The VILLAGE SCHOOL READER, by C. S. Round 1s. 6d. n.), contains extracts from White's "S "Compleat Angler," and other books in prose or i with country life; at the end we suddenly hop from t rat to the Death of Nelson, Tennyson's "Armada of patriotic cast. This spoils the unity of the each separate piece is good and interesting. haphazard system ours must be to produce such schools, then, have actually killed the old culture o man, for an old peasant would know all the natu gives and more. And books are to restore it! child is to know nothing of such things! Will a contain extracts on the habits of newsvendors cabs? Surely a cycle of Readers ought to be pla each subject of interest would find a place

Mr. J. Brown, who edits Book IV. of the Gallic War (Blackie's Illustrated Series, 1s.6d., with vocabulary), has given too much introduction and rather too many notes. The portrait illustrations are good, but we do not like so well the imaginary pictures which are found in this series. We are still of opinion that much of the information given in such books as these is far better left to the teacher. Does the publication of them show that the teacher is growing less competent?

Mr. H. Latter edits Horace Odes Book IV. and Carmen Saeculare, and Mr. A. S. Warman Cicero Dr. Senectute for Bell's Illustrated Classical Series, 1s.6d. each, with vocabularies. The introductions are satisfactory, the notes rather too full, and the illustrations, especially in the Cicero, interesting.

Mr. G. H. Nall has produced a scholarly edition for schools of Cicero's Pro Archia (Macmillan, 1s. 6d.). We are inclined to think that the notes are somewhat too copious. The index of proper names is a useful feature; and such faults as we find are all on the side of excessive tenderness to stupid students.

Professor Sonnenschein's edition of the Rudens of Plautus (Clarendon Press, 4s. 6d.) is an abbreviation of the same editor's larger edition published in 1891. Its immediate raison d'être lies in the fact that the Plautus is one of the 1902 subjects for the pass B.A. of the University of London; but it will be useful for all students of the author. The text is interleaved with blank sheets for purposes of annotation—a useful feature; and the edition as a whole commands our highest praise.

Roman History.

Mr. A. H. J. Greenidge's Roman Public Life (Macmillan, 10s. 6d.) traces the growth of the Roman Constitution and explains its working in the later days of the Republic and the earlier days of the Empire. It is a book for those who want really to know their ancient Rome, and not merely to know their Roman history as a series of incidents. The work is done with a thoroughness that it used to be the fashion to call "German," though it is nowadays as common in England as anywhere else. Every statement made is, where necessary, supported by a footnote, a reference to authority, and a quotation. The advanced student of Roman history will use it side by side with his Mommsen, and will find that it tells him much that he could never have got from Mommsen. It is not such good reading as Mommsen, but that was inevitable in view of the great attention given to minute detail. It will step at once into the front rank of educational works.

A First Latin Reader.

The Fables of Ophelia's (Part I.), by A. D. Godley (Arnold, 9d.), is a first reading book in Latin for young children. The subjects are taken from every-day life, the language is simple, the vocabulary not too large. The stories themselves are natural and bright. One or two details we might question. "Personal (and possessive) pronouns are often omitted"; true, but not at haphazard. They are always omitted unless emphatic; why is not that said at once? Such phrases as inquit pater are not unexampled, but the rule is not to allow any word to stand with inquit in parenthesis. Pater eius ei dicit is not likely to have been said by a Roman. Bibere fumum is the phrase actually used for smoking, when smoking was known (see p. 36). On the whole, the book is good.

Greek Plays.

Two editions of Euripides, Medea are before us, one by Mr. T. Nicklin in Bell's Illustrated Classics (2s.), one by Messrs. J. [illegible] the Tutorial Edition are very elementary, and, as [illegible] go into principles, but stop short at smoothing difficulti[illegible] of them being just statements of rules to be fou[illegible] grammar. In the abstract we do not like this plan [illegible] books are suited to their purpose of preparing for exa[illegible] as at present conducted.

Mr. A. W. Upcott edits Euripides, Hecuba, [illegible] Illustrated Series (with vocabulary, 1s. 6d.). The gene[illegible] duction is repeated in the plays of this series, and is [illegible] In the notes we find the astonishing statement that [illegible] not known to the ancients (926). Why should it be [illegible] the article used for the relative in choruses imita[illegible] poetry (634)? Mr. Upcott apparently does not know [illegible] was a great honour to embroider the peplos (169). [illegible] examples of the limitations of the notes. It is very di[illegible] write good notes, and the task is too lightly undertake[illegible] of these, however, are accurate as far as they go; but, [illegible] there are too many. Alas! the choruses are translated [illegible] as well.

There is much to recommend Mr. M. A. Bayfield's S[illegible] Elektra (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.), though it can hardly be m[illegible] that a new school edition of the play is wanted. The [illegible] and many of the notes are far too long for school use; [illegible] comments on the characters and the dramatic criticism [illegible] There is an instructive note on 37 which gives a n[illegible] examples of "the free use" of verbs and adjecti[illegible] editor might have seen a principle in them; as it is, he [illegible] a list. The principle seems to be that the idea (simpl[illegible] plex) was conveyed not by words but by the whole ph[illegible] the elasticity of inflexion enabled the Greeks to set out [illegible] with great variety of suggestion and emphasis. There [illegible] the text for an essay in this note. The principle mi[illegible] helped Mr. Bayfield to see more clearly through the a[illegible] in apposition to the sentence. Mr. Bayfield suggests [illegible] interpretation, that γῆς ἰσομαρ' ἀήρ means "air that per[illegible] earth equally with the sunlight." Appendices d[illegible] particles, epic, idioms, and metre. Mr. Bayfield ignore[illegible] of his "epic" εἰ with subjunctive in Aristophanes, whic[illegible] new light on it. What was the relation of epic to old A[illegible]

The Odyssey.

Homer's Odyssey, Book I., edited by Mr. E. C. M[illegible] (Bell's Intermediate Illustrated Series), has a good s[illegible] the Homeric dialect, but for the rest shows signs of has[illegible] Marchant is so uncritical as to accept Reichel's expla[illegible] χαλκοχιτῶνες, supposing that a word which means "c[illegible] bronze" could be applied to a naked warrior behin[illegible] leather shield. He also gives a warrior from the we[illegible] Mycenaean vase as typical of Homer's day, and M[illegible] pottery as Homeric. Simonides of Cos (p. 2) s[illegible] Simonides of Amorgos; ἱερὸς is not connected with the [illegible] word for "fire" (on line 2); the note on ῥάπτεζαν (1[illegible] not be understood by a boy as it stands; nor could th[illegible] (29) "ethics are in a rudimentary stage." The no[illegible] rule are sound. A short vocabulary of un-Attic [illegible] added. The illustrations are often good, but not clos[illegible] to the authorities. They are too big for the text, wh[illegible] some pages but a small fringe above and below.

French.

We may draw the favourable attention of students o[illegible] literature to A Notebook of French Literature, by [illegible] Yorke (Blackie, 6s. n.). It only consists of extracts, w[illegible]

the satirists like Scarron and Furetière, who covered these novelists with ridicule, might have been represented with advantage. Only a very few pages are devoted to the mediæval French of the Chanson de Roland, the Roman de la Rose, &c.; but that is quite right and proper. As Mr. Yorke observes, mediæval French is "a special and separate subject, a knowledge of which need not be expected generally from a student of French literature." The volume before us covers the ground up to the end of the eighteenth century, ending with André de Chénier and Madame de Staël. Another volume is to deal with nineteenth-century authors.

Supposing that a new French Grammar is wanted—an hypothesis open to doubt—then Mr. Arthur B. Wall's FRENCH PRIMER (Clarendon Press, 2s.) is wanted. It is lucid, logical, and well-displayed, and quite calculated to meet the wants of middle and lower forms. The irregularities of the verbs are particularly well shown. It should be noted that this grammar does not include exercises.

POUCHET, by Edouard Laboulaye, is edited for schools by Mr. W. R. Poole of Merchant Taylors' School (Arnold, 9d.). The text strikes us as rather difficult for "pupils of thirteen and fourteen," an extensive and unusual vocabulary being drawn upon; but the notes are voluminous enough to put the dullest safely through.

MORCEAUX CHOISIS, edited by Mr. R. L. A. du Pontet (Arnold, 1s. 6d.), is a book of selections meant to give practice in different styles. The pieces are classified as Narrative, Descriptive, Didactic, Oratory, Biography, Epistle, and Anecdote, and Comedy. The selection has been very carefully done, and comprises extracts from nearly sixty standard authors of high rank. Short biographical notes and a very few others are added. This book will be useful both in revision and for unseen translation. It may be recommended.

German.

A DUAL READER, GERMAN AND ENGLISH, by Mr. Oliver Jones (Allman, 1s.), has exactly the same matter in the two languages on pages facing each other. It is meant, no doubt, to be learnt and construed viva voce both ways; such a system has its use as a help, though it does not "educate" the faculty of discovery. For those who desire instruction, such as clerks, and not education the book will serve well.

Miss L. A. Lowe's FIRST GERMAN BOOK (Blackie, 1s. 6d.) is a collection of simple stories and scenes well suited for very young beginners. It will not do for those who begin at fourteen or later.

Mathematics.

In EUCLID, Books I.-IV., VI., and XI., by C. Smith and Sophie Bryan (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.), the authors have not hesitated in numerous cases to replace traditional proofs by better ones and to introduce a few new propositions. Thus the familiar proof of I. 24 has gone, while III. 26-29 are proved by superposition, making them independent of one another. Book II. has been altogether revised and simplified. The Fifth Book disappears, and such definitions and propositions as are required for the VIth. have been incorporated with it, a wise arrangement in view of the usual treatment—or rather non-treatment—of Book V. Good notes and exercises follow the propositions, and at the end of each book are carefully selected "Additional Propositions" and Riders. We hope that the book may succeed in directing more attention to this part of geometrical teaching. The matter of the book is in all respects worthy of the authors and deserves the careful attention of teachers. The arrangement leaves something to be desired, propositions, exercises, and notes being jumbled together without spaces between them, making reference less convenient than it might be.

FIRST YEAR'S ALGEBRA (French and Osborn; Churchill, 1s. 6d.) consists of the first thirteen chapters of the authors' Elementary Algebra. The language is very simple and the Religious.

The Rev. G. H. S. Walpole, who edits Jt pats Rivington's Handbooks to the Bible and Prayer has some common sense, but it is a pity editors of think it necessary to guard so carefully against I It is impossible to understand the sentences, " intended for spiritual persons—i.e., for persons Spirit with spiritual insight. It is supposed tha able to interpret the book by the moral standard Whose guidance it was written." The editor goes o rightly, that the stories are obviously true to li that need be said. No amount of spiritual insight death of Sisera anything else but treacherous; I kind of thing is done. The notes are not always to the Athenians always cut off the hands of prison if they did what has this to do with the lex talion may gain useful hints from the Lessons, but so rather childish.

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH TO A.D. 325, by the R (Rivingtons, 1s. n.), is a succinct and clear accoun of the Christian Church from the Apostolic Age of Nicæa. It is a useful companion to the New it traces the first stages of Christian ceremonial i way. The reader will also learn something Montanism, Alexandria, and the Councils, which to most. The book is well written, and, so far as it, accurate; but a good deal is omitted, which made good in other volumes of the series.

Mr. M. Morison's TIME TABLE OF MO (Constable, 12s. 6d. n.) is likely to be very uselu and to help teachers in making their history by being more comprehensive. It is a large laborious tabular arrangement, the dates runni page which is divided into vertical column countries. There are pedigree tables, and similar end, and some excellent maps showing Europ periods.

Not the least of the merits of Mr. T. C. Weath ACCIDENCE (Blackwood, 1s. 6d.) is the clearness o Greek and English. It is mainly intended for lad scholarships at the public schools, though it cont the purposes of students somewhat more advanc fairly full account, for instance, of Homeric for much syntax is given. The arrangement is log and the book can be recommended.

GREEK GRAMMAR PAPERS, compiled by Mr (Blackie, 1s. 6d.), are the work of a practical te Liddell is not always judicious in his way of p "Give some rules for the formation of the weak and passive" (36) is not a suitable question. But the book will certainly be found useful.

CLOUGH'S CERTIFICATE HISTORY OF EU (Ralph, Holland, and Co.), is an examination boo ing to go into detail, which would be impossib sketch (and rather a dry sketch) of the chief country, with necessary tables and maps. It do too much, and may be said to be fairly successful.

For Lower Standards we have THE BRITISH IS in New Century Geographical Readers No. IVb. (F which give brief descriptions of towns and an eye to the picturesque. There are a large num some (very crude) in colour. The book is better kind of geography, but seems to fall between two are several maps, which have this good point, tha itself to one feature—contours, commerce, railway But the mountains ought not to be indicated by BIRDS OF THE AIR, by Arabella B. Buckley (C reader, with gorgeous coloured pictures, well de

FICTION.

Mr. Gilbert Parker.

Mr. Gilbert Parker has presented us with many pictures of the life of French Canada, painting into them with masterly touch its old-world grace, its gaiety, its pathos, its simplicity, its devotion to sentiment, its heroisms little and great, but he has given us nothing better than those contained in THE RIGHT OF WAY (Heinemann, 6s.). Prefaced to the book is a Note in which he apologizes for appearing to disregard a statement made in "The Lane that had no Turning" that that tale was the last he should write of French Canada, and in explanation he tells us that the present volume was in reality written before the other. Unquestionably Mr. Parker is quite capable of essaying, perhaps conquering, another field; but why, it must be asked, should he wish to leave this in which he has achieved such remarkable distinction? His Channel Island book was a good enough novel, but it is not to be spoken of in the same breath as "The Right of Way." Still, the Seeing Eye will carry him far. And Mr. Parker is a man of wide ambitions. Here, at any rate, he takes us back once more to the ground he has made his own, and we are grateful for it.

"The Right of Way" falls into two unequal divisions—one, contained in the first eight chapters, is spread over no more than sixty pages, while the other, extending over three hundred pages, takes up the rest of the volume. This statement of the purely mechanical side of the book at once suggests that the first division is in the nature of a prelude, and that it is the second which embraces the main theme. Both parts are concerned with the life of a certain Charley Steele; in the earlier he is "Beauty Steele," avocat of Montreal, a man who had never lost a criminal case, but flâneur to his finger tips, and a fop. He is brilliant, cynical, heartless, conscienceless, atheistical—a man who surveys, with cold, penetrating, relentless criticism the heavens above and the earth beneath. The stare of interrogation, cool, nonchalant, impertinent, with which Steele looks out on life—"his elemental habit," as the author terms it—is given curious point by the fact that he constantly wears and uses an eyeglass; the eyeglass plays quite a prominent part in the book, but we wish Mr. Parker had not stubbornly persisted throughout in speaking of it as a "monocle." In the opening chapter of the novel Beauty Steele, in a trial for murder, wrings a verdict of "Not guilty" from the jury against the weight of evidence; his brilliant speech for the defence achieves this much, but—and here we find the flaw in Steele—he has drawn its inspiration from the "bottle." Alcohol, which stupefies most brains, has on his a stimulating and clarifying power. In the court-room is a young lady, upon whom his address to the jury makes such an impression that she agrees to marry him although her heart is given to another. Five years pass, and Steele is now a confirmed dipsomaniac. On bad terms with his wife, he has corrupted her brother, who, he discovers, has embezzled a large sum of money—the moral guilt of which rests upon him. As the result of a drunken riot at a riverside tavern, Steele is knocked on the head, and disappears beneath the waters of the St. Lawrence. This, in brief, is the prelude. All the rest of the story is concerned with the redemption, the moral and physical rehabilitation, of Beauty Steele. Rescued from drowning by the very man whom he had saved from the capital sentence by his eloquence some years before, he is taken away to Vadrome Mountain, on whose slopes his saviour has a shanty. This real heroine of the story, Rosalie Evanturel, an a charming, lovable, and even heroic woman. It is Ste for her that is the instrument mainly of his regenera other influences are also brought to bear upon him. variously work out, how the book sweeps on to its end, how the threads of the tale are all woven toget the finished web—all glowing with a wealth of co have no space to tell, though, in any case, it would be fair to go more into detail than we have done. Th figure of the novel, Beauty Steele, is the kind of char Parker loves to draw—a proud, haughty, brave, reck by no means blameless, but yet with the instincts of man. It is the figure dear to romance—and, in a way us all in its appeal to the heart and the imagination portraits Mr. Parker paints for us in his own admirable as a rule, they are excellent, they are alive. One o the incidents in "The Right of Way" are a trifle fo Mr. Parker drapes them with such artistry that it second thoughts we notice their improbability.

"The Potter and the Clay."

THE POTTER AND THE CLAY, by Miss Maud Howard (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), is one of the novels whi with the familiar testimonial as to extraordina from America. We have learnt to discount the val recommendation, but "The Potter and the Clay" is as possible to the "common form" romance of the Civil War, in which the Transatlantics revel. It tells English military life in Scotland and in India. Moreov story of emotions that are not commonplace, told wit sincerity, and with a rigorous exclusion of all un prolixities. This is a new thing in American fiction as we And though there are American turns of phrase insistent, and, as we think, a touch of strangeness author's notion as to the relationship between Englis and young ladies, symbolized in the heroine speakin military friends as "both you fellows"—the pictu whole is a true one. The tie between Cary, the he the one hand, and Stewart and Trevelyan on the ot of whom she has known from childhood, and who both is full of tenderness and subtle feeling. Trevelya mastering passion, the military dishonour into which him, and his subsequent redemption, form the keynot book, and give us a fine and original conception viv pathetically worked out. It is, in fact, a really powe with an imperative and unfailing appeal to the throughout, and it is not often that the first book, as w it to be, of a young writer can be so highly praised.

Dolly Dialogues.

Messrs. Nisbet send us a handsome new edition DOLLY DIALOGUES (10s. 6d.) containing some new dial some pictures. The new dialogues are very much lik ones—neither better nor worse. The illustrations are expert American artist, Mr. Howard Chandler Chri ruthlessly Americanizes all Mr. Anthony Hope's Engli Mr. Carter comes out like the American Mr. Winston and Dolly Mickleham might just as well be Daisy some young lady of the Belle of New York Company, d to be photographed "in private life." This is inartisti the pictures themselves are good enough, and we shou see an English artist try his hand at the subject.

Mr. Crockett.

dinna hand wi' the Papishes—nor yet wi' the Englishers. And I wadna advise ony one o' ye to say that I do," we have a premonition that we are in for a dull quarter of an hour with "the miner folk of Lockfinny." From "The Fitting of the Peats" to "The Exercise-Book of Field-Marshal Prince Hantz," in each and all of the tales, Mr. Crockett is the admirable maker of stories engaged upon an occupation in which he delights. But we own he leaves us utterly unsatisfied; he does not touch life with the hand of the artist or observe the ways of men with any sincerity. The "Love Idylls" are often charming, pleasant tales with theatrical people doing noble deeds, but the mark of the book-maker is too apparent. On the other hand, those who have already enjoyed Mr. Crockett's work will find in this volume all the qualities which have helped to make him famous.

After some of the strenuous novels of the day, it is rather pleasant to turn to so ingenuous, simple, and orthodox a story as Mr. Crockett's CINDERELLA (James Clarke, 6s.). It is called on the title-page "a novel," but it is rather a tale to amuse and interest children. Cinderella is a dear little girl named Hester Sterling, who has all the prettiness and all the virtue and misfortune of a nice heroine. Owing to the unbelievable stupidity of her well-wishers, her grandmother and her father, she is very early left in a position to be swindled and ill-treated by her aunt, who is inclined to whip her in the best wicked-aunt manner, and by her uncle, the rather impossible Dr. Sylvanus Torphichan. But Hester has friends; Carus, master of Darroch, is a hero to be proud of; and early in the story he glances beneath the sunbonnet (white, not lilac, this time) of Hester, and one knows that we can trust Mr. Crockett to make all come right. "Cinderella" is lucidly and admirably written, the characters are clearly cut, the incidents plainly and surely drawn; there is a quiet piety about the book that is welcome, and a note of canny humour which, we should have thought, might have prevented the somewhat remarkable gaucherie of the plot. But Mr. Crockett tells his story freshly, and will certainly delight an increasing number of readers in the domestic circle.

In the Ruritanian Style.

In THE RED CHANCELLOR (Ward, Lock, 6s.) Sir William Magnay has written "a romance" of a petty German court, an Englishman inconveniently mixed in its intrigues, love affairs, plots, a bride, and so forth—all in a manner which has long since received the reading public's cachet of approval. Without going into the complex and always exciting details we can assure our readers that the author of "The Red Chancellor" does all these things uncommonly well. We can imagine no more entertaining companion of its kind for a railway journey nor a more exciting and agreeable volume to mitigate the rigours of an English villégiature. The title-page bears the legend "illustrated by Maurice Greiffenhagen." As a matter of fact there is only one drawing, but it really illustrates an important situation and is one of the best pictures that has appeared in a six-shilling volume in our time.

Another new-comer is "Mayne Lindsay," whose book THE WHIRLPOOL (Ward, Lock, 6s.) is what one might call a fine example of the magazine novel, crowded with excitement and the clash of swords, adventures, complications, and at least one colossal mistake of identity. Mr. Francis Bothfield, the hero, is an Englishman pitch-forked by the Fates, or "Mayne Lindsay," into what the author calls "one of the most mediæval intrigues is not essentially original; her method of telli clever and brisk, and her book has the furth containing some twenty-five drawings by Mr.

We have not seen a better illustrated book this y

Anglo-Indian Novels.

"So that is poor Elisabeth Murray?"

"That is Elisabeth Murray; but I don't t thank you for calling her poor," said Cicely, sunshade to a more becoming angle.

"Nature's mistakes are always to be pit where the weakest go to the wall," said Kenne

Cicely shook her neat little head in reproo

"I don't think that is very polite, Rob
"it sounds as if Ellie was lame or deformed."

But she laughed a little, for one's deares fortunes scarcely touch one as one's own.

"It would be better for her to be bud-rid she is," said Kennedy, and meant what he said

Thus begins Mr. M. Hamilton's POOR ELISAB Blackett, 6s.). Elisabeth's infirmity is Hindu mother's side. "The curse of India," Cicely's fi girls, who, by some "fools" marrying them, "ha of laziness, sensuousness, coarseness of mind"—and would probably have said, had not Cicely pulle
The story makes pleasant reading, despite its nu frocks and colours, and in its picture of Anglo life there is some good character-drawing, es Colonel Murray, Elisabeth's father, who is almo rage. Of course, the man who makes an unwrit "fools" marrying Hindu or Eurasian women is break that law. And the sermon would be incom closing note of tragedy. The book is one of many subject, and is apt to make the reader reflec lightness of its first half makes the followin greater. Elisabeth's lightness, the pitying symp the reader, makes her case the more acute. An it all is its fidelity to an actual phase of Anglo-I

A Government is for some people only a thi get the best of. Major Hugh Evans, in Miss novel, MOUNTAINS OF NECESSITY (Blackwood, idea to its ultimate by wedding, on what he death-bed, so that the amount that he has s widows' and orphans' fund may go to some one stated, the main idea of this book seems forc
Miss White so tells her story as to make it se
Flora Niel might do this particularly strang Hugh Evans, a woman-hater of the most s recovers, and later when Flora comes into a fort becomes interesting. Circumstance causes these another, but each is naturally far too proud t tears. How this happy issue is eventually story that Miss White has to tell. And this she d that makes it one of the most interesting nove for some time. The author knows the Anglo-In But in her infinite knowledge she quaintly s readers will not understand the ordinary nat among Anglo-Indians. Thus we are told tha level plain; but we more especially resent its by the author that she alone knows that charp bed. Apart from this, Miss White does not intelligence of her readers as many novelists do.

of fortune. His wives form a considerable portion of the story; as does Zulfiear, a young and interesting protégé of the Prince. The last third of the book gives the tale of a brave slave-girl, named Narcissus, and a weak Nawab, its moral being the effeminating power of Mahomedan polygamy.

THE EMPEROR'S DESTINY, by Surgeon-Major Greenhow (Digby, Long, 6s.), tells of the court of the Great Mogul, of a beauteous Italian damsel and a chivalrous young English artist. The local colour is not overdone and makes it interesting. Major Greenhow has written other Anglo-Indian stories with success.

"Penance."

The long humiliation of a vain self-centred woman for the loss of her only child through her own neglect is the theme of PENANCE, by Leslie Keith (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). The loss of the child and the tragic end of the mother at the close of the story are well described, and there are pleasant and true pictures of life in Germany and also of an English country vicarage. (We would suggest to the author, by the way, that "ruridecanal" is not the correct adjective to "rural dean.") These make agreeable relief. But the thing is too spun out, and the tracts of story which lie between the important landmarks are often not quite interesting enough to detain the reader on his way. With stronger incident and a dialogue of more point this would be a good novel. As it is it has many merits both in its scenes and its characters, and we can commend it to leisurely readers.

In the Canadian Bush.

BONANZA, by Mr. Ernest G. Henham (Hutchinson and Co., 6s.), opens with an interesting presentment of life in a bush shanty by Yellow Sands River. The teller is one Rupert Petrie, twenty-one years of age and ignorant as Akshelah, the Cree beauty who bears him such sympathetic company in his search for "Bonanza," the Canadian land of wealth. In fact the two are a pair of ideal children of nature. What they lack in training is replaced by natural cuteness, yet their motives are refreshingly honest. His father, many years a goldseeker, dies in the shanty, leaving the usual incomplete key to hidden treasure. With Rupert goes his instigator, an old factor of the onetime Hudson Bay Company. Their first stopping place is Gull Island, where we have one of the brutal fist-and-wrestling fights of that lawless corner of the earth, and very well described it is. Then comes a straight start for the gold, the hunters nine, in two parties; and a good idea of what follows is given in: "In determining the position, I made it out to be that Leblanc and Morrison were against every one; MacCaskill and myself against Redpath and the Icelander, with, incidentally, the two thick-skulled sailors; Redpath always for himself; Olaffson (the Icelander) nominally for the adventurer, actually for himself. MacCaskill and myself formed the only genuine alliance, with Akshelah to aid us." The trial of the "sneak-thief" is a most vivid and true piece of colouring not overdone. The tale ends with Rupert and his young Cree wife turning their backs on the world to begin a combined Utopian life on his old clearance by the fair waters of the Yellow Sand. Yet, like a ghost, at the end of a feast, there rises in the reviewer's mind the query: Where did Rupert learn to write this book?

"The Seven Houses."

THE SEVEN HOUSES (Ward, Lock, and Co., 6s.) of Mr. Hamilton Drummond are not such as we live in. They are—the "houses" of Life, Kinsfolk, Marriage, Death, Religion, Honour, and Friends and Enemies; and they make the seven parts into which the story is divided. As in his previous book, Mr. [illegible] uncle, Henri, Canon de Mont-de-Sevan. Plots, [illegible] plague, and fighting follow in due order. Through [illegible] Denise goes, a brave, winsome heroine, so entirely [illegible] good that she fully deserves to be left as we leave her.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The Exhibition of Early Printed Books, at present in the King's Library of the British Museum, has for [illegible] authorities with an opportunity of issuing an illustrated [illegible] the works. The arrangement is chronological, beginning [illegible] the first block-books of Germany and the Netherlands [illegible] admirable illustrations of types and woodcuts, showing [illegible] of printing in its first rude stages. Some notes on fac[illegible] ings are another feature in a guide which possesses a [illegible] value to the bibliographer.

We are sorry to note the death of Mr. Edward [illegible] librarian of the Camberwell Public Libraries since their [illegible] ment some ten years ago. Prior to his appointment Mr. [illegible] was a member of the Camberwell Vestry, and form[illegible] library which was undoubtedly an influence in the [illegible] the Acts. He was the author of some books of verse, and [illegible] published a Cornish romance entitled "Hugh Trebarw[illegible]

The Bethnal-green Free Library is for the third [illegible] aided by the Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral So[illegible] will, in December next, give a concert at the People's [illegible]

Another crusade against the appearance of betti[illegible] the papers at a Public Library has been instituted [illegible] where the "blacking out" of all such news has bee[illegible] Some of the council are scarcely sanguine as to the [illegible] result of this measure. We are disposed to share the [illegible] It was at Aston Manor that the "blacking out" [illegible] first begun. There the latest development is the ref[illegible] committee to allow any sectarian publications to app[illegible] reading-rooms.

Mr. Carnegie will give £5,000 to Ilfracombe, [illegible] Dalkeith, £7,500 to Ilkeston, £15,000 to Waterford, [illegible] to Thurso for the erection of free libraries under cond[illegible]

The vexed question of the assessment of librari[illegible] rates has been revived at Perth, where the library [illegible] are being sued for school and poor rates over eighte[illegible] to Whitsuntide, 1900. At that date a certificate of [illegible] was granted, under the Scientific Societies Exemptio[illegible] is now contended that the exemption is not retrospe[illegible] a test case the matter is important. Surely the title [illegible] tion was as clear in 1898 as in 1900, and we may hop[illegible] principle will be affirmed.

Mr. Thomas Greenwood, having acquired the co[illegible] second edition of Edward Edwards' "Memoirs of L[illegible] as far as the sheets were finally revised by the a[illegible] generously distributed them as gifts to the original s[illegible] where these could be traced and the remainder among [illegible] of the different libraries of the kingdom.

A scheme for assisting the village and working men [illegible] has been adopted by the Department of Agriculture and [illegible] Instruction in Ireland. Grants not exceeding £3 are [illegible] tributed for the purchase of technical books from a[illegible] list of standard works, dealing with agriculture [illegible] chemistry, dressmaking, &c. The design is excellent [illegible] induce a belief in the good intentions of the Governme[illegible]

The United States Bureau of Education latel[illegible] report on Libraries in the States. There are 5,383 li[illegible] over 1,000 volumes each, about half of which are su[illegible] taxation and half by subscription. New York with [illegible] Massachusetts with 571 take the lead, though ne[illegible] founded in the Western States largely account for the [illegible] 1,357 in the total number over those in existence five [illegible] The increase in the number of libraries is chiefly [illegible] munificence of Mr. Carnegie, who during the past [illegible] given more than £2,600,000 for the purpose. In the Un[illegible]

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—I.

Those who share the "curse of modern armies" view of war correspondents should read Mr. Julian Corbett's article in the Anglo-Saxon Review on "War Correspondence and the Censorship under Elizabeth." There were, of course, no newspapers in those days, but there were pamphlets, and when the great expedition against Cadiz and the Treasure Fleet took place in 1596, each of several prominent officers took out his own private pamphleteer in order that he might impose his own version of the operations on his countrymen. There were two pamphleteers riding post-haste to London from Plymouth and Portsmouth respectively. The Portsmouth man broke down within three hours of his destination and the Plymouth man got in first. Meantime, however, the Government got wind of what was happening, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, who happened to be Press censor, forbade any but the official version to be printed. Most of the others are still in manuscript at the British Museum, at Lambeth Palace, and elsewhere. Decidedly, whatever Lord Wolseley may think, the change has been for the better.

Another article in the Review gives some unpublished letters addressed to Sheridan, together with one or two written by the dramatist. One of the latter shows how Sheridan used to express himself when borrowing money:—

> My dear Peake,—If you gave me £8 on Monday night, I have lost £5 or gave it by mistake to the coachman. I find Mrs. S. here without a shilling to pay even washing, and I have not a farthing left. I conjure you to send me £10, and by G—d this shall be the last advance you shall make.

Sheridan's financial troubles in dealing with the Drury Lane actresses are also exemplified by a very strong letter from Miss Farren. Other correspondents are Burke, James Mackintosh, Hervey, Thomas Moore, and Coleridge, who replies to an invitation to write a tragedy. Coleridge says:—

> The attempt I shall make more readily as I have reason to believe that I can hope without expecting and, of course, meet rejections without suffering disappointment. Indeed, I have conceived so high an idea of what a tragedy ought to be that I am certain that I shall find myself dissatisfied with my production; and I can therefore safely promise that I will neither be surprised or wounded if I should find you of the same opinion.

He was probably wounded, though he may have known Sheridan well enough not to be surprised, when, on his sending in his tragedy, the Drury Lane manager did not even write to acknowledge its receipt.

Messrs. Barr, Le Gallienne, and Hichens contribute short stories to the number, and the binding is copied from an edition of the "Architecture of Vitruvius," printed in Paris in 1547, and now in the Bodleian Library.

In the Nineteenth Century Mr. W. Laird Clowes writes graphically of President Roosevelt, who contributed to his "History of the Royal Navy."

> He is no swashbuckler, no fire-eater, no jingo. He will not, like Mr. Cleveland, play needlessly with powder. He will not assent to the despatch of gratuitously irritating State papers, even on the eve of a Presidential election. He has too exalted an idea of the dignity of his country willingly to suffer her to utter a single official word which she does not mean and intend to abide by.

George Eliot and George Sand are compared and contrasted by the Hon. Lady Ponsonby. The Hon. Mrs. Goodhart writes out "Fragments of Mr. Gladstone's Conversation," taken from her diary written when she met him at Naples in 1888-89. The talk seems to have been rather well-informed than brilliant. Other articles are "A Winter's Walk in Canada," by Arnold indifferent War Minister seems likely to bec successful Secretary for Foreign Affairs." I record is not less favourably regarded by an am looker," who says:—"The present Viceroy ha two years and a half of office, shown how Ind governed." Lighter articles are those by Mr. H on "Ravenna" and Mr. T. A. Cook on "Forei Henley Regatta." Admit the foreign oarsman pre does not employ a professional coach is Mr. Cook's tion. There are also some poems by Fiona Macleo

In the Contemporary the inevitable article
Roosevelt is by Mr. Poultney Bigelow, who apprel President "would welcome an understanding betwe of the English-speaking world, so that, to that ex war would be impossible." Mr. H. Morgan Browne, the great economic question, concludes that "it to doubt that on balance British commerce is success." The Rev. Charles J. Shebbeare vindi Church position, to which, differing from some ot attributes "intellectual strength." There are a Miss Emily Hobhouse on "Concentration Camps
Thomas Holmes on "The Making of the Hooligan.

The reader's curiosity will be excited by the
the National Review, of an article on "Some Le South African War," by Sir Charles Warren. greater importance is Mr. W. R. Lawson's on " Anxiety of France." "In France every impor
the national income appears to be retrograding" which is carefully substantiated by statistics. M more, M.P., writing of "The Succession to the casts his vote for Mr. Balfour, throwing dou Chamberlain's discretion. The Rev. William F
"The Prospects of Catholicism." He means Rom seems sanguine, believing that "unless ideals die humanity must one day pass on into a great R
"The Future of South America" is an important s by an anonymous contributor. His view is that Germany and Italy will compel the United Sta
the Monroe doctrine; but we fancy he underrate resistance of the South American principalities. T of Spain shows that this is a factor to be reckoned

In Macmillan Mr. Algernon Blackwood comp of his adventures "Down the Danube in a Can and Mr. J. L. Etty compares Shakespeare's King King John of history.

In the New Liberal Review Mr. Churton Co
"popular quotations," with his usual erudition, familiar sayings to unfamiliar sources. "First cat is one case in point.

> It has always been assumed that this prec > found in Mrs. Glasse's celebrated book on co > well known to our great-grandmothers. But > Glasse says is something very different. S > directions for what is called "casing" the har > wrapping it in paper and basting it with g > describing this process in cookery she says, " > hare," and out of this misconception has sprung

A third is "Curses like young chickens c roost":—

> This, being in Greek, is assumed to com > Greek writer. It was really a saying of a crack > fellow named Will Tyler, a relation of the > Coleridge, struck with its originality, turned it > coolly attributing it to some mysterious Gree > Southey prefixed this Greek version as a motto > of Kehama." And so it has come to pass that a > extemporized in the chimney-corner of an Englis > a half-witted rustic has become one of the > supposed "classical" proverbs.

Correspondence.

WHO KILLED AMY ROBSART?

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your able criticism, last week, of my little book there remains an item as to which I beg respectfully to submit that your reviewer has misrepresented me. He writes: "On the main question, too, Mr. Sidney should at least have noticed the elaborate statement of Anthony Wood, based on tradition as well as gossip." Now, I can assure him that I was, at the time of writing the book, thoroughly acquainted with Wood's statement, but I rejected its information as not being of the very least historical value. Wood's account, with the exception of the reference to a certain chamber at Cumnor, is not "based on tradition," but entirely on "Leycester's Commonwealth," with which it is so precisely in accord that the language used is often literally the same, word for word. Wood, therefore, adopts all the errors of the author of the "Commonwealth," inclusive of that which makes "Sir John Robertset" alive at the date of his daughter's funeral. Even the information about Dr. Bayley (to whom I have referred in my book) contains nothing that the "Commonwealth" had left unsaid. That part of Wood's statement "based on gossip" was derived from mere village chatter, and is by no means correct.

I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

October 7. PHILIP SIDNEY.

DICKENS EXAMINATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Vernon's Discovery o' the "Students' Guide to the School of Literne Fictitie" mentioned in Literature Oct. 5 has been anticipat sd. In "Examinations in Fiction" in the January number of Cornhill, Mr. Lang refers to it, and supplies the required Elegy on Little Nell, in the style of Pope, and the translation into the style of Dr. Johnson of "Poetry's unnat'ral; no man ever talked in poetry."

Yours very truly,

JOHN D. HAMILTON.

The Athenæum, Glasgow, Oct. 7.

"TWO GIRLS AND A DREAM."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I was very interested in your short notice of my book, "Two Girls and a Dream," which appeared in your last issue, and you will, perhaps, allow me to rectify what I consider a slight error in your criticism. When my heroine exclaims that for a writer to succeed (succeed from a pecuniary point of view, let it be remembered) he must write not the best, but the worst that is in him, you look upon this as a fallacy. Yet the fact that a writer like Mr. Israel Zangwill, to quote one instance only, whom any competent critic will allow to be one of the masters of modern prose, is less popular than, say, Mr. Guy Boothby or Mrs. L. T. Meade, seems to me convincing proof that my assertion is based on facts. I feel quite confident that you will find many authors to share this belief.

Hoping you will kindly find a space to insert these few lines, I am, Sir, yours faithfully, editor of all Mr. Murray's educational works. The p vary from a shilling to half-a-crown. Among early vo "First Makers of England: Julius Cæsar, King Arthu the Great," by Lady Magnus; "Telegraphs and Tele by Sir W. H. Preece; and "Electric Wireman's M W. C. Clinton, demonstrator in the Pender Laborat volumes specially adapted to the preliminary examinat City and Guilds of London Institute; "A Short H Coinage," by Lord Avebury; and "The Life of Ch the Rev. H. C. Beeching.

JEAN DELAIRE.

Mr. Murray has also a teacher's edition of Dean "Life of Dr. Arnold"—with a preface by Sir Joshua work set by the Board of Education for the Elementary Certificate, 1902, and a cheaper edition of Darwin's "of Man." The latter, like "The Origin of Species" issued in half-a-crown form—will soon follow. "The Ve Naturalist" out of copyright. Mr. Murray's repo copied from the latest editions of Darwin's works; it is first editions that are coming out of copyright. Oth announced by Mr. Murray for this month are the essays by expert writers on "National Education," Mr. Laurie Magnus; "The Great Persian War an liminaries," by Mr. G. B. Grundy, who has made special of Thermopylæ and Platæa; and "A General H Europe, 350-1900," by Messrs. Oliver Thatcher and F Schwill, and adapted by Mr. Arthur Hassall for English and schools.

Mr. Arthur Hassall is also editing the new edition "History of Modern Europe" (which Messrs. Bell ar ing in six volumes), and continuing it to the en nineteenth century. The first two volumes have appeared; the third and fourth will be ready immediat

Mr. Heinemann announces "The French and Eng Book: A new Dictionary of the French and English Lan by Drs. H. Edgren, and P. B. Burnet, M.A., with an tion by R. J. Lloyd, Hon. Reader in Phonetics in the U College, Liverpool; and "A new Italian-English Wor based on the same principles, is in course of preparatio

Messrs. Heffer and Sons, of Cambridge, have in two additions to their series of "Problems and Ex English History," by Mr. J. S. Lindsey, of which Book 1603) appeared in June. One of the new volumes, Book with the period 1688-1832. The other, Book II, covers span of British History. And a portion, as far as also be issued separately as a (London) Matriculation N of English History, while a similar book dealing with th of European History, 1814-1848, will be issued early in These "Notebooks" are designed to form the nucleus books, and will be available in an interleaved form.

Wessex and Mr. Thomas Hardy.

Professor Bertram Windle's work on "The W Thomas Hardy," which Mr. Lane will publish next grew into book form when the author was editing a ha the Wessex country. Its aim is to lead the reader to t of the novels, and there, by means of quotations, to Hardy describe them himself. The illustrations ar Edmund H. New. In the concluding chapters a resu topography of each novel is given.

Mr. Hardy's new volume of poems, by the way called "Poems of the Past and the Present," and in the complete uniform edition of his works. It will be by Messrs. Harper about the middle of next month.

Mr. O'Donoghue, whose Irish Poets we notice else also at work upon a similar compilation dealing w Artists. It will include notices of upwards of 2,000 Ir tors, painters, engravers, architects, &c. This work is t of many years' research in the libraries of Dublin and It will be issued in three parts, Part I. of which Mr. O'D hopes to have ready in the spring.

Two of the articles in this month's Mercure de F

sporting tale by Finch Mason, entitled "Mad Lorrimer"; a volume of Anglo-Indian stories by Allen Perrin; and "Dross," a novel by Mr. Harold Tremayne. For next week they promise "The Rance's Rubies," by Dr. Helen Bourchier; "Thirteen Ways Home," a collection of stories by E. Nesbit; an eighteenth-century novel by Theo. Gift, entitled "The Case of a Man with his Wife"; and a novel of South American life by Marvin Dana, entitled the "Woman of Orchids." Among Christmas books they will publish "Louis Wain's Annual."

"Mr. Punch's Dramatic Sequels," to appear at the end of this month (Bradbury, Agnew), will contain the continuations to famous plays by St. John Hankin which have appeared in Punch, illustrated by Mr. E. J. Wheeler, who has introduced the portraits of many prominent actors.

Books to look out for at once.

"The Life of Robert Louis Stevenson." By Graham Balfour. Methuen. 2 vols. 22s.
[The authorized biography. Uniform with the Edinburgh Edition.]

"Links with the Past." By Mrs. Charles Bagot. Arnold. 16s.
[Mrs. Bagot was born eighty years ago, and her parents and grandparents took their share in public affairs.]

"The Wessex of Thomas Hardy." By Prof. B. Windle. Lane. 21s. n.
[See note under "Authors and Publishers."]

"The Theatre: Its Development in France and England, and a History of Its Greek and Latin Origins." By Charles Hastings. (Authorized Translation.) Duckworth. 8s. n.
[With an introductory letter by Victorien Sardou.]

"Sunshine and Surf: Being a Year's Wanderings in the South Seas." By Douglas B. Hall and Lord Albert Osborne. Black. 12s. 6d.
[Illustrated.]

"A History of the Police in England." By Captain Melville Lee. Methuen. 7s. 6d.

"The Way to Rome." By Hilaire Belloc. Allen. 6s. n.
[Notes of travel in Italy.]

"Omnibuses and Cabs: Their Origin and History." By Henry Charles Moore. Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d.
[Illustrated from old engravings, prints, and photographs.]

"Tales of Dunstable Weir." By "Zack." Methuen. 6s.
[Photogravure frontispiece.]

"The Embarrassing Orphan." By W. E. Norris. Methuen. 6s.

"Young Barbarians." By Ian Maclaren. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

"Yorke, the Adventurer, and other Tales." By Louis Becke. Fisher Unwin. 6s.
[Another volume of Pacific tales. "Green Cloth" Library.]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS,

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

ART.

CONVERSATIONS OF JAMES NORTHCOTE, R.A., WITH JAMES WARD ON ART AND ARTISTS. Ed. by E. Fletcher. 9×5¾, 258 pp. Methuen. 10s. 6d.
[Mr. Fletcher gives a life of Northcote, and edits his conversations from the note books left by James Ward, his friend and admirer, who died 1850.]

THE ENGLISH PRE-RAPHAELITE PAINTERS. By P. Bate. Second Ed. 8×5¼, 124 pp. Bell. 7s. 6d. n.
[This edition has been revised, and contains additional pictures by the brethren and those who were, or are, under their influence.]

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF MAJOR-GEN. SIR R. MU'RDOCH SMITH. By W. K. Dickson. 9×6, 376 pp. Blackwood. 15s. n.
[Sir R. Murdoch Smith was for twenty years Director of the Indo-European Government Telegraph in Persia; and, later, Director of the Edinburgh Museum of Science and Art. He carried out valuable archæological research in Persia, Halicarnassus, Cyrene, &c. Died 1900.]

OWEN GLYNDYWR. (Heroes of the Nations.) By A. G. Bradley. 7¼×5¼, 357 pp. Putnam. 5s.
["The last and most celebrated of the soldier patriots of Wales," 1359-1415. By the author of "Highways and Byways of North Wales." Many photographic views.]

FAMOUS PIANISTS OF TO-DAY AND YESTERDAY. FAMOUS VIOLINISTS OF TO-DAY AND YESTERDAY. By H. C. Lahee.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

THE CHRONICLES OF DURNFORD. By J. Cartwr
131 pp. Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.
[A public school story.]

KITTY. By Adeline F. Mount. 7¼×5¼, 226 pp. S.P.C.K.
[A pathetic tale of gypsy and poaching life in wh wins her father to a respectable life. Illustrated.]

IN LUCK'S WAY. By Catherine E. Mallandaine.
Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 1s.
[A story of moral tone of lower middle-class life, fo

LITTLE JOHN COPE. By L. L. Weedon. 7¼×5, 128 p
Promoting Christian Knowledge. 1s.
[A short tale for young boys of the Jacobite Rebelli

LIKE CURES LIKE. By Catherine E. Mallandaine.
Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 3s. 6d.
[A pleasant enough story of farm life in the dales, of a girl with her misanthropic uncle whose heart she s
two pictures.]

THE CHIEFTAIN AND THE SCOUT. By E. S. Ellis Series.) 7¼×5, 296 pp. Cassell. 2s. 6d.
[A story of the Red Indians.]

OLD KING COLE'S NURSERY RHYMES. 11×8¾, 99 pp.
[This has five full-page illustrations in colour by Mr.

THE YOUNGEST GIRL IN THE SCHOOL. By Evelyn S
396 pp. Macmillan. 6s.
[School-girl life near London. Illustrated by C. E.

CHING THE CHINAMAN AND HIS MIDDY FRIE
Manville Fenn. 8×5¾, 506 pp. S.P.C.K. 5s.
[These adventures of middies in China are likely to and, as will be seen from the number of pages, there is ing in the book. There are one or two illustrations.]

FROM PLAYGROUND TO BATTLEFIELD. By F. Harr
383 pp. Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.
[A story for boys of the time of the Napoleonic war

ETHEL HARDMAN. By W. E. Chadwick. 7¾×5¼, 31 for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 3s. 6d.
[Especially against the dangers of betting and gamb

A GIRL'S RESOLVE. By E. S. Curry. 7¼×5, 127 p
Promoting Christian Knowledge. 1s.
[A brief tale for girls. Pattie resolves to make her her sweetheart, who has gone to the war, and who comes

IN THE DAYS OF ST. ANSELM. By Gertrude Hollis.
Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 2s. 6d.
[Showing the troubles of the Church under William PROVERBIAL SAYINGS. By Gordon Browne. 9×11¾ Gardner.

[A large picture book, with excellent coloured com
of proverbs.]

THE VIOLET FAIRY BOOK. Ed. by Andrew Lang.
Longmans. 6s.
[In the same style as others of the series, but many tions here are finely coloured.]

THE WOULDBEGOODS. By E. Nesbit. 7¼×5, 331 pp.
[Further adventures of the "Treasure Seekers."

THE BOYS' ODYSSEY. By H. C. Perry. 7¼×5, 201 pp.
[Founded on Butcher and Lang's prose translati at the request of several preparatory school masters.

THE WOOD PIGEON AND MARY. By Mrs. Molesw
192 pp. Macmillan. 4s. 6d.
[A pretty story in which the pigeons play a part illustrated by H. R. Millar.]

THE OLDE IRISH RIMES OF BRIAN O'LINN. By S
11¼×8¾. Macmillan. 2s. 6d.
[A large children's picture book. Illustrated in black

SIR PHELIM'S TREASURE. By H. A. Hinkson. 7
Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 2s. 6d.
[Eighteenth-century story of adventure in the ancestral treasure buried in Ireland. Illustrated.]

OUT ON THE LLANO. By A. Daent. 7¼×5¼, 384 pp Promoting Christian Knowledge. 3s. 6d.
[Adventures, based on fact, in the wilds of Columbi

ONE WOMAN'S WORK. By Annette Lyster. 7¼×5¼, 2 for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 2s.
[Shows how a woman not favoured by fortune com life's work.]

AN IRISH COUSIN. By Catherine M. Macgorley.

THE LITTLE CLOWN. By THOMAS COBB. (Dumpy Books for Children.) 5×3, 150 pp. Grant Richards. 1s. 6d.

LORD ROBERTS. A Life for Boys. By VIOLET BROOKE-HUNT. 7¾×5¼, 346 pp. Nisbet. 6s.

THE GOLLIWOGG'S "AUTO-GO-CART." By FLORENCE K. UPTON. 8¾×11, 66 pp. Longmans. 6s.

[Further "up-to-date" adventures of the Golliwog.]

LEADING STRINGS. 9¾×7½, 124 pp. Wells Gardner. 1s. 6d.

[Simple illustrated tales for quite young children.]

THE FISH CROWN IN DISPUTE. By F. L. LUCAS. 8¾×5½, 140 pp. Skeffington. 3s. 6d.

[Illustrated by A. H. Woodward and others. The adventures of two little children at the bottom of the sea.]

THE LILY PRINCESS. By MARGUERITE LLOYD. 7×5, 120 pp. Skeffington. 2s. 6d.

[A pretty story of children's "make-believe," and how they found princesses, fairies, and witches at home. Two illustrations by Mrs. Farmiloe.

EDUCATIONAL.

CICERO: PRO ARCHIA. (Elementary Classics.) Ed. by G. H. NALL. 6×4½, 94 pp. Macmillan. 1s. 6d.

THUCYDIDES, THE ATHENIANS IN SICILY. By W. C. COMPTON. (Illustrated Classics.) 7×4½, 237 pp. Bell.

THE HISTORY OF EUROPE IN OUTLINE, 1814-1848. By O. BROWNING. 7×4½, 164 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

CICERO DE SENECTUTE. Ed. by A. S. WARMAN. (Illustrated Classics.) 6½×4½, 119 pp. Bell. 1s. 6d.

A CLASS BOOK OF ENGLISH HISTORY. By A. HASSALL. 7½×5, 603 pp. Rivingtons. 3s. 6d.

[See Review p. 346.]

PRIMER OF GEOMETRY. By H. W. GROOME SMITH. 7×4¾, 100 pp. Macmillan. 2s.

JULIUS CÆSAR. Ed. by G. J. LEES. 7½×5, 138 pp. Allman. 1s.

FICTION.

GOLDEN HEARTED. By M. BRAMSTON. 7½×5, 160 pp. Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 1s. 6d.

[Adapted from the German. The adventures in life of two middle-class girls, unselfish and selfish.]

THE COMING OF THE PREACHER. By J. ACKWORTH. 7¾×5¼, 290 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[A tale of the rise of Methodism.]

EDWARD THE EXILE. By MARY M. DAVIDSON. 7¾×5¼, 299 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[A story of the eleventh century about Edward, the father of St. Margaret of Scotland, who is briefly mentioned in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.]

THE CANKERWORM. By G. MANVILLE FENN. 7¾×5¼, 415 pp. Chatto and Windus. 6s.

[The life of Linda, a baronet's daughter who is taken home after a runaway match with a rascal, who dies at the end of the book, when Linda marries Lord Inveraigh.]

A FIGHT TO THE FINISH. By FLORENCE WARDEN. 7¾×5¼, 338 pp. Chatto and Windus. 6s.

[The gradual unmasking of a spiritualistic criminal impostor.]

THE BENEFACTRESS. By the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." 7¾×5¼, 418 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

[An English girl comes into an estate in North Germany, where she offers a home to ladies of good birth. Three accept, and the story pictures the relations between them, their host, and their neighbours.]

MARGARET. By A. H. HODGES. (Popular Stories, VII.) 7¾×5¼, 123 pp. Stockwell. 2s.

[A tale of middle-class Congregationalism.]

MANASSEH. By M. JÓKAI. Trans. by P. F. Bicknell. 7¾×5¼, 328 pp. Macqueen.

[A story of the troubles in Hungary in 1848. Somewhat abridged.]

CLEMENTINE. By A. E. W. MASON. 7¾×5¼, 310 pp. Methuen. 6s.

[A romance of the Jacobites, introducing the old Pretender. Illustrated by Bernard Partridge.]

A GALLANT QUAKER. By MARGARET H. ROBERTSON. 7¾×5¼, 296 pp. Methuen. 6s.

[The story of a young wool merchant of the seventeenth century, a friend of Fox and Penn, and of the persecutions of the Quakers.]

ATHIRT THE DOWNS. A Tale of Church Folk. By A. J. DAVIES. 7½×5, 152 pp. Skeffington. 2s. 6d.

[A charming tale of a Sussex village. Realistic and

THE LAIRD'S LUCK, and other Fireside Tales. By A. T. COUCH. 8×5½, 342 pp. Cassell. 6s.

[Stories of past times, especially the French wars.]

PENANCE. By L. KEITH. 7¾×5¼, 300 pp. Hodder and St

[See Review, p. 351.]

THE MARRIAGE OF MR. MOLYNEUX. By CECIL HEA 332 pp. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.

[Countryhouse and political life. Mr. Molyneux's lo stopped (?) at the end by the discovery of his early fa Frenchwoman.]

THE KING'S RING. Trans. from the Swedish of Z. TOPELIU S. Ohrwall and Herbert Arnold. 7¾×5¼, 297 pp. Jarrold.

[A romance of the days of Gustavus Adolphus and Years' War.]

FAREWELL NIKOLA. By GUY BOOTHBY. 7¾×5¼, 315 pp. War

[Nikola departs at the end "to the fate which claims hi

CAPTAIN RAVENSHAW. By R. N. STEPHENS. 7¾×5¼, 369 Lock. 6s.

[A story of every day life in Elizabethan times. Illustr

A HERO OF THE HILLS. By G. W. BROWNE. 8×5¼, 312 pp. Jar

[The third volume of the "Woodranger Tales" characters continued. The fighting between the New Colonists and the Indians. Illustrated.]

THE FOREST SCHOOLMASTER. By PETER ROSEGGER. Francis E. Skinner. 7¾×5¼, 333 pp. Putnam. 6s.

[An autobiographical work by the well-known sel Austrian Peasant who has become a voluminous writer.]

THE POTTER AND THE CLAY. By MAUD H. PETERSON. 7¾ Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[See Review, p. 349]

NELLIE, OR A CHEQUERED LIFE. By ETHEL CHILVER 140 pp. Stockwell.

[A story of very religious tone, about the experiences an &c., of the daughter of a Baptist minister.]

LIGHT FREIGHTS. By W. W. JACOBS. 7¾×5¼, 295 pp. Methu

[Short stories dealing mostly with the adventures of sa and ashore. Illustrated.]

THE HOUSE WITH THE GREEN SHUTTERS. By G. 7¾×5¼, 320 pp. Macqueen. 6s.

[A sad story of Scottish commercial and University life

THE SINNER AND THE PROBLEM. By ERIC PARKER 282 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

[Tells of two picturesque and rather pathetic scho their artist friend, and their doings in the country.]

CIRCUMSTANCE. By S. WEIR MITCHELL. 7¾×5¼, 405 pp. Mac

[New York of to-day.]

TALES AND SKETCHES. By F. PLANT. 7×4¾, 222 pp. Hender

[Brief tales, tragic and domestic, mostly of middle-class life.]

INGRAM. By GERALDINE KEMP. 7¾×5¼, 287 pp. Chapman and [Story of a young man who returns from a wild life of t become the master of an ancestral home and how the change a

DEBORAH. By J. M. LUDLOW. 8×5¼, 406 pp. Nisbet. 6s.

[A tale of the times of Judas Maccabæus.]

WHEELS OF IRON. By L. T. MEADE. 8×5¼, 415 pp. Nisbe

[Written in the interest of the National Society for the of Cruelty to Children. A story of neglected children in upper-class home. It is a pathetic story—though, we thi overdrawn—and shows again the author's intimate kno children.]

EREWHON REVISITED. By SAMUEL BUTLER. 7¾×5, 338 Richards. 6s.

[This appears with a new edition of the original "Erew describes the visit to that strange country twenty years lat original discoverer and his son.]

HISTORY.

THE WELSH WARS OF EDWARD I. By J. E. MORRIS. 9× Clarendon Press. 9s. 6d. n.

[The chief object is "to depict an English Army in th the most critical point in medieval military history—nam very beginning of a systematic organization of infantry," an the influence of the wars on English Constitutional history.]

LE LIVRE DES MILLE NUITS ET UNE NUIT. Traduction par le Dr. MARDRUS. Tome IX. 5½×8, 335 pp. Paris: Revue Blanche. Fr.7.

[The tenth volume of this remarkable work is now being printed.]

THE WORKS OF THOMAS KYD. Ed. by F. S. BOAS. 9½×5¾. 470 pp. Clarendon Press. 15s. n.

[First complete edition of Kyd's work, based on a collation of all the extant texts. Exhaustive introduction (with index) on Kyd's life and work, notes, and facsimiles.]

MILITARY.

THROUGH RHODESIA WITH THE SHARPSHOOTERS. By R. STEVENSON. 7½×6½. 199 pp. Macqueen.

[See Review, p. 341.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

WOMEN AND THEIR WORK. By the Hon. Mrs. A. LYTTELTON. 7½×5, 152 pp. Methuen. 2s. 6d.

[A discussion of the position and pursuits of women today by the wife of the Bishop of Southampton.]

THE ART OF BUILDING A HOME. By B. PARKER and H. UNWIN. 9×6, 123 pp. Longmans. 10s. 6d. n.

[Reprinted lectures, with sketches and photographs.]

A TEXT-BOOK OF ELEMENTARY BOTANY. By CHARLOTTE L. LAURIE. 7½×5, 138 pp. Allman. 2s. 6d.

ORIENTAL.

TETRAEVANGELIUM SANCTUM SIMPLEX SYROHUM VERSIO. Ed. by the late P. E. PUSEY and G. H. GWILLIAM. 9×8, 608 pp. Clarendon Press. £2 2s. n.

[The late Mr. Pusey made careful collations of the ancient MSS of the Peshitto to test the accuracy of the traditional text. Mr. Gwilliam continued the work. It was found that the Peshitto version of the Gospels has not been corrupted in later times. This work exhibits the Peshitto Gospels as they were read in the ancient Syriac Church. With Latin translation, notes, &c.]

BOOKS ON EGYPT AND CHALDÆA. Assyrian Language. By L. W. KING, F.S.A. 7½×5. 216 pp. Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

EREWHON; or, Over the Range. New Ed. Rev. By SAMUEL BUTLER. 7½×5, 324 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

TABLE TALK. By WILLIAM HAZLITT. (The World's Classics). 6×4, 450 pp. Grant Richards. 1s. n.

[A convenient and well-printed reprint. The text only.]

STUMPS. By STELLA AUSTIN. Ninth Ed. 7×4½, 152 pp. Wells, Gardner. 1s. 6d.

[A well-known and popular story for children.]

MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS TO HIMSELF. In English. By G. H. RENDALL. 6½×4½. 167 pp. Macmillan. 2s. 6d. n.

[Golden Treasury Series. The Headmaster of Charterhouse has here abridged the Introduction, and simplified the translation for the general reader from his edition published in 1898.]

THE CHURCH OF HISTORY AND OF EXPERIENCE. Third Ed. By D. W. Forrest, D.D. 8½×5½. 489 pp. T. and T. Clark. 6s.

[To the new edition of this important work an Appendix is added in support of the view that our Lord did not pray with His disciples.]

PRESENT IRISH QUESTIONS. By W. O'CONNOR MORRIS. 9×5½. 435 pp. Grant Richards. 12s. 6d. n.

[Discussion of the land question, Home Rule, &c., by the veteran writer and lawyer, who also wrote "Ireland, 1494-1868," and "Ireland, 179[illegible]-1898."]

THE WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH. The Vicar of Wakefield and Plays and Poems. (Library of English Classics.) 9×5¾. 436 pp. Macmillan. 3. 6d. n.

[Another volume of this fine series, with Mr. A. W. Pollard's bibliographical note.]

THE WINDSOR SHAKESPEARE. Vols. I.-VIII. Ed. by H. N. HUDSON, LL.D. 8½×5½. Edinburgh: Jack. 2s. n. each vol.

[Fair edition has one play to each volume, the text being that of the Harvard Edition. Each play has an introduction, short explanatory notes at the bottom of the page, critical notes at the end, and a photogravure frontispiece (portraits or views connected with Shakespeare).]

THE CHASE AND THE ROAD. THE TURF. (The Sportman's Classics.). By NIMROD. 6½×4. 1-214 195 pp. Gay and Bird. 1s. 6d. n.

EXPERIMENTAL HYGIENE. By A. T. SUMMONS an[illegible] 7×4¾, 322 pp. Macmillan. 2s. 6d.

[This is a careful scientific text-book for teache[illegible] foods, weights, &c., with detailed instructions as to [illegible] maries, and examination questions. Illustrated.]

"THE REVIVAL OF PHRENOLOGY." THE MENT[illegible] OF THE BRAIN. By B. HOLLANDER, M.D. 9×5[illegible] Richards. 21s. n.

[A scientific investigation into the localisation [illegible] with special reference to the phrenological doctr[illegible] discoveries the author claims now to present for the [illegible]

SPORT.

SIDE AND SCREW. Notes on the Theory and Practi[illegible] Billiards. By C. D. LOCOCK. 7½×8½. 182 pp. Lon[illegible]

[Intended for moderately advanced amateurs. [illegible] study of the theory and practice of billiards, with m[illegible]

THEOLOGY.

MESSAGES OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. By [illegible] MACGREGOR. 8×5½, 178 pp. Hodder and Stoughto[illegible]

[Addresses on the book of the Old Testament [illegible] Chronicles and Joel by the well-known Presbyterian [illegible] at the age of 35, in London in May, 1900.]

STEPS TO UNITY. A Scientific Philosophy, the harbi[illegible] Theology. 8¾×5½, 211 pp. Sonnenschein. 7s. 6d.

[This anonymous work is intended to show (1) th[illegible] philosophy of common-sense, which proclaims an ob[illegible] be established on scientific principles; (2) that [illegible] Scripture can be made to rest on these principles.]

THE ATONEMENT AND INTERCESSION OF CHR[illegible] D. C. DAVIES. Ed. by D. E. JENKINS. 7¾×5½, 2[illegible] Clark. 4s.

[Dr. D. C. Davies, Welsh Calvinist preacher an[illegible] 1891 after work in London and as Principal fo[illegible] Trevecca College. These papers were written whe[illegible] man in London. Mr. Jenkins contributes a biograp[illegible]

LESSONS ON THE CHURCH CATECHISM. By [illegible] STEWART, D.D. 6¾×4½. Skeffington. 2s.

[The lessons have been found useful in Gat[illegible] Stewart worked, and are warmly commended in [illegible] Body.]

CATECHIZING FOR CHURCH AND SUNDAY SC[illegible] POTTER and E. A. W. SHEARD. 7½×5, 172 pp. Sk[illegible]

[The teaching follows the Prayer-book, and i[illegible] with useful, practical hints for teachers.]

THE GOSPEL FOR AN AGE OF HOPE. By T. [illegible] 10[illegible] pp. Stockwell. 1s.

[Short Congregationalist addresses. Paper bou[illegible]

THE VISION OF THE CROSS. A Dramatic Poem. [illegible] 7¾×5½, 48 pp. Stockwell. 2s.

[Mainly a conversation in undistinguished rhe[illegible] between a Jewish Christian convert and his old [illegible] scorns Christianity.]

THE OLD TESTAMENT AND THE NEW SCHOLA[illegible] PETERS. 7¾×5½, 328 pp. Methuen. 6s.

[Dr. Peters is the author of "Nippur," which [illegible] the University of Philadelphia Expedition to B[illegible] discusses the modern method of Bible study, with s[illegible] the Psalms and Daniel, and surveys the archæologic[illegible] ing on the Old Testament.]

THE CHURCH EPISTLES. By E. W. BULLINGER, D. [illegible] Eyre and Spottiswoode. 2s. 6d.

[Romans to 2nd Thessalonians, reprinted from "[illegible] The author (an Anglican) thinks the present distress [illegible] Evangelical Churches is due to the neglect of the [illegible] the Church and the doctrine of the Apostolical succe[illegible]

JOHANNINE PROBLEMS AND MODERN NEEDS. [illegible] 7¾×5, 127 pp. Macmillan. 3s. n.

[Assumes generally the Johannine authorshi[illegible] Gospel, and discusses the environment, the objec[illegible] tianity of the Evangelists.]

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY. By the late Br[illegible] 7¾×5, 148 pp. Macmillan. 3s. n.

[This appeared originally in the Commentary on [illegible]

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 209. SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 357, 358, 359
THE REFORMERS—Poem by Rudyard Kipling 358
"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS. XXIV. Mr. R. S. Hichens. An Appreciation by W. G. Waters 359
THE QUALIFICATIONS OF A CRITIC.—A "Personal View," by A. B. Walkley 361 POETS OF THE YOUNGER GENERATION 362
ACROSS THE BORDER 364
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 365
CURRENT LITERATURE—
The Mystery of Mary Stuart 366
Music—
Mendelssohn—Brother Musicians—Famous Violinists—Famous Pianists 367, 368, 369
The Umbrian Towns 369
English Topography—
Letter-Books of the City of London—Leicester Records—Swallowfield—Epsom—The Stone Crosses of Northamptonshire—The Gentleman's Magazine Library 369, 370, 371, 372
A Restoration Document—The Queen's Comrade—The Vicar and His Friends—Unstoried in History—The Works of Sir Philip Sidney—Use Inheritance 372, 373
The Benefactress—The Sinner and the Problem—Barbara West—Stephen Calinart—The Giant's Gate—The Wooing of Grey Eyes—Hallaro—The Striking Hours—The Pharaohs of the West—Quincy Adams Sawyer—The Thirteen Evenings—The Maiden's Creed—The Warrigals' Well—Her Grace's Secret—The Follies of Captain Daly—A Man of Millions—Captain Ravenshaw—Sylvia's Ambition—The Black Mask—Sporting Sorrows—An Ill Wind—A Stolen Wooing—The Call of the Future—A Harvest of Stubble 374, 375, 376
AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—II 376
CORRESPONDENCE—Was Amy Robsart Killed?—Dr. James Gairdner, C.B.—Australian Verse—An International Detective—The Memorial to the late Mr. R. D. Blackmore (Mr. R. H. Marston) 377, 378
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 378, 379
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 379, 380, 381

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be MR. E. F. BENSON.

* * * *

We publish this week the first of a series of letters giving the latest news of the Scotch literary world, which will be published at frequent intervals. The letter is dated from Edinburgh; the next will come from Glasgow.

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"The Life of Robert Louis Stevenson." By Graham Balfour. (Methuen.)

"The Mystery of Mary Stuart." By Andrew Lang. (Longmans.)

"The Benefactress." By the author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." (Macmillan.)

little anticipate—no other than Bastien Lepage. A Lepage died nearly two decades ago, the picture will King as Prince of Wales in the eighties. Within a month famous "Stolen Duchess" is to be on view at Messrs. where the entrance money will, as usual, go to the Benevolent Fund. "The Stolen Duchess" now belon Pierpont Morgan, as do the ten decorative panels ex Fragonard for Madame du Barry. The latter, bought of years ago for some £50,000, will be a featur Guildhall Exhibition in 1902. Again, the New G the close of the Portrait Painters' show, will c assemblage of works by Mr. J. S. Sargent. Finally, probably have an Old Masters' exhibition at the Academ of the unsatisfactory assemblage of works by Briti deceased during the last fifty years.

* * * *

Controversy still rages in Paris over the constitut "reading committee" of the Comédie Française. The pieces has been taken out of the hands of the players, w it previously rested, and entrusted to the director, w French State theatres, is never an actor, but genera of letters. The system now abolished was first estab Napoleon in 1812. Under the Government of the R "mixed committees" were temporarily established; a time the committee assembled by Harel, the direc Odéon, consisted of a notary, a colonel, a major, two and the secretary and treasurer of the theatre. Th attended the meetings, and the selection of plays was p left to Harel himself. He was asked, once, if the read plays did not take up an enormous amount of time. read them," he replied. "I put the manuscripts shake them up, draw one out, and put it in rehear method of selection has always proved successful." committees, however, were abolished in the reign Philippe, and the committees of actors were restored.

* * * *

According to Jouslin de la Salle, who was then a the Comédie Française, the mixed committee the complete failure. "It was," he said, "composed of men of letters. The latter were in the majority an members of the Academy. It was a disastrous peri theatre, which found its pigeon-holes overwhelmed avalanche of so-called 'literary' plays, few of whi stand the test of production. The Academicians con got to reject each other's pieces." The decisions ha given satisfaction even from the earliest times. Voltaire embarrassing trick upon the committee of his day. He retreat; but this is a legend which researches in the national archives have exploded. The decree was drafted in Paris and sent to the Emperor when he was preparing his invasion. It reached him before he had left Poland, and he sent it back, after signing it, with this note scrawled in the margin:—"To be published when the army is at Moscow. His Majesty intends it to be dated from that city."

A letter has appeared in the Politiken from Dr. Georg Brandes giving an alarming account of Ibsen's state of health. By the order of King Oscar, bulletins as to his condition are published three times a day; and the patient is attended, at the cost of the State, by the best physicians of the country. One telegram of condolence has come from the Kaiser.

Mr. Kipling has written a story of the South African War—which he puts into the mouth of a Sikh—for the Windsor Christmas Number. It will be illustrated by Mr. Raven Hill. Other South African stories are coming from Mr. Kipling.

The American Critic is printing a series of letters from Mrs. Carlyle to "Jessie," who was the Carlyles' servant during the sixties.

Mr. Hall Caine has been asked to allow himself to be nominated for the vacancy in the Manx House of Keys caused by the resignation of Mr. J. R. Cowell, member for Ramsey.

Mrs. Meynell is giving lectures during her tour in America. Her subject is the Transition Period in Poetry from the Seventeenth to the Eighteenth Centuries.

The Pope, in a recently published "Index," has removed the restrictions on the two works of Galileo, the "De Revolutionibus" and the "Dialogues."

Last Sunday Professor Theodore Mommsen celebrated his jubilee as professor. He was appointed at Zurich on October 13, 1851.

Sienkiewicz is at work on an historical novel on the subject of Napoleon I. and the Polish Legions.

If we may judge from the partial removal of the hoarding, Messrs. Grant Richards' new premises next door to Sir Joshua Reynolds' old house in Leicester-square are nearly ready for the removal of the firm from Henrietta-street. The frontage is attractively designed by the same firm (Messrs. Treadwell and Martin) which has had a pronounced success in the bold Buchanan premises in Holborn.

A "South African Association for the Advancement of Science" has been formed at Cape Town to work on the lines of the British Association.

Dr. G. Birkbeck Hill is engaged upon an edition of Johnson's "Lives of the Poets."

Professor Sampson of Indiana University is in England collecting material for the history of the development of the structure of our drama.

The Ayr Town Council is establishing an electric tram

THE REFORMERS.

[Reprinted from The Times of October

"The men who have been through this South Af no longer accept the old outworn explanations. Th much, and it is to them we must look, when they com real work of reform in every direction."—Extract letter.

Not in the camp his victory lies
Or triumph in the market-place,
Who is his nation's sacrifice
To turn the judgment from his race.

Happy is he who, bred and taught
By sleek sufficing Circumstance—
Whose Gospel was the apparelled thoug Whose Gods were Luxury and Chan

Sees, on the threshold of his days,
The old life shrivel like a scroll,
And to unheralded dismays Submits his body and his soul;

The fatted shows wherein he stood Forgoing, and the idiot pride,
That he may prove with his own blood
All that his easy sire denied—

Ultimate issues, primal springs, Demands, abasements, penalties—
The imperishable plinth of things
Seen and unseen, that touch our pe

For, though ensnaring ritual dim
His vision through the after-years,
Yet virtue shall go out of him:
Example profiting his peers.

With great things charged he shall not Aloof till great occasion rise,
But serve full-harnessed, as of old
The days that are the destinies.

He shall forswear and put away
The idols of his sheltered house;
And to Necessity shall pay Unflinching tribute of his vows.

He shall not plead another's act
Nor bind him in another's oath
To weigh the Word above the Fact,
Or make or take excuse for sloth.

The yoke he bore shall press him still,
And long ingrained effort goad
To find, to fashion and fulfil
The cleaner life, the sterner code.

Not in the camp his victory lies—
The world (unheeding his return)
Shall see it in his children's eyes
And from his grandson's lips shall l

RUDYARD

(Copyright 1901 by Rudyard Kipling. All rights

Is Australian poetry the real thing? And if Is Canadian poetry better? And if so, why?
questions arise out of an article

Australia is only Australian by accident—the work of Englishmen who went to Australia after they were grown up. Adam Lindsey Gordon was not much more Australian than Mr. Douglas Sladen, whose Australian anthology, including six pieces of his own composition, lies before us as we write; and at the time when that anthology appeared Henry Kendall was held by many to be the only native-born Australian poet of serious importance. He was, indeed, only one of a school of nature poets. Among the first of them was Charles Harpur, who has been called "The Australian Wordsworth." Their note was rather one of regret and sadness induced by the isolation of the scenery and by the disappointment of hopes in a land where success came only to practical genius. Since then, however, the new school, of which Mr. Jose wrote, has arisen, and we quite think that some of them come up to the not very exacting standard required for inclusion in Mr. Archer's miscellaneous gallery. The best of them are melodious, if not profound. They are at any rate sincere, and determined to sing frankly of what they know and feel, and amid a multitude of echoes a real voice is occasionally heard. Epic and drama may be beyond them; but the best of them have the gifts of the ballad-maker; and, after all, poetry began with ballads. We agree with Mr. Archer, however, that Canada has gone further than Australia, though we do not agree with him in finding anything perplexing in the fact. "Perhaps," Mr. Archer writes, "when a great Australian poet shall, in the fulness of time, arise, we may be able to discern why his coming has been delayed so long"; and he hardly offers even a tentative answer to his question, "Why has Canada contributed so much, Australia so little, to the poetry of Greater Britain?" Surely there are many reasons, which are not far to seek. Surely, too, the one reason which Mr. Archer partly recognizes—the greater variety of the Canadian climate with its allegorical presentation of "the cyclic drama of life and death"—is not the most important of them. If the climate of Persia and Palestine have not prevented the writing of great poetry, neither need the climate of New South Wales. The true explanations seem to us quite independent of meteorological phenomena. In the first place, Australia has only three-fifths of the population of Canada, so that, according to the law of averages, it has only three-fifths of Canada's chances of producing a poet of consummate genius. In the second place, the Australians may reasonably urge that, if they have not got so far up Parnassus as the Canadians, they have not been so long upon the road. Canada began to be settled in 1608 and became an English possession in 1763; whereas the settlement of New South Wales only dates from 1788, and the settlements of Victoria and South Australia from 1834 and 1836 respectively. And, of course, the colonists could not be expected to begin writing poetry at once. They had first to build their houses, plant their gardens, peg out their claims, and reduce the aborigines to submission. Canada, it is clear, had a very long start of them. Canada was already a nation with an inspiring history and traditions when Australia was merely an unknown continent with penal settlements dotted along the coasts. Finally, and this seems to us the most important point of all, Canada in its early days received a far better class of emigrants than Australia; and these emigrants, first through the Jesuits and afterwards by other means, remained in closer and more constant touch with the culture and civilization of the Old World. There are few people more full of the sentiment of old romance than the French Canadians. Australia was first colonized by convicts and then by impoverished agricultural labourers, and, in spite of the

Literature Portraits.—XXIV

MR. ROBERT HICHENS.

When Mr. Hichens rose suddenly to fame and applause of the town by the production of "The Gres tion" he did not at once reveal how wide a range his would take within the following decade. "The Gres tion" is one of those books which can seldom, if ever, be with any success by their authors, and Mr. Hichens ha been content to let his clever tour de force stand al cast about for a theme and a style of another pattern in to build up that great novel which is supposed to l bottom of every inkstand. In several of the works wh his name, written since the appearance of "The Gres tion," Mr. Hichens has achieved high excellence—in orthodox length and in collections of short stories. In named, indeed, he has given us work which few can ma there seems to be an unwritten law that writers of fiti a few favoured exceptions—may not climb to the high save by the production of a lengthy work. It is h perhaps with reason, that the short story—even in inst consummate merit—is only a sketch and not a finished and that the trick of construction is one which may be l writers entirely wanting in those qualities which are n for the creation of a complete story in the grand style.

In his longer novels Mr. Hichens has taken a li ought surely to earn him the gratitude of those who a of the conventions of modern fiction. Here he has c work upon material which, however it might be treate scarcely resolve itself into a repetition of the stock attit worn-out clichés dear to the laborious band who cater circulating libraries. When "Flames" appeared the reader experienced a shock rare in his torpid existen did not know what to make of it, but his attitude wa main one of disapproval. The volume was read and s to the library as soon as pater and mater familias had d it, and even the writer of book notices was uncertain as he ought to say. "Flames," in spite of its eccentric without doubt the book which, through its origin subject and manipulation, takes precedence of any Hichens' longer works. The appearance of such a work in provoked discussion, and made sharp division of ju and, while it would be going too far to describe it as book, it was unquestionably a great attempt and crowne measure of success which perhaps no other living novel have achieved. The spiritual struggle, manifested c in the opposition of light and darkness, of pleasure and p of growth and decay; the struggle for the soul of ma has been raging since the battles of Gods and Titans exhibited in its most delicate and sublimated phase. in what degree the tide of life which ebbs and flows arou swayed and enriched by the flux and motion of the co forces has been the chief task of poet and romancer s days of the first story-teller. The makers of different ag favoured methods widely diverse for the exhibition of th struggle, but seldom has any one chosen instruments m cult to control than those affected by Mr. Hichens. In "F the author certainly works with few characters, but eac his figures is charged with a duty so far-reaching and s cause of "the dance of the hours" as a knot worthy of such heroic solution. To the author, no doubt, the point was clear enough; but, considering the complexity of the situation, it would be unjust to treat this failure of revelation as a capital offence. Failures of this nature are not rare in novels dealing with the obvious and the commonplace, and something of the kind was bound to occur in the abnormal methods used in unravelling this particular story. To work out such a theme on these lines requires constant watchfulness, and moments must come when the perceptions of the writer and his dexterity of touch will be relaxed through overstrain, and then the blurred outlines of his figures will confess his temporary lapse.

But in certain scenes of the book Mr. Hichens has achieved a great success, scenes which would take worthy place in a novel of the highest rank. It would be hard to overpraise the skill with which Cuckoo is transformed from "The Lady of the Feathers" into a perfect and pathetic impersonation of unselfish endeavour, the victorious protagonist of good in the final struggle. The orderly movement of her upward progress is never forced. From the outset Cuckoo's action is entirely consistent, and each forward step follows inevitably on the preceding one. When the supreme crisis arises, when the little dog must needs be sold to keep Cuckoo's body alive and competent for the task she had set herself to accomplish, there is no savour of extravagance, no writing for the gallery, and a contrast at once suggests itself (as between members of the same class) between this living woman and the mawkish, sentimental doll for whom Dumas fils claims our sympathies in his notorious play. It is probable that Mr. Hichens may have been indebted to Gautier's Arriar for the central motive of the story. If it be so, his ambition to work with more subtle combinations has led him to put aside the mere exchange of souls as too direct a method. The soul of Marr, indeed, is allowed independent play in Valentine's body; but the wanderings of Valentine's own soul, and its somewhat purposeless divagations before it goes finally to dwell with Cuckoo's as a strengthening influence, are necessarily difficult to treat, and leave the reader in a state of confusion both as to motive and method. Gautier's treatment, being far simpler, leaves no uncertainty; and, seeing how complicated a task Mr. Hichens has set himself, he was scarcely wise to jeopardize lucidity for the sake of elaboration which often proves ineffective.

Though Mr. Hichens has put aside occultism in "The Slave," he has built up his story out of materials which are something more than abnormal. The chief actors are presented in a form too bizarre to let them enlist very much sympathy for themselves; we can only wonder and pass on. Cuckoo, even with the supplementary soul exhibited in the flames in her eyes, has infinitely more verisimilitude than Lady Caryll, or Sir Reuben, or M. Anneau in their sanest moments. But, though the figures themselves are impossible, the drama they enact is coherent and fascinating on account of its skilful construction and legitimate sequence of cause and effect. Though we feel certain that nothing like these people ever existed in the flesh we have to admit that, for what they are, they act consistently. Revolting as it is, Caryll's final move to recover her emerald does not mark a descent too deep for a woman under such obsession to compass. In the minor incidents of the story there is plentiful humanity and verisimilitude in the figures of Aubrey and of Diamond; the last-named, indeed, gives convincing proof that Mr. Hichens can draw a pure-hearted, noble girl on natural lines with the same artistic completeness that he showed in his craftsmanship; to write a good farcical story as great a boon on society; and, to judge from t written, must be the more difficult feat of the tw than "The Londoners" would be hard to find, is not moved by horseplay alone. The book is ings and comic situations, and it is nothing to dull people often dislike it, and cannot imagi people would ever behave like the Bun Emperor

Mr. Hichens' taste and imagination drift the whimsical and the abnormal. To construc artistically a long story on these lines is diffi doubt on this account that the best of his writi in his shorter tales. "A Charmer of Snakes Life," "Sea Change," and "William Forster rank among short stories. In "An Echo in Egy in brief with the motive of "Flames," and he central idea of "A Silent Guardian," not alt fully, in his novel "An Imaginative Man."

Mr. Hichens has certainly created a pub days it might have passed for an important one it is as nothing compared with the mass which n edition after edition of quasi-religious fustian, posturings of a set of antique marionettes, ne through a set of stereotyped incidents, and emo The carelessness of the million whether what t literary value or not is discouraging, but, in s of the charlatan, our age is not without a school spend themselves in endeavouring to fathom the of being, in exhibiting the difficulties of life, an a little too solemnly here and there—their re remark which applies especially to a select g discovered the anodyne virtues of Roman C never weary of displaying their new conviction and persistence of children just come home from

To pass to the question whether Mr. Hich erratic productions can be placed in line w those contemporary novels which have been w to sell, but for the benefit of those who are p over what they read, it is to be feared that most friendly critic will be that they cannot. B are there in plenty, wide sympathy and a abundant intellectual activity. What is lackin concentration, of welding ideas together into personalities instead of letting them merely cor page as brilliant phantasms. Mr. Hichens s constructive instinct rather than constructive ting visions of the masque of life float in embarr before his eyes, but he is less fain to seize upon compel it into dramatic or epic symmetry than beauties and present it by itself as something the play of life, in cold detachment from the which rage around the borders of the calmest e spite of his evident disinclination to pose a themes of his more serious novels—of "Flam emerge as moral lessons by the inherent lo therein displayed. Vice is never made a occasionally it may seem to lose part of its defo about through the pure humanity of the dramati

For some years Mr. Hichens has been many subjects, and now his admirers begin to f never write supremely well upon one. It is Shakespeare or Goethe who can range the wh ment is one which inclines to the appreciation of the picture held up to the light rather than to the thought of any working which may ensue from its exhibition to the world. With many of those who admire and delight in his writings there dwells a lurking doubt that he takes nothing seriously; that the working out of any of the more weighty problems of life in a story would fail to interest, or even bore him; that, while carefully avoiding a repetition of the form of his first great success, he has let the spirit of it permeate a good part of what he has written since, and they recall passim echoes of the sparkling paradoxes enunciated in Mrs. Windsor's garden. In a word Mr. Hichens will have to unlearn something before he can give to the world that great book which will justify the confidence of his admirers and earn the final reward which his high qualities deserve.

W. G. WATERS.

The seven stages of Mr. Hichens' career are given—presumably by himself—in "Who's Who" as follows:—"After leaving Clifton College fell in love with music, and resolved to be musician; studied at Bristol and in London for some years; meanwhile wrote and published many lyrics for music, some recitations and short stories; finally resolved to abandon music for literature; studied for a year at the London School of Journalism; since then has written regularly for various newspapers; at present on staff of the World, &c." His first publication was "The Coastguard's Secret," written at the age of seventeen, but it was not until 1894—thirteen years later—that he began the series of books with which his name is generally associated. "The Green Carnation" was brought out by Mr. Heinemann in September of that year in his half-crown "Pioneer Series," and was described by a well-known weekly at the time as "the most impudent piece of fiction we have ever met with." There was such a run on the book that it had to be reprinted twice during the following month, and again in the spring of 1895. Its fifth edition (May, 1896) is still selling in the same series. "An Imaginative Man" followed "The Green Carnation" in 1895 as a six-shilling novel, and continues to be published in that form, like most of Mr. Hichens' books, by Mr. Heinemann. "The Folly of Eustace" appeared next (1896), the half-dozen stories included in the volume coming from the Pall Mall Magazine, the New Review, Temple Bar, and the World, though the tale which gave its title to the collection was new. "Flames" was published by Mr. Heinemann in 1897, and has sold well ever since, reaching its fourth edition only a few months ago. Mr. Hichens' second volume of short stories, "Byways," also appeared in 1897—this time through Messrs. Methuen—mainly reprinted from various periodicals, and including "A Tribute of Souls," which he wrote with Lord Frederick Hamilton for the Pall Mall Magazine. "Byways" is now in its second edition. "The Londoners" was published by Mr. Heinemann in the spring of 1898, and went into its third edition in the same year. It was again reprinted in November last. "The Slave" followed through the same publisher in 1899, and now sells in a second edition. It was in 1899, too, that Mr. Hichens wrote "The Daughters of Babylon" (Macqueen) in conjunction with Mr. Wilson Barrett. He published "Tongues of Conscience" last year with Messrs. Methuen (the book is now in its second edition), and on the 25th inst. his new long novel, "The Prophet of Berkeley Square," will appear with the same firm.

The National Home-Reading Union has just opened its thirteenth reading season. The Secretary writes:—"The union exists to give guidance to readers in the choice of books and to lay open the attractions of study to those who cannot as yet be classed as readers. For this purpose lists of books are drawn up and articles contributed to the society's magazines by some of our foremost teachers. The lists cover a wide range of subjects—the beginning of colonial enterprise, nature-study, the Far East, the history of education. Victor

THE QUALIFICATIONS OF A CRI

Another "Personal View."

A month or two ago I happened to say something, i magazine article, about Mr. Stephen Gwynn's view that is only one way to become a critic of any consequence, is by practising the art you criticize." The other Gwynn apologized for a somewhat belated reply to my tions on the score of absence in a remote land of hol must now offer him the same excuse. When his article i ture appeared I was in a remote lagoon of holidays really cannot tackle questions of criticism

> A travers la folie risée > Que Saint-Marc renvoie au Lido.

Many things, important enough in London, acquire a strange insignificance to a loafer in a gondola, and Stephen Gwynn from that deceptive point of view seems to almost human dimensions. Now I am home again a hope, see these literary questions in their proper propo perspective. I wish I could say the same thing of Mr. He says that my article, though it had an inoffensive t in reality, for the most part, an attack upon his harmle dictum; whereupon he calls me his antagonist, says little peace to be had in the same world with me, and to the lion of Scripture seeking whom he may devour. fact (which I have just verified with a foot-rule) is th eight columns, my article devoted to Mr. Gwynn opinions just half a column and no more. Thus he se nearly sixteen times bigger than they are. This arithmetical consideration greatly relieves my mind. I me to discount the violence of Mr. Gwynn's censure ninety-six per cent. The margin is so small that I shall one day be fast friends.

But we shall have to be friends who agree to di fundamental point—the true nature of criticism. Mr chides me for calling criticism an art, and says it is onl ness. So that Walter Pater, say, was an artist when he and exhibited the feelings of Marius the Epicurean and rated into a mere business man when he analyzed and the pictorial qualities of Sandro Botticelli. The re absurdum is obvious, yet many people no less acute Gwynn have failed to perceive it. That is because t never succeeded in dismissing from their minds that criterion of "creation." The dramatist, the novelist, "creates," whereas, the critic, they say (Mr. Swinburne others, very vehemently), "creates" nothing. The simpl that they are all creators, and what they all create is emotion. And the raw material out of which they cre each case the same—namely, themselves. Criticism, other art, is a mode of self-expression. "Pour être critique devrait dire: Messieurs, je vais parler de moi de Shakespeare, à propos de Racine, ou de Pascal, ou de once and for all of that old fallacy that criticism is not "creative," for he shows that the mere enjoyment of æsthetic pleasure —i.e., criticism before it reaches the stage of expression—always involves an element of unconscious creation.

> When absorbed in the beauty of nature we do in fact appear to ourselves to be entirely receptive; but in truth our enjoyment, if the enjoyment has any æsthetic value at all, is always more or less derived from the activity of our own mind. It does not matter much, from the psychological point of view, whether we make an abortive but original effort to select and arrange the impressions which we receive, as is the case when a new aspect of nature delights us, or whether we merely reproduce at second-hand the impression originally arranged by an artist, as happens when we admire a statue, or recognize in a landscape some effect Turner has recorded. In any case the passive attitude can never be explained without reference to the active one.

It is time to have done, then, with the old nonsense about critics creating nothing, and with its attendant fallacy that while the novelist, say, is an artist, the critic is not. They are both in the same boat. The novelist narrates the adventures of Harry Richmond or Tom Jones and the critic "the adventures of his soul among masterpieces." And both narratives may be art.

I come to Mr. Gwynn's main point—"I assert again that the men who have written the criticism which throws most light on the subject which they had to criticize were men who had tried their hand at art, not as amateurs, but with serious creative purpose"—and, asserting this, Mr. Gwynn is driven to the remarkable conclusion that R. L. Stevenson is a better critic than Mr. Leslie Stephen. This judgment, taken as it stands, seems sufficiently saugrenu. One would say it was uttered for a bet. But, fortunately, Mr. Gwynn goes on to explain what he means, and, with the explanation, the difference between us—friends once more!—vanishes away. For the critics Mr. Gwynn is thinking of, it seems, are "the men who can show to those who are learning to read and learning to write what the art of literature really means." The fact is, when Mr. Gwynn says "criticism," he means, all the time, "technical criticism," criticism as a piece of didactic. And so, all the time, he and I have been arguing about different things, and he has called me antagonist, lion of Scripture, "pestifère ou pestiféré" (as Paul Louis Courier said in another controversy), when all the time I was his friend. I was considering criticism as the valuation of pleasure, and he as the valuation of methods; I as the contemplation of the thing done, and he as the examination of the way to do it. In short, I was considering the critic as a Hazlitt or a Bagehot; he as the author of "How to write a good play" (you will still find that quaint work in the 4d. box) or "How to sketch from nature in ten lessons" (see advertisements). So now I quite understand why Mr. Gwynn has learnt more about acting from M. Coquelin than from Sarcey—though, I cannot help saying, parenthetically, that the particular question on which he found M. Coquelin so illuminating—the question whether the actor in playing a king should make himself as well as other people believe that he is a king—has been discussed argument of his:—"If a man paints his pictu theme, for the thing which he desires to illu dence of light upon a figure, there is no use h if he meant to convey the character of a head." what is Mr. Gwynn's conclusion? That the learn to paint or—yes, here it is, in black an sort a great deal with artists." Sapristi! Fa quiring you to come and live with him befor make you see whether he is painting character the answer is plain? The technical means ar artist alone; it is his business to make his me sible. And, as for critics, there is, of course between lack of technical experience and absolu can tell a hexameter when I see one, though I Gwynn wrings this deplorable admission fro verse in my life. And I know a piece of Sèv though I have never even touched a lump of po be it from me to deny the need for the critic of ments. But the art whose technique he has and to master if he can, is the art of criticism. critic of painting? I should say the man wh good pictures in the world, and studied and co lived with them. Mr. Gwynn would say the ma to daub a canvas—or lived with artists. The tru (I daresay for the satisfaction of calling me an of Scripture, which shows a sporting instinct, it) has revived the most ancient of controve versy as to whether the proof of the pudding i in Mary Jane's intentions when boiling it. ment, this controversy was long ago settled by who never practised the art he criticized—on Mr. Gwynn turn to his "Politics" Bk. III., will read:—"Thus it is not the builder alone is to criticize the merits of a house; the perso wit, the householder, is actually a better judge pilot is a better judge of a helm than a carpen company of a dinner than the cook." I leav tender mercies of Mr. Gwynn. He is dead, so to be called "lion of Scripture."

A. I

OUR YOUNGER POETS.

Mr. William Archer is master of a very analytic faculties co-extensive with his esthe and we doubt whether any contemporary crit than he for the task he undertakes in giving so qualities of the younger poets whose positions to be uncontested. It demands a catholicity of many people possess, and which he frankly conf and again, too much for him. He cannot envisa instance, from the point of view of Mr. Lauren lacks all clue in his own experience to the proces mind. This is candid, and the more so because Mr. Archer has discovered what lies "at Housman's thinking"—viz., "a genuine Co

Unquestionably the poets are greatly in his debt. He has tempered his appreciations of them with a good deal of criticism, but not in any case to the detriment of the reputations which they have earned. No matter what he may say in private, the poet does want the public to know of his achievements and his needs, and the effect of this book must be to make known or to recall a great deal that has either been overlooked or has lost its appeal to the purchasers of books. And we confess that we are, on general grounds, glad to see a book of this kind. A little while ago Mr. Stopford Brooke complained—we forget his exact words—that he was tired of hearing the latest new versifier acclaimed as a new Shakespeare or Milton. It is, we know, a common belief that this kind of exaggeration is usual among critics; but in the case of poets, at any rate, Mr. Stopford Brooke's complaint seemed to be founded on the common belief only, and not on a real experience. As far as our observation has gone, certainly, we have not found the younger poets overwhelmed with this excessive praise; we have only found them ignored. And yet there is undoubtedly at the present moment a large output of verse which is sincere, careful, varied, in the main thoroughly wholesome, and which, if a judicious selection be made from it, attains a really high standard of quality. This augurs well both for the culture of the nation and for the future of English poetry, and it is good that attention should be focussed to this feature of our literary life.

Who, then, are the select few whom Mr. Archer's searchlight discovers wandering on the slopes of Parnassus? He is more exacting—numerically—than was Mr. Traill in his famous list of "minor poets," and indeed Mr. Archer expressly deprecates the notion that he is dealing with "minor poets" at all; the term, as he rightly says, has become a "supercilious catchword," and has had "a depressing and sterilizing effect." The principle of Mr. Archer's choice has been that the poets he selects are "more or less on probation." They are as follows:—H. C. Beeching, A. C. Benson, Laurence Binyon, Alice Brown, Bliss Carman, Madison Cawein, A. T. Quiller Couch, F. B. Money Coutts, John Davidson, Mrs. Hinkson, Nora Hopper (Mrs. Chesson), A. E. Housman, Laurence Housman, Richard Hovey, Rudyard Kipling, Richard Le Gallienne, Mrs. Meynell, E. Nesbit (Mrs. Bland), Henry Newbolt, Stephen Phillips, Mrs. Radford, C. G. D. Roberts, G. Santayana, Duncan Campbell Scott, Dora Sigerson (Mrs. Shorter), Arthur Symons, J. B. Tabb, Francis Thompson, F. H. Trench, Mrs. Marriott Watson, William Watson, Mrs. Woods, W. B. Yeats. How many of these thirty-three names, we wonder, are familiar to the "average reader," even to the average reader who is "fond of poetry"? And yet Mr. Archer in the extracts which he has selected, with great judgment, from their writings is able to show that every one of them possesses real poetical merit, and deserves a hearing. It is impossible and, indeed, unnecessary for us to enter closely into Mr. Archer's estimate of individual cases very suggestive essay is that on Mr. Kipling, the whose genius Mr. Archer thinks to be the "vision eternally romantic in the unflinchingly real." Some surprised to find Mr. Kipling here at all. The that this essay, like that on Mr. Davidson, is by complete. The book is one of those which the war back. It was ready for publication in 1899, and altho matter has in some cases been added to meet the develop the last two years, this is not so with Mr. Kipling, and no mention of "The Recessional," an omission which appreciation of the different sides of Mr. Kipling'

REV. H. C. BEECHING

Mr. Beeching, besides being a poet, has published sermons and essays, edited many reprints, a known as the author of the witty and scholarly "Pages from a Private Diary" and "Conference Books and Men." He is Chaplain to Lincoln's Inn.

certainly inadequate. The two years which have in have wrought other changes which tend to rea

Roberts, and Mr. Bliss Carman. We confess we are sorry that Mr. Archer did not succeed in finding any one from Australia worthy of a niche in his temple. His range covers the English-speaking world, and it is curious, perhaps significant, that he should have found only two poets from America, a circumstance which he kindly attributes to "the hopelessness of attempting to do more than cull a flower here and there in so vast and luxuriant a prairie." One of the Americans, Mr. Richard Hovey—the other is Mr. Madison Cawein—wrote in the spirit and style of Whitman. He unhappily died while the

Mrs. Hinkson's last volume of verse was "The Wind in the Trees," 1898. She has also published a good many novels. She was born and educated in Ireland, but now lives in London.

book was in manuscript, and his portrait is therefore separated from the others by being placed in the frontispiece. These portraits—large woodcuts by Mr. Robert Bryden, whose work is read, in the interest of the many lyrical singers have recently found expression in these columns.

With the quality or the finality of Mr. Ar
we are not, as we have said, at present concerne much more likely to read his prose than his poets may succeed in directing the attention of ot sincerely believes to be noteworthy in the acl poets amongst his contemporaries.

ACROSS THE B

EDINBURGH,

Professor Sayce has paid Edinburgh. He has made th because he finds that it combin number of advantages." Wh tages may be he does not can hardly be advantages of c Stevenson, who was a native the core, had nothing to say i
"east-windy, west-endy cap respect. There are certain the side of literature, such,
the Advocates' and the Sig
And there is a good de
In the literary world, alth hardly a literary Edinburgl sense. The drawing power o great.

The Rev. Dr. Hastings, th great "Bible Dictionary" lished in sections by Messrs.
has resigned his ministerial c in favour of one at St. Cyrus, Dr. Hastings, it is underst change in order to get more t work. The freedom of Kilm presented to Sir Archibald H day, when he distributes the the local Volunteers. At the will be published a volume of front, entitled "Outposts and the Ayrshire Volunteers in Sou writer of the volume, which is Archibald Hunter, is Sergeant who had some interesting ex captive trekking with De Wet.
are Messrs. Dunlop and Drenn

The articles on the var philosophy, such as Hume an Messrs. Nelson's new Encyclo taking which is making steady the editorship of Mr. George being written by Mr. Hector whose portrait we published in number on June 8. Mr. Mac editor of the Edinburgh Evening News, is also volume dealing with Hume, somewhat on the lin masterly work on Herbert Spencer. His monogr

the business was almost entirely confined to the publication of subscription works issued in parts. With the publication of Mr. Henley's Centenary Burns the firm came into more general prominence, and that prominence has since been extended by the publication of the "Edinburgh Waverley." The new Lockhart is to be in ten volumes, with a series of 100 photogravures, eighty of which are portraits of Scott's ancestors, family, household friends, and contemporaries. Some of these portraits have never before been reproduced, and they are now made available by the special permission of the Hon. Mrs. Maxwell Scott. "The Scott Country" is another book for lovers of Waverley. It is coming from Messrs. A. and C. Black, and is from the pen of the Rev. W. S. Crockett, the minister of Tweedsmuir. Mr. Crockett, who is no relation of the novelist, though he is generally supposed to be, is a native of Thomas the Rhymer's Earlston and is an authority on Border history and literature. His new book will take in practically the whole of the Border country, though it is meant to be of special interest to lovers of Scott. It will have close on 150 illustrations, many of them quite new, including a photograph of the grave of Scott's "Willie Laidlaw" at Contin, near Dingwall. Messrs. Jack, by the way, have also a new Shakespeare, which appeared in our list of books last week.

Mention has already been briefly made in these columns of the unique version of the New Testament in "braid Scots," just published by Mr. Gardner, of Paisley. The only thing of the kind hitherto attempted was the late Dr. Hately Waddell's vernacular version of the Psalms. This new rendering is by the Rev. William Wye Smith, a veteran of eighty-six, who, though of Scottish extraction, has never been in Scotland. He is a retired Congregational minister living at Brantford, Ontario, and has acted as Scottish expert on the "Standard Dictionary," published in New York. His version of the New Testament will be of considerable interest to students of the Scots dialect. It appears to be very well done. The notes are certainly racy, and the page headings strike us as being particularly good. Mr. Gardner continues to take the lead in the publishing of books dealing with peculiarly Scottish themes. One of the parish histories on his list—the history of Kilbarchan, by the Rev. R. D. Mackenzie—should prove of more than local interest. Kilbarchan is near the birthplace of Wallace, and Knox's family belonged to the neighbourhood. The famous "Habbie Simpson" of Scottish song was also a native. Visitors to the ancient town of Lanark are interested in the quaint statue of Wallace which finds a quainter situation in the steeple of the parish church. There is, we believe, only one other similarly-placed statue in the country; it is the statue of Habbie Simpson, the piper of Kilbarchan, in the steeple of the parish church there. The new historian is the parish minister, who will no doubt be found to have made a good use of his special opportunities. Another book coming from the same house deserves general notice—viz., "The Ancient Castles and Mansions of Stirling Nobility," by Mr. J. S. Fleming. The author is a Stirling lawyer, and has already written at least a couple of works on local antiquities. Among new editions we note the Memoir of James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, written a good many years ago by his daughter, Mrs. Garden, who is still living, at an advanced age, in Aberdeen. This will be edited by Sir George Douglas, who contributed the monograph on Hogg to the "Famous Scots" Series.

All those who are interested in Scotch literature will have noticed the announcement (which appeared in Literature of

The "Reporting Reminiscences" of Mr. Willi promised for early publication by the Aberdeen Press, will be a much more important work than its t to indicate. Mr. Carnie has in later years been kno as the treasurer of the Aberdeen Royal Infirmary, 1862, when he was appointed to that post, he exclusively a Pressman. He edited the Aberdeen some years; acted also as correspondent for The Scotsman, and wrote a weekly column of county and for the Banffshire Journal. He has done some notabl verse, particularly in the local dialect, which he write ever Dr. George Macdonald has done, and his "Psalter," of which a new edition has quite re published, has sold in thousands. Mr. Carnie's "Reminiscences" cover only the first ten years of his a life, but his intention is to bring the record down to

THE DRAMA.

"THE MUMMY AND THE HUMMING BI "A TIGHT CORNER."

Mr. Isaac Henderson's new play at Wyndham The Mummy and the Humming Bird, is a tissue of con and conventions. Its hero is a man of science and a realm. Why a man of science? In order that we ma the differentia of the scientific man, the influence of specialization upon character, or the dramatic side, t sorrows, of patient research? By no means; but order that the hero may be clumsy and bespectacled in the clouds," unmindful of the clock, so that he keep dressed ladies waiting for dinner. That is, he is th man as seen from the standpoint of the kitchen. He is whom Molly the Cook says, "Lor', master is that untidylike!" Poor Molly stands excused, for she better; what is inexcusable is that Mr. Henderson el no better or chooses to assume that we, his audience better. And why is the hero a peer? Because rank in the hero is essential to the scheme of the play all; but partly (I guess) because the audience, as readers familiar with the names of Lord Kelvin, Lord others, are expected to take an interest in scient partly because even the best of actors have an absur for stage titles (or Victoria Crosses—in France, Comédie Française, actors will take an inferior part if put a red ribbon in its button-hole), and partly because audiences are supposed to contain a large percentag One of the subordinate characters is a naval officer Why a naval officer? In order that he may use naut in talking to ladies—a habit about as likely to e real naval officer as the habit of saying "Belay t "Shiver my timbers!" Why a peer? Because our m naval officer is Lord Charles Beresford. The villain is an Italian and an "amatory" poet and wear moustaches. Why? Because that is the point of kitchen or (not to be too hard on the kitchen, which, known, perhaps contains as much good sense as the dra the point of view of the people who romanticize life materials supplied by penny novelettes, wherein h always six feet high and in evening dress, foreigners are wicked, poetry is suspect, and pointed moustaches a eyes on the Italian with the pointed moustache her fate will be sealed. You see, she must have love. It is all her husband's fault if she is driven to seek it from the nearest bystander. Frou-Frou's husband would persist in poring over his horrid diplomatic despatches, and so left her to flirt with Valreas. Tant pis! So it was with the young wife in Mr. Carton's Wheels within Wheels. So it was with the young wife of the aged historian in La Petite Marquise of Meilhac and Halévy. So it is with Mr. Isaac Henderson's young woman. Tant pis! They must have love, these ladies—because the author must have a scene in which they compromise themselves, and are or are not, as the case may be, rescued from disgrace by their magnanimous husbands.

Mr. Henderson's rescue-scene is ingenious enough, considered as a game of hide-and-seek behind doors and curtains. Suppose Sir Peter Teazle to come to Joseph Surface's library, knowing that Lady Teazle is there, and, what is more, knowing that she is behind the screen all the time of his conversation with Joseph. Suppose, further, that, while he artfully gets Joseph to turn his back for a moment, he whisks his wife away from the back of the screen and out of the room, so that when the screen falls there is nothing there and Sir Peter can go away comfortably, with his wife's reputation saved, and a little anecdote for his friends that it must have been "a little French milliner" after all. Well, that, or something not very unlike it, is Mr. Henderson's plan. When the "guilty pair" (though the lady's guilt, like Lady Teazle's, is only potential) are disturbed by the husband at the door, the lover locks the wife up in the next room. Is my wife here? asks the peer. Certainly not, he is answered; but he surprises a glance of the villain in the direction of the locked door. On a pretence he gets the man to leave the room, and (like Charles Surface) "has her out." "Run downstairs, and jump into the brougham at the door—if not, I blow your Italian friend's brains out." Off she goes—and when the villain returns the peer quietly wishes him good night. Then with a triumphant leer, the villain opens the door of the next room. Empty! Curtain. . . . For this kind of adventure there is always a theatrical public, and that particular public will not in the least object to Mr. Henderson's conventions and commonplaces of character and ideas—will probably rather like them—and with only a half-conscious feeling of disappointment in finding players like Mr. Wyndham and Miss Lena Ashwell cast for parts which are only parts and not human beings.

I spoke just now, with too little charity, perhaps, of Molly the Cook, her views of life and romance. Miss Kate Phillips puts me to shame by playing Molly the Cook as Molly really is (with just the necessary touch of footlight-exaggeration allowed for), a very simple, sentimental, faithful, candid, and womanly person. Molly is in love with a strange gentleman of glib address, and, indeed, literary allusiveness (oh! that allusiveness! even the burglars have caught the trick—Mr. Andrew Lang has much to answer for), who is mistaken for the husband of a magistrate's daughter and takes advantage of the mistake to pocket the magistrate's bric-à-brac under his very nose. These things happen in Mr. Sidney Bowkett's farce A Tight Corner, at Terry's Theatre. It is not a good farce, and Mr. James Welch's "patter" part rapidly becomes tiresome. But one is ready to forgive much for that natural little sketch of Miss Phillips'.

A. B. WALKLEY.

The Plugger, of which we have received the first number, is, in appearance, much like the other popular illustrated magazines. The catholicity of its aims appears from the fact

CURRENT LITERATU

MR. LANG'S "MARY STUA

THE MYSTERY OF MARY STUART. By AN
(Longmans. 18s.)

Well says Mr. Lang, in the introduction t
"Mystery of Mary Stuart," that Queen Mary' has been best served by her accusers—most defenders. Her contemporary enemies were i convict her of crime that they neglected the ordi of checking dates and lacked either the courag foresight to preserve incriminating document champions have done her far more mischief tha extreme instance was given in Mr. Cowan's book in these columns. Therefore, it was with muc we began to cut the leaves of yet another agitating theme. We imagined that Mr. Lang, distaste for the Scottish reformers and with all ness for beauty in distress, could scarcely be ex
the searchlight with unflinching nerve and stead him injustice. He has performed his task with when he descried where it was leading him, reluctant conscientiousness."

> The case [says he] is really a pol > investigation cannot be too anxious. . .
> book I have followed, as Socrates advises, w > led me. Several conclusions or theories which > me, and seemed convincing, have been ruined b > of fresh evidence, and have been withdrawn.

He has collated narratives with extraordi confronted witnesses with each other, sifting th testing their motives with exemplary impartia sterilizing treatment which, in less accomplish have drained the story of all its sap, and sacrifi
the frigid shrine of accuracy.

Alas! the result of his labour tends the s of less scrupulous partisans of the Queen of S fresh is proved against her, but the pressure increased. We fancy that Mr. Lang set to proving that the Casket Letters were forged.
Logos has led him further than ever from such p with they may have been; it is not unlikely and garbled in translation and re-translation theory that they were wholly forged can searc any longer. Henceforward the memory of the of Scots will be cherished no whit the less tend shrouded in parts under a mist of blood and tea

Without falsifying the standard of good a eternal, or it is naught—Mr. Lang has prefac his case by a convincing review of the state of which Mary came to lead, and by vivid portr and secondary actors in the tragedy.

> Mary was sorely bested [he writes] be > Fool, the Furious Man, the Puritan broth > Wylie (Machiavelli) as the Scots nicknamed > was absolutely alone. There was no man > trust. On every hand were known rebels > half reconciled. Feuds—above all that of believe. Ample evidence is here to justify the portrait in Aytoun's poem. Vicious, reckless, and heartless beyond the measure of common men, Bothwell was cultivated and courtly, wrote a neat Italian hand in the latest mode, collected books which he cared to have nicely bound, and was cool enough to cite classical precedent in moments of mortal peril; altogether just such a fascinating rogue as to captivate the fancy of a clever woman.

About Darnley, the gentil batandeau, there has never been much disguise: he stands in Mr. Lang's gallery as the world has known him. As to Moray and Morton, we are not so easily convinced. True, they were unscrupulous in act to a degree which, at this day, is scarcely to be reconciled with any standard of right doing: but we hardly think that Mr. Lang has assigned enough value to the conviction which possessed these powerful men of the hopelessness of ending the chronic anarchy of Scotland, save by cutting off for good and all the fatal league with France, establishing good and lasting relations with England, and settling the Reformed Religion upon a firm base.

"Moray, to Mr. Froude, seemed 'noble and stainless.' He was a man of his time—a time when every traitor or assassin had 'God' and 'honour' for ever on his lips. At the hypocrisies and falsehoods of his party, Moray 'looked through his fingers.'" Nevertheless, Mr. Lang, after glancing at his excessive caution and constant eye to the main chance, sums him up as "a strong, patient, cautious man, capable of deep reserve, in his family relations—financial matters apart—austerely moral. Moray would have made an excellent king." But Morton is shown in a far more sinister light. "A red-handed murderer, living in open adultery with the widow of Captain Cullen, whom he had hanged . . . . his private life was notoriously profligate; he added avarice to his other and more genial peccadilloes." Upon this we would only remark that the custom of the age counts for something, and that the hopeless insanity of his countess was reckoned, according to the measure of those exceedingly practical days, as some palliation for Morton's undoubted immorality. Further, although like James III., he was suspected of avarice and peculation, it has never been proved that the Church revenues which Morton intercepted by means of his "tulchan" Bishops were applied otherwise than in the service of the neediest State in Christendom. Undoubtedly he was one of Mary's most formidable enemies; but Mr. Lang, while citing the document lately discovered at Cambridge which tends to prove his active co-operation in Darnley's murder, does not refer to the Protestant Calderwood's assertion that it was owing to Morton's intercession that the Queen's life was spared after her surrender at Carberry.

But we must hasten on to the Casket Letters, for it is the examination of these and the circumstances under which they came to light which constitute the purpose and interest of this volume. These circumstances and the nature of the documents in the casket are matters of common knowledge; but, having regard to the discrepancies in dates contained in the letters and the looseness of the chronology of witnesses (pardonable enough in days when newspapers were not in every house to remind people of the days of week and month), it is useful rapidly to rehearse the sequence of events.

Darnley was murdered on the 10th February, 1567; on the 24th April the arch-assassin, Bothwell, carried off his widow with a show of force, married her on the 15th May, and slipped away from her on the 15th June, when she surrendered to the Lords at Carberry. On the 17th (some say the 16th) she was imprisoned in Loch Leven Castle. On the 19th Bothwell's guilty love for Bothwell and her eager and active in the murderous plot against her husband.

The mystery had its birth in the amazingly slipsho
by the lords of such dangerous material. Precis becomes of supreme importance. In December follow justified themselves before Parliament, for their r Mary and putting her in prison, by declaring that had revealed to them her guilt. The letters nev their hands until Mary had been at least three da Lethington, once Mary's trusted secretary, now be on the very day of the finding of the casket w adducing these letters as the very "ground of the l and honourable cause." Grave reason, here, for forgery; but, although Edinburgh abounded with enough for such a job, there were few, very few attempt to simulate the delicate Italian handwri letters.

Suspicion against the lords is deepened by the incredible carelessness in subsequent dealings wit documents. Moray and the other Scottish commis Norfolk and the English commissioners at York in Oc
when the originals of the Casket Letters were show to Norfolk. But when the Westminster Commissi November to consider the charges against Mary, were submitted and translations, hurriedly made. N of the contents of the casket was submitted; no mi proceedings at the opening of the casket on 21st Morton merely put in his account of the affair, nei any other present at the opening, being submitted to ination. "I do not," says Mr. Lang, "profess to be even strongly inclined to believe, that there was any Mary's writings, except in the case of the letter neve
But, if forgery there was, our scraps and hints of evi to Lethington as manager of the plot." He is even le to consider the sonnets as forgeries.

> Nothing is less likely than that a forger wo > such a task as forging verses by Mary; nor do w > one among her enemies who could have produced the
> if he had the will. To suspect Buchanan is grotesq
> Meanwhile, I am obliged to share the opinion o > Fénelon, that, as proof of Mary's passion for B > sonnets are stronger evidence than the letters, an > open to suspicion than some parts of the letters.

Into the internal discrepancies of chronology in and the manner in which Mr. Lang shows how they m ciled with the actual known facts we cannot enter in
He has brought to his task the patience and acumen tive; he has kept an open mind upon a questio never before been approached without prejudice, failed to redeem the Queen of Scots from a terrible Will the question ever receive a more confident answ

MUSIC.

Mendelssohn.

Mendelssohn's music is so often judged from a point of view that Mr. Stephen S. Stratton's emi estimate of his powers in MENDELSSOHN (The Master Dent, 3s.6d. n.) is most welcome. As Mr. Stratton poin after Mendelssohn's death the adulation which he in his life-time was followed by depreciation. No extreme facility was fatal to the permanence of vative England . . . . but was it necessary to exalt it at the expense of Mendelssohn? The stage holds the mirror up to nature; music mirrors the man who creates it. The rugged, lofty-souled Beethoven portrays himself in his music. The boundless imagination, the princely splendour of thought and habit of Wagner, are reflected in his vast designs, and the prodigal display of means in his scores. The cultivated, refined, precise, and orderly disposition of Mendelssohn found expression in music, polished, beautifully balanced in harmony and phrase, and worked out with consummate skill and address. Nothing vague, no redundant bars, but everything in correct form, symmetry being as it were a law of his nature. . . .

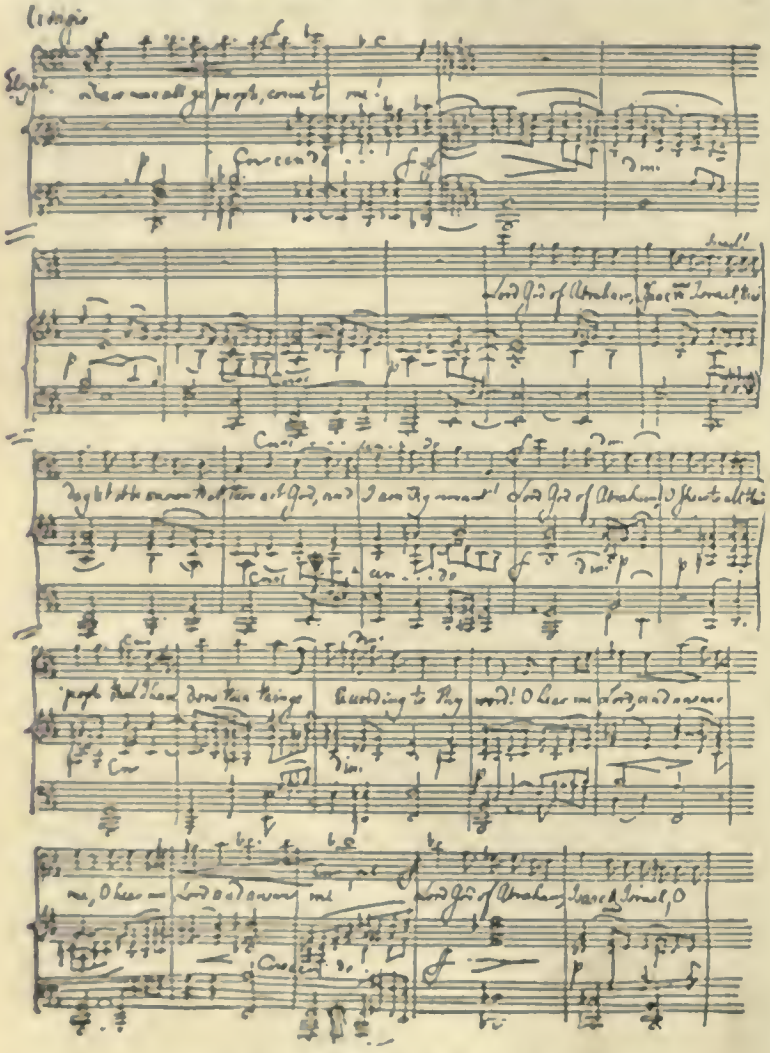
This is an excellent comment on much musical criticism. The depreciation of Mendelssohn results largely from the habit of judging one composer by the standards of another. Most musicians have their own particular god of music, and their worship is too apt to take the form of pulling down the other gods. Then again, Mendelssohn's music is direct in its appeal



FACSIMILE OF PAGE OF "ELIJAH."

Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Score of the well-known Bass Solo, "Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel." Reproduced by permission of Messrs. Dent in A and the Trio in C Minor. Mr. Stratton doe to the inventiveness and delicacy of Mendelssoh tation, his balance of form, and skill in thematic to his dramatic treatment of Scriptural themes painting, and enchanting fairy music. May acknowledge a certain Oriental splendour and dig a Judaic element—here and there in his treat subjects? At all events he is one of three co renderings of Scripture are almost as well worth the Bible itself really well read. Moreover, he is composers whose music satisfies a critical tas the ears of the man in the street.

The biographical portion of Mr. Stratton's called with much discretion from the mass o literature which naturally centres roun attractive personality. We are reminded sohn added to his musical genius a tale and more than a talent for letter-writing tration which we reproduce is enough in the extraordinary care and elegance of hi

Two English Musicians.

Widows' reminiscences of their late lately come under the lash of Mr. Edm sisters, doubtless, run almost an equal testions about their brothers. Not so M Bache, who has put together her re Edward and Walter Bache, in Brothe (Methuen, 6s. n.). Waiving all sisterly allows the brothers to reveal themselves part from their own letters. The resu interesting to musical students in a va Francis Edward and Walter belonged to in their musical ideas. The former, who the age of twenty-five, was sternly oppos then called "the music of the future," to and even Schumann. The latter was the Liszt in England, and belonged to a socie Working Men's Society," who formed a s early Wagnerians. We are not told wh title was chosen for the society. It sug then there was a tendency to mix up Wa and his music, just as nowadays Mr. Berna have us regard the "Nibelungen Ring" dramatic allegory of an Anarchist. But chief title to fame was his championship his correspondence with him brings out and courtesy of the Abbé in a very fa Miss Constance Bache's account of thi brother, is the more acceptable as he fin Grove's Dictionary. His great talent, ex pianoforte playing, does not appear to ha composition. Francis Edward, the elde on the other hand, a composer. As a boy of Sterndale Bennett, and his work bea traces of his master's influence. It is n Bache is not more explicit on the charact his compositions now that they are so litt doubt her relationship to the deceased has to a cert her hand as a critic. To judge from his letters, Edwa to have had more success on the Continent tha

the Philharmonic, and made so little impression with his own music, spoke highly of our performers. Another comparison is between the Germans and the Italians as critics of music. "The Germans are critical as to the colouring and execution of a picture; the Italians are perceptive as regards the design." The illustrations are mostly photographs of the many well-known musicians that the brothers came across. There is an excellent one of Liszt. But the sketch of Sterndale Bennett bears little resemblance to him at any time in his career.

Mr. Henry C. Lahee follows up his "Famous Singers" with FAMOUS VIOLINISTS OF TO-DAY AND YESTERDAY and FAMOUS PIANISTS OF TO-DAY AND YESTERDAY (Putnam, 6s. each). Brief criticism of the playing of virtuosi long since dead must be a réchauffé from well-known sources, and more valuable for reference than interesting to read. But on living players Mr. Lahee writes with spirit and is able to tell us the difference between American and English opinion—e.g., of Stavenhagen, who was coldly received in the States. With so many performers to deal with, the author is not always able to make clear the salient characteristics which distinguish them from one another; and some of his comments are questionable. Some reason might be given for the statement that "D'Albert now excels all other pianists." The conventional opinions which Mr. Lahee adopts, that Steibelt's music was all display and Hummel's all scholarship, are too sweeping. And Oscar Bie's description of Paderewski as "the delicate, emotional drawing-room player" (the italics are ours) ought not to be quoted without a smile. There is a good deal of amusing biographical matter in both books and some of the portraits are excellent.

UMBRIAN TOWNS.

Owing to plethora of production it will soon be a harder task to select a guide-book than a region of travel, and a study of the more recent additions raises a doubt whether the traveller fares better now than he did in the days when Murray catered for the man of leisure, and Baedeker for him whose time was limited. THE UMBRIAN TOWNS, by J. W. and A. M. Cruickshank (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. n.), is a work compounded with laborious care and sufficient accuracy. The series of facts it sets forth is vast and even bewildering, and if this mass had been compelled into something like symmetry the book would have been of some service to conscientious pilgrims to the great art centres described; but it is crude in plan and execution as well, and the authors display a bent for preaching which must prove irritating to all but the long-suffering and the undiscerning. Umbria is a region with flexible boundaries, and the compilers have taken full advantage of this characteristic in selecting their towns. It is hard to see why Chiusi (which is essentially Etruscan) should have been included and Città di Castello left out, especially as the first lies without and the last within the limits of modern Umbria. Again places like Cortona, Urbino, Arezzo, and San Sepolcro, representative seats of Umbrian art, and lying just over the borders, might have been included with advantage. In the preface it is announced that this guide-book does not compete with Murray and Baedeker, and this is true enough; its great defect is that it does not (at least, as far as Murray is concerned) act as a supplement. All it does is to give a portion of the older guide-books, freely diluted and in less convenient form; and, wanting as it is in evidence of spiritual vocation or force of character Giovanni Pisano in his effigy of Benedict XI. has "with marvellous subtlety the existence which h beginning nor ending." The reading in of subtle me this fashion is a process which may be extended indef the authors have given us a very fair dose. The thought which they have expended over this amazing; indeed they tell us what they think of a picture they see in a strain which rouses a regret ever saw and described Botticelli's Madonna and the Monna Lisa. They inform us in the preface that the to enable the reader to "create for himself an at and with this view they print the gems of thought type, and enclose in brackets certain choice directions being given that these are to be read, storm and stress of the gallery, but in the retirem hotel bed room. All this labour is well meant atmosphere created by such cramming will stand, in one acquired by judicious and not excessive reading, made suit stands to one cut to measure. A lengthy is given at the end for the benefit of those who may enlighten themselves still further, and amongst the superseded English edition of Crowe and Cavalcase print and rarely to be had). It should be known authoritative edition of this work is the more recent published in Florence. "The Umbrian Towns" i with an excellent series of diagrams of the walls a churches and galleries described, duly numbered works referred to in the text may be easily identified have been all the better for a map.

ENGLISH TOPOGRAPHY.

LONDON UNDER EDWARD I.

CALENDAR OF LETTER-BOOKS OF THE CITY OF LONDO Book C, 1291-1309. By REGINALD R. SHAR Printed by J. E. Francis, by Order of the Corpo

We welcome another issue of these valuable calen City Letter-Books. They are serviceable not only for tion of the social and citizen life of the period, but contributions to the story of the nation. Dr. Sharpe tion to this calendar is as clear and interesting as two previous volumes. The period covered by t begins at the time when Edward I. was in sore trou the recent loss of his wife. Soon after occurred, too of his mother, Queen Eleanor, a loss which was moment to the citizens of London. Eleanor had profits and emoluments pertaining to the wardenship bridge, to the great chagrin of the City. The expu Jews from England in 1290, due to her influence generally popular step, had increased her son's di driving him to resort to the Lombard merchants fo help. By thus resorting to foreign help, Edward wa with the citizens. The City was still under special re having been governed by a warden of the King's cho 1285, instead of by a popularly elected mayor. It is fore surprising to find in this volume abundant pr reluctance of London to satisfy the King's demand loan, fine, tallage, custom, or the like. There w disturbance during the King's absence in Flanders

a "Court of Scavagers" (curia scauagerorum). The latter circumstance causes Dr. Sharpe to discuss the term "scavager," the forerunner of "scavenger." It has been generally supposed that the scavager was originally an officer who took toll or custom on the "scavage" (i.e., showage, from A.S. scewian, to show), or the opening out of imported goods, and that at a later period the general care of the streets became a part of his duties. Professor Skeat has, however, recently objected to this derivation, pointing out that the A.S. sc becomes sh in English. Mr. Round in his "Commune of London" has still more recently shown, from a British Museum MS., that at one time scavengers (escuwingores) were elected for regulating the watch and ward of the City. Dr. Sharpe is probably wise in leaving the matter still an open question and cleverly adopts the phrase "Court of Inspectors" as the safest interpretation of the expression used in 1301 and 1307. It is of interest to remember a fact, which has apparently escaped Dr. Sharpe's attention, namely, that long after the office of town scavenger or skevinger had come to be applied to the remover of filth and sweepings from the streets, terms as to scavage dues of a totally different meaning were in simultaneous use. Thus Dr. Cox has shown, in the second volume of the "Northampton Borough Records," that scavengers for the streets were appointed under that title in Elizabethan days, that a scavenger cess for street cleaning was levied throughout the Commonwealth period, and that nevertheless an order by the assembly of 1652 provided against the refusal of country people bringing corn to the markets and refusing to pay the accustomed due to the Cryer and Sexton which was called "Skavage due."

The special difficulties surrounding the sale of intoxicants required then as now exceptional treatment. Early closing was rigidly enforced on the City taverners in the days of Edward I. The articles touching the state of London, confirmed by the King, set forth, inter alia, that no taverner was to keep his tavern open for wine or beer after curfew, nor to admit any one into his tavern nor into his house. This, too, was the only trade exercised in the City, for the practice of which it was required that good characters should be produced, and sureties found for good behaviour.

LEICESTER RECORDS.

Records of the Borough of Leicester, 1327-1509. By Mary Bateson. Vol. II. (Cambridge University Press.)

The late Dr. Creighton was not only himself a masterhand as an historian, but possessed the rare and tactful faculty of interesting others in such work and in promoting the publication of valuable records. It was due to his initiation that the Corporation of Northampton undertook the publication of their valuable records, whilst the idea of publishing the still more important records of Leicester not only received from him its first impulse, but all the preliminary steps were taken under his guidance. It was due also to the late Bishop that the Leicester muniments were placed in the capable hands of Miss Bateson. The period covered by the second volume, extending from 1327 to 1509, has an unfortunate hiatus of some seventy-five years. There is no record extant of any borough legislation from 1380 to 1455, whilst from the same date down to 1465 every record pertaining to the Merchant Gild is missing.

The introduction gives an admirable analysis of the subsequent series of transcripts and extracts from the archives. Attention is there drawn to the relations existing between the

The wealth of the archives of Leicester precludes full reproduction, but a wise discretion seems exercised in giving considerable parts in extenso, the most part accompanied by an English version entries on the Merchant Gild roll are various o the sale of wine. In 1343 William of Stopworth, charged with mixing old wine with new wine again tion of the mayor and community. The roll for 1 no taverner was allowed to sell wine until it had the mayor and bailiff and other honest men purpose. In 1354 one William of Cossington was the mayor and jurats with selling a tun of wine d fixed price; he pleaded guilty, and was bound o of 20s. to be paid if he should again offend. I year another taverner was charged with the li the mayor, with his peers and others of the comm the tavern and begged him to sell his wine a according to the ordinance. The taverner refu the chief magistrate, whereupon it was decide that a tun of wine should be forfeited; and tha should be ejected from his gild and expelled fr juror. Moreover, the defaulter had to pay the ma 5s. of silver for his labour in selling the wine. important part in the history of the borough, accounts specially in the fourteenth century s quantities of wine were bestowed upon the courtiers whenever a Royal visit was paid to the to the lord and his officials. Other visitors thought well to mollify were treated after a distinction being made not only in the qualit quantity of the wine, which varied from a and a sester, down to a pottle. On the the mayor being presented at the castle his oath, there was considerable feasting, mayor's accounts every item is noted, inclu amount of fuel burned and the grain spent chickens beforehand.

It matters not, however, in what subject or social town life the reader may be interested, h much material to attract him. The subject-i references to such diverse matters as ale-tas assize of bread, bell men and bell-founders, brid stalls, chandlers, common latrines, ovens, store-ho Corpus Christi and other gilds, cuckstool, curfew flesh assayers, unlawful games, building and re hall, hobby-horses, indulgences, Irish in Lei labourers' wages, lepers' garden, mills and mi officials, pageants, passion play, piepowder co every conceivable commodity, schools, scolds tallage, watchmen, waits, weights and measure writs. These are but a small selection of head haphazard to prove the immense variety of top these pages.

As to the more intricate questions of the mu ment of Leicester and its varied evolutions th special value on account of the peculiar position as part of the Earldom and later of the Duchy of L the accession of Henry IV. there came a great position of Leicester, for its immediate lord King, and the town had, therefore, a doubl to the Sovereign. The frequent residence o Leicester Castle also exercised considerable

A BERKSHIRE MANOR.

In SWALLOWFIELD AND ITS OWNERS (Longmans, 42s. n.) Lady Russell has produced a volume of topography which is almost as interesting as it is handsome. "It is observed," says Fuller, "that the lands in Berkshire are very skittish, and often cast their owners"; and Swallowfield is no exception to the general skittishness, since it has had innumerable owners since its recorded history began. For the matter of that, however, Fuller might have said the same of almost any lands within fifty miles of London—and Swallowfield, being near Reading, is not much more than thirty. It is inevitable that estates within easy reach of the seat of Government should change their owners frequently. Their very propinquity to the capital gives them an artificial value which will sometimes induce a possessor to part with them; while, the purchasers of such places will not, as a rule, be persons rooted to the soil. Thus, it is not surprising that Swallowfield has belonged to something like a dozen families since the Conquest, to say nothing of the Tudor Queens who had it in dower. St. John and Despencer, De La Beche and Beaumys, Backhouse and Hyde held it in turn until it was bought by Governor Pitt with the proceeds of the famous "Regent" Diamond. It did not long remain in the possession of his posterity, and the eighty years during which the Russells have been its owners forms a very respectable tenure.

The early baronial lords need not trouble us. In the middle of the fourteenth century Edward III., that too generous lover of horse-flesh, used the park for his stud. That great King was desperately extravagant. He was, indeed, an early prototype of Carlyle's "Expensive Herr," for he is known to have bought three horses for the modern equivalents of £1,000, £1,400, and £2,000, and Archbishop Islip's "Speculum Regis" was full of reproaches of him for spending money in this way instead of paying his own and his father's debts, or bestowing alms upon the poor. In the middle of Elizabeth's reign the lands of Swallowfield, fallen from their high estate as the appanage of Queens, became the prize of a successful London merchant named Backhouse—a circumstance that was by no means unusual. In proportion to the much smaller population the Elizabethan period was quite as full of new families as the Victorian. It is, indeed, just about three centuries and a-half since the now familiar comedy of New Men and Old Acres began to be played in this country. It was then that fortunes made out of corn or wool, or the commerce of London, or York, or Bristol, became comparatively common—until about that time, indeed, the country had been too unsettled for industrial wealth to have a chance. Once it became clear that a man could own lands without having to be constantly in the field, and that, so many of the old families having been ruined or killed off by the Wars of the Roses, he would not be looked upon as a pariah because he had little or no pedigree, it grew to be the ambition of the trader to obtain "a stake in the country." And so well did his ambition thrive that there are now but few great ennobled families destitute of the blood of at least one Lord Mayor of London or other prosperous citizen. When Samuel Backhouse, the enriched son of a London Alderman, bought Swallowfield in 1582, he was doing his part, all unconsciously, in the evolution of English society. His grandson, William Backhouse, was, according to Anthony Wood, "a most renowned chymist and Rosicrucian," who believed that the true matter of the Philosopher's Stone had been communicated to him by his father, on his death-bed. His heiress carried Swallowfield to her cousin, Sir William Backhouse, Bart. When we remember that an Adventurer's share in the New River Company fetche

Swallowfield, but she does not give the place w born, which was, we believe, York-house, Twickenh time Evelyn was wont to visit at Swallowfield indeed, to have laid out the garden and planted th and cedars which still flourish. It is clear, however the diarist himself says, that there was a good before his time, although he may have improved it.
Cornbury became Earl of Clarendon he found t connexions did not make for his peace of mind.
take the new oaths, and was constantly plotting.
the Tower, which he visited twice as a prisoner.
finally released he found his affairs embarrassed extravagances was the rebuilding of Swallowfield, hands took its present plain but comfortable for 1719 that his son and successor sold the place t
"Diamond," Pitt, whose remarkable career is very interesting way by Lady Russell. She tel ghost of a "black man" is said to haunt Queen An and that this visitant is supposed to be the murdered slave who originally found the gem, or a the angry god Juggernaut, one of whose eyes diamond. When Swallowfield came to Chatham' sold it for £20,770 to the Dodds, and from th Earles it came at last to the family of the pre 1820. The first Russell of Swallowfield was the unc Rose Aylmer, and an able man in many ways; yet his architect to Grecianize one front of the hous
a richly carved cornice which Grinling Gibbons for Lord Clarendon at John Evelyn's suggestion, an other enormous crimes of the same character.

The book concludes with some reminiscences of Russell, the late owner and the husband of the h was acquainted with many of the distinguished men and his notes of conversations with them, althou attractive. It is a little surprising to find it record George had heard Thackeray speak disparagingly, contemptuously," of Scott's "heroic" novel Dickens' case the contempt was poured upon "Tom

The admirable object of "The Homeland Libr interesting us in the beauties and traditions o country, will certainly be advanced by the second series EPSOM, ITS HISTORY AND SURROUNDINGS Association Limited, 6s. n.), written and illustr Gordon Home, whose excellent black and white already praised. To his description of the town, history, Lord Rosebery adds a highly interesting int
which he says,

> When I first came to live at Epsom, a quarter > ago, it was a little sleepy town, surrounded by l > of down and common. Its perennial slumber was > a year by race meetings, when the followers and ca > of the Turf stormed the neighbourhood during a > days, then struck their tents and left the town, > exhausted. Thereafter the calm recommence > inhabitants could saunter over miles of open tu
> the purest air in England. But the memory of th > of carnival kept off the speculative builder an > clients. Thus the town remained rural and o
> Now, all that is changed.

But there yet remain many points of interes exhaustive monograph should incline many visitors

centre of the village of Geddington—have been frequently illustrated and described. The pre-Norman sculptured stones and remains of early crosses in Northamptonshire have also been well treated by Mr. J. Romilly Allen. There are, however, many other stone crosses that have hitherto escaped notice, and the whole series is worth cataloguing, if only as tending to their preservation. Mr. Christopher Markham has done well in expanding a paper read before a local society some few years ago into THE STONE CROSSES OF NORTHAMPTONSHIRE (Simpkin, Marshall, 10s. 6d. n.). Several of Mr. Markham's pictures are creditable and interesting; but we do not, if the drawings are accurate, always agree with him as to dates. The gracefully clustered tall shaft of the Harringworth cross, much spoilt by a modern head, is surely of thirteenth and not fourteenth century date. A drawing is given of the curious boundary stone of Rockingham forest, near Brigstock, which is lettered in capitals, apparently of seventeenth-century date, "In this place grow bocase tree," whilst just above the ground is repeated "Here stood bocase tree." There was some discussion as to this stone many years ago in Notes and Queries to which Mr. Markham gives a reference; but he offers no suggestion of his own. Much wild speculation has been offered on the subject; but there seems little doubt that the true solution is that "bocase tree" was a provincial rendering of boc, a book or writing, and was the name of a boundary tree mentioned in charters. In these pages there are brief descriptions of no fewer than eighty churchyard, village, market, or wayside crosses. The introduction on crosses in general was not called for. A number of general statements that have often appeared elsewhere are put together rather carelessly in a dozen pages; they cannot satisfy any one desirous of a general essay on the subject, and they cannot fail to surprise antiquaries by various slips or errors. It is rather strange to be told in a book which deals with stone crosses that Anglo Saxon ones begin about A.D. 800. Mr. Markham does not seem to be acquainted with the writings of the Bishop of Bristol, Mr. Romilly Allen, the late Mr. Calverley, and many other pre-Norman experts on such a subject.

THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE LIBRARY (Elliot Stock), Mr. G. Laurence Gomme's useful series of topographical excerpts from that famous publication, is now drawing to a close, the thirteenth volume dealing with Warwickshire, Westmorland, and Wiltshire. The northern county occupies a very small space indeed—the antiquarian inquirer in the eighteenth century and the early part of the nineteenth did not often travel so far afield. It is a little surprising to find that Wilts occupies far more space than Warwick, with its Shakespearian memories. To some extent this is accounted for by the public amazement at the eccentric splendour of Fonthill, many pages being needed to detail its glories. But such Midland shires as Warwick have always been regarded as more remote than their distance from London altogether warrants. Nevertheless we find here much that is of interest about the county, although the purely modern importance of Birmingham is suggested by the circumstance that only four pages are devoted to it. Wiltshire is, of course, a very attractive county to the topographer and archæologist, and some of the ancient municipal customs of Marlborough provided Mr. Gomme with important material for his book on "The Village Community." These extracts from "The Gentleman's" are so well edited—this particular volume has been under the care of Mr. F. A. Milne—and so carefully arranged that they form exceedingly handy desiderata to students who are interested in [illegible]

OTHER NEW BOOK

A Restoration Document.

Lady Newdigate-Newdegate is not very fa title, CAVALIER AND PURITAN (Smith and Elder, fragmentary jottings concerning Sir Richard N worthy baronet of the time of Charles II., scar
the real struggles of Cavalier and Puritan, w Restoration days were fast merging into othe
When, however, we have dismissed the mislead Richard, as depicted in diaries, account-books, an proves to be an entertaining personage, able to t on the domestic and social aspects of his time. H marked or heroic, and his Parliamentary career d him deeply in the perilous intricacies of Restor
though a zealous Protestant, he passes safely th House Plot and Monmouth's Rebellion. It is in tions that he reveals himself with Pepys-like deta
He rules his household by means of fines and rew three daughters because they came to prayers, thr he revels in elaborate accounts while perpe deeper in debt; he patronizes Lely and Grin goes on a tour in France, keeps a shrewdly obse which the inn reckonings bulk large, and con comfortable insular conclusion that the Fre
"asinorum rex." Sir Richard is withal a wort though choleric, gentleman, who keeps count of his diary, and indulges in self-communings and over his own "unbridled nature." For the re with his children, plans new extravagances, and old ones, and is "exceeding melancholy" on which falls three days after his second marriage.
historical comments are of the slightest, servi setting to the personal portrait, but we see so ill-starred Monmouth, once in the company of his fa Sovereign, James of York, and Prince Rupert.
most entertaining thing in the volume is Marvell'
from the Throne, one of the most delectable b satire ever produced, here printed from a conte letter in a slightly unfamiliar form. There is spective in the book which lessens its value f reader, but the student of the times will be int occasional glimpses of men and manners which it a for example, is a public-spirited proposal which h don clearly—or shall we say darkly—before us.
lights (being two sockets of glass in form of a lan up in Cornhill, and is intended to burn very b night, which, if approved of, two persons will under the whole city over at a farthing a light."

"Mrs. Freeman."

Under the taking title of THE QUEEN'S COMP son, 24s. n.) Mr. Fitzgerald Molloy retells the old Morley" and "Mrs. Freeman"; of the temp Jennings and the phlegmatic Princess, and Queen book is not of historical value. But it retells kn lively manner, though without any distinction o publisher has provided big print and nice margins some three dozen portrait-illustrations, and th of crimson cloth stamped with the Royal arms in gold

A good deal of abuse has been presented to t Marlborough. Strong virago and [illegible]

than meaner vices. She was her own chief enemy always. Emotional, passionate, vehement, impulsive, she loved strongly and hated strongly, would be all in all to those she loved, and where she loved most showed herself most tyrannical. But most unfortunate feature of any in her whole character was her dangerous propensity to write letters in moments of mental excitement. Coming straight from her quarrels with the Queen, throbbing under a sense of injury always very keen with her, she would sit down and indite a letter in hot blood which, read by the recipient in cool censorious mood, appeared entirely unforgivable. When the rift came in their friendship the Duchess certainly wrote Anne some outrageous letters. With her adored Mrs. Freeman the Queen would have no more to do, and the Duchess was refused admission to her presence. Then this rash and foolish lady went about the town uttering complaints, and her impetuous words were carried, emphasized and distorted, straight back to Anne's ears. The breach was complete, and the Queen died four years later without having had any reconciliation with the woman she had known so intimately. The Duchess survived the Queen more than thirty years, perhaps that she might have time to learn that even for the most fortunate of mortals, for the possessor of great beauty, a brilliant position, many palaces, and immense wealth, this is nevertheless not the best of all possible worlds. It is certain that she learned this lesson well, for in her eighty-third year we find her writing :—" When the stroke comes I only pray that it may not be very painful, knowing that everybody must die, and I think that whatever the next world is it must be better than this, at least to those that never did deceive mortal." And, again, to another correspondent, " I hope that my punishment for small omissions will not be severe when I go out of this world, and I think there cannot possibly be a worse place than this is at present." Perhaps some indulgence might now be shown to the memory of Sarah Jennings, whose chief ambition—a pathetic one in the light of history—was to gain a good name (we quote again from her letters), " to deserve approbation, both living and dead, from the virtuous and the wise."

Friends in Council.

THE VICAR AND HIS FRIENDS, by Dr. Cunningham Geikie (Longmans, 5s. n.), is a collection of imaginary discussions. They are popular rather than learned, though every one concerned in them does his best to overwhelm one with authorities, no matter what may be the subject of the conversation. For instance, when the vicar and his friends discuss prayer, they quote in the course of a few pages John Newton, Tyndall, Mrs. Carlyle, Seneca, Plato, Juvenal, Persius, Schleiermacher, the Accadians, St. John the Baptist, and Mr. Spurgeon. In fact, they all seem to have the classical dictionary at their fingers' ends, and a working knowledge of the best-known modern books. The result is by no means bad reading, but one feels that these large social and religious topics demand more thorough treatment than they have received, at any rate in the present work, from Dr. Geikie. In a book so full of references to ancient and modern literature, it is unpleasant to suspect that many of them need to be verified. Dr. Geikie says :—" Plato, indeed, in ' Charmides,' tells us that Apollo gave the arrow to the Scythian, and that by its means he found his way through countries strange to him." Where, in the " Charmides," is this to be found ? Again, Dr. Geikie says :—" No wonder that Gibbon, after discoursing on the glory of the dome of St. Sophia, adds, ' but the smallest fly that lighted on it was a much greater wonder.' " These, though put into inverted commas, are not references, the name of the late vicar of St. Pete Docks, was not Lowther, but Lowder ; and the late Alban's, Holborn, should not be given, as in the " Machonochie Rev."

Ladies of Old Times.

Miss Gabrielle Festing's UNSTORIED IN HISTO 6s.) contains some charming and careful studies of certain interesting women of the 16th, 17th, and 18th Drawn from old letters, old diaries, and the Rep Historical Manuscripts Commission, these sympa portraits breathe, as it were, the aroma of pot-pour for us the indefinable sadness which belongs to all m a vanished past, and in the story of Lady Harley, wife, of Thomas Pitt and Jane Innes, that ill-mate and of so delightful an aunt and niece as Mrs. E and Lady Fenn, Miss Festing provides us with so self-forgetfulness and refreshment. These scatter papers were worth collecting into permanent book fo volume may be recommended to quiet souls who wayside resting-place.

The Works of Sir Philip Sidney.

The authoress (Edith Morley) of this essay, WORKS OF SIR PHILIP SIDNEY (Rees, 1s. n), congratulated on the comprehensive style in wh arranged her matter. The " Arcadia " and the receive adequate treatment at her hands, but the m work in her book is the criticism of that inestimabl " Apologie for Poetrie," whilst the famous lett Elizabeth, concerning the " French Match," attention that it so thoroughly deserves. In her " Sidney's Translations of the Psalms," it is to that, for the sake of the casual reader, Miss not allude to those translated by his si both in quality as well as in quantity, it admitted that the better results were achieve Pembroke, of whose labours also in revising the " Arcadia " acknowledgment should have " Astrophel's " relations with " Stella " are interp vague a spirit, and should have been examined length, as also should have been his correspondence Languet ; but, in offering these criticisms, we mus that the book in question does not claim to be a bio an essay.

A Question for the Weissmanists.

USE-INHERITANCE, by Dr. Walter Kidd (A. 2s. 6d. n.), raises an interesting point—already disc author before the Zoological Society—which sugg doctrine that acquired characters can never be by inheritance requires modification, in other Weismannism is not universally valid. The point is ment of hair on the bodies of animals. When we find, that the " hair-streams " on the face of a dog trend those on the face of a horse downwards, or that the of hair on the head of a large class of men is opp found in the simian family, we seem to be in the facts which cannot be accounted for by natural s which can only have had their origin in certain animals which show the new types. The peculiarities must, it would seem, have thus been acquired by and transmitted to their descendants. The point worked out by Dr. Kidd with many illustratio pamphlet certainly deserves the careful consi

FICTION.

"The Benefactress."

Readers who wish to be amused, and do not like problems and pathological studies presented to them in the guise of fiction, will not find many better new novels than THE BENEFACTRESS (Macmillan and Co., 6s.). It is by the author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden," and is fully equal to that taking book. We are not praising the author extravagantly when we say that she has at least two of the qualifications of a good novelist—an easy and correct style and an abiding sense of humour. The story, though it is clear that it will end satisfactorily, maintains its interest throughout, and is full of well-drawn characters. Anna Estcourt, a young Englishwoman of twenty-five, who is heartily tired of her dependence on her rich and vulgar sister-in-law, succeeds to an estate near Stralsund in North Germany, which has been left to her by her German uncle Joachim. It is worth £2,000 a year, and Anna takes possession of it with the benevolent intention of providing a home, not only for herself, but also for "ladies of good family who have fallen on evil days by the will of God." So runs the pious German advertisement, an elderly lady of good family being also required as a paid housekeeper. Anna, of course, is an enthusiast, but at the same time a well-bred and sensible woman with whom it is possible to sympathize. She needs all the reader's sympathy during the progress of her experiment. It is to be hoped that the unsparing portraits of two or three German ladies will not lead to international complications. Fortunately, they are balanced by a German country gentleman of the best type, and by a terrible English female snob. After all, it is only a novel, and we suspect, from internal evidence, that it has been written merely for our amusement. From that point of view, it is a complete success.

A Pleasant Surprise.

The young person who anticipates in THE SINNER AND THE PROBLEM, by Eric Parker (Macmillan, 6s.), the sort of thing suggested by the title will be comically disappointed. The book is named with probably faintly malicious "intention." It is not concerned with unsavoury "pasts" leading to sentimental futures. It is a delicate, sympathetic study of a handful of people as they appear to a sensitive artist with a keen sense of humour. The Sinner is one small boy; the Problem is another. Child-pathos is too apt to become maudlin and is a strict test of a writer's powers. How few have succeeded with it, from Dickens downwards! But "The Sinner" can even have an illness without becoming sickly. In his delirium he does not talk of angels:—

> Latin sentences, always Latin sentences, subject and object and predicate and all the unmannerly jargon of school-book grammar. And twice at least there were words indicative of the more serious interviews with mine host—a sort of comment unspoken till now—and yet I knew the Sinner thought lightly of such matters; but they were part of his daily life, and so I think found their utterance then. I am sure I should have laughed at the word don't at any other time; just then, in that connexion, I wondered what it had cost him before to suppress it; not much, I dare-say, but in that little bed he did not look worth whipping.

The Sinner's pathos is by no means always tearful. He has a conjuring which is "a sort of collection, really," of all the

There is a love story running through the book o daintiest kind, and there are happy little descripti nature, and, behind all, an interesting and fastidio

"Barbara West."

It is long since we have had the good fortune t a book so convincing and so capable as Kelgh BARBARA WEST (John Long, 6s.). The story has the love affair of a young journalist, Enoch Watson West, a violinist on the lowest rung of fame's l whatever point of view the book is regarded it mu
a success. The two principals are admirably dr earnestly sentimental, desiring a mate for an anch in life; Barbara, frolicsome, tender, yet shallow, him in her little incapable way so that she may re friend while not accepting him as a lover. Th dithian atmosphere about the book, both in the occasional involution of the literary style and in analysis of the woman's mental and emotional p of the minor characters at least is not who of Dickens. This is Jack Darbyshire, whose persiflage and downright good-heartedness remi Swiveller. A good deal of the book is give description of a provincial newspaper man's life i and the thing is well done. As a study in the de the declension of character, as well as for hea humour and tragedy delicately described, forcible over-wrought, "Barbara West" deserves high pr

An Amiable Prig.

Mr. Julian Sturgis has improved considerably CALINART (Constable, 6s.) is a novel excellent of i life and smart dialogue and good character-drawin many better-known novelists might have been pr Stephen himself begins as an Oxford undergra child of fortune, clever, self-conscious, meaning to to rights with the least possible delay—in short, person" of a not uncommon type in that ancient U Sturgis accomplishes the remarkable feat of turnin very decent sort of man, and introduces us by the w usual and very well-drawn characters. His gallery o bear comparison with any we have seen of late ye novel, and they cover a wide range, from the estimal Coops to Lord Ranham and the Princess. Some o are admirable studies; the men, without e eminently like-life; and the author has provided incident (from the Russo-Turkish war) to ke mercurial reader's interest from flagging. It i from start to finish—by far the best that Mr. St written.

Mr. Max Pemberton.

"This" says the publisher's leaflet, with ca
"is Mr. Pemberton's longest and greatest novel.
so. THE GIANT'S GATE (Cassell, 6s.) is by no mea
The author has taken the stirring period of the ag Fashoda, the death of the late President of the of the riots at Longchamp; and stimulates the c readers by the innocent device of introducing celebrities under thinly disguised names. Mr. M seems to know his Paris; we find here (to quote o the obliging leaflet) "pictures of storm and calm and palace, of the halls of the Anarchists, and the h who are conspiring against the French Republic."

heroic. The author himself becomes no less monotonous in the glowing periods of his descriptive passages. He must always be painting his pictures in a high key, and the consequence is that he produces an impression of an unreal life passed in a whirl of violent emotions. We hunger for more repose. And the style of his writing is open to the same reproach. On occasion he can write decent English, but the temptation to be strong overpowers him, and too often he becomes merely violent, presenting the curious spectacle of a man ranting and weeping by turns over the fortunes of these harmless puppets of his own creation. The sight is almost pathetic, reminiscent of a baffled, struggling aeronaut whose machine obstinately refuses to rise for all his efforts. Mr. Pemberton is so clever a contriver of romantic stories that we could wish to see him learn a little more restraint and observe mankind a little more closely. His characters are excellent—from the outside; from within they are nothing.

Mr. Riccardo Stephens.

The temperament of the medical student is everywhere visible in the work of Mr. Riccardo Stephens, who loves to adopt the tone of the healthy, uneducated British sportsman. THE WOOING OF GREY EYES (Murray, 6s.) contains one long story, which gives the volume its name, and several short ones. They all exhibit a talent of narration; the opening story would be really good but for a touch of the melodramatic and the use of some too ordinary machinery. Mr. Stephens writes well of what he knows; he handles field sports and the hospital with equal ease; and he is at home in the streets of Edinburgh or on the northern moors. Perhaps the best bit of work in an entertaining volume is the story called "Drummer Deas," which we remember noticing some years ago in one of the magazines. It is a powerful story, well told, and gives promise of better work.

Gulliver up to Date.

The satirist has often found a safe field in an imaginary Eutopia. Mr. Godfrey Sweven is so determined to leave no abuse unlashed that he has been at the pains of discovering a whole archipelago, through which he painfully proceeds, island by island. RIALLARO (Putnams, 6s.) is the name he gives to his new Utopia. It is in the South Pacific, and the group of islands which go to make it up are for ever encircled by a ring of mist and guarded by dangerous reefs and currents. The introductory chapters strike us as laboured and unnecessary. After the landing takes place there are some interesting chapters on the Alcofanian language, religion and social customs, which remind us of the habits of Mr. Samuel Butler's people of "Erewhon." The Bureau of Fame and its amalgamation with journalism and the Church into one great department of the State gives scope for a good deal of biting sarcasm. But the whole book is too long, and the writer's style is not calculated to banish weariness. "Riallaro" contains some sound sense, but the author has attempted too much, and towards the end of the book the quality of his satire has sadly degenerated.

Devon and Somerset.

We hesitate as to the epithet to apply to the set of short stories collected by Mr. Eden Phillpotts under the title THE STRIKING HOURS (Methuen, 6s.). They are dialect stories of South Devon, and there can be no question of Mr. Phillpotts' knowledge of the dialect. His work, when read aloud with the true intonation, is music in the ears of a Devonian. The stories themselves, however, are more open to criticism. Many of them seem trivial, made to measure, unconvincing. Whether in comedy or in tragedy Mr. Phillpotts seldom gets to the heart of three men and three women, makes them fall l duly marries them at the end. In place of the diffi commonly attend the progress of true love—in fiction rather good account of a stag-hunt. It is not story, on the whole—rather thin and slight, but no w than some more pretentious works. The "Pha West," it may be as well to explain, are the wild re

Mason's Corner.

We are assured in Mr. Charles Felton Pidgin's his "Picture of New England Home Life," as he ADAMS SAWYER (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), is most cer from the imagination alone—that there is no su Massachusetts as Normouth, no town bearing the n borough, and no village discoverable under that Corner. If there had been, he ingenuously adds, have employed these names. No doubt, as was t
"David Harum," there will not be wanting enthu cover the actual locale of the story, and to fit all th with their real names. The book is of the "Da school: it proceeds leisurely on its way, including of interest (and a good deal of no very great inter characters said, or did, or thought. Is this sort becoming a distinctive feature of American liter Stockton practises it to excess, and it seems to be g and more the custom on the other side of the Atlan at every opportunity reams of diffuse dialogue ha much to do with the story. Perhaps the strenuous li America finds restfulness in this deliberate inconse confess that we should prefer a little judicious comp Pidgin seems to have found himself making but sl and towards the end the action becomes brisk eno body—so brisk as to present the appearance of a ha Long-lost relations crop up with bewildering freq dings take place wholesale; every one successfully i ambition with a completeness that is almost comic rather a liking for Mr. Quincy Adams Sawyer, but the perfect gentleman that Mr. Pidgin would have n his preface. But he is a good fellow on the who of the folk at Mason's Corner are worth knowing.

The Boomerang Club.

Mr. George Bartram has some power of imagina has no fear of incurring the wrath of the strait-lac THIRTEEN EVENINGS (Methuen, 6s.) he adopts the machinery of a club—the Boomerang Club is the na
it—the members of which entertain each other occas interesting reminiscences of their past lives. S characters are not particularly reputable, but the of the respectable are commonly dull reading, a Mr. Bartram does well to seek lively subjects, for writing is apt to be long-winded, and even the stirri related by the gay frequenters of the Boomerang times upon the monotonous. "On the Track of Sly," for instance, is mere silliness. Some of M contributions, on the other hand, are highly spiced anybody. It is not a particularly good collectio but it contains one or two that are worth readin shall be Lord," is the best; and "With a Tast is almost worthy of a place beside Mr. Kipling's smith" as a description of a Bacchanalian orgie.
to us that the stories would have been better wi clumsy and old-fashioned framework.

A Reading Party.

burning to achieve another) discovers, in orthodox fashion, that college life even at Cambridge cannot give her everything; and the frivolous young lady, who had joined the expedition with a tardy resolve to make up for lost time, goes away to be introduced to the family of her betrothed. There is one disappointment—the plain student falls in love, but is rather unfairly fobbed off with a Newnham Fellowship. "Alan St. Aubyn" displays here her one stroke of originality.

In North Australia.

Despite its sensational cover, and the fact that Mr. Donald Macdonald and his collaborator have not attained to the level of "How We Kept the Flag Flying," yet THE WARRIGALS' WELL (Ward, Lock, and Co., 6s.) is certainly a book to read. The story is put into the mouth of one Jasper Meredith, an ex-army captain. He and his friend, Allan Ogilvie, go to North Australia in the employ of an exploration company. The outsetting of the story lacks coherence. But once into it, the reader finds himself fastened to an absorbing tale in which the style is well suited to the story. Like the life of the explorers, one of recurring quietude and adventure, the story now rises high and now sinks to dulness. But some of its characters are well done, especially the "hard-case" "Slasher" Quin and the scoundrel Fox. The tale gives much insight as to gold prospecting in North Australia; also how the black police there do their work, and, as it comes from those who know their ground, it may be taken "without salt." The end is all that one could wish it to be, there being a modicum of the inevitable love interest.

Le Monde où l'on s'ennuie.

Titles are as thick in the pages of HER GRACE'S SECRET (Hutchinson, 6s.) as blackberries in September—a fact which should be enough to secure Mrs. Tweedale's novel a wide reading in certain quarters. Whether, when read, it will be appreciated is another matter. Her aristocrats are terribly wicked, it is true; they break the ten commandments like so many eggs; and the majority of the ladies are haughty and beautiful enough even for the taste of the servants' hall. But they are also bored to extinction. The old Duke of Glenroy, Lord and Lady Arlington, and the rest find life in these lofty circles almost too hard a burden to bear, and after some time their persistent air of ennui infects the reader. The book is long: it has an ingenious plot (Her Grace's secret is, curiously enough, rather like the secret in "Tristram of Blent" turned upside down); it is written with some cleverness and some acquaintance with the world it describes. But it is too full of the air of boredom to be exhilarating, and the warmest admirer of the aristocracy could hardly call it pleasant.

THE FOLLIES OF CAPTAIN DALY, by F. Norreys Connell (Grant Richards, 6s.), has the merit of being a little out of the common. "Zooks," said the Duke of York, "that's a rake-helly corner on the bay!" After this beginning we naturally find ourselves back in the days of Charles O'Malley; and the escapades of the Irish Captain, which culminate in his winning a wager that he would get Napoleon's sword on the field of Waterloo, form a clever revival of the manner of Charles Lever which is rather a refreshing change from the society novel.

A MAN OF MILLIONS (Cassell, 6s.), though not, despite its sensational incidents, wildly thrilling, is a well-written book, by Mr. S. R. Keightley; and the rough diamond of a millionaire, who returns from the life of an outcast in Africa, is well drawn, as is also the girl who reclaims him, though their agreement at the close sixteenth century. It is a laudable attempt one, though as a story it wants coherence an little tedious in its rehearsal of the brawls Captain.

Miss Adeline Sergeant hardly puts forth he SYLVIA'S AMBITION (Hodder and Stoughton, quite harmless tale, pleasant enough to rea rather superficially on theatrical life, with a country home of a wealthy and philanthropic ma

THE BLACK MASK, by E. W. Hornung (Grant gives us the exploits of an educated professiona who appeared in a previous book by the same au his "Dr. Watson." They are sensational enou tails off considerably when the hero goes out dies there. The stories are ingenious, but the au like Raffles', might well be turned to a better us

SPORTING SORROWS (Arrowsmith, 1s.), by F bright little collection of amusingly written s on sporting subjects. The humour is fresh and of the sketches have previously appeared in Pun worth reprinting.

AN ILL WIND (John Long, 6s.) gives us one Cameron's ingenious plots wherein almost all the m the same girl, one of them being already engaged and subsequently marrying a third. They play manner a little too obviously amateurish to m all convincing.

A STOLEN WOOING, by Seyton Heath (Digb improbable, ungrammatical, well-meaning, and a It is well printed and brightly bound.

In a smooth style, far from being too wordy, marred by occasional lapses into slipshod Englis Tanqueray records, in THE CALL OF THE FUT Blackett, 6s.), the main part of an immoral, aest poet's journey through life. It is hardly an in but the book contains a pleasing sketch of a lady

A HARVEST OF STUBBLE (Francis Brett, 2s. 6 Hooper, is not a very creditable piece of work. not a book that a clergyman would choose to rea meetings. The tone throughout is vulgar an the characters and the setting are equally obj though the book may possibly be worth p emphatically not worth reading.

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAG

In Temple Bar George Paston writes of " Professor in Literary England." The professo George Ticknor, who gossiped agreeably about Salon, &c. The inclusion of some of his Madame de Stael's salon would have added to the paper. One of the short stories is by Mr. H whose career we have watched with interest eve that very graphic book "In the Niger Country."

Those who are interested in the lighter lite will thank us for drawing attention to an article written by Mrs. Pennell and illustrated by Mr. on "Italy's Garden of Eden," which is Ruskin Italian Lakes. There is also an interesting accou Mead Howells, of life in the Paris Art Schools.

In Good Words some old acquaintances are

In the Sunday Magazine Mrs. Belloc-Lowndes discourses of the charity of Queens—a subject on which she has collected a good deal of information.

"Wanted—Women" in the Empire Review is an appeal to ladies of birth and education to go West and get married. It is pointed out to them, however, that they had better learn to make themselves useful in a house before they start. If they are competent and "willing"—not only in the sense of Mr. Barkis but also in the sense of the general servant—they have a fair promise of a happy home some forty miles or so from a railway station. "Silhouettes of the War" is anecdotal and moderately interesting. The writer's name is not given. The most important paper in the issue is Colonel Willcocks' account of the relief of Kumassi. He is very enthusiastic about the black troops under his command :-

> The only refusal to obey orders was that men in hospital broke out during the night and, willing to face any punishment except that of not being in the relief, joined their companies, hiding in the bush to avoid detection. Footsore, their legs in most cases a mass of ulcers, underfed, without an ounce of meat or salt or anything in the shape of grease to cook with, without change of clothing, these splendid fellows never grumbled; all they wanted was to say :—"I too took part in the relief of Kumassi."

The story of "The Duke of Kent's Military Service in the West Indies" is an unrecorded chapter in colonial history related by the Hon. N. Darnell Davis.

The North American Review brings to light an essay on Shakespeare, by Victor Hugo. It is like this :—

> Shakespeare the drunken savage! Savage, Yes, but the inhabitant of the virgin forest; drunken indeed, but with the ideal. He is a giant, beneath the boughs of enormous trees, who holds a great golden cup, and the light which he drinks is reflected in his eyes. Shakespeare, like Æschylus, like Job, like Isaiah, is one of the sovereigns of thought and of poesy, who, sufficient for the All Mysterious, have the depth of creation itself, and who like creation itself translate and illustrate this depth by a profusion of forms and images, springing from the darkness, in flowers, in leaves, and in living streams.

One can picture the poet declaiming this. One sees his arms waving, and eyes glowing like coals of fire.

In the Universal and Ludgate Magazine Miss Mabel Moore has an article on Wren's Library at Cambridge. The series of photographs—"Frenchmen of To-Day"—continues with M. Paul Bourget, "Gyp," and Madame Dieulafoy.

We have also received The Woman at Home, The Universal and Ludgate Magazine, The Art Journal, Golden Sunbeams, The Dawn of Day, Little Folks, Cassell's Magazine, The Magazine of Art, The Connoisseur, St. Nicholas, The Gentleman's Magazine, Longman's Magazine, The Literary Era, The Artist, The Journal of Education, The Smart Set, The Rambler, The Antiquary, The Genealogical Magazine, The Public School Magazine, The Architectural Review.

Correspondence.

WAS AMY ROBSART KILLED?

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Philip Sidney writes in answer to some criticisms of your reviewer on his recently published treatise "Who killed Amy Robsart?" With the point raised by your reviewer I have nothing to do. In fact I have not seen Mr. Sidney's treatise. But I am surprised that no reviewer has taken him to task for its very title. The question "Who killed Amy Robsart?" assumes, as a matter of course, that scandal was right in insinuating that Amy Robsart was killed by somebody, and except any testimonies hitherto unknown that Mr. have succeeded in unearthing. But, unless he has fo arguments to prove a murder, I submit that the title of h should have been, not "Who killed Amy Robsart?" Amy Robsart killed?"

My first article on the subject will be found in Historical Review for April, 1886 (Vol. I., p. 235), in argument would have been considerably strengthen seen at that date the text of De Quadra's letter, wh professed to translate in his History. As soon as I disc the whole text of that letter was actually in print publication, I wrote an article upon it, which will be f number for January, 1888 (Vol. XIII., p. 85), of the s To these two papers, especially to the last, I refer and all who are interested in the subject.

Your obedient servant,

JAMES GAI

West View, Pinner, Oct. 12, 1901.

AUSTRALIAN VERSE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Jose, in his contribution on Austra remarks that he has said little of what he meant therefore may perhaps be pardoned for feeling una comprehend his meaning.

His article, however, amounts to a depreciation Lindsay Gordon and one or two of his time, and an a of some later poets, or poetical aspirants, who, he co much more typical of the country.

I have travelled through the bush more than most themselves, and, while my experience of the cities is weeks, my experience of the bush extends to some year emphatically that Gordon in his poems voiced Australia and to the native born of my time. And, though I have the country for some eight years, I venture to say tha Australia of to-day. Kendall we can leave aside, admired for some of his sad, sweet verses, he was neve by the Australians as typical of the country.

Mr. Jose tells us that the Australians mistaken Gordon as representative of the country at the Marcus Clarke in his preface to Gordon's poems, whic such an exquisite piece of poetical prose. Did any accept a poet as typical of their country on the critic? Further, is Mr. Jose aware that Gordon's in the mouth of more or less all Australia long befo Clarke wrote his appreciation? To say that Gordon Australian as "With Kitchener to Khartoum" is S absurd. And when Mr. Jose says that what he is call the "Wattleblossom" sentiment of the "Sick St appeals to the tourist and the townsman he is misre a poem which is one of the best descriptions of t philosophy of the bush.

Mr. Jose gives a number of quotations from writers, but one fails to see in them anything more of the life, or that the more serious represent more acc philosophy of the country in what, did one wish to "Wattleblossom" compliment, one might describe "never-never" sentiment.

It is true that a weird melancholy tinges the Gordon and others, and will any one with a touch of imagination, whether English or Australian born,

Where, with fire and fierce drought on her tresses,
Insatiable summer oppresses
Sere woodlands and sad wildernesses,
And faint flocks and herds.

And the following lines from the "Sick Stockrider" are as typical as any of the active life :—

'Twas merry in the glowing morn, among the gleaming grass,
To wander as we've wandered many a mile ;
And blow the cool tobacco cloud, and watch the white wreaths pass, Sitting loosely in the saddle all the while.
'Twas merry 'mid the blackwoods, when we spied the station roofs,
To wheel the wild scrub cattle at the yard,
With a running fire of stockwhips, and a fiery run of hoofs :
Oh ! the hardest day was never then too hard !

I am, Sir,
Yours faithfully,
London. EDWARD H. CANNEY.

"AN INTERNATIONAL DETECTIVE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have no wish or right to meddle with English politics, nor have I either any competency to deal with military matters. But on reading Sir Redvers Buller's speech of the 10th inst., in which he brings in an "international detective," I could not help recalling a somewhat similar incident in literary history.

Lord Chesterfield and Montesquieu were good friends, and, on one occasion, while travelling together to Rome, they began to discuss rather hotly the character of their respective countrymen.

"The French," said Montesquieu, "are more intelligent than the English."

"Well," replied Chesterfield, "I do not deny it, but the English have more common sense."

Each persevered in his estimate of his own people, and, meanwhile, they arrived at Rome. Shortly after, Montesquieu received one evening the visit of an individual unknown to him, who said, in a mysterious voice, "Sir, I know you are a great French literary man, and for this reason, beside the great interest I take in your safety, I come secretly to inform you that the police of the Holy Office have their eye upon you, knowing that you are by no means a firm believer in our holy religion. I come, therefore, to warn you to be on your guard." The stranger quitted the room with the thanks of Montesquieu, who began to consider how to protect himself. With this object in view he burnt without delay the sheets of a book on the affairs of Rome, still in MS., at which he had worked for years. The following day he met Chesterfield and related to him what had occurred.

"Then," said Chesterfield, "you have done away with a work which cost you several years of thought ?"

"Yes."

"But, tell me, who was your visitor ? Did you ask for his name ?"

"No, I didn't. He merely said that he warned me out of sympathy. And considering that my book, though unfinished, was on subjects relating to religion, I thought it prudent to destroy it."

THE MEMORIAL TO THE LATE R BLACKMORE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have been asked to act as Hon. Secre
Treasurer of a Fund to be raised with the obje Memorial of the late Mr. R. D. Blackmore in Ex and, having known Mr. Blackmore intimately fo years, and enjoyed the great privilege of his hear ness I hardly say that in accepting the position
the feeling that whatever work it may entail it a "labour of love."

The accompanying reprint of an article in Circular and Booksellers' Record of May 4, 1901, how the Memorial came to be suggested. It i the Subscription Fund will be more than s erection of a suitable Memorial in Exeter Cathe proposed, with the sanction of Mr. Blackmore's that any surplus should be invested for the benefit Benevolent Fund, which has recently been connexion with the Society of Authors.

I am yours faithfully,
R. B.
St. Dunstan's-house, Fetter-lane, London, E.C

* Mr. Marston will be glad to send the circu reprint of the article above mentioned and a pre the Honorary Committee of the Fund, which inc of Mr. Thomas Hardy, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, M &c., to any of our readers.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISH

The life of Christ is still the favourite gift boo
At least five new biographies are announced, the being the guinea volume by Dr. John Watson
the Master" (Hodder and Stoughton). Mr. Co sent to Palestine especially to illustrate this pictures are reproduced in colours. "The I the Redeemer" is Messrs. Cassell's contrib already mentioned in Literature, is divided written by various well-known writers of dif bodies. A third biography (Grant Richards) is J. Dawson, who has recently visited Palestine
"The Man Christ Jesus," and is as far as poss versial. It is illustrated from the old mast also the Rev. H. C. Beeching's "Life of Ch Murray's "Home and School Library," and "
Lord Jesus Christ : A Harmony of the Gospe
Father Palmer (Art and Book Company).

"A History of the World" is a lar announced the first volume of eight, to come t
Mr. Heinemann. The general editor is Dr. Helm
the Rt. Hon. James Bryce. It begins with th American Continent, since in Mexico and P documents of man's existence are to be found.

Mr. H. G. Wells' volume of "Anticipation lished by Messrs. Chapman and Hall next mo will also have another "Road" book by Mr. ready—"The Norwich Road," illustrated by with reproductions from well-known pictures.
lishers also announce a translation by F. A Diaries of the Emperor Frederick, as edited by Poschinger, with extracts from the diaries kept month, is subsidiary to his "The Women of the Renaissance" and arises to some extent from the correspondence that book brought him from ladies on the part women may play in life.

Mr. Grant Richards will shortly publish a volume by Mr. T. W. Russell, M.P., entitled "Ireland and the Empire: A Review, 1800-1900," sketching the political history of Ireland, and giving the author's views on the future.

"What's What," the new book of reference by Mr. Harry Quilter, which he describes as a "guide for to-day to life as it is, and things as they are," will be published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein on November 1st.

Mr. Elliot Stock will shortly publish a book by Mr. Percy Fitzgerald on "Bardell v. Pickwick," giving the real names of the characters introduced into the case, and some fresh information concerning its origin, with curious illustrations.

Miss Mary Wilkins' new book, "The Portion of Labour"—a long New England novel—will be issued by Messrs. Harper towards the end of October.

"The Military Forces of the Crown," by Colonel W. H. Daniel, late instructor at Sandhurst, is a book of interest to come from Messrs. Cassell. It is intended both for military men and the general public.

Messrs. George Newnes, Limited, are about to publish a volume of fairy tales by the Queen of Roumania, which bears the title "A Real Queen's Fairy Book."

A new series of books dealing with current ecclesiastical problems called "The Churches Outlook for the Twentieth Century" is to be published by Mr. Elliot Stock. The first volume to be issued next week is "Theology Old and New," by Dr. W. F. Cobb.

Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode are issuing as new volumes in the Bible Student's Library "Samuel and His Age," a study in the constitutional history of Israel, by Dr. G. C. M. Douglas, D.D., and "Grammar of Prophecy," an attempt to discern the method underlying the Prophetic Scriptures, by the Rev. R. B. Girdlestone.

Among the books we have not already announced coming from the Cambridge University Press shortly are "The Annotators of the Codex Bezæ," by Dr. Rendel Harris; "Cromwell on Foreign Affairs," with four essays on international matters, by F. W. Payn; "Hegelian Cosmology," by J. McT. E. McTaggart, uniform with his "Studies in the Hegelian Dialectic"; and two volumes in the Pitt Press Series, "The 'Memorabilia' of Xenophon," Book II., edited by G. M. Edwards, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Sidney Sussex; and Horace's "Satires," edited by the Headmaster of Westminster School.

The Oxford University Press announce the following works for the Series of Anecdota Oxoniensia:—"Collations from the Codex Cluniacensis s. Holkhamicus," a Ninth-Century Manuscript of Cicero, now in Lord Leicester's library at Holkham, with unpublished Scholia, two facsimiles, and a History of the Codex, by W. Peterson; Firdausi's "Yûsuf and Zalikhâ," edited by H. Ethé; "Kâuva Satapatha Brâhmana," edited by J. Eggeling; Bale's "Index Britanniae Scriptorum," edited by R. L. Poole and Miss Mary Bateson.

Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein will publish immediately a work entitled "A Scientific Philosophy the Harbinger of a Scientific Theology."

Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall announce a new illustrated magazine devoted to carpentry, mechanics, electricity, and engineering, called the Young Engineer and Amateur Carpenter. The price is to be 4d., and the first number will be ready on the 25th instant.

Books to look out for at once.

"Hypolympia; or The Gods in the Island." By Edmund Gosse. Heinemann. 3s. 6d.

[An ironic fantasy.]

"The Chartreuse of Parma." By Stendhal. With an Introduction by Maurice Maeterlinck. Heinemann. 7s. 6d.

"Living London." Edited by George R. Sims. Cassell. Part I., with photogravures.

"The Prophet of Berkeley Square." By Robert Hichens. Methuen. 6s.

"Count Hannibal." By Stanley Weyman. Smith, Elder. 6s.

"A Modern Antæus." By the writer of "An English Woman's Letters." Murray. 6d.

"In Spite of All." By Edna Lyall. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS

With notes where required to guide the reader as to contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent

ART.

L'IMAGINATION DE L'ARTISTE. Par P. Souriau. 7½ × 5. Paris: Hachette.

[By the author of "Théorie de l'Invention," "L'esthétique du mouvement," and "La suggestion dans l'art."]

THE PRINT COLLECTOR'S HANDBOOK. By A. Whitman. 152 pp. Bell. 15s.

[The author is in the Prints and Drawings Department of the British Museum. It is a substantial work, with a great number of page illustrations, mostly in half-tone.]

FILIPPO DE SER BRUNELLESCO. (Great Masters Series.) By Leader Scott. 8 × 5½. 158 pp. Bell. 5s. n.

GIOVANNI SEGANTINI. By L. Villari. 11½ × 7½. '07 pp. 21s. n.

[A sumptuous work, with 75 of the artist's pictures.]

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. By Graham Balfour. 2 vols. 9 × 6, 455 pp. Methuen. 25s. n.

[This is the "authorized" biography, undertaken at the request of Mrs. Stevenson, supplementing the letters edited by Sidney Colvin.]

STRINGER LAWRENCE (The Father of the Indian Army). By Biddulph. 8 × 5½. 133 pp. Murray. 5s. n.

[A short life, with portraits, &c., of the first English Commander-in-Chief in India, 1678-1775.]

PROPOS DE FELIX FAURE. By Saint-Simonin. 7½ × 4½. Paris: Ollendorff. Fr. 3.50.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

GOODY TWO SHOES—NURSERY RHYMES. Part II. Ed. Welsh. (Both paper bound.) S.P.C.K. 4d. and 6d.

["Goody Two Shoes" is a slightly abridged reprint of the well-known tale (1768) attributed to Goldsmith. The illustrations are the original woodcuts. "The Nursery Rhymes" are well illustrated by Clara E. Atwood.]

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF ANTHEA. By L. Rossi. 4½ × 3. Glaisher.

[A little fairy story in large print.]

MRS. HAMMOND'S CHILDREN. By Mary Stafford. 7½ × 5. Brimley Johnson. 3s. 6d. n.

[Sketches of children's home-life amusement. Fairly well illustrated.]

THE REIGN OF KING COLE. Ed. by J. M. Gibbon. 7½ × 5. Dent. 4s. 6d. n.

[A number of fairy stories from different sources retold. The Court of Old King Cole. Copiously and well illus. by C. Robinson.]

THE WONDER-CHILD. By Ethel Turner (Mrs. H. R. Cox). 7½ × 5, 320 pp. R.T.S.

[A story of Australian life, and the Australian war-continued.]

FAIRY TALES. From the Swedish of Baron G. Djurklou. Ed. by H. L. Brækstad. 8½ × 6½. 178 pp. Heinemann.

[A selection of the Swedish Folk and Fairy Tales collected twenty years ago by Baron Djurklou. Fully illustrated by Nordic artists.]

WITH THE REDSKINS ON THE WARPATH. By S. Walker. 280 pp. 3s. 6d. n.

[The adventures—fights with Indians, &c.—of a young Lad of Canadian Rangers during the French Wars in Canada in the first half of the eighteenth century.]

THE SOUL OF A CAT, and Other Stories. By Margaret. 7 × 4½. 174 pp. Heinemann.

[Mostly studies in cat-character, with sketches by Renan.]

THREE SAILOR BOYS; or, Adrift in the Pacific. By V. L. CAMERON, C.B. 7½×5, 149 pp. Nelson. 1s. 6d.

[Three runaway boys who go to sea and get caught by savages. Illus.]

A CHERRY TREE. By AMY LE FEUVRE. 7½×4¾, 183 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 2s.

[A short story of domestic life for girls. Two Illustrations.]

THE WORLD OF THE GREAT FOREST. By P. DU CHAILLU. 8½×5½, 323 pp. Murray. 7s. 6d. n.

[The animals of the Great Central African Forest (some of which were discovered by the author) here tell their own stories and explain their actions. The pictures (not all new, we fancy) are very good.]

CLASSICAL.

SEXTI PROPERTI. CARMINA. (Scriptorum Classicorum Bibliotheca Oxoniensis.) 7½×5. Clarendon Press. 3s.

HOMER'S ODYSSEY. Books XIII.-XXIV. Ed. by D. B. MONRO. 9×5¾, 312 pp. Clarendon Press. 16s.

[A continuation of the commentary on the Odyssey originally begun by Mr. Riddell, of Balliol, and completed as to its first part, books I.-XII., by Dr. Merry, in 1875. Appendices on Homer and his works occupy more than 200 pages.]

EDUCATIONAL.

GERMAN VOCABULARIES. For Repetition. By SOPHIE WRIGHT. 6½×4¼, 64 pp. Methuen. 1s. 6d.

EASY GREEK EXERCISES. By C. G. Botting. 7½×5, 102. Methuen. 2s.

KENILWORTH ("Sir Walter Scott" Continuous Readers). Ed. by E. S. DAVIES. 7×4½, 216 pp. Black. 1s. n.

A TREATISE ON ELEMENTARY STATICS, for the use of Schools and Colleges. By W. J. DODS. 7×4½, 311 pp. Black. 7s. 6d.

LA LANGUE ANGLAISE SANS MAÎTRE. Par C. A. THIMM. 7×4¾, 108 pp. Marlborough. 1s.

DER ENGLISCHE DOLMETSCHER. Von C. A. THIMM. 7×4¾, 96 pp. Marlborough. 1s.

ENGLISH COMPOSITION. By G. H. THORNTON. (Self Educator Series.) 217 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 2s. 6d.

[Like other books in this series divided into two parts—First, Chapters on Composition with Exercises; secondly, Key to Exercises.]

FICTION.

LOVE LIKE A GIPSY. By B. CAPES. 7¾×5¼, 365 pp. Constable. 6s.

[A Romance of the Time of the American Revolution.]

DEEP-SEA PLUNDERINGS. By F. T. BULLEN. 7¾×5¼, 350 pp. Smith, Elder. 6s.

[Stories belonging to Mr. Bullen's usual province, two-thirds of which are reprinted from newspapers and magazines.]

FRÉDÉRIQUE. By MARCEL PRÉVOST. Trans. by Ellen Marriage. 7½×5, 296 pp. Duckworth. 6s.

[The most important of the author's novels on Feminism.]

"MAH" LORRIMER. By F. MASON. 8½×5½, 244 pp. Treherne. 3s. 6d.

[Short sporting stories, mostly reprinted from the Sporting and Dramatic News and Tillotson's Newspaper.]

EAST OF SUEZ. By ALICE PERRIN. 8×5½, 311 pp. Treherne. 6s.

[Romantic and mysterious phases of Anglo-Indian life.]

MARY ANNE OF PARCHMENT BUILDINGS. By LUCAS CLEEVE. 7½×5½, 332 pp. Digby Long. 6s.

[The story of a barrister and a girl of the lower class who sacrifices her life for him.]

THE AWAKENING OF HELENA THORPE. By E. R. ESLER. 7½×5½, 320 pp. Partridge.

[The love story of a country doctor's daughter.]

THE GATHERING OF BROTHER HILARIUS. By M. FAIRLESS. 7½×5½, 171 pp. Murray. 2s. 6d. n.

[A mediæval story of monastic life.]

A BLIND MARRIAGE. By G. R. SIMS. 7½×5, 256 pp. Chatto and Windus. 2s. 6d.

[Short stories of to-day.]

CAPTAIN ISHMAEL. By G. GRIFFITH. 7½×5½, 344 pp. Hutchinson. 6s.

[Romance and adventure in the Pacific Ocean in the 16th century.]

A MAN OF MILLIONS. By S. R. CROCKETT. 7½×5½, 336 pp. Cassell. 6s.

[See Review, p. 376.]

TRAMUA QUEEN. By T. WILMER WILSON. 7½×5½, 355 pp. Arnold. 6s.

[Provincial life near the Lake Country.]

JOSEPH KHASSAN, HALF-CASTE. By A. J. D[illegible] Heinemann. 6s.

[A curious study of a humanitarian half[illegible] marries an English girl.]

SOME WOMEN I HAVE KNOWN. By MARC[illegible] 299 pp. Heinemann. 6s.

[Short stories. One or two of the women [illegible] scenes laid in England.]

LA COLONNE. By LUCIEN DESCAVES. 7½×4¾, [illegible] Stock. Fr.3.50.

LES OBERLÉ. By RENÉ BAZIN. 7½×4¾, 390 pp. [illegible] Fr.3.50.

LE MYSTÈRE DE KAMA. Roman Magique. By [illegible] 7½×4¾, 307 pp. Paris: Flammarion. Fr.3.50.

L'AGONIE. Roman Historique. By JEAN LOMB[illegible] With Illustrations. Paris: Ollendorff. Fr.3.5[illegible]

HISTORY.

AMERICAN HISTORY TOLD BY CONTEMP[illegible] Welding of the nation, 1865-1900. Ed. by A. B. [illegible] Macmillan. 8s. 6d. n.

[The last vol., with general index, of t[illegible] book."]

THE CAPE AND ITS STORY; or, The Struggl[illegible] the Author of "Breaking the Record," &c. [illegible] 2s. 6d.

[A popular history to the taking of Pretori[illegible]

MODERN EUROPE. Vols. III. and IV. By T. [illegible] Ed. Revised by A. HASSALL. 7¾×5¼, 464+46[illegible]

[This is to be completed in six volumes.]

VERCINGÉTORIX. By CAMILLE JULLIAN. [illegible] Hachette. Fr.3.50.

THE LIFE OF A CENTURY. By E. HODDER. [illegible] 10s. 6d. n.

[A copiously illustrated popular narrative [illegible] all branches, of the Empire during the 19th cen[illegible]

LITERARY.

ESSAYS OF AN EX-LIBRARIAN. By RICHA[illegible] 350 pp. Heinemann.

[On Literary subjects—Coleridge, Shelley, [illegible]

THE WRITINGS OF OLIVER ORMEROD. A [illegible] By H. COLLEY MARCH, M.D. 7¾×5, 351pp. R[illegible] 5s. n.

[Ormerod wrote "The Felley fro Rachde[illegible] dale dialect of the visit of a shrewd Lancashir[illegible] of 1851, and a similar book about the Exhibitio[illegible] their quaint illustrations, were very popular. T[illegible] by any one but a Lancashire man, though th[illegible] them are included criticisms mostly in literary [illegible] the Rochdale Spectator, and criticisms on the S[illegible] to the Vicar's Lantern. Dr. March contribute[illegible]

MISCELLANEOUS.

FAUNA, FLORA, AND GEOLOGY OF THE CL[illegible] SCOTT ELLIOT, M. LAURIE, and J. R. MURDOC[illegible] ON THE LOCAL INDUSTRIES OF GLAS[illegible] OF SCOTLAND. Ed. by A. MCLEAN. 3s. 6d. [illegible] ARCHÆOLOGY, EDUCATION, AND MIS[illegible] JECTS. Ed. by M. MACLEAN. 3s. 6d. n. 8½[illegible] MacLehose.

[These are the handbooks prepared for the [illegible] Association in Glasgow, 1901.]

HEADS AND HOW TO READ THEM. By S[illegible] 7½×5, 112 pp. Pearson. 1s.

[A popular exposition of phrenology, w[illegible] deduced therefrom as to choice of wives, servan[illegible]

THE COUNTING HOUSE GUIDE. By W. G. Con[illegible] Effingham Wilson. 7s. 6d. n.

[A very complete and useful book, intend[illegible] "Tate's Counting House Guide," now some[illegible] valuable feature is the insertion of copies of [illegible] used in commerce.]

POPULAR STUDIES IN MYTHOLOGY, ROMAN[illegible] No. XI. By I. B. JONS. Nutt. 6d.

[Another of these capital little paper-boun[illegible] the Mabinogion.]

THE QUIVER. Vol. for 1901. Cassell. 7s. 6d.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE. Vol. 40. 10×6[illegible] 10s. 6d.

ST. NICHOLAS. Vol. XXVIII., Part II. 9½×7, 57[illegible]

THE BOYS' OWN ANNUAL. Vol. for 1901. [illegible]

PHILOSOPHY.

HUMAN NATURE AND MORALS. By J. K. INGRAM, LL.D. 9×5½. 115 pp. Black. 3s. 6d. n.

[An account of Comte's theory of man's moral and intellectual constitution.]

THE ORIGIN AND SIGNIFICANCE OF HEGEL'S LOGIC. By J. B. BAILLIE. 9×5⅞. 375 pp. Macmillan. 8s. 6d. n.

[Described as "A general introduction to Hegel's system." The author is a Cambridge man, and is now Lecturer in Philosophy at University College, Dundee.]

POETRY.

POEMS. By ELIZABETH M. ALFORD. 7¾×5, 83 pp. Stock. 2s. 6d. n.

[Partly reprinted from the Queen, the Argosy, and the Family Churchman, and from previous books by the author.]

POLITICAL.

LETTERS FROM JOHN CHINAMAN. 6¾×4½, 63 pp. Brimley Johnson. 1s. n.

[A pamphlet partly from the Saturday Review giving the Chinese point of view.]

THE IRISH LAND PROBLEM AND HOW TO SOLVE IT. By R. S. A. COSBY. 7½×4¾. 117 pp. Brimley Johnson. 1s. 6d. n.

[A defence of Irish landlords, reprinted from the Westminster Review.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE NOVELS OF SAMUEL RICHARDSON, in Twenty Vols. 7¼×4½. Chapman and Hall. 2s. 6d. n. each vol.

[Mr. Leslie Stephen's edition in 12 volumes is now out of print, and this is an attempt to produce a complete, handy, and inexpensive edition. The illustrations are from engravings by Stothard and Burney. The volumes are in small octavo, tastefully bound.]

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON. Three vols. Ed. by A. GLOVER. 9×6½. 459+464+466 pp.

[These portly and well got up volumes contain an Introduction by Mr. Austin Dobson, many portraits, and a great number of topographical illustrations, full-page and in the text, by Mr. Herbert Railton.]

THE OXFORD INDIA PAPER EDITION OF DICKENS'S WORKS. The Pickwick Papers. A Tale of Two Cities and A Child's History of England. 7×4½. 928+938 pp. Chapman and Hall, and Frowde. 2s. 6d. n. each vol.

[The first volumes of a new light and handy Dickens, printed in good type at the Oxford University Press. It will be a complete edition, in 17 vols., with portraits of Dickens, and illustrations reproduced from the original pictures, with some by modern artists, nearly 700 in all. Each book also has a list of characters. The "Pickwick" pictures (42) and the "Tale of Two Cities" pictures are from the originals.]

BRET HARTE'S TALES OF THE ARGONAUTS AND SELECTED VERSE. HENRY ESMOND. By W. M. THACKERAY. (Turner House Classics.) 6¾×4, 423+420 pp. Virtue. 2s. n. each vol.

[This new series is in "pocket duodecimo" and decorative style, choicely bound, in black, white, and red, with one and sometimes several illustrations. The editor is Mr. William Macdonald, and each volume is prefaced by a critical monograph.]

THE WORKS OF LORD BYRON. Letters and Journals, Vol. VI. Ed. by R. E. PROTHERO. 8½×5½, 605 pp. Murray. 6s.

FAMILIAR STUDIES OF MEN AND BOOKS. By R. L. STEVENSON. (Fine Paper Edition.) 6½×4½, 277 pp. Chatto and Windus. 2s. 6d. n.

[Neatly bound. With Stevenson's own preface.]

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF MIGUEL DE CERVANTES, Vol. V. (Don Quixote, Vol. III.) 7×4½. 243 pp. Glasgow: Gowan and Gray. 1s. n.

GEORGE ELIOT'S WORKS. Warwick Ed. Vols. VII. and VIII. 2s. n. each. MIDDLEMARCH. Library Ed. Vols. IV., V., and VI., 10s. 6d. each. SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE. SILAS MARNER. FELIX HOLT. Blackwood.

[We have before called attention to this handsome edition. The frontispieces in half-tone by various artists are exceedingly good.]

THE ESSAYS OF RALPH WALDO EMERSON. POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN KEATS. The Waldo Classics. Vols. VI. and VII. 6×4. 351+336 pp. Grant Richards. 1s. n. each.

[Further volumes similar to the reprint of Hazlitt's "Table Talk," noticed in last week's list.]

SHAKESPEARE'S HEROINES. By MRS. JAMESON. (Miranda's Library.)

ARNOLD TOYNBEE. By LORD MILNER, G.C.B. 2nd Ed. 7 60 pp. Arnold. 2s. 6d.

THE FORMAL GARDEN IN ENGLAND. By R. BLOMFIELD. 250 pp. Macmillan. 7s. 6d. n.

[The third edition of this well-known work may, as the hopes, recall attention to the first principles of a subject appears to possess a dangerous fascination for writers, with a pretty sentiment."]

TOURAINE AND BRITTANY. By C. B. BLACK. 12th Ed. 204 pp. Black. 2s. 6d.

THE HOUSE ON THE SCAR. By BERTHA THOMAS. 2nd Ed. 314 pp. Chatto and Windus. 6s.

[A tale of South Devon.]

SCIENCE.

PRACTICAL HISTOLOGY. By J. N. LANGLEY. 7½×5, 34 Macmillan. 6s.

PSYCHOLOGY, NORMAL AND MORBID. By C. A. MERCIER. 578 pp. Sonnenschein. 15s.

[The author is Lecturer on Insanity at two London M Schools, and this substantial work is founded on the thesis, whi thinks too much ignored that a knowledge of the normal precede a knowledge of the abnormal.]

SOCIOLOGY.

ESSAIS SUR LE MOUVEMENT OUVRIER EN FRANCE. By D HALÉVY. 7½×4¾, 300 pp. Paris: Georges Bellais. Fr.3.50.

L'HUMANITÉ ET LA PATRIE. By ALFRED NAQUET. 7½×4¾, 3 Paris: P. V. Stock. Fr.3.50.

CHIVALRY. By F. W. CORNISH. (Social England Series.) 7½×5, 3 Sonnenschein. 4s. 6d.

[Not a consecutive history, but a discussion of the ide knighthood—its faults and merits—in the 11th and 16th cent This is the sixth volume of the series.]

THEOLOGY.

THE WAR SONGS OF THE PRINCE OF PEACE. Two Vols. REV. R. M. BENSON. 8½×5½, 541 pp. Murray. 10s. n.

[On the Devotional use of the Psalms, with new translation.

GUIDANCE FOR MEN. By H. W. HOLDEN. 7¾×5½. 145 pp. Skeffingt

[Definite Church teaching.]

STUDIES IN CEREMONIAL. By the REV. V. SHALEY. 6¾×4, 2 Mowbray. 3s. 6d. n.

[An historical investigation adversely criticising certain ceremo &c., introduced into the English Church during the last fifty year

LEISURABLE STUDIES. By the REV. T. H. PASSMORE. 7¾×5½, 1 Longmans. 4s. n.

[Studies on religious subjects "which have lightened the g and solemnized the secularity of the Church Review."]

MATTHEW HENRY AND HIS CHAPPEL, 1662-1900. By H ROBERTS. 9×6, 265 pp. Liverpool Booksellers' Company. 5s.

[An account of the oldest Nonconformist chapel in Chester, on the biography of Matthew Henry, for whom the chapel was and the autobiography of Philip Henry, his father. The funds by the sale of the book will go to the repair of the chapel.]

RULING IDEAS OF OUR LORD. By C. F. D'ARCY, D.D. EARLY CHURCH. By PROF. J. ORR, D.D. PROTES PRINCIPLES. By J. M. GIBSON, D.D. (Christian Study Mas 7×4½. 139+146+171 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 1s. n. each.

[Dr. Gibson's book aims at being a moderate statement Evangelical position, written in the hope of an understanding wi Sacerdotalists. Dr. D'Arcy is Dean of Belfast; Dr. Orr is fessor at the United Free Church College, Glasgow.]

THE ANCIENT EAST. No. III. The Babylonian and the H Genesis. By H. ZIMMERN. Nutt. 1s.

[The third of these short studies on recent Oriental discover the leading scholars of Germany, with bibliographies. The transla revised by the authors, are by Miss Jane Hutchison.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

THE GREAT DESERTS AND FORESTS OF NORTH AMERICA P. FOUNTAIN. 9×6, 295 pp. Longmans. 9s. 6d. n.

[Mainly deals with animal life. Mr. W. H. Hudson com the work in a preface.]

SUNSHINE AND SURF. A Year's Wanderings in the South Sea D. B. HALL and LORD A. OSBORNE. 8½×5½, 320 pp. Black. 1

[Impressions of travel in Central and Western Polynesia. Ph

TRAVELLING IMPRESSIONS IN AND NOTES ON PERU. SEEBEE. 7¾ 5, 196 pp. Stock. 3s. 6d.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. 247, by MAX KARSTEDT, Kostbau

BLACK. 9 pieces.

WHITE. 9 pieces.

White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM No. 248, by G. B. VALLE, Spezia

BLACK. 11 pieces.

WHITE. 11 pieces.

White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 249, by W. F. von Holzhausen.—White (3 pieces)—K at Q Kt 3; Kts at Q 4 and Q B 4. Black (2 pieces)—K at Q R 8; pawn at Q Kt 5. White to play and win.

PROBLEM No. 250, by Otto Würzburg.—White (5 pieces)—K at Q 8; Q at K R 2; rooks at K Kt 8 and Q Kt 5; B at Q R 6. Black (5 pieces)—K at K 6; pawns at K R 4, K B 7, K B 6, and K 4. Three moves.

BLINDFOLD PLAY.—Chess without sight of boards and men is no longer a wonder in the sense in which it so appeared when Philidor displayed the faculty in the middle of last century. He played three games simultaneously, and the fact was placed on record formally that succeeding generations might know and wonder at such a feat. Blackburne has long played from six to ten boards, and now Pillsbury has well succeeded with twenty against strong teams. He will often play twelve or more, with two or three of draughts and a hand at whist thrown in. How is it accomplished? No one can give a clearly satisfactory reply. Obviously memory plays a large part, and then also the faculty of picturing the boards and of concentrating attention upon one at a time. This is what the great expert Pillsbury himself says:—I can play best when I have a cigar in my mouth; only a cigar, never anything else. When I play a lot of different games at the same time I must be keyed up to it as it were. I practice what you may call self-hypnotism. It is largely will power. It is just this way:—When it becomes my turn to make a move at one of the chess boards my mental powers are concentrated very severely on the one move. All the other chess boards, the draughts, and the whist are obliterated from my mind. It is as though I had never started playing those games at all. I seem to remember nothing of them. I come to a decision, the move is made, and I turn again to the cards in my hand. Quick as lightning, the game of chess vanishes from my mind. Now it is nothing but whist to me. I seem never to have had a thought of anything but the game of cards. I play one. Then I move one of the draughts. These transitions of mind take place so quickly that I seem to be playing chess, draughts, and whist all at once, and to be thinking of all the games at once. But it is as I have explained.

GAME No. CV.—Played between two young experts at the New York State meeting:—

RUY LOPEZ.

White. L. Karpinski.	Black. W. E. Napier.	White. L. Karpinski.	Black. W. E. Napier.
1. P–K 4	P–K 4	26. Q–K B 2	R–R sq
2. Kt–K B 3	Kt–Q B 3	27. R–Q 3	R (Q 2)–R 2
3. B–Kt 5	P–Q B 3	28. R (Q 3)–Q sq	Q–B 2
4. B–R 4	Kt–B 3	29. Q–Kt 3	B–Q 2
5. Castles	Kt x P	30. Kt–K sq	B–Q B 3
6. P–Q 4	P–Q Kt 4	31. Kt–Q 3	Q–Kt 2
7. B–Kt 3	P–Q 4	32. K–R 2	K–B 2
8. P x P	Kt–K 2	33. Q–B 2	K–K 3
9. Kt–Kt 5	Kt x Kt	34. Kt–K sq	B–K 5
10. R x Kt	B–K 3	35. Kt–B 3	B–Q sq

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD'S NE

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELL

LINKS WITH THE

BY MRS. CHARLES BAGG

With Photogravure Plates. Demy 8vo

IMPERIUM ET LIB

BY BERNARD HOLLAND

Demy 8vo., 12s. 6d. net.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

RIGHTS AND WRONG

THE TRANSVAA

BY E. T. COOK,

Recently Editor of the Daily News. 1 vol. demy

LIVES OF HOLY MEN

MONSIEUR VINCENT: a Shor

Vincent de Paul. By JAMES ADDERLEY, A

Remarx," &c. With Portrait. 3s. 6d.

HUGH OF LINCOLN. By CHA

Vicar of Hambridge, Taunton. Elegantly bound,

ALREADY ISSUED.

FRANCIS: The Little Poor Ma

By JAMES ADDERLEY. Second Edition. W

8vo., 3s. 6d.

NEW NOVELS NOW REA

T' BACCA QUEEN. By THEODO

MR. ELLIOTT. By ISABELL

THE BETTALEY JEWELS.

By E. M. HALF

London: EDWARD ARNOLD, 37, Bedfor

A MAGAZINE FOR COLLECTORS. IL

'THE CONNOIS

No. 2, OCTOBER ISSUE, NOW

REPRINT OF FIRST NUMB

In consequence of the large demand for issue) of "THE CONNOISSEUR," it ha issue a THIRD EDITION. All those de requested to place their Orders with thei

Newsagents immediately.

"THE CONNOISSEU

In the event of any difficulty in obtaining

write to "THE CONNOISSEUR" Offices,

Covent Garden, W.C.

PROCESS WORK OF EVERY DESCRI

COLOUR, TON

Carl Hentsc

THE

HENTSCHEL-COLOURTYPE

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 210. SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 383, 384, 385

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XXV. Mr. Edward Frederick Benson 385

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE'S PLACE IN LITERATURE.—A "Personal View," by D. F. Hannigan 387

SAMUEL RICHARDSON 388

MICK MCQUAID 390

CURRENT LITERATURE—

The Life of Robert Louis Stevenson 390

Dictionary of National Biography (Supplement, Vol. III.) 392

Alfred Tennyson 393

A Commentary on Tennyson's "In Memoriam" 393

A Winter Pilgrimage 394

The Early Age of Greece 395

The Oldest Civilization of Greece 395

Andrea Mantegna 396

Brunellesco—Pinturicchio—Francesco Raibolini—Fra Angelico—Velazquez—Burne Jones—Erewhon Revisited—The Life of a Century 398, 399, 400

ART NOTES 399, 400

Cardigan—Clementina—Hearts in Revolt—Despair's Last Journey—Herb of Grace—A Sower of Wheat—The Fourth Estate—Beyond These Voices 401, 402

CANON ISAAC TAYLOR 402

CORRESPONDENCE—Stevenson—Was Amy Robsart Killed? 403

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 403

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 404, 405, 406

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be

MR. H. V. ESMOND.

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"Links with the Past." By Mrs. C. Bagot. (Arnold.)
"The War of the Civilizations." By G. Lynch. (Longmans.)
"Tales of Dunstable Weir." By Zack. (Methuen.)
"The Embarrassing Orphan." By W. E. Norris. (Methuen.)
"The Glow Worm." By May Bateman. (Heinemann.)

* * * *

We may congratulate Miss Netta Syrett on being the author of the play selected by the Committee of the Playgoers' Club, in accordance with their arrangement with Mr. George Alexander. Mr. Alexander, as our readers know, sympathetically mindful of the numberless amateur playwrights who never get [illegible]

Garden of Delight" (1897). The latter was published by Hurst and Blackett, who have also in hand a new novel Syrett, of which the title is not yet fixed.

* * * *

That portion of the library of the late Mr. Fre Ellis which comes under Messrs. Sotheby's hammer o ber 4 is noteworthy by reason of the number of K Press books on vellum it contains. As friend and William Morris, for on most points his advice was s received picked copies of all or nearly all the publ many of them, too, were gifts, with inscriptions on th Including the two trial pages of the Froissart, a wo would have excelled the Chaucer in splendour had it b pleted, 53 works were issued during the seven years. It is no uncommon thing for a complete set on paper to auction. A series realized about £430 when first s years ago; and as much as £560 has been paid for it hammer. In 47 cases a strictly limited number of co printed on vellum at about six times the price of those Of these the Ellis library contains no less than 28, the of which have never before changed hands publicly. The on paper was issued at £20, and has risen steadily, un is worth about £85, albeit 425 copies exist. Now for time one of 13 examples on vellum will be sold. Its orig was £126. This Chaucer, so far as modern books g corner-stone of the Ellis library, as it was of the Morr There are also rarities on vellum like the 1891 "G Plain," one of four examples bound in green vellum b experiment; the "Poems by the Way," which made as £50 in 1899; the "Defence of Guenevere," sold not for £39; and the Herrick "Poems," which have m tripled in value since published at 8gns. Among the are, too, several editiones principes of works by Morri Marbecke's "Booke of Common Praier Noted," pri Richard Grafton in 1550; the first issues of Keats' "End and Shelley's "Adonais," which, like many other vol in Cobden-Sanderson bindings; a 1501 Horæ, printed o by Kerver; the copy used by Ruskin, and containing m notes in his autograph, of John Stuart Mill's " Economy"; and "Leaves of Grass," with pencil co by Walt Whitman, who sent the book to Mr. Ellis with as to an English edition to be published by him.

* * * *

Mr. Bernard Shaw recounts his early struggles as a in a characteristic preface to the new edition of "Cashel Profession" (Grant Richards, 6s.). He wrote, he assures novels, and for many years the only people who handle and did not lose money by them were Messrs. Carter, I

Mr. W. E. Henley wanted to have it dramatized; Stevenson wrote a letter about it, of which more presently; the other papers hastily searched their waste-paper baskets for it and reviewed it, mostly rather disappointedly; and the public preserved its composure and did not seem to care.

Stevenson thought highly of it, and the letter referred to is in Mr. Colvin's edition. But it is there expurgated; and Mr. Shaw gives us for the first time Stevenson's analysis of the contents of the book:—

Charles Reade	1 part.
Henry James or some kindred author, badly assimilated	1 part.
Disraeli (perhaps unconscious)	½ part.
Struggling, overlaid, original talent	1½ part.
Blooming gaseous folly	1 part.

"If he only knew how I had enjoyed the chivalry!" adds Stevenson. Though we agree with Mr. Shaw in not thinking it a masterpiece, we enjoyed it when we read it in the shilling edition referred to. Some twenty years after its first appearance it was discovered in America, where it prospered.

* * * *

THE FIRST LINE.

21st October, 1805.

This day is full of glorious victory.
Echoes of conquest whisper from afar
In every wave of the remembering sea.
Dear England! hath thy crown a richer star
Than this brave jewel, Nelson's Trafalgar?
Or hast thou in thy missal lovelier name
Than his who stricken in the ebb of war
Pillowed his head on thine unsullied fame
And smiled into Death's eyes from out the smoke and flame?

Let the sea speak to thee, the jealous sea
Whose scorn of weakness is the scourge of fears,
Let her surge be a trumpet unto thee,
Her waves a memory ringing in thine ears.
Heed her, or thou shalt place sad dust with tears,
No laurel, on thy proud cathedral graves;
Heed her, or in tradition-robbing years
Thy trampled children looking o'er the waves
On this great day shall curse the sires who made them slaves.

Shall the shrugged shoulder speak a nation's mind
When at their post the easy wardens sleep?
Shall we be blind because our chiefs are blind?
And keep no count because no count they keep?
Nay! by the sacred blood that won the deep,
And by the words on our dead Nelson's lips,
We will not hold our British birthright cheap,
Assured our star shall never know eclipse
While British seamen man their country's honest ships.

If Alfred builded, canst not thou maintain?
If Nelson conquered, canst not thou make sure?
Are all thy riches, all thy splendour vain,
Thy realms a Paphian's glittering furniture?
Thine is wide empery—Wilt thou abjure
The open ocean, empire's silver key?
Perish the drunken thought! Be strong, endure;
Thou must be England, and thou must be free,
And while this England stands, England's must be the sea.

The Society of Authors have offered to e designed by Mr. George Frampton, in the cry Cathedral as a memorial to Sir Walter Besant.

We are glad to hear that Sir Theodore Ma from his illness.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie has offered £1,000 t a free library; £2,000 to the town of Castle Dou
brightshire; and to Dundee £6,500 for fou buildings (if the town furnishes the sites and le in the £); and £11,000 for a central library an

Mr. Stopford Brooke will begin on October College a course of five lectures on Matthew contemporary poets.

At a mass meeting of students of St. And held on Tuesday, a letter was read from Mr.
accepting his nomination for the Rectorship of

An Irish play, Diarmid and Grania, writ and Mr. George Moore, was produced on Tues Benson's company at the Gaiety Theatre, Dubl

It is denied that the dispute between M Messrs. Pearson has been settled out of Court.
come on towards the middle of November.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling has been re-elected Rottingdean Rifle Club, which he founded some

The naming of novels is an art in itself, literary exercise is started by an evening publishing a serial by Mr. Robert Machray. T it, and a prize is offered to the reader who cho

The tenth session of lectures of the Biblio will begin on Monday, when Mr. Cyril Dav discussion on the various leathers used in book

The chapel in King's-court, Great Suff wark, in which Bunyan once took refuge w angry mob, has been closed by the County Co of its dilapidated condition.

M. Victorien Sardou is writing a play o
Henry Irving.

It is said that Mr. Pinero's visit to I Signora Duse's playing the title-part of his lat

Mr. J. M. Barrie's play Quality Street ha at Toledo, U.S.A.

Lieutenant-General Sir William Butler
a member of the Ruskin Society.

The editor of Boys of our Empire has scription list, in order to raise a testimonial fr Jules Verne.

Mark Twain has become a politician, a Tammany Hall and all its works at a public me Waldorf.

An announcement comes from New Zeala
Mr. T. J. Burns, a leading Dunedin citiz editions of Chaucer, copies of the first four folios of Shakespeare, and first editions of Froissart, Spenser, Herrick, Milton, Waller, Suckling, and Holinshed, and Still's "Gammer Gurton's Needle," which realized £64 at the sale of Mr. George Daniel's library in 1864.

The Languages of the Future.

Mr. H. G. Wells, who takes all prophecy for his province, has been discussing the languages of the future in an article published simultaneously in the North American and Fortnightly Reviews. His prediction is that the little languages like Basque and Flemish and even Italian will be squeezed out, that English, French, and German will struggle, and that French will win in the end. We are not at all sure that the former opinion is based upon a close observation of the facts or derives a great deal of support from them. The minor languages, though useless for commerce and often superfluous for culture, die uncommonly hard, and display remarkable vitality at the present time. The attempt to galvanize into life the old Celtic language of Ireland is only one case in point, and not, perhaps, one of the most important cases. The endeavour to revive Provençal in the South of France is in the main a literary enterprise. The instances which really affect Mr. Wells' argument are those in which the masses of the people have insisted upon retaining tongues which most of us consider outlandish. In spite of the opposition encountered, they have gained ground instead of losing it. There are at least two European countries in which this has notoriously and conspicuously happened: Belgium and Austria-Hungary. In Belgium a serious attempt was made to establish French as the general and official language. But the Flemish resisted, and after a long and furious agitation they obtained the complete official recognition of their language. It is taught in the Belgian schools, admitted in the Belgian law courts, and printed on the Belgian postage stamps. As every philatelist knows, on the earlier Belgian stamps the inscription "Belgique-Postes" stands alone; whereas they now carry the double legend "Postes-Belgique" and "Belgie-Posterijen." In Austria-Hungary the battle has been against German, which, of all the many tongues spoken in that composite country, is obviously the most suitable for general use; and two alternative languages are making headway against it. In Austria itself the Czech language is forcing its way to equality with German. In Hungary the Magyars, who hold the balance of political power, are absolutely persecuting German out of existence. Magyar, and not German, is taught in the national schools; only the Magyar names of places are given in the geography manuals and railway time-tables; German theatrical performances have lately been suppressed. German, in short, has been made as much a foreign tongue in Hungary as Magyar is in Prussia. Obviously there are here strong tendencies which will have to be violently corrected before the first part of Mr. Wells' prophecy can begin to be fulfilled. Nor are we satisfied of the soundness of the reasoning by which he maintains that French is destined to make headway at the expense of English. He writes that "the decisive factor in this matter is the amount of science and thought the acquisition of a language will afford the man who learns it," and that France has the advantage in this respect over England and Germany alike. Whether the latter proposition be true or not, the former fails to carry conviction. It is not warranted by ancient, mediæval, or contemporary experience, and it is based upon the familiar fallacy of putting the cart before the horse. The number of people who learn German in the

Literature Portraits.—XX

EDWARD FREDERICK BENS

Breezy optimism, great self-confidence, and cultiv seem to be Mr. Benson's three principal charact revealed in his work, and three excellent character are for a man to be endowed with if he wishes to wi in literature; for, together, they should imply a h of sanity. This healthfulness is shown, quite apar writings, in his life at Marlborough and Cambridge.
well, but he played well too, and made it difficult f ever to be dull. Racquets and football, in both o shone, denote much; the Wortz, Prendergast, an studentships, all of which he won, denote much o kind. He made the most of the best sort of educ obtained in England and qualified for admission in sort of modern society where manner and manners are as indispensable as birth formerly was.

In the meantime, his scholarship had taken him a in Athens, where he worked for the British Arc School, and in Egypt, where he worked for the Hellen he came directly under an entirely different set of He came under them, moreover, at the time when likely to have the best effect upon him, when he enough to be impressed by the splendour of traditi glamour of the past, but old enough to appreciate the value and discriminate between the old and the out both environments—in Piccadilly, where another have become a flâneur, and on the Acropolis, wher might have become a misty visionary—his training e to control his temperament and arrive at healthy His sanity, as it seems to me, gave him power to unfitting and assimilate only the simplest and the best

From the same quality another thing inevitably an honesty of mind revealed in a certain simple di speech which, if not good style from a purely lite of view, is a fair working substitute for it. Wha Benson may do some day, he is at present so i interested in whatever story he happens to be tell the moment that he forgets all but the story; he be beginning and stops when he comes to the end, regard all fine writing for fine writing's sake as so m of good time. Simplicity and straightforwardness are and I doubt if in all his books there is one line tha condemned as "precious."

It is only natural that with a mind as susc impressions as a sensitive plate, much of Benson's w be photographic in its fidelity, and, photography not highest form of art, the inference is obvious. If he judged only by his stories and books dealing with his place in fiction would almost approach that of Du in black and white; and incidentally it may be adde no more Benson's fault that his characters speak a argot in 1901 than it was Du Maurier's fault some ago, as time is reckoned now, that his characters w a Grecian bend. But the Benson who is known as Benson is only part of the man. With his self-conf optimism it was inevitable that he should at the follow the line of least resistance; he went about with whatever form of art, he is apt to find his public very tyrannical; he has done something well and stands committed to following it up with something similar, whatever his own inclinations or powers may be. Benson himself probably knew his potentialities pretty well, but he acquiesced easily in the situation, and the next year, in 1894, "The Rubicon" appeared. It had much the same merits and much the same demerits as its predecessor, to which, indeed, it was practically a sequel; and if to certain palates a sequel has the same sort of flavour as has a twice-lighted cigar, one need not find fault with the tobacco. In 1895 "Six Common Things" was published, and in 1895 there came the "Judgment Books." Of the former one cannot fail to have a high opinion. So far as publication fixes events these four books covered a period during which two things had happened—the "Dodo" tradition was established and Benson had spent three years in Greece.

In 1896 came "Limitations," and in that book there are two things worth noticing. It contains one of the best pictures I know of University life, and it seems to be in some sense a confession of faith on the part of the author. The really good story of undergraduate life remains to be written, possibly because, at the time the spell of it is strong upon a man, he has not acquired the power of expression, and because when he has acquired the power of expression the spell has weakened and his sense of perspective makes him hesitate as to whether it is worth writing about at all. But much of the charm of life at Cambridge is recalled by "Limitations," and for that alone some gratitude is due. More important, however, is the description of the struggle that goes on in Tom Carlingford's mind before he gives up what he believes he could do, and what he believes to be supremely well worth doing, and decides to be an apostate prostituting his gifts by simply using them to ward off starvation. There is the nucleus of fine tragedy, and one wonders how far the book is autobiographical. When once you have tasted enthusiasm you can never forget its wonderful intoxication although you may have lost it entirely. The chances may be a thousand to one that you can never fly, but lose the blessed illusion that you can fly, and what is left? I have often wondered whether "Dodo" was the statuette, and whether in Benson's studio a Demeter stands with her head bent in sorrow for her child. If so, one hopes that he has another goddess. For "Dodo" reappeared in person in "The Lady's Realm" if I remember rightly, and "Mammon and Co." did well in two continents in 1899, and "The Luck of the Vails" has been serialized and published as a book since then. Of "The Babe B.A." there is not much to say, and besides all these Benson wrote a multitude of little society stories, all bright and flippant, and cheerily, breezily amusing.

I do not want to seem to depreciate these things; they are wonderfully vivid, and, as I have said, photographic in their fidelity to the life they describe; if sometimes the people who move in the world seem sordid and mean, or heartless and unmoral, it is no fault of the author; it is their artificiality which is emphasized by his own truthfulness; they are at any rate well gowned and witty, quick in the up-take and mentally alert. Benson, with his optimism, sees the best side of them, and with his good taste makes the best of them. Above all, the books are amusing, as such books ought to be. But yet I seem to see their author a victim to the tyranny of the public he has created for himself. Are they his "statuettes"?

For apart from them all, on an utterly different plane, stand the two novels which show, and that perhaps in-

had suffered something of the unspeakable horro goaded the Greeks into that rebellion than a nearly a century after the event. He steeped wonderful atmosphere of the country, with the book is full of exquisite word pictures; he p inmost hearts of the people, with the result th contribution to the history of the time by its re character of the people who rebelled; finally he one living soul, incarnate in the "little Mitso
the central point of one of the most charming lo have ever read.

These are the things which seem to me to words, supremely well worth doing, and which n do. What his place in fiction is destined to entirely with himself, but, if "The Vintage" to remain a single aberration from the paths comedy, it may be very high indeed.

CRANSTOUN

Mr. E. F. Benson was working at Athens
Archæological School when "Dodo" appe
"Dodo" made her first appearance in two volum and went through three editions in that form in The book continued to sell remarkably well, and one-volume form can boast of a fourteenth editio though always certain of a fair measure of suc reached anything approaching this circulation books. "Dodo" was given another lease of present year with a large sixpenny edition in Me
"Novelist" Series. The chronological list of novels is as follows:—

1893.—"Dodo" (14th edition). Methuen.
1893.—"Six Common Things." (5th edition) (Osg
—now published by Harper.)
1894.—"The Rubicon" (5th edition), Methuen.
1895.—"The Judgment Books." (2nd edition) (Os
—now published by Harper.)
1896.—"Limitations." (Innes—now published b 1897.—"The Babe B.A.," Putnam.
1898.—"The Vintage" (3rd edition). (Methuen ing serially in the Graphic and Harper
1898.—"The Money Market." (Arrowsmith's Ch 1899.—"The Capsina" (2nd edition). (Methue 1899.—"Mammon and Co." (3rd edition). (Hei
1900.—"The Princess Sophia." (Heinemann.)
1901.—"The Luck of the Vails" (2nd edition).

Mr. Benson was also the joint author w Hogarth of the "Report on Prospects of Alexandria," which was drawn up for the Archa of the Egypt Exploration Fund, 1894-95, and re members of the Hellenic Society, who had subs
the expenses of the excavations carried out This month Mr. Benson is beginning a series of Onlooker, entitled "Some Social Criminals."

The rumour is contradicted that the Fig garded as the typical French newspaper, is to the Gaulois. The latter is the younger paper, at present, has a firmer hold upon the public.
as the avowed rival of the Figaro, in 1867; and it has frequently changed sides. The editors ha Tarbé, Jules Simon, and Arthur Meyer, the p
of the chair; and its policy has been successiv Bonapartist, Republican again, Bonapartist a Royalist. M. Meyer is such a devoted Royalist to support the claims of the Duc d'Orleans eve tender had publicly sneered at him for being a

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE'S PLACE IN LITERATURE.

A "Personal View."

Recent criticism has not been quite judicious in its estimate of some living American writers. The excessive praise bestowed on the rather facile historical novel "Richard Carvel" is a striking illustration of the lack of the sense of proportion in the minds of some critics when they happen to be reviewing new American works of fiction. Whatever may be the strong points of this book it is distinctly amateurish both in style and construction. Of course, "Richard Carvel" would never have been written if Mr. Stanley Weyman had not set the fashion of writing historical novels on the somewhat artificial plan of making the hero relate his own exploits. "Richard Carvel" is from this point of view little better than a clever imitation of so-called historical romances which, are doomed, sooner or later, to pass into oblivion for this simple reason—that they appeal too much to popular taste to have much solid artistic value.

The undiscriminating critic also misleads the public, as he probably misleads himself, when he lands Mr. Henry James and Mr. W. D. Howells as masters of style. The style of both of these authors is surely marred by cumbrousness, affectation, and self-consciousness. When we compare their method with that of Nathaniel Hawthorne, we are struck by the difference. Hawthorne appeals to the human heart; they appeal to the prejudices and, we might add, to the manias of latter-day literary pedants. While Mr. Howells sees nothing in modern life but "leather and prunella," Hawthorne sees a deep and tragic background behind the apparently commonplace routine of civilized existence. To over-estimate living American writers is to do injustice to Hawthorne. One of the worst offences of the log-roller is the way in which he, so to speak, depreciates the literary currency. He makes pewter pass for gold, so that books become a species of debased coinage. It is time to call attention to the fact that the American writers of to-day are much inferior artists to Hawthorne.

So peculiar is the position of Nathaniel Hawthorne in literature that justice has never been done to his extraordinary powers as a writer of fiction. It is true that Mr. Leslie Stephen in his work, "Half-hours in a Library," gives the American writer credit for having extracted poetry "out of the most unpromising materials"; but something more than this can be said of Hawthorne. He is not merely a great creative artist. He is a writer endowed with the rarest kind of originality; he is one of the true aristocrats of literature. His genius is the fine flower of Puritanism. In his writings there is nothing impure—nothing "common" or "mean." He has a positive disdain for the trivial. He has made imagination the torch of conscience. Tearing aside the mask of conventionality which human nature wears in everyday life, he reveals its inner depths with painful clearness and definiteness.

His method, indeed, is almost the reverse of that adopted of the romantic incidents which not only give life an

the story, but bring out all that is most distin characteristic in its dramatis personæ. The villain Pyncheon and his terrible death have in them a kind of fatality; but the author carefully avoids all "bloud details, so that the tragic horror of the dénouement i way, the opposite of melodrama.

Carlyle, in his somewhat ungenerous estimate novels, has described them as "costume novels."
this is not a fair criticism of Scott. The Waverley N enjoyed a long-continued popularity because of th great merits as works of fiction. But it must be ack that Scott was too much concerned about externals, a always devote sufficient attention to the study of This could not be said of Hawthorne. It is easy t how differently he would have dealt with the sub Scott has, after his own fashion, so strikingly "Ivanhoe." We should have had very few tour possibly, we might have had no description of a to We should, on the other hand, have learned a great as to the spiritual history of both Ivanhoe and Rebe should have been more deeply interested in the un brutality of Reginald Front-de-Bœuf's spirit than in record of his crimes. A more lurid light might have on the mysterious death of the Templar, Bois-Guil according to Scott, after a fall from his horse, died a the violence of his own contending passions. In should have had none of the Wardour-street el
"Ivanhoe" if it had been written by Hawthorne.

But Scott was not Hawthorne. He was greater in power—far inferior in penetrative insight. To h admirers Sir Walter will always be the "Wizard of th and his glamour will be unfading. To those whom cannot charm, many—if not most—of his historical por seem little better than "plaster of Paris," to use M
Stephen's somewhat disrespectful but not unfelicitous p

The book which has gained for Hawthorne the wi is "The Scarlet Letter." He did not himself regard work that embodied his highest conceptions as a litera but it is certainly a masterpiece of its kind. In the Arthur Dimmesdale we have a study in "morbid a which impresses us as too cruel, too uncompromis woman, Hester Prynne, is a heroine as great as Magda moral martyrdom raises the story to the highest level of Even George Eliot has never presented to us th possibilities of a woman's nature so vividly or thor Hawthorne has in "The Scarlet Letter." The book, has artistic defects. Its "symbolism," on which M James has laid so much stress, gives the story here an curious aspect of unreality. The witch-element, t mistake. It might, furthermore, be urged that ol Chillingley is an attempt to personify the Prince of in human form. But, when criticism has done its wor Scarlet Letter" remains the greatest work of its ki of anguish and repentance likewise—was now to be laid open to them. The sun, but little past its meridian, shone down upon the clergyman, and gave a distinctness to his figure as he stood out from all the earth to put in his plea of guilty at the Bar of Eternal Justice. "People of New England," cried he, with a voice that rose ever high, solemn, and majestic, yet had always a tremor through it, and sometimes a shriek struggling up out of a fathomless depth of remorse and woe, "Ye that have loved me—ye that have deemed me holy! Behold me here, the one sinner in the world! At last! At last! I stand upon the spot where, seven years since, I should have stood, here with this woman, whose arm more than the little strength wherewith I have crept hitherward, sustains me, at this dreadful moment, from grovelling down upon my face! Lo, the scarlet letter which Hester wears! Ye have all shuddered at it! Wherever her walk hath been, wherever, so miserably burdened, she may have hoped to find repose, it has cast a lurid gleam of awe, and horrible repugnance round-about her. But there stood one in the midst of you at whose hand of sin and infamy ye have not shuddered!"

The dramatic power of the scene is only equalled by what one might call its spiritual realism. How terrible is the unveiling of a soul! and how marvellous is the gift of the artist who can thus uplift the veil! Many writers have, since Hawthorne's death, vainly endeavoured, by borrowing the confession-scene in "The Scarlet Letter," to adapt it to other circumstances, but what a failure such efforts have proved! The imitators of Hawthorne have not the art of creating an atmosphere in which their phantoms could live.

"The Blithedale Romance," though it possesses a deep interest as a tolerably faithful account of the Brook Farm experiment, can scarcely be described as an entirely successful work of fiction. But the character of Zenobia will always fascinate the student of female psychology. Mr. Thomas Hardy has never portrayed a more charming, a more wayward, a more elusive, or a more inscrutable type of womanhood. The scene in which the body of Zenobia is discovered in the river, with her knees still bent in the attitude of prayer, but with a look of proud defiance in her eyes, is one which clearly proves that Hawthorne was a consummate artist.

If we were merely discussing the question of style, it would be no exaggeration to say that Hawthorne has never written anything more beautiful than the description of the old man and the child in "The Dolliver Romance." The work, though a fragment, bears the stamp of genius. At the time when Hawthorne was writing it he was suffering not only from illness but from anxiety as to pecuniary affairs. He had previously written about his projected work in this characteristic fashion:—

> There is something preternatural in my reluctance to begin. I linger at the threshold and have a perception of very disagreeable phantasms to be encountered as I enter. I wish God had given me the faculty of writing a sunshiny book.

It would not, indeed, have been "a sunshiny book" if Hawthorne had lived to complete it. A book written by a man in the "Valley of the Shadow of Death" can scarcely be expected to be mirthful or light in tone; and yet there is in story would have weakened its force as a finished might be an interesting question for those con mere art of manufacturing stories. But w Hawthorne by this standard. Certainly in "S or the Elixir of Life," the theme is also too fanci perhaps, for successful treatment.

In "Transformation" Hawthorne gives us of been said by a celebrated English novelist tha design it was the greatest work of fiction ever w
the author had failed to execute his plan effec the best passages in "Transformation" could excelled. Balzac has never written anything passages. Hawthorne, however, by his fastidi mere dramatic situations, cramped his story formation," which might have been his greatest creates on our minds the same impression as mutilated piece of beautiful sculpture.

Of the short stories of this unique writer it speak too highly. Some of them are perhaps m sentative of his peculiar genius than his more For instance, "The Birth-mark" and "The Gr have more spiritual significance than any oth same length.

In one of the "Notes," which give suc glimpse at the mental mechanism of the author
he would like to write a story about nothing. C Flaubert says much the same thing in one of his novel-manufacturer of to-day the idea may seem in reality genius has little need of incidents to works. It is not the situations in Hamlet but of Hamlet's mental struggles that interest us mo
the greatest American prose writer, stan analyst of the soul. His stern Puritanism has strip off the stage accessories of life, and to lay b and the convulsions which are the real sources
He is in literature what Spinoza is in philo pursuer of truth. Those who are weary of be and of sensationalism may turn to Hawthorn and peace. His works have a cloistral calm w in common with the mad rush of modern life.
a country where progress has almost made wither" should have given birth to such a ma needed a Hawthorne. His writings are the b her restless pursuit of material success.

D. F.

SAMUEL RICHARDSON

Samuel Richardson has, we are afraid, been except students for many years past; and be his three novels the modern reader probably kn author or his works. One might ask a dozen ances the names of Richardson's books and
"Pamela," "Clarissa," "Grandison," but it

In his day the whole of Europe positively raved about him. They imitated his style, they plagiarized his plots, made plays out of his novels, wrote continuations of his stories, and issued several translations of his works. These things were done by such men as Rousseau, Diderot, Goethe, Prévost, George Sand, Musset, Balzac, Voltaire, and Lessing—writers who did not, surely, follow the craze of a fashion as is done so extensively nowadays. They were admirers heart and soul of one of the greatest realists England has known. Rousseau considered "Clarissa" the finest novel in any language; Diderot in his "Éloge" promised to read him alternately with Homer, the Bible, Euripides, and Sophocles, and said that he rejoiced that Richardson had more admirers in France than in his native country. And those who did not "weep hours of life away," as a German poet confessed to have done over his work, came over to England to find the spots where the characters were supposed to have walked and had their being, much in the same way that Americans go to Stratford and admirers of Dickens to Rochester and the neighbourhood. In England the feeling was much the same, but not so strongly manifested. If one had not read the latest volume of "Pamela" or "Clarissa," as the case might be, it was considered a far more heinous crime than, say, to confess ignorance of "An Englishwomen's Love-letters" to-day. These facts elaborated in the few biographical accounts of his career have kept his memory green; and a knowledge of the place of Richardson in English literary history is part of the equipment of the literary student, even if few such students have taken the trouble to read him. Perhaps one reason why his works are not more widely read is to be found in the curious fact that while Sterne, Fielding, and Smollett are well served by the publishers of reprints, only one complete edition of Richardson's writings has been accessible for close upon a century, and that expensive, and, speaking from a general point of view, ungetatable. We are led, therefore, to welcome the complete edition included in our book list of last week, published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall. It is in twenty small well-printed volumes, and contains seventy-eight reproductions from the illustrations by Stothard and Burney—we reproduce one by Stothard—and a portrait of Richardson, the frontispiece to each volume being a photogravure. Miss Ethel M. M. McKenna's study of the novelist and his work is well considered and interesting. We confess, however, some curiosity to learn upon what authority she speaks of Fielding's "Apology for the Life of Mrs. Shamela Andrews" and of "his famous parody 'Shamela' to which Joseph Andrews owes its inception."

Richardson was born in 1689 in Derbyshire, so that when "Pamela" was written in 1740 he was over fifty years old. Everybody knows how it came to be written—it was evolved out of an invitation to write a volume of business letters. Long as it is, it is said that only two months were devoted to its writing, and only after office hours, for Richardson's printing business kept him occupied during the day. It was published anonymously and its success was immediate. "Clarissa" began to appear in 1747. "Pamela," according to the well-known story, so moved the blacksmiths of Slough that they broke into the church to ring the bells for joy when the heroine wedded her master. Whether the blacksmiths were equally interested in Clarissa we do not know, but there are plenty of instances on record of expressed agony of impatience for the new volume. It is undoubtedly Richardson's greatest book; Dr. Johnson proclaimed it the first book in the world for the knowledge it displays of the human heart. "Grandison" (1753) was the outcome of the pestering

O master of the heart! whose magick skill
The close recesses of the soul can find,
Can rouze, becalm, and terrify the mind,
Now melt with pity, and with anguish thrill;
Thy moral page while virtuous precepts fill,
Warm from the heart, to mend the age des
Wit, strength, truth, decency, are all com
To lead our youth to good, and guard from ill.

O long enjoy what thou so well hast won,
The grateful tribute of each honest heart, Sincere, not hackney'd in the ways of
At each distressful stroke their true tears run
And nature, unsophisticate by art, Owns and applands the labours of thy

To Richardson, surrounded by his little troop of ladies, the literary quality of such addresses matter

THE RESCUE OF MISS BYRON BY SIR CHARLES GRANDISO
THE HANDS OF SIR HARGRAVE POLLEXFEN
"The moment I returned to the chariot your lovely cousi herself into my arms."
[By permission of Messrs. Chapman and Hall.]

provided they paid the proper tribute to his rather ta prudential morality, and he doubtless accepted with con more than of "Tom Jones" or "Tristram Shandy." Who would have the heart to interfere with an author who assures us that his works were written to "amiably illustrate, and strongly enforce, the proper virtues of man and woman, parent and child, old age and youth, master and servant. Each of them communicated in a regular collection of familiar letters written to the moment while the heart is agitated by hopes and fears on events undecided. A method which must engage more strongly and prove far more interesting to the reader than a cold unanimating narrative of events long since determined."

Richardson carried on his business of printer and publisher in Salisbury-court. His house at North End is still to be seen. He died in 1761 and was buried in St. Bride's, Fleet-street.

MICK McQUAID.

An Irish correspondent writes :—The recent references to the creator of "Jack Harkaway" in Literature remind me of a similar curious instance of the immense popularity in Ireland of a serial writer whose personality was and is known to comparatively few people. The late Colonel W. F. Lynam, the creator of "Mick McQuaid," published next to nothing in book form, but he was a prolific writer for papers and magazines. In 1867 he began the publication, in a paper called the Shamrock, read chiefly by the Nationalist youth of Ireland, of a story called "Mick McQuaid's Conversion." It described the sordid cunning of a character who changes his religion for money. It caught on immediately, and for nearly thirty years the adventures of Mick McQuaid delighted a constantly increasing circle of readers. The "Conversion" was followed at once by a fresh serial called "Mick McQuaid the Evangelizer," showing his hero as a fully-fledged evangelist. It depicted the worst vices of the lowest class of Irish peasants, often with remarkable humour and raciness, and sometimes with coarse, savage power. The cry for "more" induced Colonel (then Captain) Lynam to present Mick in a new light, and he next appeared as "Mick McQuaid the Under-Agent," in which the cupidity and insolence of the inferior type of bailiff are depicted. The appetite of the Shamrock's public being unsatisfied, we next find Mick as "M.D.," and the life of the country doctor in Ireland and its humours and its miseries are well displayed. Then "Mick McQuaid, M.P.," comes on the scene and outshines all his previous records. His capacity for jobbery, his insincerity and roguery, are ruthlessly drawn. "Mick McQuaid, Solicitor," followed, and all the chicanery of the worst type of Irish attorney is set down in a quite Hogarthian manner. The circulation of the paper, meanwhile, increased by leaps and bounds, and it became a valuable property. Many Irish writers who have since become well known were its frequent contributors, and the same may be said of its artists, among whom were Harry Furniss, Gustave Doré, and G. Montbard. The next appearance of the famous Mick was in "Mick McQuaid's Spa," further illustrating his genius for dishonesty and his sublime impudence. The author tried vainly to invent other characters and to turn his attention to other subjects, but his readers only clamoured for more, and "Mick McQuaid, J.P.," and "Mick McQuaid, Poor Law Guardian," not to mention other serials with Mick as the central figure, duly appeared. When, on a change of proprietorship, an attempt was made to stop the interminable narrative, the circulation of the paper went down by thousands and the

CURRENT LITERAT

THE LIFE OF STEVENSO

THE LIFE OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. By G
Two volumes. (Methuen. 25s.

There is no personality in the whole of ture more fascinating than that of Robert Much of this personal fascination he contriv and well-concealed literary art, to transfe of his books, which thus achieved that note of fr sake of which certain writers are always val than their intrinsic power quite justifies. C task of his biographer is made harder tha compensation, his work is assured of a r it is at all adequately executed. Mr. G life of his famous cousin is more than ade say so; it is a dignified, scholarly, frank, a time very loving piece of work, which is wh subject. At the same time, it tells us, litt Stevenson that was not already familiar to a sy who had the Edinburgh Edition and the letters
Mr. Colvin at his finger ends, and who possess ance with the various reminiscences which St have published in the seven years that have death. It was inevitable that, in anything p definite and formal biography, this should Balfour has candidly admitted it in his preface

In Stevenson's case, if anywhere, the biography would be autobiography if it co availed myself as far as possible of the wri has referred to himself and his past expe together the passing allusions to himself throughout his works was an obvious duty;
my longer quotations, except in two or t necessary instances, have been taken almost material which was hitherto either unpublis in the limited Edinburgh Edition. Whe passage in his manuscripts or ephemeral w his life or development, I employed it no should have used a letter or a hasty note, a same fashion, regarding it as a piece of dir
the best possible source.

This plan, which seems to us to be the o adopt, necessarily involves a certain amount of may even appear excessive to those who o thumb the Edinburgh Edition. As they ar thousand in number—at an outside computa was right to consider the far larger numbe deal of the autobiographic material publish alone will be new. Even to the best-read ad
he has succeeded in purveying a respectab material, though it is not of essential import luckiest finds we are disposed to account th autobiography which Stevenson set himself t during his stay in San Francisco, when th burning low. This especially helps him to period of Stevenson's life which is still obsc on his development and his literary work is so one cannot but feel a justifiable curiosity enough after all, chiefly consisting in the shifts to which even an Edinburgh lad is put when he tries to "see life" on five shillings a week, which was all the pocket money that Stevenson had to conduct his University career upon. An extract from the fragment aforesaid helps us to understand a good deal in Stevenson's work and in his own dim references to his youthful excesses :—

> I was the companion of seamen, chimney-sweeps, and thieves ; my circle was being continually changed by the action of the police magistrate. I see now the little sanded kitchen where Velvet Coat (for such was the name I went by) has spent days together, generally in silence and making sonnets in a penny version-book ; and rough as the material may appear, I do not believe those days were among the least happy I have spent. I was distinctly petted and respected ; the women were most gentle and kind to me ; I might have left all my money for a month, and they would have returned every farthing of it. Such indeed was my celebrity, that when the proprietor and his mistress came to inspect the establishment, I was invited to tea with them ; and it is still a grisly thought to me, that I have since seen that mistress, then gorgeous in velvet and gold chains, an old, toothless, ragged woman, with hardly enough voice to welcome me by my old name of Velvet Coat.

This gives us a good idea of the lad whom Mr. Henley painted in that sonnet which still remains, to our mind, the best portrait of young Stevenson that has been drawn with pen and ink :—

> Valiant in velvet, light in ragged luck,
> Most vain, most generous, sternly critical,
> Buffoon and poet, lover and sensualist :
> A deal of Ariel, just a streak of Puck,
> Much Antony, of Hamlet most of all,
> And something of the Shorter Catechist.

Mr. Balfour has been thrice fortunate in the discovery of this fragment of autobiography, notably in its third book, "From Jest to Earnest," which describes the "high jinks" in which R. L. S. and his friends delighted, and indicates the passage from "greensickness" to that sane and manly attitude to life which was so signal a triumph over physical disabilities. Little less welcome are the charming reminiscences of Colinton Manse, which contain much that is fresh and characteristic, in spite of their having clearly furnished material for several published essays. Indeed, the two best parts of the book, to our taste, are those which deal with Stevenson's childhood, of which all is here collected that the world can ever expect to know, and with his life at Vailima, of which Mr. Balfour writes as a participant in the family interests and a close observer of the romantic life of Tusitala. Mr. Colvin was too unsympathetic with "the blacks and chocolates" to handle that well, and there was much to tell which did not find place in the Letters or in the South Sea book. The account of Stevenson's parents, too, is fuller and more subtle than anything that has hitherto been published, and the outside world should have no excuse for further misapprehending the relationship between Thomas Stevenson and his strangely gifted son, or for uttering such fatuities as the supposition that the whole of that relationship is painted in (for instance) "John Nicholson," which had just enough of autobiography to mislead the ignorant. Indeed, we have nothing but praise for the way in which Mr. Balfour has throughout his book fulfilled a task of extreme difficulty and

A Bible picture-book was given to him as an extra p adds his mother, 'from that time forward it was the his heart to be an author.'" He learnt, about the sa lisp in numbers ; there is preserved a curious little po
the boy called a "songstry"—which his father secre down and preserved. It may rank in the history of with the epitaph of the duck on which little Sam Joh
—though that story rests on a worse foundation :—

> Had not an angel got the pride of man,
> No evil thought, no hardened heart would have be > No hell to go to, but a heaven so pure ;
> That angel was the Devil.
> Had not that angel got the pride, there would hav > need
> For Jesus Christ to die upon the cross.

The manner of Stevenson's collaboration has o discussed, and the account of its method which is giv surviving partner, Mr. Lloyd Osbourne, will be read w interest by craftsmen in the art of letters. He says :—

> When the idea for a book was started, we used > over together, and generally carried the tale on > invention to another, until, in accordance with L > practice, we had drawn out a complete list of the
> In all our collaborations I always wrote the first draf
> the ground . . . . The first draft was then writ > and rewritten by Louis and myself in turn. .
> collaboration was a mistake, for me, nearly as m > him ; but I don't believe Louis ever enjoyed any w
> He liked the comradeship—my work coming in j > energy flagged, or vice versa ; and he liked my appl
> he—as he always did—pulled us magnificently out o
> In a way, I was well fitted to help him. I had a > dialogue—I mean, of the note-taking kind. I was a > he an artist and a man of genius. I managed the pe > shifts and inventions which were constantly necessar > the practical man, so to speak, the one who p > distances, and used the weights and measures ; > Wrecker" the storm was mine ; so were the figl > murders on the Currency Lass ; the picnics in San > and the commercial details of London's partnershi > was mine and Pinkerton to a great degree, and Capt > was mine throughout.

It is always interesting to look into an artist's and for all Mr. Osbourne's becoming modesty we ca that a partnership was a mistake which gave us s vigorous, and romantic a tale as "The Wrecker." F us quote a rondeau which is of double interest as bei the sole survivor of a form of verse in which Steve took more than superficial interest, and as expre philosophy of life with great directness. It runs thus :

> Since I am sworn to live my life
> And not to keep an easy heart,
> Some men may sit and drink apart,
> I bear a banner in the strife.
>
> Some can take quiet thought to wife,
> I am all day at tierce and carte,
> Since I am sworn to live my life
> And not to keep an easy heart.
>
> I follow gaily to the fife,
> I leave Wisdom bowed above a chart,

QUEEN VICTORIA AND SOME OF HER CONTEMPORARIES.

DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY. Supplement Vol. III.—How—Woodward. (Smith, Elder. 15s. n.)

In this, the last, volume of our great national dictionary, we naturally turn first to the excellent life of Queen Victoria, written by Mr. Sidney Lee. It occupies 110 pages and contains about 95,000 words. That is to say, it is long enough, if published separately, to make a book of respectable size. The bibliography shows that Mr. Lee has not been satisfied with the obvious sources of information, though these do really cover most of the ground. He has also been to such foreign authorities as De la Gorce's "Histoire du Second Empire," and Th. von Bernhardi's "Aus dem Leben"; has made considerable use of the vivacious and well informed sketch quite recently published in the Quarterly Review, and is so up to date as to include in his bibliography Mrs. Gerald Gurney's book just published on "The Childhood of the Queen"; and lays further claim to "private information derived from various sources." The precise part which this private information, necessarily used with much circumspection, has played in the writing of the life is not very easy to determine; but it presumably is relied upon for "personal characteristics" and for generalization and criticism. For Mr. Lee's historical conscience has prevented him from indulging in indiscriminate eulogy. He gravely rebukes the petulance and lack of consideration for the feelings of others which in Queen Victoria's early years (and notably in the Lady Flora Hastings case) placed her popularity in peril, and the personal preferences which sometimes swayed her in the choice of candidates for ecclesiastical promotion; and he sheds what will probably, to many readers, be fresh light upon her Majesty's character by recording that "she stoutly protested against the proposal for the abolition of flogging in the Army." Moreover, his summing up is written in the temper of detachment proper to the historian, though his language is sometimes severe. Of Queen Victoria's reluctance to visit Ireland he writes that she "by conduct which can only be assigned to care for her personal comfort at the cost of the public advantage almost sapped the influence which the Crown can legitimately exert on the maintenance of a healthy harmony among the component parts of the United Kingdom"; while of her final journey to that country he declares, with some excess, we cannot but think, of the critical spirit, that "it emphasized the errors of feeling and of judgment which made her almost a complete stranger to her Irish subjects during the rest of her long reign." The final verdict is that "Queen Victoria's whole life and actions were guided by personal sentiment rather than by reasoned principles," but that, with the exceptions referred to and some others, "the Queen's personal sentiment proved a safer guide than the best devised system of moral or political philosophy."

None of the other lives are nearly as long as that of Queen Victoria; but several of them are very interesting. One of the first is that of Thomas Hughes by the Rev. J. Llewelyn Davies; but we miss the familiar story about the negotiations for the publishing of "Tom Brown." Hughes, we have always heard, wanted Mr. Macmillan, as a personal friend, to buy the book outright for £100, but Mr. Macmillan, acting as a personal friend, refused. "Tom, my boy," he said, or is said to have said, "there's money for you in this for the remainder of your life."

Mrs. Lynn Linton is not wholly adequate, whethe of Mrs. Linton's remarkable relations with her her early work as a journalist, so fully detailed Sonies Layard's biography, and we have seen appreciations of Max Müller's work on philology tive mythology than that contributed by Profe Mr. Arthur Sidgwick's life of F. W. H. Myers d the poet as psychical researcher, but also mentio to us, that in his youth he swam the Niagara r Falls. Mr. D'Arcy Power's life of Sir Jame doubtless have been more detailed if the been able to read the memoirs published the some of the information contained in it appears placed at his disposal. Mr. H. R. Tedder's Quaritch has an exceptional vivacity and candou what squat and awkward figure, occasionally irrepressible egotism, pithy sayings, half sardonic, combined to form an interesting attractive personality." The sad career of Osca with by Mr. Thomas Seccombe, who informs wrote, while in prison, an apology for his life w the hands of his literary executor.

There remains Mr. E. T. Cook's life of Rus of all the biographies, except that of Queen Vi twenty-three pages. No better blographer than have been selected. He writes with equal sym ledge, and has the great gift of being concise wi The essay is an admirable summary, illumi personal touches, relating alike to the expe Hinksey-road, where the diggers included such disciples as Arnold Toynbee and Oscar Wil lectures at Oxford and elsewhere. At many of was himself present, taking notes for the Pall Others who attended them will appreciate this d

He was a magnificent reader. The quotat or from Chaucer or from some other favou declaimed as no other public man save Gladst declaimed them. He read his own works wi attention to emphasis and rhythm that they strain of music, in the memories of his hearers not powerful but had a peculiar timbre w penetrating and attractive. His old-fashi tion, with the peculiar roll of the r's, seemed harmony with the mediæval strain in his thou

It would be easy, but perhaps not wholly fa to criticize the occasional want of proportion i the lives included in this volume—three pages, Lord Leighton (by Sir Walter Armstrong), and Arthur Orton (by Mr. J. B. Atlay), and a som importance given, as it seems to us, to actors w died. Much depends, of course, on the am available; and this, when it is so often derive information," must necessarily vary to an ex proportionate to the importance of a subject. difficulty under which the editor of a volume many recent biographies labours is that whilst mass of printed material is at hand, in others, a Sir James Paget, the most important source of appear just too late for him to make use of. Th some biographies not of recent date which rep from the earlier volumes; such as those of Pic

TENNYSON.

ALFRED TENNYSON. By ANDREW LANG. ("Modern English Writers.") (Blackwood. 2s. 6d.)

This book, though it may not add anything to the popular knowledge of the great Victorian poet, nor indeed say much to affect the popular estimate of his poetry, is nevertheless a book which any lover of poetry will be glad to have read. To say that the book is by Mr. Lang is to imply at once that it is bright and entertaining; and it may be added that he has contrived to treat a greatly over-written subject with astonishing freshness and vivacity. His animated style, in which every sentence is like a pistol-shot fired point-blank at its mark; his restless idiosyncrasy, which seems afraid to be altogether serious for two pages together; his playful "digs" at the younger generation; his amenable assumptions of desirable ignorance ("I am not well acquainted with the habits of the greater ape"; "I confess to little acquaintance with modern ethical novels"); all these traits combine to render his work attractive, lively, and companionable. But what will perhaps be less easily appreciated, except by the professed student of literature, is the extraordinarily apt and ready acquaintance with a whole wealth of literary associations which peeps out everywhere from beneath the more superficial attractions of his style. Mr. Lang's felicitous allusiveness is inexhaustible, and to the reader who can follow him intelligently through his network of suggestions and snatches of literary reminiscence the book will have the additional charm of illustrating the subject with a diversity of associations which form a far more eloquent commentary than all the annotation of the pedants.

From the biographical point of view, Mr. Lang possesses a great advantage over his predecessors, in having Lord Tennyson's life of his father to draw upon. He is thus protected from error, and the accuracy of his little volume is generally sound. It may, perhaps, be noted that Browning was not in 1850 "already author of 'Men and Women,'" as a rather ambiguous phrase on page 83 seems to suggest; and that Becket was not (page 190) "put on the stage in 1891," but in February, 1893. Nor is it correct to say (p. 6) that the "Poems by Two Brothers" were by Alfred and Frederick, since the latter contributed but two or three pieces to the volume, and it was Charles who was the acknowledged joint-author with Alfred. These, however, are comparatively trifles. More open to criticism is Mr. Lang's contented reliance upon the "authoritative life" for all his biographical details. "I have not thought it desirable," he says, "to include what [Lord Tennyson] rejected"; and again, "Nor have I sought outside the biography by his son for more than the biographer chose to tell." This is, of course, a courtly compliment to the present Lord Tennyson; but, so far as a character-sketch of the poet is concerned, it has the effect of leaving us very much where we were before. Every one knows that Tennyson was a man of marked individuality, and subject to many shades of characteristic, but his biographers have hitherto done very little towards giving us a comparative or descriptive sketch of his life and temperament. Even the definitive biography itself is rather a storehouse of record than a picture of character. And, without in the least encouraging "tittle-tattle" or undesirable personality, we cannot help thinking it a pity that Tennyson should lack, what so many other less important persons have fortunately secured—takes the safe view, which is also, generally speaking, one. His criticism is pleasantly free from fashionable he makes no ingenious attempts to maintain perverse theories; his estimate is that of the enthusiastic, fanatical, Tennysonian. Although he playfully professes ignorance of the stage and a lack of enthusiasm for the he is particularly interesting in his analysis of the positively "illuminating" on Queen Mary. His for "Maud" is less heart-whole than we should have but he writes with tact and a rather uncharacteri seriousness" upon "In Memoriam." His suggesti effect of that fine poem of consolation upon the mourner is touched with a sincerity that is both restr dignified. We have never read better criticism of w has too often been treated as the particular tourney- sectaries and schismatics.

Finally, the whole book is marked by an enth the spirit, as opposed to the letter, of true poet significance of Tennyson's work is being gradually ob criticism of the utilitarian order; and, since he deliberately philosophical, there is a growing tendenc him as though he were primarily valuable for his philo religious teaching, and his snatches of scientific Against this lumbering kind of comment Mr. Lang make protest. "The point of view," he says, "must shift generation of readers, as ideas or beliefs go in or out are accepted, rejected, or rehabilitated. To one age may seem weakly superstitious, to another needlessly After all, what he must live by is, not his opinion poetry. The poetry of Milton survives his ideas; may be the fate of the ideas of Tennyson, his po endure." This is admirably said; and, what is unquestionably true. We can only hope that Mr. Lang' may have its effect upon his successors in the growin Tennysonian commentators.

A COMMENTARY ON TENNYSON'S "IN MEMORIAM." BRADLEY, LL.D., Professor of Poetry in the Uni Oxford. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. n.)

If any poem of Tennyson's can justly be said annotation and commentary, "In Memoriam" is cer one. It is perhaps the most widely read, as it is cer most frequently quoted of all his works, and yet it wou too much to say that it is probably the least understoo most easily subject to misinterpretation. And this mis rooted in its very construction and in the circumstan composition. As every one knows, "In Memori practically seventeen years in process of growth. It series of disconnected pieces, not even intended for pu and it only gradually grew into coherence and into the of a complete and progressive study. The result presents a sort of multiplicity in unity; its separate are in one sense complete in themselves, and in anc ponent parts of a corporate whole; so that, while poem is too long to be read at a sitting, and is, pe rarely read as a connected study at all, its section partially understood without reference to their pla graduated scheme of the argument. And, apart from thesis, there are textual difficulties of considerable co As Mr. Bradley justly says:—"The meaning of many is doubtful, and a few are extremely obscure; the caus

From one point of view Mr. Bradley has done his work, as was only to be expected, with exemplary judgment. Almost every difficult passage is satisfactorily elucidated; and, although there is an occasional tendency towards a somewhat tiresomely academic tilting with earlier commentators, the notes are for the most part kept commendably clear of excesses. The only respect in which Mr. Bradley seems to us to indulge his taste for annotation too freely is in the number and abstruseness of his illustrations. It is easy to see that he has been led astray here by Mr. Churton Collins' example, and, indeed, many of his parallel passages are taken straight from "Illustrations of Tennyson." But, not only are many of these cross-references far too elaborate to be profitable, but they have also the undesirable result of wearying the student on the one hand, and on the other of confusing his appreciation of the author he is studying by diverting his attention to literary parallels when it ought to be concentrated upon individual beauties. Here, for instance, is Mr. Bradley's note upon the verse—

> And all the phantom, Nature, stands—
> With all the music in her tone,
> A hollow echo of my own,—
> A hollow form with empty hands.

> Hollow: Tennyson is very fond of this word; e.g., "Hollow smile and frozen sneer." "The Poet's Mind" (cf., LXX. 4, LXXIII. 13). There may be a reminiscence of Virgil's "cava sub imagine formae." Aen VI., 293.

This is a fair example of much of Mr. Bradley's annotation, and, well-meant as it is, it is precisely the sort of commentary which deadens the mind of the young student to an intelligent and quick love of literature. As Mr. Bradley well says, there is no virtue in a sort of misty appreciation of poetry which enjoys without understanding; and it is unquestionable that, the more the heart of the meaning of fine poetry is understood, the more keenly it is appreciated for its own sake. But it cannot, we think, be pretended that either an understanding or a love for poetry is fostered by the sort of annotation that overlays a single passage with a variety of parallelisms, many of them far-sought and unconvincingly ingenious. On the contrary, the very opposite effect is produced, and the unfortunate habit of cramming—the perpetual risk of the modern system of examination—is insinuated into the one field of study from which a true lover of literature would be most anxious to exclude it. For "the cramming of tips" is the destruction of the literary spirit.

There are other respects, however, in which Mr. Bradley's commentary invites cordial approbation. Its elucidation of difficult passages is, as we have said, thorough; it is also concise and unaffected. His explanations are pleasantly free from the parade of the lecturer; they, curiously enough, avoid just those shortcomings which make the "Illustrations" appear a little self-consciously pedagogic. But the best part of the whole book is the catena of short prefaces, dealing with different aspects of the poem, historical, constructive, and spiritual. These are, in their way, models of brief elucidation, and will be helpful even to the experienced and methodical student of "In Memoriam." They sum up much thoughtful study in a little space, and convey a great deal of suggestive reflection brightly, clearly, and persuasively. The book is well worth possessing, if only for them.

As to the larger question of the general utility of commentaries of this kind, this clearly opens up arguments too wide argument, but we believe it to be a sound one. time for these commentaries comes later. When poetry has been intimately absorbed, the spi clearer by familiarity. At this stage the need obvious; and here a book like Mr. Bradley's tion, and perhaps even its necessity. If onl lecturers would appreciate more thoroughl gradation in the process of poetic taste, we popular appreciation for poetry would be more g sensitive. The fault of our modern system is commentary is used too early, and the sense o at its birth under a weight of quite subsidiar considerations.

MR. RIDER HAGGARD AS EA TRAVELLER.

A WINTER PILGRIMAGE: Being an Account of Palestine, Italy, and the Island of Cypru in the year 1900. By H. RIDER HAGGARD. tions. (Longmans. 12s. 6d. n.)

Mr. Rider Haggard is very amusing. We d to make of this book; classify it we cannot, but all with interest and amusement. Such an odd dry humour, unintentional humour, and humo explained with footnotes; of shrewd observat ignorance; of enthusiasm and good-humoured m hasten to add, Mr. Haggard never mocks a neither, again, does he pump up insincere senti fashion of Pierre Loti. It is a healthy book, the with a kind of boyish naïveté, who does not know should not be interested in his meals or the rail yet contrives to add a great deal which is re without realizing the difference.

The book has no unity. The architecture Station has nothing to do with Palestine, nor, in and yet we would not have missed some of simple remarks on what he saw in Florence, the an unsophisticated mind which knows little of admirations is, however, wasted; the "lace-wo marble dome" in Milan Cathedral is simply p whole thing a sham. We, too, hate a Continent every decoration strikes you like a blow, surr servility on fire for unearned fees, fed with mess soul loathes"; we, too, have suffered the sling outrageous fortune on Italian railways; but the of the essence of a winter pilgrimage to the Hol

Again, Mr. Haggard quotes Latin lines whi speaks of the "Mycenians," regards Homer and isolated sports of nature which have no co circumstances of their time, calls Mount Athos and imagines the modern Greek pet name Christ form of Christopher or what not, to be the s "Christ." He suggests that an ancient to "jeweller," because pieces of gold were fo Haggard is convinced that Tabor was the Transfiguration; thinks that Gordon's tomb wa and the hill which now presents two eye-holes Calvary. He does not know how completely th has been refuted (e.g., in the last Quarterly P.E.S. fund). In fact, the reader who goes to amuses. His adventures are told with something of Kinglake's good-humour, though hardly with his inimitable touch. When his amazement at what he sees does not strike him dumb, his descriptions are often really vivid. He has an eye to agricultural possibilities, and some good advice not only on these, but on other practical points. His account of the way to exterminate locusts may prove useful elsewhere. Above all, every great deed, or pathetic memory arouses in him an instant enthusiasm, which is quite sincere, though it scarcely lasts long. A healthy book, we repeat; it will not be mentioned a thousand years hence amongst the works of Palestine pilgrims, but it is quite worth having in this present year of grace.

THE MYCENÆAN AGE AND ITS LORE.

THE EARLY AGE OF GREECE. By Professor WILLIAM RIDGEWAY. Vol I. (Cambridge University Press. 21s.)

"What people made the objects called Mycenæan?" was the subject of an article published in 1896 by Professor Ridgeway in the Journal of Hellenic Studies. He came to the conclusion that this people was the nation called by the Greeks Pelasgi, a name which was for a long time thought to have been loosely applied by the ancients to the prehistoric inhabitants of Greece. That paper has never been answered, and, indeed, it was thought by many well able to judge to be unanswerable. Mr. Ridgeway proves his theory still more fully in the remarkable volume before us; and we frankly confess that his main position seems to be quite secure.

His method is briefly as follows. He first examines all the finds of Mycenæan remains. Their number, as they stand here for the first time collected, and their distribution, ranging from Spain to Rhodes, Cyprus, and Canea, from Etruria to Africa, and over practically the whole area of the Ægean, will come as a surprise to many. He finds in all the same characteristics, and concludes that they were made by one race. He then chooses out Crete and the Peloponnese, as places where large numbers of such remains have been found, and where not many successive races have lived; and tests the claims of the several races which have inhabited these countries to be the makers of the remains. He discusses the ancient statements about the Pelasgi, and shows them to be consistent, and to point all to the conclusion that the remains are Pelasgian. The theory is used to explain facts like the existence of Helots and Perioeci in Lacedæmon, and serfs in Crete, Thessaly, and elsewhere, as well as the absence of serfs in places where the Pelasgi had not been conquered, but their territory had passed by marriage to new masters.

Then comes a discussion of the Homeric age, in which dress, arms, and armour are made the tests of race; and the conclusion is made that the Homeric heroes were Achæans. Ethnology points in the same direction. The Achæans are a tall, light-haired race, identified here with the Celts, who came from central Europe by the trade routes and conquered the small swarthy Pelasgi then in their decline. The tombs at Hallstatt, Glasinatz, and elsewhere, are shown to contain accoutrements of the same kind as those described in Homer; and the burial customs of both correspond. Special attention is drawn to the shield and the brooch, which are examined in minute detail. Finally the Homeric dialect is examined, and with the Arcadian identified as a kind of Æolic, which Mr. Ridgeway believes to point in the argument; for it is now impossible for an to say that the processes assumed are impossible Improbable. The same course is taken to prove conquered nations influence or are influenced by their in language, or neighbours by neighbours. It is a confirmation of the soundness of Mr. Ridgeway's theo how many difficulties are cleared up by the way. We space to examine these at length; but we must to point out that reasonable explanations are sug labialism in the Attic dialect, of the so-called Doric in Attic plays, of the strangeness of Homeric names, obscure letters in the Italian alphabet; and, aga Centaur myth, of the existence of cremation and inhu by side, of the developed literary style of the Homeric

As we cannot but agree with conclusions wh forth with such fulness and fairness of argument, our will be confined to a few points. First of all, there is amount of unnecessary detail in the account of ex dates and diggers' names might well be dismissed to for the argument would gain in clearness by some con A careful arrangement in paragraphs would also same end. Again, the chapter on the Brooch does n us to be sufficiently clear. The technical terms a explained, and where so much turns on minute dif form, each ought to have been depicted, especially several classes and sub-classes mentioned on page 531 lastly suggest a few additions. A μίτρη has lately b in Crete, and is figured in the last number of th The assumption that tribes diverse in speech mi communicate by written signs is amply borne out where one written language is intelligible over a lar but differently read. The awe of a race which canno one which can is exemplified in the Spanish di America. Perhaps the sacrifice of "red-haired me Egyptians, which Plutarch mentions, points to some of the Celts or Achæans. The Hbation-tube, or ho may be seen in a number of Roman tombs on the and in many earthen urns of the Italian muse Payne's village of women, described in the "Hist New World," throws some light on the Amazons Perhaps some clue to the origin of the Greek lett may be found if ever the Cretan tablets are decipher particular looks like the double axe, and a simil In a Laconian inscription is given this value by C shall look forward with keen interest to the seco where we hope to see some light thrown on the Poseidon, Zeus, and Hades, and, perhaps, an expl Dodonean Zeus, whom Mr. Ridgeway calls Achæan calls Pelasgian. No doubt Mr. Ridgeway will have to say of the "old-fashioned custom of women t ὀλολυγή at sacrifice" (Schol. Arist. "Knights"), an custom that the men shouted a pæan. Mr. Evans h Cnossos the picture of a female goddess in a s apparently a priestess is depicted holding the sacr on the bronze belt (μίτρη) mentioned above. On question more evidence is certain to be found when islands have been properly examined. There are them Cyclopean remains which have not been publi for instance, such a name as that of the hill Lars in Lesbos is a distinct point of contact with the Myce come to sum up the discoveries of a generation and to see what is the result. Absolute certainty is claimed by no wise scholar; Professor Ridgeway, who is clearly confident in his own theory, would be the first to renounce it if further evidence made that necessary; and Mr. Hall is careful to point out that in prehistoric archæology nothing but a working hypothesis can be got. If Mr. Hall's working hypothesis differs from Professor Ridgeway's, we must endeavour to test how far this is due to a juster weighing of evidence, and how far to other causes.

In one point Mr. Hall has the advantage of other writers on the Mycenæan age; he is able to estimate the evidence from Egypt in the light of a wider knowledge. He has examined this evidence fully and carefully, and classical scholars will be glad to have it put in a form which they can understand, and yet so put that the Egyptologist can test the statements. This is, in our opinion, the most valuable part of the book, and we doubt whether Mr. Torr himself will now venture to contest the accepted date for the Mycenæan age. Mr. Hall believes that the "great men of Keftiu" were Cretans, who communicated with Egypt probably by way of Cyprus, basing the identification on a comparison of the Cretan cupbearer frescoes with Egyptian paintings of the Kefts. The illustrations of things Mycenæan from Egyptian sources are interesting and convincing, and we have no quarrel with this for a "working hypothesis." Mr. Hall is by no means rash in his use of evidence, and is careful to guard against mistakes such as assuming that a tomb is as old as the oldest object found in it. On the "question of date" and on Egyptian influence his book is satisfactory. He is also just in his deduction that the Mycenæan culture cannot have come from Asia Minor—that is, from Babylonia in the end. This has a bearing upon the latest finds in Crete, rude figures which have been assigned, with the rashness of half-knowledge, to a Babylonian origin.

On Greek soil Mr. Hall is not so safe, and we cannot think that he has mastered the evidence. He assumes that the Homeric culture was a decadent form of that of Mycenæ, in spite of the complete difference in armour and dress, and a wide difference in custom. The contrast between burning and burial, he says, "implies no difference of race," although it implies a wholly different conception of the next life. Those who buried the dead believed that the spirit remained with them; those who burned, that the spirit departed to another place. So the buried dead were worshipped; so Crœsus burned his offering to Apollo, that the God far away might sooner enjoy it. Mr. Hall actually urges the fact that both were practised side by side as an argument that they prove nothing as to race. As well might he assert that language is no test of race because English and Bengali are both spoken in Calcutta. The differences in arms and armour, he would have it, "only show that in the Homeric period they had altered somewhat from the old Mycenæan standard"; yet he cannot point to any intermediate stages or suggest reasons for the change, or explain survivals just where they would be expected. He thinks the Pelasgians excluded from the candidates for Mycenæ simply because no Mycenæan culture has been found in Arcadia, forgetting that this bleak district was the home of the poor, while the great fortresses and cities were all elsewhere. Legends of the Pelasgians are "so contradictory that nothing can be made out of them." He does, however, believe that the Pelasgians were non-Aryan and spoke a barbarous tongue; yet he seems to imply now and then that this non-Aryan tongue had affinity with Greek (p. 135, note). A similar confusion appears in his statement—

The fact is that, apart from his special depar writes with insufficient knowledge. We have al how curtly he dismisses the burial question, ethnological considerations; in matters of reli is equally rash. "Foremost amongst Pelasgi Zeus," he says, "who was born in Crete." Yet Mycenæan at Olympia, and when was he b
There is no proof that Mycenæan Crete knew o
the "old Pelasgic god of the double-headed axe Zeus of later days, known from Plutarch, or the Pag or Apollo Tarsia, or Asiatic heroes, or the Amazo all use this axe, as human warriors did? None of th if we ask for proof in place of assumption. We r the theories put forth by Mr. Evans as to his C not only accepted here as "working hypotheses, as "without doubt" facts (203 ff.) Mr. Evans taken a few of the scores of literary signs Cnossian palace for Divine symbols, leaving the themselves. Where this kind of argument leads clearly enough; he actually makes the preposte that the ornamental seat in the palace was a sym leaf of Dodona! In fact, these theories cannot Mr. Hall must reconsider his symbolism. Our judgment has been rudely shaken; and we hope nounce on such questions as he has imperfectly confident dogmatism of this part of his book i trast with the wise caution of the rest; and it Mr. Hall's sincerity that he has hung out a c those who are not colour-blind.

ART.

ANDREA MANTEGNA.

ANDREA MANTEGNA. By PAUL KRISTELLER. W
Plates and 162 Text Illustrations. Engl
S. ARTHUR STRONG, M.A. (Longmans. 70

This new life of Mantegna is not only th which has been published this season, but the monograph on an Italian master which has se many years. The work of a German author acquired a considerable reputation in more tha literature, it appears, first of all, in an Eng edited by Mr. Arthur Strong. The book does author, editor, and publisher. A profusion of trations adorn its pages, and the cover is decorat duction of the noble bronze bust which sta painter's last resting-place in the church of Mantua. Dr. Kristeller's studies in Italian have qualified him in an especial manner for He is intimately acquainted with those Mantua are so rich in material for the art-history of the f and publishes several new documents which thro Mantegna's history and on his relations wit princes and princesses in whose service the best were spent. At the same time he has carefully master's works and the best critical opinions o own judgments on doubtful points are alway discriminating. Andrea Mantegna, our autho preface, has never yet been given the place th

the keynote of Dr. Kristeller's book, the motive which he draws out and illustrates throughout the 500 pages of this fine volume.

It was in Padua, the centre of humanism in North Italy, surrounded at once by the most stimulating intellectual and artistic influences, that young Andrea grew up in the shop of Squarcione, "the father of painters." But his real teachers were the Florentine sculptor, Donatello, who came to work in Sant' Antonio of Padua in 1443, when Andrea was a boy of twelve, and the Venetian painter, Jacopo Bellini, who was employed in the same church a few years later, and whose daughter, Nicolosia, he married in 1454. The young Paduan applied himself with all the enthusiasm of his ardent spirit to attain the new ideals that came to him from Venice and Florence. Donatello taught him how to study nature; Jacopo Bellini and his son showed him the fine technique of Venetian painting. The frescoes in the Eremitani Church at Padua, painted between 1448 and 1455, were his first successes. While Donatello's influence is felt throughout, the bold experiments in perspective that we find in the frescoes which show St. James led to Execution and his Martyrdom prove that Andrea had profited by the examples of Paolo Uccello, who was then working in Padua. On the other hand, the marked advance in colouring and expression that becomes visible in the last subjects show how much he was still learning from the Bellinis, and more especially from his brother-in-law Giovanni. "How keenly," exclaimed Goethe at the sight of these frescoes, "and with what certainty an actual present is here reproduced." The Eremitani frescoes were, so to speak, the school in which Mantegna conducted his own education. By the time they were completed he was a mature and independent master. Besides the altar-pieces of St. Luke in the Brera and the St. Euphemia at Naples, both of which were painted in 1554, the Madonnas of Bergamo and the Poldi-Pezzoli, so full of strong human feeling and tender melancholy, are assigned by the present writer to this early period. Another work which we should have been inclined to place rather later is the St. Sebastian at Aigue-Perse in the Puy de Dôme, which was evidently brought to this remote corner of France by Chiara Gonzaga, who in 1480 married Gilbert Count of Montpensier. It is interesting to compare this little-known figure with the fine St. Sebastian at Vienna—probably a work of Andrea's early Mantuan days—and with the strangely vehement and exaggerated representation of the same martyr in the Franchetti collection at Venice which he painted at the close of his life.

The great Triptych, which is still the glory of S. Zeno of Verona, and the Christ on the Mount of Olives, which hangs close to the similar subject by Giovanni Bellini in the National Gallery, were not completed until the summer of 1459. By this time Andrea had already received a flattering invitation from Lodovico Gonzaga to enter his service, and towards the end of the year he moved with his wife and family to Mantua. The Gonzaga princes were liberal and intelligent patrons of the fine arts and treated Mantegna with unvarying kindness during the forty-five years which he spent at their Court. He received a salary of fifteen ducats a month, together with lodgings, corn and wood for his family, as well as frequent grants of land and money. But wars, plague, and famine impoverished the little State, and Mantegna was always addressing letters to the Marquis complaining that his salary was in arrears and reproaching him with not keeping his promises. "It is impossible to obtain from us what we have not got," wrote Lodovico on one occasion, in reply to these remonstrances, "and you yourself have seen that whenever we have been able to collect our revenues we have

Among the first works which Mantegna executed at Ma
the Triptych in the Uffizi and the Death of the Virg the Prado at Madrid). The three great altar-pieces—the della Vittoria, the noble Trivulzio Madonna, and t and Saints in the National Gallery—belong to the last ye century, when the master was already approaching his year. So, too, do the smaller Madonna at Dresden and t Child in the Mond collection. Of all the wall-paint which Mantegna adorned the Gonzaga palaces and v
two series remain—the frescoes of the Camera del Mantua and the Triumphs at Hampton Court. The paintings which adorned the bed-chamber of the Marquis in the tower of the Castello were finished in 1474, and charming picture of the good prince in the heart of The nine tempera paintings of the "Triumph of Julius were begun in 1484, and were sufficiently advanced later to be shown to Duke Guidobaldo of Urbino whe to visit his betrothed bride at Mantua—not as Dr. K in one of his very few mistakes states (at p. 274) to Du of Ferrara. They were only completed after Mantegna from Rome in 1490, and during his absence he wrote t Marquis to see that the rain was not allowed to com
the windows and injure them, as he considered them hi most perfect works. In 1629 these priceless works we Charles I., and after being valued at £1,000 at the King's works of art in 1651, were reserved by the Lord
Cromwell for the decoration of his own residence of Hamp
They were entirely painted over by Laguerre in Wil reign, but even in their present deplorable con splendour and beauty of the composition still excite o admiration. The great procession moves along with swing and freedom; every figure seems to be animated same enthusiasm and stirred with the same emotion as goes on his triumphal way to the Capitol. In Go quoted words:—"The study of the antique supplies Nature gives movement and the last touch of life." I last years of Mantegna's career mythological subjects oc increasing share of his time and thoughts. The two pict Triumph of Venus, or Parnassus, and the Triumph of or that of Virtue over the Vices, and a third, Com Realm of Love, which Costa finished after his death, the Louvre. The fine grisaille known as the Triumph but in reality representing the image of the Phrygia the Mother of Gods, publicly received by the Roman Ostia, remained in the painter's shop at the time of and was bought in Venice by Lord George Vivian and b by his son to the National Gallery in 1873. Closely this work, both in style and subject, are the drawings Scævola at Munich, and the Combat of the Tritons worth, and several of Mantegna's finest copper engrav

To the end of his life the master's activity neve spite of illness and of financial troubles which at last him to part from his favourite antique marble, the bust of a few weeks before his death. He died on the 13th o ber, 1506, at the age of seventy-five, and the cultured org Lorenzo da Pavia, writing to the Marchesa Isabella, thus the feelings of his contemporaries:—

"The death of our master Andrea causes sorrow, for, in truth, in him an excellent man and Apelles have passed away: I do believe the Lord G to employ him for the creation of some beautiful work destroyed by the modern spirit, a full and perfect understanding of the sincere and splendid representations of intellectual and physical life, of the intensity of purely human emotion and the melodious rhythm of form and movement, which, with a strict and stern restraint, but with a purity and strength equalled by no other artist of the Quattrocento, is expressed by the works and in the whole personality of Andrea Mantegna.

GREAT MASTERS IN PAINTING AND SCULPTURE.

(George Bell and Sons.)

Brunellesco.

FILIPPO DI SER BRUNELLESCO. By LEADER SCOTT. (5s. n.)

Three great figures dominate Florentine art at the opening of the fifteenth century—Brunelleschi (Leader Scott, following Vasari, adopts the popular form of the name in her book, but not on the title page), the architect of the cathedral dome; Donatello, the supreme master of sculpture; and Masaccio, the short-lived painter whose carmine frescoes mark an epoch in the history of the Italian Renaissance. All three men were united by a bond of close friendship, and Brunelleschi, the elder of the group, grieved bitterly, Vasari tells us, over the loss sustained by the world in Masaccio's early death. The great architect, there can be no doubt, exerted a powerful influence over his younger friends, and taught them to apply scientific principles to the arts. But it is less as the discoverer of perspective than as the builder of the cupola of Santa Maria del Fiore that Brunelleschi is remembered to-day. The history of this his great work, of the ridicule and opposition which he had to encounter, of the failures and misfortunes which attended the realization of his project, are the leading features of Leader Scott's excellent Life. Fortunately there is no lack of material for this important episode in Florentine art history. The biography of "Filippo di Ser Brunellesco"—to give him his full and correct name—by his friend and contemporary Antonio Manetti, lately reprinted by Signor Milanesi, gives a trustworthy account of the architect's career, and his statements are in almost every case confirmed by the Archives of the Opera del Duomo, lately collected and published by Cesare Guasti. Still more recently—in 1892—a distinguished German scholar, Herr von Fabriczy, has given us a full and complete life of Brunelleschi, in which all the documents relating to the master are carefully compared and edited, and many doubtful points are cleared up. The building of the dome occupied the last years of Brunelleschi's life. In 1417 he first laid his bold scheme for the erection of a free dome, "without scaffolding and centering," before the Councillors of the Cathedral Works, and it was not till August 31, 1436, that the cupola was finally closed and received the solemn benediction of the Bishop of Fiesole, while the bells rang peals of joy, and the whole city hailed the master with shouts of triumph. But during the intervals of his great work he was employed on several other important buildings, which are still the glory of Florence; amongst others, the portico of the Innocents Hospital, the church and sacristy of San Lorenzo, the beautiful little Cappella Pazzi in Santo Croce, the great church of San Spirito, and the famous Palazzo Pitti, which was still unfinished when he died in 1446. Brunelleschi visited Milan and Mantua and was consulted both by Duke Filippo Visconti as to the building of the strong Rocca, or fortress, in which he spent the greater part of his life, and by the Marquis Gianfrancesco Gonzaga as to the restoration of causeways on the Po. But, since the Rocca Visconteа was razed to the ground by the Pintorricchio.

PINTORICCHIO. By EVELYN MARCH PHILLIPP

This painter, though he stands artistically than the majority of the men hitherto dealt wit provides a personality full of interest and picturesque treatment from the literary as artistic point of view. Like many other arti was fated to endure dire trouble in domestic much younger than himself, was flagrantly unfai suspected of having hastened her husband's neglect during his last illness, but this private l a measure balanced by the generous patron opportunities which befell him in his public car tive craftsman. His first chance came when he help to decorate the Sistine Chapel, and the commission to cover with frescoes the walls apartments in the Vatican. Innocent VIII. and however glaring may have been their delinquen men, were munificent and discerning patrons decision to entrust the adornment of their Pintoricchio was a wise and enlightened one. achievement, which by the liberality of the rei been judiciously restored and made accessible raised him to fame and opulence, and the descri by Miss March Phillipps is concise and intellig opus magnum was the decoration of the library of Siena, a task entrusted to him by Cardinal executed between 1502 and 1509. These great are familiar to all students of art, and a Pintoricchio's grand opportunities may legitim speculation as to what treasures of painting an world would now possess had Michael Angelo w like Pintoricchio's instead of the exacting and ir

Pintoricchio was born at Perugia about 14 opens the life of this painter in a tone of sneeri describes him as the pupil of Perugino. This correct, but, seeing that there was only eight y their age, it is likely that both men may have time or other in the same bottega under Fiorenz Bonfigli, who were at the period in question the in Perugia. His earliest work was done in Ro and the two frescoes in the Sistine Chapel are extant productions. The decoration of the App was begun in 1492, but the work was frequently the political unrest of the times. His minor wor among the most important are his frescoes Maggiore at Spello and in Ara Cœli at Rome. fashion with writers on Italian art to carp at V remarkable how often the sermon on a part achievement is preached from a text taken from garrulous Aretine. Vasari declares that Pintori his day a reputation greater than he deserved, least a portion of the merit inherent in the library at Siena may arise from the fact that t from sketches furnished by Raphael, who was th Vasari often dipped his pen too deeply in gall, that a certain justification exists for both of t Pintoricchio could hardly have been rated the of his time, but it is certain that he came portion of work and patronage. As to the ques assistance or inspiration in the Siena frescoes, t a subject over which art experts have wran on the life, and not Vasari's text. Milanesi labours this point at great length, but his arguments and his parallel extracts from the different editions of Vasari do not establish anything like a refutation of the charge. But the controversy is unimportant, except to the archæologists. Pintoricchio has left us a body of work which, whether it be entirely due to his brain and hand or not, must ever remain one of the masterpieces of decorative art. It would be hard to name another painter who realizes so completely the joy of life. We are told that his own lot was unhappy, but in his age domestic irregularities were all too common, and in his busy life of absorbing work his troubles may have weighed lightly upon him. It is certain that his brush moved as if he were one delighting in the banquet of the senses, in the newly discovered earthly Paradise. In all his renderings of religious themes there is no touch of asceticism; his saints and virgins are fair and comely personages, set in splendid and luxurious surroundings—objects destined less to stimulate devotion than to delight the eye of the beholder. It was a happy conjunction when a painter thus inspired was selected to commemorate the life of the humanist statesman, the friend of Pontano who ultimately became Pope Pius II. Miss March Phillipps' volume is, on the whole, well carried out. She is an enthusiast who is nevertheless not blind to the shortcomings of her subject. Too much space seems to be devoted to biographical details and to description of the painter's work, and too little to the derivation and character of his art. Again, minor errors are somewhat frequent. Perugino was eight and not four years Pintoricchio's senior; Piero della Francesca sprang from Borgo San Sepolcro and not from Arezzo; and Alfonso Borgia was the third and not the second Pope Calixtus; but the book gives evidence of wide reading, and a sincere desire to present the subject in verisimilitude. The illustrations are fully up to the standard of the previous volumes of the series, which continues to hold its own easily in comparison with other issues of a similar character in Germany and elsewhere.

Francia.

FRANCESCO RAIBOLINI, CALLED FRANCIA. By GEORGE C. WILLIAMSON, Litt.D. (5s. n.)

This is a good and useful little work. Dr. Williamson has carefully collected all the information that is to be found in contemporary documents respecting the goldsmith painter of Bologna, who enjoyed so high a reputation towards the close of the fifteenth century. Little, however, can be discovered as to the details of his life. He was born about 1450, became master of the Goldsmiths' Guild in 1483, and, after acquiring considerable fame throughout Italy as a medallist and worker in metal, he began to paint portraits and altar-pieces when he was nearly fifty years of age. His friendship with the Ferrarese master, Lorenzo Costa, who came to Bologna in 1483 and lived in the same house, may have encouraged the goldsmith to take up the sister craft, and the two artists were frequently associated together in important works. Costa, the younger man, had a higher imaginative gift and poetry of conception, but Francia, as Dr. Williamson remarks, "was the finest colourist and more deeply religious man of the two." All Francia's contemporaries speak in the warmest terms of his high character and integrity, and of the charm and sweetness of his nature. He was the most popular of teachers and had as many as 200 pupils, one of whom was that "beloved Timoteo" of whom he speaks so tenderly when he left Bologna and returned to Urbino to become the seen in the gallery and churches of Bologna, but his m known picture is the Buonvisi altar-piece, with t lunette of the Pieta, in the National Gallery. Dr. W gives us a few interesting particulars regarding this m which was originally painted about 1515 for a chap Church of San Frediano at Lucca, as well as extrac seventeenth-century manuscript by Marcello Oretti Archiginnasio Library at Bologna, which contains Francia's works then existing in the different citie

From this we learn that the well-known Madonna o
Garden at Munich originally belonged to a Capuchin
Ferrara and that the fine Annunciation with the figu Carmelite Saint, Albert, under an open portico, whic belonged to M. Reiset and is now at Chantilly, was p Francesco Maria, Duke of Urbino, and given by secretary, Giovanni della Posta, for his chapel in the Church at Modena. An excellent reproduction of th forms the frontispiece to the present volume, w contains reproductions of several of Francia's best por the little-known fresco of the Madonna of the Earthq its view of the towers and churches of Bologna. Bu surprised to find no mention of the lovely Madonn red-haired angel in the Mond collection, which is one o finest of Francia's paintings in England. We must also author's attention to the fact that Isabella d'Este's let her son's portrait in 1510 was addressed, not to Cost Francia's intimate friend, the poet Girolamo Casio, w in the noble Bentivoglio altar-piece by our master, w laurel crown bestowed upon him by Leo X. Again the wife of Giovanni Bentivoglio, was not "the da Carlo Fratello, Duke of Milan, and mother of A Bentivoglio," but the child of Carlo Sforza, and Giangaleazzo, the reigning Duke of Milan. This acc lady married the son of the ruler of Bologna in 149 portrait, as well as that of her husband, appears i beautiful frescoes in San Maurizio of Milan, where daughter Alessandra had taken the veil.

Dr. Williamson's chapter on Francia's work as a and the examples of medals and coins struck by him of the Mint, first for the Bentivoglio Princes and then Julius II., the conqueror of Bologna, are of especial inte in his enumeration of the works which he executed for families of Gonzaga and Este he omits to mention one o renowned productions, the exquisite service of gold plate, enriched with precious gems and encrusted wi and foliage, which he made for the wedding of Bentivoglio and the Duke of Ferrara's daughter, d'Este, in 1487. Such wonders of the goldsmith's Francia's name famous throughout Italy, and earned the splendid tribute paid him at his death, when S wrote:—"On the 7th of January, 1517, died Messer Francia, the best goldsmith in Italy, as well as a most painter, a first-rate jeweller, very handsome in person eloquent in speech, although he was only the carpenter."

Messrs. Bell's new "Miniature Series of Painter has begun with the attractive illustrated booklets FRA A VELAZQUEZ, and BURNE JONES (1s. n. each), seems to us conceived. They give in small compass chapters on th the art of each painter and on the illustrations by him in the book, and lists of his chief works, of the bo

of the visitor to the third art congress of "The International." Is it true, as the envious gleefully aver, that the whole thing is becoming "played out"? We rather feel that there is a rebound from the nervous tension produced by the two previous exhibitions, and it would seem as if the hanging committee had circularized the artists in the terms of Mr. Whistler's Proposition No. 2, and besought them to contribute "the gentle truth," which, as The Master thought, has but a sorry chance in the unseemly struggle for prominence which is the predominant characteristic of the usual "pictures of the year." The true merit of this exhibition is perhaps to be found in the "Sailing of the Boat," by Alexander Roche, rather than in the purple "Rue de Village," by Loiseau, or the polychromatic "Quai en Zelande," by Émile Claus. Is it a new-born desire for quietude and repose that inclines us to prefer the simple power of "Plenilunio," by Pietro Fragiacomo, or the "Dordrecht" of W. Witsen to the "Recluse," in wax and water-colour, of Fernand Khnopff? "The frame," said Whistler, "is, indeed, the window through which the painter looks at his model, and nothing could be more offensively inartistic than this brutal attempt to thrust the model on the hitherside of this window"; and this proposition must account for the dissatisfaction which we feel this year with Bartel's huge "Milkmaid," the "General Music Director, Herman Levi" of Franz Stuck, and "La Fumeuse" of Francis Howard. Seen in the light of the Propositions, moreover, Hans Petersen's "Hochsee" seems to be neither sea nor land and Claude Monet's "La Plage des Petites Dalles" neither sky nor sea.

The desire of art to please rather than to astound is returning, and the poetic unreality of Millie Dow's "Vision of Spring" is better than the unpoetic brutality of A. S. Hartrick's "Three Rounds," the calm of Austen Brown's "Portrait" (No. 270) preferable to the out-of-date realism of Renoir's "La Promenade," the grace of "The Bouquet," by G. Santer, and the firmness of "Miss Betty Mylne," by E. A. Walton, more satisfying than the strained quality of "Rosemary," by W. Nicholson, than the inelegance of Greiffenhagen's flat "Family Group" or the plainness of Forain's "La Sollicitouse." We would sooner have the repose of John Lavery's "Mrs. Spottiswoode" and W. M. Chase's "His First Portrait" than the strange perspective of "Ring Toss"; the convention of "Mrs. Brown Potter" than the forced sentimentality of Milcendeau's "Amoureux"; and, frankly, any one of the Whistlers that have figured at Knightsbridge than the whole seven of this year's exhibition. Once again, the old things—amongst them W. Nicholson's portrait of Mr. Henley (unintentionally) as Rip Van Winkle, W. M. Chase's "Dorothy and her Sister," Witsen's "Dordrecht," and either of the two older Hornel's (Nos. 269 and 272)—are the best things. The supply of new masterpeices is not equal to the demand made by a recurring exhibition. It must be gratifying to a president to have on the walls of the exhibition over which he presides so many works which can point the moral of his own destructive Propositions! Yet an exhibition which introduces us to such a new view of things as W. Nicholson's "Winchelsea" and Dudley Hardy's "Solitude" is not held in vain. The Art Record for October 19 was a special number devoted to this exhibition, with descriptive letterpress and many reproductions of pictures.

The London Sketch Club.

It is amongst the works of the President, the vice-President, and some of the members of the council that we must look for the sketch at its ripest. Mr. Geo. C. Haité, Mr. Dudley Hardy, Mr. Tom Browne, and Mr. Hassell are the mainstay of the London Sketch Club, but they do not supply all that is interesting in the seventh exhibition. The freedom of Leo-Hankey, the directness of "The Emir" by Cecil W. Quinnell, the brilliancy of Frank Spenlove-Spenlove, the reality of "The Chalk Pit" by Walter Chrystal, the poetic of "Reclaim" by

OTHER NEW BOO

The Land of Nowhere.

It need not derogate from the quality Butler's EREWHON REVISITED (Grant Richards one advantage of its publication is the opportun reading "Erewhon" once more. Most peopl knowledge of past English history, but i prising to find how ignorant they are of the of thirty years ago. It is just the same with boo (to which some slight additions are made to se right) ranks among the cleverest and most p the English language, but so overwhelming is books that the lapse of a few years has practi oblivion. The picture of that land of tops an instant and general success. To conceive a To establish it in detail and elaborate it to its sions is a different matter. That is where Butler lies. The notion of the evolution of ma an obvious and rather trite one, but it was great subtlety: the world of the unborn and into the life of earth was a happy and original satirist. But the humour of the writer had a k it described the Colleges of Unreason, and playe round the moral conceptions of the Erewhonian on trial for consumption, and offered their sympat when he embezzled money. In these aston ments, with their humorous complications and suggestions of half-truths, lay the virtue "Erewhon Revisited" gives much less scope for intellectual agility of its predecessor. It is m ing narrative of incident and character, reco return of the traveller Higgs and his recog and his son's mother. It is a pleasant, alm story; and the presence of Higgs unrecognise who practice a cult in his honour provides many p But the irony is less conspicuous, the wit capricious, and less active in the acute and the preposterous. The Deformatory, for instance taught not to be too good, and learn that Washin tell a lie" was merely "an expression of reg which his education had been neglected"—d amusing persiflage. There is, however, run book one vein of deliberate and intentional sa in a prefatory note announces that he has profess himself a member of the more advanced Church." His views on an established tradit already found expression in "Erewhon" in t "Musical Banks." On the strength of them h —in the legendary worship which had grown up of Higgs as "the Sunchild" after his depa twenty years before—with a travesty of Christi as an attack on religious teaching superficial the subject. Professors Hanky and Panky amusing caricature of worldly religious o the picture of "Sunchildism" certainly deger once into rather a foolish flippancy. It is nec in order to prepare readers of the sequel to "E they have to expect. But unquestionably th high rank for its originality and humour, its vi and its lucid and scholarly literary style.

has done very well. He is craftsman rather than artist, but an exceedingly good craftsman, who knows how to handle his material. His book may be particularly recommended to people who have no leisure to study history deeply; and those who wish to study will find in it useful indications to direct their reading. The opening chapters, on the condition of the people when George III. was King, are especially well compiled. Nor must we omit to praise the pictures. There are 519 of them—many of them, as will be seen from the one we reproduce, of a very original kind—and the labour involved in collecting them must have been immense. The handsome volume would be a welcome gift-book to any one.

MR. AND MRS. BROWNING' FIRST VISIT TO ITALY AFTER MARRIAGE.
A Drawing by Mr. E. J. Sullivan to illustrate "The Life of a Century."
[By permission of Messrs. George Newnes.]

FICTION.

The Slaying of the Red Beast.

Yet another story of the American War of Independence. We may say at once that CARDIGAN (Constable, 6s.) is a very good story, too, so far as the main elements of romance go. It is moving, spirited, with enough striking incident to furnish half-a-dozen ordinary novels, and a whole gallery of actors, some of whom are drawn with skill and discrimination. Mr. R. W.

burned alive, is within an hour or two of being hang pany with the aforesaid Mount as a common felon, safely through all these and innumerable minor enc take hand in the fighting at Lexington, and finally down, a sober, married man, in the old home by the River. It is a moving tale, told with spirit and with language and patriotic fervour. The passages w Chambers recounts the Slaying of the Red Beast—England of ours is the Red Beast—are done wit gusto. The author's villains are painted with a bru he lavishes upon them the blackest of black pa naturally enough, they are all on the Tory side.
confess that a little more restraint would be sometim able—a little less magniloquence, and not quite aggressiveness of manner. But the story is so vig enjoyable that it is possible to overlook many triflin
If Lord Dunmore is a caricatured fop-villain, and you Butler a caricatured rogue-villain, and Miss Felicit
the customary heroine of historical romance, there events redeeming points about Sir William Johnson himself, and his two stanch henchmen. Nobody coul book dull; it is packed with incident; it goes with energy from start to finish. Lovers of the melodrama it breathlessly.

Three More Musqueteers.

Mr. A. E. W. Mason's work improves in quality.
not fear comparison with any living writer of historical
"The Courtship of Morrice Buckler" was his first co book, and CLEMENTINA (Methuen, 6s), is in some points b that excellent story. It is told in the right heroic Charles Wogan—the name will recall one of the "Parson Kelly"—with his three trusty comrades in a is as gallant a gentleman as we could wish to meet Like Alan Breck, he is a "bonny fighter," and the resource displayed in his innumerable contests—he finds himself pitted against four or five opponents at remarkable even for an Irish gentleman. For Mr. Wo your true Hibernian stock, seldom at a loss either w or tongue, and he needs all his dexterity to get thr his self-imposed mission. Mr. Mason's Clementina is personage than her Highness the Princess Clementina, of Sobieski of Poland, affianced to James Stuart, King of England, and detained at Innsbruck by the E her way to Bologna. The rescue of this amiable work enough even for the indomitable Irishman and friends of Dillon's regiment, beset as they are by enc traitors at every turn. Mr. Mason handles all the the abduction in his best manner. The story takes of the reader from the start, and it is told in a plea with a spice of distinction and with no lack of humon most heroines of historical romance there is generally sameness, but the Princess Clementina is not too much common model. She is at any rate a plausible creatio author has wisely refrained from doing violence to p in order to secure the conventional ending. "Clem
a good book of its class, well written and well constru illustrations, by Mr. Bernard Partridge, are perhaps that accomplished artist's happiest vein.

"Hearts in Revolt."

HEARTS IN REVOLT, by Henry Gilbert (George All
a curious study, not without fascination, of a young

And this very distinction, paradoxically enough, might be not unlikely to result in the man being ignored as something which it was too much trouble to understand. This may quite conceivably happen to the book. But any one who reads and understands it will find it difficult to forget.

Paul Armstrong.

A thoroughly capable writer, who has seldom put his name to a book unless he has had something to say, is sufficiently rare in these days to deserve our gratitude. Mr. David Christie Murray is a novelist whose work has always had an original note, and he does not readily descend to the manufacture of cheap machine-made fiction. DESPAIR'S LAST JOURNEY (Chatto, 6s.) may not have a very alluring title, but it is better worth reading than most of the novels we have seen of late. It traces the history of Paul Armstrong from his youth up, and Paul is an interesting character-study of the young man of genius who has to fight his way upwards from lowly beginnings. Paul's father also is a good character; the cosmopolitan impresario and playwright, George Darco, is admirable—as good a sketch of an uncommon type as we could wish to see. The authors of "Ready-Money Mortiboy" could not have drawn the generous, irascible, eccentric better. It is a good story, excellently written. We catch in it, in parts, at any rate, a certain personal and pessimistic note.

HERB OF GRACE (Macmillan, 6s.) is one of Miss Rosa Nouchette Carey's quiet domestic stories, appealing as they mostly do to an enormous public. Miss Carey is safer when she does not go too deeply into details of masculine life. "The stakes [at cards] were high, though the boy was too much fuddled by champagne to guess that" is hardly put convincingly. "Stakes" (an odd word in this connexion) are hardly in the nature of ingenious acrostics to be "guessed" by the soberest villain.

Mr. Harold Bindloss in A SOWER OF WHEAT (Chatto, Windus, 6s.) preaches the dignity of labour. The scene of the story is laid in Canada, and the joys and sorrows of the pioneer's life in his grim struggle with the virgin prairie are the main theme. The type of career which is described may lack the romance and glamour of life in other parts of our Empire, but the Canadian farmer's lot is far from being all prose, and Mr. Bindloss never allows his tale to suffer from want of variety. Without being sensational the plot is interesting enough, although the value of the book undoubtedly lies in its fresh and vivid portraiture of Canadian homesteads.

Those who wish to read an intimate picture of provincial Spanish life could hardly do better than try THE FOURTH ESTATE (Grant Richards, 6s.), a translation by Rachel Challice from the original of A. Palacio Valdés. As a story it is, to put it frankly, rather dull, in spite of the struggles of the two Sarrio papers and the advent to that sleepy town of a most licentious and immoral aristocrat in the person of the Duke de Tornos. But it bears the impress of truth, and although it may not inspire us with any great respect for the modern Spaniard, the study of manners and customs on the Cantabrian coast has its interesting side.

Mrs. Egerton Eastwick's novel, BEYOND THESE VOICES (Burns and Oates, 5s.), is divided into two parts. In the first we are presented with "A Modern Pagan," Iolanthe, the beautiful half Spanish-American niece of an English Squire with a pedigree and its consequent pride and reserve, the second part being the sequel of her temperament and conditions. The book [illegible] evidence of far good reading, but the study of

CANON ISAAC TAYLO

The late Canon Isaac Taylor, rector of died last week at the age of seventy-two, was deserved more recognition than the daily Pr to give him. He inherited literary gifts, bein of Isaac Taylor, the well-known author of the "
of Enthusiasm," who was himself the son represented in the religious literature of th
the nineteenth century. His aunt, the well-kn or "Q. Q.," was a voluminous writer in high fa sober folk of the past generation. When the la wrote two volumes, in 1867, on "The Tayl was able to give in an appendix a list of ninet been published by members of his family b
the year in which he was writing.

Canon Taylor made his first venture in li (after graduating at Trinity College, Cambridg wrangler), by editing a new edition, under Becker's "Charicles." He made no pretensions scholar, but he had a thorough knowledge of French, and wrote almost as fluently in either as in English. It was characteristic of his bold ness, in polemics that whilst still in his first cur cliffe) he published an essay on "The Liturgy and wherein he strenuously urged a revision of t mainly on the ground that it would be "an ac to the Dissenters." He came to London in 18 successively two West-end curacies. It was d that he first published, in 1864, the book on lo which he will be best remembered—"Words and the first real attempt to give intelligent ill historical, ethnological, and geographical value and it at once brought its author's name to science of local etymology has now outpac theories confidently enunciated by Taylor, but later editions is still accepted as a work of n er

From 1865 to 1869 Taylor was vicar o Bethnal-green, and here he brought out, "for tion," a sketch of the work done in the paris Burden of the Poor," giving an unvarnished acc of child labour. His rare leisure in the East to compiling the literary annals of his family green he went in 1869 to Holy Trinity, Twic
a holiday spent in Italy he was led to give p Etruscan antiquities, particularly their numera
The result was a volume of some merit en Researches," produced in 1874. In the follo presented by Earl Brownlow (whose niece he the valuable and quiet country rectory of Settr
He had now greater leisure for literary wo began systematic and original researches in the alphabet. Whilst engaged in this st necessary to acquaint himself with the origin of all the theories then current unsatisfactory, examining the problem, with the result that Phœnician and Latin solutions, and built ingenuity, proofs of their Greek origin. In 1 his views, which are now generally accepted entitled "Greeks and Goths, a Study on the same year, in recognition of his philologi he received from the University of Edinbu degree of LL.D. His most important work 1883; this was "The History of the Alph of which will probably always be recogniz
It is a detailed account in two volumes o development of both Semitic and Aryan letters.
of Cambridge, in consequence of its merits, author in 1885 the appropriate degree of Doct in the same year he became an honorary ca paper read by Canon Taylor at the Manchest British Association in 1887 on "The Origin o

distressed many of his Church of England friends, Canon Taylor was never personally aggressive; and he entertained at Settrington more than one of the strong advocates of missionary work who had attacked him in the Press—no doubt to their mutual edification. Canon Taylor took a prominent part in the Domesday celebration. The memorial volumes on the subject, issued in 1888, contained three essays from his pen—namely "Domesday Survivals," "The Ploughland and the Plough," and "Wapentakes and Hundreds." Of these three, the last was the most open to criticism by Domesday scholars, but the first, with its instances of Yorkshire strip cultivation, was at once valuable and most interesting. For a long period Canon Taylor had intended to revise and extend his work on "Words and Places," recognizing the advance made in the study of etymology since his last edition in 1873. Eventually he abandoned the idea, mainly through failing health, and the collections that he had originally made for this purpose were issued in 1896 under the title "Names and their Histories," which is an alphabetically arranged handbook of historical geography and topographical nomenclature. The student of place-names will find it best to treat this book as an appendix to and a corrective of "Words and Places." For several years past Canon Taylor's health had been far from satisfactory, and he was able to discharge but few of his clerical duties. But his interest in literary pursuits remained keen to the last. In 1898 he was able to see a revised edition of "Names and their Histories" through the press; and even last Saturday (October 19) appeared a posthumous paragraph from his pen in Notes and Queries on South African place-names.

Correspondence.

STEVENSON.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In these days of pocket editions, may I put in a plea for a reprint in that form of the complete works of Robert Louis Stevenson, including, of course, those pieces which were only reprinted in the "Edinburgh Edition," which, unfortunately, is beyond the reach of most? Such an issue would be a boon to all, but especially to persons like myself, whose employment necessitates a change of residence at least once a year. Books are notoriously heavy, and to save the heavy cost of moving same I am compelled to buy all I do in as small a bulk as is compatible with legibility.

The thirty-five (or thereabouts) large octavo volumes (not even uniform) which go to make up as complete a set of "R.L.S." as can be got upon the open market would take up more room than I can spare in my little library. The difficulty of the books being published by different firms was overridden in the case of the "Edinburgh Edition," and I see no reason why it could not be repeated.

I notice Messrs. Chatto and Windus announce (in their "St. Martin's Library") a pocket copy of "Familiar Studies in Men and Books," but there is no promise of the others following. A single work is, to my mind, useless. What is wanted is an edition including novels, essays, plays, letters, forthcoming life, and poems, and, for my own part, I would like Mr. Egerton Castle's French version of "Prince Otto" to be included.

While agreeing with Stevenson that in Mr. Meredith we have our greatest living novelist, I am sure most of your readers will agree with me when I say that "R.L.S." is more popular than even Mr. Meredith, and if Messrs. Constable find it pays them to issue a pocket edition of the latter's works there is no doubt that a similar issue of Stevenson would at least do as well.

In a bibliography, inserted in my book, I have en these (and other) articles by him, all of which I perus sending my manuscript to the press.

In support of my opinion that the mysterious Amy Robsart was not the result of an accident, I hav allude to a conversation which occurred, about a mo
Amy's death, between Elizabeth and a messenger English Ambassador at Paris. In the course of this the Queen stated that "none of his (Dudley's) men we attempt at Cumnor."

If Amy's death was accidental, why did Queen make use of such an expression as "the attempt"?

I am faithfully yours,

Oct. 21. PHILIP SI

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS

We understand that the report that Mrs. Cornwall quarterly, the Anglo-Saxon Review, published by Mr. M comes to an end with the present number, is unfounded contrary, the next number, due at the beginnin new year, is all but ready for the press. No chang made in either the price or the general get-up of the r

Mr. J. H. Slater, the editor of that useful work Prices Current," has undertaken a similar book dea
Pictures and Engravings, which will be published Christmas by H. Virtue and Co.

"Jane Austen: her Houses and her Friends," by C Hill, will be published at a guinea by Mr. Lane in or two. The author has been helped by the Auste who have lent manuscripts as well as family portraits.

"Oxford University Sermons," by Principal Bel
Mr. George Allen will publish on the 28th inst., contains a selection of sermons, an account of the rise and deca institution—"the Sermon"—at Oxford.

Messrs. Ginn and Company, the United States sch publishers for whom Mr. Edward Arnold has acted as agent, have opened an office at No. 9, St. Martin's-stre as headquarters for their business outside America.

A life of "Charles Haddon Spurgeon," by one w him intimately, is one of Mr. Andrew Melrose's new a ments for the autumn. A life in one volume of the great p less extensive than that edited by Mrs. Spurgeon, is co want. The same publisher has some new books in the Own" Library for boys, including an illustrated re
"Westward Ho!"

Books to look out for at once.

"Wanderings in Three Continents." By the late Sir Richar
Hutchinson. 16s. net.
[A survey of Burton's most important expeditions, large own words. Edited by W. H. Wilkins. Illustrated.]

"Then and Now." By Dean Hole. Hutchinson. 16s. net.
[Reminiscences. Illustrated.]

"The Life of Sir William Wilson Hunter." By F. H. Skrine. I

"Diaries of the Emperor Frederick." Edited by Marga Poschinger. Translated by Frances A. Welby. Chapman and net.

"The Life of Lord Russell of Killowen." By R. Barry O'Brien
Elder. 10s. 6d.

"Behind the Scenes in the Transvaal." By D. M. Wilson, the f
Commissioner in the Transvaal. Cassell. 7s. 6d.

"British Sculpture and Sculptors of To-day." By M. H. S Cassell. 5s. net and 7s. 6d. net.

"More Famous Homes of Great Britain and Their Stories."
A. H. Malan. Putnam. 21s. net.
[Among the writers are Lord Sackville, Lady Glam Ernestine Edgcumbe, the Countess of Pembroke, and Lord Sa

"History of the Tower of London." By Lord Ronald Sutherlan

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS,

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

ART AND ARCHÆOLOGY.

FRENCH DECORATION AND FURNITURE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By LADY DILKE. 11¼×7½, 260 pp. Bell. 28s. n.

[A sumptuous, copiously illustrated work.]

MINIATURE SERIES OF PAINTERS. FRA ANGELICO, BURNE JONES, VELAZQUEZ. By G. C. WILLIAMSON and MALCOLM BELL. 6½×4½. Bell. 1s. n. each.

[See Review, p. 399.]

A WIDOW AND HER FRIENDS. By C. D. GIBSON. 11¾×7½. Lane. 20s.

[This is the new season's book by Mr. Charles Dana Gibson, which will be welcomed by all who admire "The Education of Mr. Pipp," "Americans," and the other collections of these finely-drawn pen and ink drawings.]

THE MAGAZINE OF ART, Vol. for 1901. 12¼×9½, 576 pp. Cassell. 21s.

THE RELIQUARY AND ILLUSTRATED ARCHÆOLOGIST. Vol. VII. Ed. by J. R. ALLEN. 10½×7¾, 288 pp. Bemrose.

ENGLISH CHURCH NEEDLEWORK. A Handbook for Workers and Designers. By MAUD R. HALL. 10×7½, 130 pp. Grant Richards. 10s. 6d.

[A finely-illustrated book, clear and practical, which fills a want which the revival of Church needlework has created.]

BIOGRAPHY.

THE MARQUIS D'ARGENSON AND RICHARD II. By R. RANKIN. 9×5½, 300 pp. Longmans. 10s. 6d. n.

[Two separate historical studies bound together; one of the French statesman, 1694-1757, who has left us his "Memoirs," the other "The Causes of the Fall of Richard II.]

LINKS WITH THE PAST. By MRS. C. BAGOT. 9×6, 332 pp. Arnold. 16s.

[Mrs. Bagot was born in 1821, and her parents and grandparents bore their share in public affairs. There are also extracts from the diaries of Miss Mary Bagot, who saw much of society at the beginning of the nineteenth century.]

HUGH OF LINCOLN. By C. L. MARSON. 159 pp. MONSIEUR VINCENT. By J. ADDERLEY. 169 pp. 7¾×5. Arnold. 3s. 6d. each.

[These short biographies of Vincent de Paul, 1576-1660, and Hugh, Bishop of Lincoln (c. 1135-1200) form part of a little series of the "Lives of Holy Men," begun by Mr. Arnold.]

PRESIDENT McKINLEY. The Story of his Life. By D. WILLIAMSON. Stockwell. 1s. n.

[A short popular life, especially from the religious side.]

MARY RICH, COUNTESS OF WARWICK (1625-1678). By MARY E. PALGRAVE. (Saintly Lives.) 8×5½, 323 pp. Dent. 4s. 6d. n.

[Lady Warwick lived at Leighs Priory, Essex.]

THE LIFE OF PASTEUR. Two Vols. By RENÉ VALLERY-RADOT. Trans. from the French by Mrs. R. L. Devonshire. 9×6, 293+336. Constable. 32s.

ASOKA. Rulers of India. By V. A. SMITH, M.R.A.S. 7¾×5, 204 pp. Clarendon Press. 3s. 6d.

[The 4th supplementary volume in this complete series, dealing with the life of the great Buddhist Emperor, 272-232 B.C.]

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

ON WINDING WATERS. By W. M. KIRAYDON. 7½×5, 330 pp. Partridge. 2s. 6d.

[Mishaps and adventures of a party of students canoeing on a North American creek.]

ICE-BOUND, or The Anticosti Castaways. By E. ROPER. 7½×5, 330 pp. Partridge. 2s. 6d.

[Boys' adventures in North Canada. Illustrated.]

GOD SAVE KING ALFRED. By the REV. E. GILLIAT. 7½×5, 422 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

[A story with Alfred for hero. Illustrated.]

BOYS OF OUR EMPIRE. Vol. I. 12×8½, 944 pp. Melrose. 7s. 6d.

SUNDAY READING FOR THE YOUNG, 1902. 10×7¾, 412 pp. Wells Gardner. 3s.

[A copiously illustrated Annual.]

THE CAPTAIN'S FAGS. A School Story. By W. E. CULE. 7¼×4¾, 176 pp. Sunday School Union. 1s. 6d. Illustrated.

THE STORY OF CATHERINE OF SIENA. By FLORENCE WITTS. 7¼×4¾, 123 pp. Sunday School Union. 1s.

GEORDIE'S VICTORY. By MARGARET E. HAYC[illegible] Sunday School Union. 9d. Illustrated.

[A boy's battle with bad temper.]

MARLEY'S BOY. By JEANNIE CHAPPELL. 7×4[illegible] School Union. 9d. Illustrated.

[A moral story about a bad shilling which pas[illegible] hands.]

FANCY FAR LAND. A Collection of Stories for [illegible] MYRA HAMILTON. 9¼×7½, 229 pp. Chapman and [illegible]

[A large-sized volume, containing fanciful st[illegible] magazines—the Quiver, the Sketch, &c. A charm[illegible] illustrations, for children of from ten to fourteen [illegible]

ÆSOP'S FABLES IN VERSE. By ELIZABETH EY[illegible] Stock.

[The author's theory is that children will [illegible] better in verse. Only a few of the best-known are [illegible] illustrations.]

FOUR LITTLE FOLK AND SOME OF THEIR DO[illegible] 7¼×5, 111 pp. Stock.

[A tale of children's domestic life.]

EDUCATIONAL.

HORACE SATIRES. Book I. Ed. by J. GOW. [illegible] 6¾×4½, 120 pp. Cambridge University Press. 2[illegible]

XENOPHON MEMORABILIA, Book II. Ed. by G. [illegible] Press Series). 6¾×4½, 98 pp. Cambridge Univer[illegible]

LESSONS IN ELEMENTARY GRAMMAR. By G. [illegible] 135 pp. The Macmillan Co. 2s. 6d.

[Founded on schoolwork in America.]

ALL FRENCH VERBS IN TWELVE HOURS. By A[illegible] 43 pp. Blackwood. 1s.

FRENCH TEST PAPERS. Ed. by ÉMILE H. LE[illegible] 126 pp. Blackwood. 2s.

THE MIDDLE TEMPLE READER. By E. E. SPE[illegible] H. MARSHALL. 1s. 6d. n.

[This comes between "The Junior Temple," [illegible] Readers—"for middle forms and standards." [illegible] English reading books in literature are all well do[illegible]

PASSAGES FOR PARAPHRASING. By J. F. M[illegible] Black. 9d.

[The passages are from poets—mostly E[illegible] eighteenth century—about 20 lines long and [illegible] certificate and University Locals.]

FICTION.

THE BETTALEY JEWELS. By E. M. C. BALFOU[illegible] 303 pp. Arnold. 6s.

[The tale of a remote country squire's famil[illegible] in the cupboard."]

MR. ELLIOTT. By I. O. FORD. 7¾×5½, 314 pp. A[illegible]

[A story of factory life and county society.]

REVERSED ON APPEAL. By J. ROSS. 7½×5, 375 [illegible]

[Deals with the question of marriage with a de[illegible]

THE WEALTH OF MALLERSTANG. By A. GISS[illegible] Chatto and Windus. 6s.

[The north of England at the beginning of the [illegible]

THE AMBASSADOR'S ADVENTURE. By ALLE[illegible] 344 pp. Cassell. 6s.

[Continues the adventures of the Ambassa[illegible] "Secrets of the Courts of Europe" (Pearson's M[illegible] political story introducing "personages of Europ[illegible]

FLOWER AND THORN. By BEATRICE WRITHY. 7[illegible] and Blackett. 6s.

[The troubled relations of an officer and his w[illegible] together again by the African war.]

THE CAVALIER. By G. W. CABLE. 8×5½, 371 pp. [illegible]

[The American Civil War.]

ANTONIA. By JESSIE VAN ZILE BELDEN. 7¾×5½, 196 [illegible]

[A story of the Dutch West India Comp[illegible] Hudson, 1640.]

THE GREATEST OF THESE. By HELEN WALLA[illegible] Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[Scotch life, ecclesiastical and provincial, in [illegible]

A MAN OF DEVON. By J. SINJOHN. 7½×5, 306 p[illegible]

[Four short stories, in Devon, America, and [illegible]

A FOOL'S YEAR. By E. H. COOPER. 7¾×5½, 320 p[illegible]

[Aristocratic and racing life.]

THE EMBARRASSING ORPHAN. By W. E. NOR[illegible] Methuen. 6s.

[In England and on an island in the Medit[illegible]

RED ROSE AND WHITE. By A. ARMITAGE. 7½×5, 334 pp. Macqueen. 5s.

["The experience of Ralph Mortimer, son of a knightly house, during the stirring times of Richard III. of England." Illustrated.]

THE LOVELY MRS. PEMBERTON. By FLORENCE WARDEN. 7¾×5¼, 300 pp. J. Long. 6s.

[A mildish and ordinary story of an impeccable husband, a beautiful wife, a wicked earl, and a meddlesome aunt.]

IN THE BLOOD. By W. S. WALKER. ("Coo-ee.") 7¾×5¼, 340 pp. J. Long. 6s.

[An Australian story of the bush, larrikins, "diggings out back," &c.]

GILLETTE'S MARRIAGE. By MAMIE HOWLES. 7¾×5¼, 321 pp. Heinemann. 6s.

[The prolonged disloyalty of a husband who marries for money.]

THE JOY OF LIFE. By ÉMILE ZOLA. Trans. by E. Vizetelly. 7½×5, 318 pp. Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d.

[The title is sarcastic. It is a pessimistic novel of life in Normandy.]

MY ISLAND. By EILIAN HUGHES. 7×4¾, 208 pp. Dent. 2s. 6d.

[Begins with a study of the scenery and memories of Anglesey and continues with stories of Welsh village life. Three illustrations by Lady Stanley.]

IN SPITE OF ALL. By EDNA LYALL. 7¾×5¼, 388 pp. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.

[A romance of the Great Rebellion.]

THE REAL CHRISTIAN. By LUCAS CLEEVE. 7¾×5¼, 334 pp. J. Long. 6s.

[A modern story of a man who is converted to Rome, and fails to find there "real Christianity."]

WILLOWDENE WILL. By H. SUTCLIFFE. 8×5¼, 339 pp. Pearson. 6s.

[The adventures of a highwayman in Cumberland, 18th cent.]

DROSS. By H. TREMAYNE. 8×5¼, 222 pp. Treherne. 6s.

[The marriage of a clergyman with an adventuress and its tragic result.]

THE LOVER'S PROGRESS. Told by Himself. 7¾×5, 438 pp. Chatto and Windus. 6s.

[Three love experiences, in Paris and Spain.]

THE OLD KNOWLEDGE. By STEPHEN GWYNN. 7¾×5¼, 302 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

[A story of Donegal at the present day and of an English girl who stays there. The central figure is a visionary peasant, who interprets "the old knowledge" or old folk beliefs of the people.]

LADY CHRIST. A Modern Mystery. By D. MACGREGOR. 7¾×5¼, 380 pp. Stockwell. 6s.

[The story of a quasi-divine maiden supposed to live in a Highland village in the early part of Queen Victoria's reign.]

THE WAYS OF THE WORLD. By ESCA GRAY. 7¾×5¼. 290 pp. (Popular Stories, No. VIII.) Stockwell. 3s. 6d.

[Another volume, dealing with county society, in this new series, which is presenting tales of an attractive and interesting kind, written from the Nonconformist point of view.]

LOVE'S CROSSWAYS. By MRS. A. M. DIEHL. 7½×5. Digby Long. 6s.

[A love story of girls' college life.]

THROUGH THE TURF SMOKE. Love, lore, and laughter of Old Ireland. By SEUMAS MACMANUS ("Mac"). 6¼×4¼, 174 pp. Unwin. 1s.

[Short stories—"The Bewitched Fiddle," "The Boyne Water," &c., by a native of Donegal.]

HISTORY.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY. Vol. I. Pre-History America and the Pacific Ocean. Ed. by DR. HELMOLT. 11×7½, 628 pp. Heinemann. 15s. n.

[This elaborate work is to be completed in six volumes. It is an English adaptation of Dr. Helmholt's work. There is a long introduction by Mr. James Bryce. This volume deals with the first principles of a universal history: man as a life phenomenon: prehistoric times; the complete history of America: and the importance of the Pacific Ocean. Illustrated.]

CHRONICLES OF THE HOUSE OF BORGIA. By FREDERICK BARON CORVO. 10¼×6½, 375 pp. Grant Richards. 21s. n.

[This is a very elaborate study drawn from original sources, with portrait illustrations from coins, &c.]

LA MORT DE LA REINE (Les Suites de "l'affaire du Collier.") By M. FRANTZ FUNCK-BRENTANO, d'après de nouveaux documents recueillis en partie par A. BIGOT. 7¼×4¾, 262 pp. Paris: Hachette. Fr.3.50.

THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA, 1861-1865. By J. C. SCHWAB. (Yale Bi-centennial Publications.) 9×6, 332 pp. London: Arnold. New York: Scribner. 10s. 6d. n.

ENGLISH LAW AND THE RENAISSANCE. By F. W. MAITLAND. (The Rede Lecture for 1901.) 7¾×5, 98 pp. Cambridge University Press.

THE GREAT EPIC OF INDIA. By E. W. HOPKINS. (Yale B Publications). 9×6, 485 pp. London: Arnold. New Yor 17s. n.

ESSAI SUR TAINE: SON ŒUVRE ET SON INFLUENCE. GIRAUD. 7½×4¾, 311 pp. Paris: Hachette. Fr.3.50.

CHAMBERS'S TWENTIETH CENTURY DICTIONARY. T. DAVIDSON. 8½×5¾. 1,207 pp. Chambers. 2s. 6d.

[A clearly printed, full Dictionary by an experienced le with occasional small illustrations. Derivation and ap foreign phrases, common abbreviations, &c.]

MILITARY.

THE WAR OF THE CIVILIZATIONS. By G. LYNCH. 6½ Longmans. 6s. n.

["The record of a 'Foreign Devil's' experienc Allies in China." Photographs.]

WITH PAGET'S HORSE TO THE FRONT. By COMMO (Trooper). 8×5¼, 180 pp. Macqueen.

[Told by a barrister Volunteer.]

NATURAL HISTORY.

PHOTOGRAPHY FOR NATURALISTS. By D. ENGLISH. 9½ Iliffe. 5s. n.

[Naturalists have comparatively recently discovered photography, and much work of a popular kind has recentl in this direction by the Kearton and others. It was sensible and practical book on the subject, such as this, photography can really help the study. Many excellent Ill

PHILOSOPHY.

A STUDENT'S HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY. By A. K. Ro 8×5½, 519 pp. Macmillan. 8s. 6d. n.

[By an American professor.]

LAST WORDS ON MATERIALISM. By PROFESSOR LUDWI Translated by J. McCabe. 7¾×5¼, 299 pp. Watts. 6s.

[A selection from the essays, published at differe various scientific and religious subjects, of the late profe of "Force and Matter"), who was described as a mat called himself a monist. With a Life of him by his brothe Büchner.]

STUDIES ON HEGELIAN COSMOLOGY. By J. MCTA MCTAGGART. 9×5¾, 292 pp. Cambridge University Pres

[Two chapters appeared in the International Journal o author is Fellow and Lecturer of Trinity College, Cambrid

POETRY.

COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF ROBERT BUCHAN 7¾×5¼, 534+432 pp. Chatto and Windus. 12s.

[Well printed and bound, with two portraits.]

POEMS. By A. MUNBY. 8¾×7, 108 pp. Kegan Paul. 5s.

PRO PATRIA ET REGINA. Collected and edited by PROFES 7×4½, 163 pp. MACLEHOSE. 3s. 6d.

[An anthology from eighteenth-century poets, American. Issued in aid of Queen Alexandra's Fund for Sailors.]

TO THE WOMEN OF ENGLAND, AND OTHER POE BARLOW. 9¼×6, 223 pp. Glaisher. 5s. n.

FOLIA DISPERSA. By C. M. MASTERMAN. 7¾×5¼, 53 pp.

[Mostly sonnets.]

POEMS. By JOHN FARMER. 7½×5, 247 pp. Stock. 3s. 6d.

[Sacred and miscellaneous poems, and poems in the dialect. The author is an octogenarian Devonian.]

POLITICAL.

IRELAND AND THE EMPIRE. A Review, 1800-1900. RUSSELL, M.P. 7¾×5, 284 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

[An historical review from 1800 for busy people who about Ireland. The last chapter is on "How the U maintained."]

BURMA UNDER BRITISH RULE—AND BEFORE. Two NISBET. 9×5¾, 460+452 pp. Constable. 32s. n.

[Describes the material progress of Burma since it British rule in 1886. The author has been twenty-five year

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

SIX SAINTS OF THE COVENANT—Peden, Semple, Welwoo Cargill, Smith. By PATRICK WALKER. Ed. by D. H 2 vols. 9×6, 365+264 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 25s.

[A reprint of these lives by Patrick Walker (1666-1745? as contemporary historical documents, and also for their S. R. Crockett contributes a foreword; and the editor su trative documents. Introduction, notes, and a glossary friend, and added to in 1895. This edition is uniform with the same publisher's "Horæ Subsecivæ," recently issued—a neat little red book, with flexible cloth cover, and contains an Introductory note by Professor A. Crum Brown on his brother's life.]

HIGHLAND SUPERSTITIONS. By REV. ALEXANDER MACGREGOR. New Ed. 8¼×5¾, 64 pp. Stirling: Mackay. 2s. n.

[This brief and popular study was first published in 1891, after appearing in the Celtic Magazine.]

THE LIFE OF FLORA MACDONALD. By the REV. A. MACGREGOR. 7¼×5, 152 pp. Stirling: Mackay. 2s. 6d. n.

[This 4th ed. contains a life of the author and an appendix giving descendants of Flora Macdonald, by Mr. Alex. Mackenzie. The Life was the first authentic record, and gave reminiscences given to the author by Flora's daughter.]

NOVELS OF HIS NONAGE. No. 4. CASHEL BYRON'S PROFESSION. By BERNARD SHAW. Newly Revised. 7¾×5¼, 349 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

[This very clever novel, with a pugilist for hero, deserved a reprint. Mr. Shaw writes a preface.]

THE EPISTLES OF ERASMUS. English Translation. By FRANCIS MORGAN NICHOLS. 9¼× , 486 pp. Longmans. 18s. n.

[This book includes the letters written when Erasmus was still at the head of the religious and literary movements of the time, and does not go beyond 1517, when the Lutheran storm broke over Europe. One chief object of the editor is to give the right chronological order of the letters. There is a full bibliographical introduction, a chronological register, and notes and explanations appended to the letters.]

THE STORY OF SOME ENGLISH SHIRES. By the late DR. CREIGHTON. 9×6, 382 pp. R.T.S. 6s. n.

[This important book, until now out of print, appears as published in 1897, with the addition of a chapter on the County of Cambridge.]

THE CHRISTIAN'S GREAT INTEREST. By W. GUTHRIE. (Books for the Heart.) 7×4¼, 251 pp. Melrose. 2s. 6d.

[A neatly got-up edition, with an interesting biographical introduction of this great popular work of Guthrie (1620-1665), a leader of early Scotch Presbyterianism.]

THE ZINCALI, or, An Account of the Gypsies of Spain, with an Original Collection of their Songs and Poetry, and a copious Dictionary of their Language. By GEORGE BORROW. 6×3¾, 493 pp. Lane. 2s. n.

[A well-got-up edition on fine paper, with Borrow's prefaces to the first two editions.]

THE RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM. Trans. by E. FITZ GERALD. 4¼×3, 58 pp. Brimley Johnson. 2s. n.

[A minute pocket edition, bound in white vellum. With FitzGerald's preface.]

A DREAM OF FAIR WOMEN. ALFRED TENNYSON. FLOWERS OF PARNASSUS, VI. 5¾×4¾, 45 pp. Lane. 1s. n.

[Illustrated in line by Percy Bullock.]

LOVE POEMS OF E. B. BROWNING. (The Lovers' Library.) 5¼×3, 133 pp. 1s. 6d. n.

[Including the Sonnets from the Portuguese.]

THE ARABIAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS. Trans. by E. W. LANE. Illus. by S. Wood. 6 vols. 7¼×5. Dent.

[Modified version of Lane's translation, published 1839-41, and the first complete translation from Arabic into English. Includes also the ten Tales, not in Lane but introduced by Galland in his French translation (1705). Preface on the literary history of the stories. Photogravures.]

LAMB'S TALES FROM SHAKESPEARE. Ed., with Intro., by F. G. FURNIVALL. Illus. by H. Copping. 2 vols. 9¾×6¾, 347+309 pp. Raphael Tuck. 31s. 6d.

[A sumptuous reprint of the original Tales, with new Tales founded on the plays (other than the Histories) not dealt with by the Lambs. Dr. Furnivall also writes a general introduction and an introduction to each Tale. The volumes, bound in white and gold, are copiously and excellently illustrated in half-tone by Harold Copping.]

DESCARTES'S DISCOURSE ON METHOD. Trans. by GERTRUDE B. RAWLINGS. 227 pp. ON LIBERTY. By JOHN S. MILL. Ed. by W. L. COURTNEY. (The Scott Library.) 219 pp., 7×4¾. W. Scott. 1s. 6d.

[Two more volumes of this very extensive and well-printed series. In each case the editor, or translator, contributes a preface.]

SOCIOLOGY.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND HOUSING. By J. F. J. Sy[illegible] 216 pp. P. S. King. 5s. n.

[The Milroy Lectures delivered before the [illegible] Physicians, 1901.]

THEOLOGY.

THE ENDEAVOUR GREETING. Information and So[illegible] Members. By A. R. WELLS. 6¾×3¼, 59 pp. Melr[illegible]

[A little book giving information and suggestion[illegible] of the British National Council of Christian Endeav[illegible]

A CALL TO ARMS. By H. G. GROSER. 6¼×4, 31 pp.

[A short paper-bound appeal "to young men and [illegible] on the religious warfare.]

FRIENDLY COUNSELS. By REV. F. B. MEYER. 6[illegible] Marshall. 1s. n.

[A little book containing papers from a monthl[illegible] advice on practical and domestic subjects.]

THE TRINITY. By R. F. HORTON, D.D. 302 p[illegible] ASCENT. By the REV. F. B. MEYER. (Present Day [illegible] 8¼×5¼, 334 pp. H. Marshall. 3s. 6d. each.

[This series provides volumes of sermons by [illegible] Dean Lefroy, the Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, and other [illegible] tributed vols. Mr. Meyer's book is a selection of [illegible]

TEXTS AND STUDIES. Contributions to Bibli[illegible] Literature. Vol. VII., No. 1. "The Meaning of [illegible] 'Constantinopolitan' Creed." By J. F. BETHUNE-[illegible] No. 2. "S. Ephraim's Quotations from the Gospel." [illegible] 8¾×5¾. Cambridge University Press. 3s. n. each.

THY HEART'S DESIRE. A Book of Family Prayer [illegible] LOVETT. 8¼×5¾, 280 pp. R.T.S. 6s.

[Provides a single prayer (without versicles [illegible] with a Scripture reading for each morning and [illegible] quarter of a year. Strongly bound, and printe[illegible] headings.]

THE MINISTRY OF GRACE. By J. WORDSWORTH, [illegible] 9×6, 486 pp. Longmans. 12s. 6d. n.

[A learned work on the origin and history [illegible] orders, Church festivals, asceticism and celibac[illegible] mainly founded on Diocesan addresses. Extremely [illegible] index.]

ERASMUS: A SERMON ON THE CHILD JES[illegible] LUPTON, D.D. 7¼×5, 42 pp. Bell. 2s. 6d.

[This is reprinted from the apparently unique co[illegible] undated translation of Erasmus' "Concio," whic[illegible] of the late Mr. G. W. Napier, of Merchistoun, Che[illegible] by Robert Redman, who died 1540. The use by t[illegible] word "Sir" seems (argues Dr. Lupton) to show t[illegible] was written for a formal opening of St. Paul [illegible] Paulines and bibliographers should note this little [illegible]

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. (Oxford Comme[illegible] RACKHAM. 9×6, cxv.+521 pp. Methuen. 12s. 6[illegible]

[The notes take the form of a continuous [illegible] read straight on. There are six chapters and introd[illegible]

THE LIFE AND WORK OF THE REDEEMER. By [illegible] H. D. M. SPENCE and others. 8¼×5¼, 340 pp. Ca[illegible]

[Studies by the Archbishop of Armagh, the Bis[illegible] Ripon, Principal Fairbairn, Dr. Lyman Abbott and [illegible] from well-known pictures, with views.]

THE MAN CHRIST JESUS. By W. J. DAWSON. 9¼× [illegible] Richards. 10s. 6d.

[The human life, avoiding theology and met[illegible] took final outline during a visit of the author t[illegible] Illustrated from the Old Masters.]

LESSONS FROM THE PARABLES. By MRS. W. J. T[illegible] Stock. 5s.

[For home and school use. Commended in [illegible] Dean Hole.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVE[illegible]

BY THE WATERS OF SICILY. By NORMA LORIM[illegible] Hutchinson. 10s. 6d. n.

[Personal notes and stories of travel in Sicily [illegible] of letters to a girl friend. Photographs.]

THE SHERBRO AND ITS HINTERLAND. By [illegible]

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 211. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 407, 408, 409

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS. XXVI. Mr. Harry V. Esmond. Appreciation by H. H. Fyfe 409

WOMEN'S JOURNALISM.—A "Personal View," by Mrs. E. T. Cook 411

ANOTHER BOSWELL 413

ACROSS THE BORDER (Glasgow) 414

THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 415

CURRENT LITERATURE—

Links with the Past 417

Roads to Rome—MS. Salisbury Processions and Ceremonies—The Hearts of Men—The Earliest Gospel—The Apostles' Creed—The Coronation Service—Christian Mysticism—The Apostolic Constitutions—St. Augustine's City of God—The Blessing of the Waters—The Church of Cyprus—The Acrostic Poems of the Old Testament 417, 418, 419, 420

Major-General Sir Robert Murdoch Smith. Lord Roberts—Lord Milner—The Marquess of Salisbury—President McKinley—The War of the Civilizations—The Tribulations of a Princess, &c. 420, 421, 422

Deep Sea Plunderings—The Glowworm—The Laird's Luck—The Alien—The Secret Orchard—Don or Devil?—The Crime of the Crystal—Youth Goes a-Marketing 422

CANON CARTER OF CLEWER 423

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—I. 423

ART NOTES 424

LIBRARY NOTES 424

CORRESPONDENCE—The Casket Letters.—Was Amy Robsart Killed? (Dr. James Gairdner, C.B.)—Hawthorne and "The Blithedale Romance" 425, 426

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for 426, 427, 428

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 428, 429, 430

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of next week's Literature Portrait will be

MR. SIDNEY LEE.

The accompanying article on Mr. Lee's literary work will be written by Dr. Richard Garnett, C.B.

* * * *

We shall also publish next week an article by Our Paris Correspondent on the chief recent publications and other literary matters in France.

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"Letters of John Richard Green." Edited by Leslie Stephen. (Macmillan.)

"Wanderings on Three Continents." By Sir Richard Burton. Edited by W. H. Wilkins. (Hutchinson.)

"The Prophet of Berkeley Square." By R. S. Hichens. (Methuen.)

history of Mary Queen of Scots; and he is now enga novel to be called "The Queen's Quair."

* * * *

M. and Mme. Psichari, the son-in-law and of Renan, are preparing for the Press a volume of writer's letters to his mother, written when Renan had
In his youth, between the Church and a life of scienc explains his scruples to his mother with infinite and the comparison of these letters with those to Her be curious and instructive.

* * * *

A record price was obtained on Wednesday at Rooms, when a beautiful folio Watteau passed for £ Hodgkins, the underbidder being a Parisian age volumes are uniformly bound in old French red m bear the arms of Louis Joachim Potier, Duc de Ges 1704), with the fleur de lis stamped in the four cor Impressions of the plates are fine throughout, bu slightly soiled. It is a curious fact that the numb varies with each known copy of this rare work. In t number is well above the average. At the same sa Arabian Nights (16 vols. printed for private subscrib the Kamashastra Society) fetched £33 10s., and a com the Tudor Translations, 30 vols., £50. The sale ceeding and we hope to give further particulars next

* * * *

Those who have been accustomed to read the "Crockford's Clerical Directory"—and it is gen reading—will no doubt recollect several acid parag degrees conferred by certain American Universi pleasant to be able to state that the University of Id rate, does not regard its degrees as matter for traffic.
firm of solicitors, who recently wrote to the presid society offering to purchase an LL.D. degree for a y who was thinking of entering Parliament, received th very caustic answer:—"The principal whom you re disgraced his nationality, the Bar, and himself.
when he attempts to enter Parliament he will learn t ambitions, unless carefully limited, are unrealizable."

* * * *

It will be remembered that a shiplead of sch collected by the headmaster of Dover College, and conducted by Dr. Lunn, lately made a holiday tour Isles of Greece. Mr. Gwen Seaman wrote a poem on t with the delightful couplet:—

'Twill be among their purest joys
To work it off upon the boys.

MUSINGS ON A SHELL.

Upon a mountain's height, far from the sea,
I found a shell,
And to my curious ear this lonely thing
Ever a song of ocean seemed to sing—
Ever a tale of ocean seemed to tell.

How came this shell upon the mountain height?
Ah, who can say
Whether there dropped by some too careless hand—
Whether there cast when oceans swept the land,
Ere the Eternal had ordained the day?

Strange, was it not? far from its native sea,
One song it sang—
Sang of the mighty mysteries of the tide,
Sang of the awful vast, profound and wide—
Softly with echoes of the ocean rang.

And as the shell upon the mountain's height
Sings of the sea,
So do I ever, leagues and leagues away,
So do I ever, wandering where I may,
Sing, O my home; sing, O my home, of thee.

ROBERT M. SILLARD.

The King has given to Eton College a prize for proficiency in French and German.

Among the literary birthdays of next week are those of Ian Maclaren (November 3, 1850), Sir Rennell Rodd (November 9, 1858), "John Oliver Hobbes" (November 3, 1867), Eden Phillpotts (November 4, 1862), Jonas Lie (November 6, 1833).

Canon T. Thellusson Carter died at Clewer on Monday last. We publish an obituary notice in another column.

Mrs. C. Bagot, whose "Links with the Past" we review on another page, is the mother of Mr. Richard Bagot, the novelist, author of "Casting of Nets," and "The Just and the Unjust."

Some Dickens letters have been presented to the manuscript department of the British Museum, subject to the conditions that they shall not be shown to the public for another twenty years.

Mr. Hall Caine has been elected a member of the Manx House of Keys.

"Miranda of the Balcony," Mr. A. E. W. Mason's popular novel, has been dramatized and produced in America with considerable success.

Miss Dorothea Beale, Principal of the Cheltenham Ladies' College, was presented on Monday with the freedom of the borough of Cheltenham in recognition of her services in connexion with the education of the women of England.

The Bull at Rochester, famous as the resting-place of Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Snodgrass, is about to be sold by auction.

The Bishop of Ripon will lecture on Burke at Glasgow next Wednesday. On Tuesday Mr. Henry S. Salt will lecture at Essex-hall, on behalf of the Humanitarian League, on Shelley as one of the pioneers of humanitarianism.

Dr. Conan Doyle is to be the guest of the Walter Scott Club at its annual dinner on Decem

Mr. Ernest Seton Thompson, the well-kn natural history subjects, has changed his n Thompson Seton. He maintains that Thompson w adopted by his family during the troublous times

At the recent counting of volumes in the British Museum, the estimate reached the en over two million volumes.

On Thursday a statue of Daniel Owen—the once a Stickit Minister, was unveiled at Mold

The cross on the Communion Table at Woburn-square, to which was attached the jewe Osmanieh, presented to Christina Rossetti for he wounded in the Crimean War, has been stolen.

Mr. Reginald Carter, Fellow and Tutor of Oxford, has been appointed to the rectorshi Academy, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Haw

Dr. Sophie Bryant opened the Irish Lit Session with an address at the rooms of the Soc Saturday evening, her subject being the Celtic

Leo Tolstoy, the novelist's son, has had but l his five act tragedy Nights of Madness at St. Pe

In a note in this column on October 19 action with reference to the Index, the "De Re one of the works on which the restriction is should have been spoken of as the work of Cope

A monument will be erected in his native la of Elias Lönnrot (1802-1884), the Finnish folk-l and author of a well-known version of the "Ka the great Finnish Dictionary.

A Russian version of The Tempest has St. Petersburg, at Mme. Yaworsky's theatre.

Señor Galdos is visiting Paris in ord with M. Coquelin aîné, with a view to the French version of his play Electra.

A monument to the German war-poet, Kor erected at Chemnitz.

A committee has been formed at Dijon fo erecting a monument to Bossuet. The subsc already amount to 45,000 francs.

We publish this week a portrait and an a work of Mr. H. V. Esmond, who, almost alone a poraries, has distinguished him and as dramatist. It sugge whether players are more likely to write good plays. The ques difficult because history and somewhat doubtful conclusions.

Plays, Players, and Playerights.

Music is not quite an exact one since it is not necessarily distinguished actors. Shakespeare was not only an actor but an actor-manager. Molière was excluded from membership of the French Academy of Letters because he was an actor. The precedents, however, are too old to be very helpful; and it may be more interesting to consider the question with reference only to contemporary conditions. What we should expect, under those conditions, would be that the actor would be far less likely than the average man to write a very bad play, but that the man who has it in him to write a very good play would not be very likely to be an actor. The writing of plays is partly an art and partly a craft; and, in so far as it is a craft, the actor, if he have the merest modicum of intelligence, cannot help knowing a great deal about it. He has at least a certain negative equipment. Certain fundamental principles have been impressed upon him by his experiences at rehearsals and on first-nights. Certain mistakes, usual in the work of amateur playwrights, are quite impossible to him. He knows that situation counts for more than fine writing, that the most brilliant effects may be lost if they are not led up to, that other effects will not carry over the footlights at all, and that it is necessary for him to please the stupid as well as the clever people among his audience. Such instinctive knowledge is an immense initial advantage, and a good many actors (though hardly so many as one would have expected) have turned it to profitable account and produced plays (mainly farces and melodramas) which may fairly be described as workmanlike. Between the workmanlike play and the great play, however, a considerable gulf is fixed. The great play requires a great man to write it—a man of intellect, imagination, and knowledge of life; and our doubt whether such plays are likely to be written by actors is really a doubt whether men of commanding intellect are likely to feel tempted to adopt the stage as a profession. Rightly or wrongly, such men have, even in modern times, a suspicion of a feeling somewhat akin to that which prejudiced the mimes and mummers in days gone by—viz., that to paint their faces, and dress themselves in outlandish garments, and affect emotions, often ridiculous, at the bidding of another, is an undignified proceeding. In spite of the precedents of Shakespeare and Molière one finds it impossible to picture such dramatic writers as Tennyson, or Bulwer Lytton, or Victor Hugo treading the stage. Nor can one help feeling that, if they had done so, they would have forfeited some of their greatness. Whence it follows that the men best qualified to practise dramatic composition as an art have, in too many cases, had an inadequate knowledge of it as a craft. It is a difficulty which must be got over somehow if great plays are to be written. To some extent it is got over by the fact that a certain number of men of brilliant ability are stage-struck in their youth, and so learn the technicalities before awakening to the discovery that acting is an occupation not wholly worthy of the man who is conscious of the faculty of creation. This, we imagine, must have been the case with Mr. Pinero and Mr. Stephen Phillips. Such cases, however, are necessarily rare; and probably the cause of the theatre would be helped if people other than actors were afforded greater opportunities of studying the craft of writing for the stage. We do not suggest a School of Dramatic Composition, or anything of that sort. But there are certain facilities which it would not be difficult for enterprising managers to afford. They all know (through the MSS. submitted to them and through other sources of information) of young writers who have the root of the matter in them, though their ignorance

Literature Portraits.—XXV

MR. HARRY V. ESMOND.

The case of Mr. Esmond suggests some curious an reflections. Ask the casual playgoer what he kn a playwright. The casual playgoer will think of seve sentimental, fanciful pieces. The verdict will b fellow, writes nice little plays." Put the same qu student of the more serious drama and his mind w Grierson's Way. Nothing pretty or sentimental h truth, hard reasoning, an almost brutal fidelity to Grierson's Way the casual playgoer has possibly heard. The afternoon performances of the Ne Theatre Society were not in his line, and the piece been played since, in this country at any rate. Y strangely vivid and powerful impression upon the who did see it, and in my own case a lasting hope was, in the right sense of the words, strong and ori Violence and eccentricity too often masquerade in originality and strength, especially in these day criticism and hasty handing-about of the bays. eager for dramatic masterpieces, so credulous when t renascence is talked about, that it must go hard wright if he cannot contrive, once in his career at al persuade some little knot of critics that he is the c Alas! we have such a number of coming men—an so long to arrive. When Grierson's Way was played market Theatre that dull winter afternoon in 1899, a of us thought we were the witnesses of an arrival. Bu we to look back upon since then? If not a retireme point attained, yet merely a marking of time; a stan far as progress in artistic achievement is concerned; p us hope so—a recula de pour mieux sauter, when shall be come full circle.

Now which is the real Esmond? The creator Ball and Jim Grierson and Captain Murray and th maimed musician, Philip Keen; the creator, too, The Divided Way; the man who sees so clearly wh women are when you get at the real creature und wrappings of convention and circumstance? Or craftsman of theatrical plays, who preaches sentime unblushing brow: would fain persuade a world o beings that a habit of mind cultivated and rooted dee out twenty years can give way in a moment, in th of an eye, at the glance of a comely young woma the common save for a rosy cheek and a fresh air and dainty roguery: would have you believe that the saving of a boy from marriage with a wanton, middle-aged barrister would untruthfully proclaim his mistress? There can be no compromise betwe of life so utterly and entirely opposed. The same serve God and Mammon. Can the same writer seek eye for Truth and also serve tables spread by Sent If not, which is the real Esmond? Who, indeed, sh

Let us see what deductions we can found u writing career from the first. Of Rest I must co uninformed; it was acted at the Avenue Theatre so remote from our present age that the books of their mention of it leave its date to the searcher's

he marries the poor soul, while two pretty nieces who have flitted in and out during his period of aberration are also provided with husbands and dowries. Bogey was full of fancies, queer fancies and engaging fancies. Mr. Esmond let his freakish imagination run awhile unchecked. The same freakishness has been noticeable in most of his later plays, but not in any other to the same extent as in this. It is this curious element in his work that has made much of it seem unsubstantial, unreal. Leigh Hunt wrote a book to point the distinction between imagination and fancy. Mr. Esmond's plays might have served Leigh Hunt for so many examples of his theory. They are fanciful rather than imaginative. His ideas are quaint rather than illuminating. They seldom flood the mind with fresh knowledge, but they set it working in out-of-the-way directions. Bogey was an entertaining fantasy and there was some pretty writing in it. But it was of too thin a substance to take hold of the public which confers success from the box-office point of view.

The Divided Way, which at a short interval followed Bogey upon the same boards, failed for another reason. It was a study in morbid psychology, unrelieved by any lighter theme. In its kind it was true enough to nature, but the kind is not one that most people would admit to be either possible or suited to stage treatment. If Bogey was not real enough, The Divided Way was far too real. An outline of the story will plainly show why it had so short a life. Lois, a woman of passionate impulse, and of the unemotional, unimaginative type to which such women nearly always belong, has been engaged to marry Gaunt Humesden, who, travelling in Africa, is reported dead. The report is credited and Lois marries his half-brother. You may ask "why?" Mr. Esmond could only make answer that such things do happen, which is undeniable, most often to women like Lois. Later on Gaunt Humesden comes back very much alive. He is a good fellow and he accepts the situation. But his presence revives the passion which he had awakened in Lois, and she makes little attempt to conceal its revival. At last she drives him to take refuge in flight, but even then he is not safe, for Lois follows him. He pleads with her to return to her husband, and even threatens to poison himself if she still refuses. At this moment the husband comes upon them, prepared to take Lois back with him, to forgive and to forget. But the idea of going back to her life without Gaunt fills her with misery and repugnance, and it is she who swallows the poison that Gaunt had produced. So the play ends with suicide and despair, in unrelieved gloom and darkness. Now seven people out of ten decline to believe in the existence of such women as Lois, just as they scout the possibility of a woman like La Femme de Claude, or of a woman like Iris. "If such women do exist," say these people, "let us hear as little of them as we can." On the other hand, those who know that Dumas fils and Mr. Pinero and Mr. Esmond have drawn characters true to life, find the stage presentation of them, with its necessary reticence and limitations, falling short of the actual. The playwright is therefore in a hard case.

Possibly we have here the explanation of which we are in search. Mr. Esmond may quite well have said to himself "There is clearly neither money nor present fame to be won by drawing from the life, the ugly with the beautiful, the monstrous as well as the normal; go to, therefore, I will offer to the public that pays just the kind of travesty upon the facts of life in which it delights." And he may have sat down upon the spot and written One Summer's Day, which filled the Comedy Theatre for months and won golden opinions, as well as golden sovereigns, from all only just to say here that he has done all this with a deft hand, with a pretty wit, with an en quiet humour. And very likely from his point right. As Mr. Alexander said in the very sen made last Saturday, it is difficult for those public with drama to disregard the demands of say "Is there not enough sorrow in the re should we have it in the theatre, where we wan after the day's toil and its sad experiences?" first order must be concerned with the lives tha the bells that are jangled, out of tune and h that have no history, the bells that chime swe opening to year's end—these provide the dr material. The pity of it is that there should theatre found among all the theatres of London few who care about a play that is something othe after the day's toil and its sad experiences. stands at present, it would be as unreasonable t for writing sugar-plum plays as it would be to merchant to sell only dry champagne. But Grierson's Way and understood what a future a man who could write so moving a drama; can that such a situation should exist.

I do not think that I need discuss the pl Way. So few people have seen it that nearly a lines would be dependent upon my rough sketch the play. That would incline them to do it les hope Mr. Esmond will publish it, for it reads al nets. The workmanship is as simple and bold original. The only defect to allege against it is calculated to depress the mind, to lower vitality. It is logical, natural, but it sends yo with a feeling of revolt against the conditions the hopeless tangle of so many lives. You do depression after reading it. Then it is the strikes you most forcibly. You say "It could n otherwise; it is Kismet," or, if you be an uph "It is the inevitable penalty of sin." But wh the tragedy played out before your eyes women, the pity and the poignancy of it are Which seems to suggest that there is somethin old belief that the theatre had its limitati subjects were not for dramatic treatment.

One lesson Grierson's Way teaches is t awakened in a woman's breast cannot be quene is a theme Mr. Esmond has developed in seve In nearly every one of them he insists that the woman can commit is to disregard what her he to marry without love. In The Wilderness, it is a little, and showed how a girl who married a m and his money learnt to love him for himself. Esmond drops a pretty broad hint that this hap was due mainly to the fact that no one had In The Sentimentalist, the play which was seen last Saturday, at the Duke of York's Theatre, inclined to press home his warning against with a vehemence that loses sense of prop indeed laugh a little himself at the lover who so far as to kill an elderly and battered duke duke's betrothed may wed, not the sentimental third adorer whom she really loves. Mr. Esmon sentimentalist, through the duke, and suggests people eat unwholesome suppers; but it is on a different level from the rest of the piece. Nor do the fanciful touches here call forth quite the same sympathy as in the other plays. The "Trinity," as the four old friends illogically insist on styling themselves, are more than a little tedious. But the stuff of the drama is good, genuine human nature, tenderly and humorously presented, and I do not think Mr. Esmond has written any prettier love-scene, although he has written many pretty ones, than that for Dick, and in the final act. Dick's slowness to see that he has only to ask and to win reminds one of another Dick—Major Dick Rudyard in One Summer's Day, who was equally long in discovering Mayslie's readiness to fall into his arms. Oddly enough, the resemblance goes further, for each Dick is looking after an adopted son, though the plots are otherwise quite distinct. The "Kiddie," who is Dick Rudyard's charge, and the small boy and girl in The Wilderness would justify a fashionable palmist in crediting Mr. Esmond with fondness for children amongst his other qualities. But they scarcely remove that wholesome prejudice which most of us indulge against children on the stage.

Mr. Esmond's experience as an actor has, of course, very much helped him to master the technical side of playwriting, as Mr. Pinero's years of acting helped him. Yet neither of these authors write what are called "actors' plays"—that is, plays depending for their effect more upon trickery and "business" than upon exposition of character and study of men and women. Mr. Esmond was well-known as an actor before he gained a name or even made a bid for fortune as playwright. He first attracted notice in London by his playing in The Middleman. In this piece was acting also Miss Eva Moore, who in 1891 became Mrs. Esmond, and who has played several of the leading parts in her husband's plays. Mr. Esmond was particularly good in parts so utterly different as the scapegrace young Bompas in Mr. Pinero's play The Times, Cayley Drummle in The Second Mrs. Tanqueray, the depressed little man (whose name I forget) in The Princess and the Butterfly, and Eddie Remon in The Masqueraders. When Mr. Esmond the actor had parts in Mr. Pinero's plays the experience must have been exceptionally useful to Mr. Esmond the dramatist. Mr. Pinero is a master of stage-craft. No young playwright could study in a better school. And, by the way, when one comes to think of it, Mr. Pinero has set us puzzles sometimes very much like that which we are investigating in Mr. Esmond's case. We are often in doubt as to what the real Pinero is like, what are his views and his outlook upon life, what his philosophy and his convictions. Can it be that actor-playwrights are influenced in the choice of subjects and in their treatment of themes more by the opportunities afforded for making effective drama than by settled habits of mind and bias of matured opinion? It may be. Now and again one is driven to say that it must be. And yet, as Mr. Bernard Shaw would mockingly remind us, "You never can tell."

H. H. FYFE.

Americans certainly take their literature very seriously if we may judge from a slip enclosed in a new book sent us by the Funk and Wagnalls Company. It gives instructions as to "How to open a new book"; and seems to combine the chief features of a conjuring trick, a scientific experiment, and a religious ceremonial.

In order to open a new book so that its back will not be broken, the following instructions will be of value:—The book should be held with its back on a smooth table, then the front board cover should be let down, the leaves being held in one

WOMEN'S JOURNALISM
"A Personal View."

By Mrs. E. T. COOK.

Things are always unexpected in life, and th
Women's Journals, even to the mere man, are ofte reading. Was it not the late Mr. Corney Grain who own inimitable way, that, if he ever chanced to have to spare in a waiting-room, or country house, he invari himself with the "Answers to Correspondents" i "Ladies' Journals," where, no matter how tired he he always found in such remarks as "Aspinall's En for the face," or "If your 'Cosy Corner' is not co
cosy by sitting in it," unfailing consolation and charm

Have women really—as apart from men—quite s distinct tastes in journalism? It is a wide question.
advanced and educated among them indignantly refut and that, indeed, with so much energy and vigour a suspicion of the real weakness of their cause. "M ladies do protest too much." Is it not doubtful, t even superior feminine souls could, or would, be proof against an article headed "What Women are W Spring"? Is it, according to generally received even desirable that they should? But that is anothe

The superior few among women are right as wel
What may be perfectly true so far as they are conc be equally untrue as regards the vast majority Unfortunately, it is the large mass of these "others" really answer the question. It is the actual facts tha prove the truth; it is the demand that causes the sup
the large number of so-called women's publications instance, as The Domesticated Woman, Home Wrinkl Footsteps, Society Chatter, with a hundred other every bookstall haunter will be able to reel off a surely testify sufficiently to the average woman's ta such tastes really culpable? I would not, myself, c discriminate in this matter, for I have many charmin at all unintelligent women friends who love such purel papers. They cannot resist the attractions of Home C become kleptomaniacs on the spot as regards Societ
The Domesticated Woman is ever at their elbow, th politics in the severer abstract, but they turn at once, by instinct, to the magic "Daily Magazine" of the paper. Are they stupid therefore? Certainly not.
people, on the contrary, are often remarkably qui practical, and talented. If it seems of vital importan to know where Lady A—— buys her toupées, what the of B—— thinks of the kindergarten system, or how Mrs. C—— dresses her twins—why, it is, after all, an a comparatively harmless folly. Everybody, perhaps, tolerate such small-beer; but then people are not all a have been away from England for ten years, and only hammock; she can ruminate placidly on such ephemeral pastures without, at the end of the siesta, in the least knowing what she has been assimilating. In such cases, literature acts like a mild soporific, beneficial to the body, whatever it may be to the mind. It is difficult to gauge the public taste; some ladies may, like Mrs. Witlitterly, prefer a paper that is entirely invertebrate. In this connexion, I may say that I once happened to travel with two respectably dressed girls, of the "superior dressmaker" class, who both of them appeared to be entirely engrossed in popular weeklies. For one hour neither of the two looked up from her book, at length one of them yawned and said:—

"My story's awfully dry. How's yours?"
"Oh, such rubbish!"
"But there, it does well enough to pass the time away."

And then for another hour they read on speechlessly. Just good enough "to pass the time away"—demanding no mental effort, containing a variety of every kind of topic, and artistically seasoned with a few personalities—such appears to be the average woman's taste. And women's journals, if they would succeed, must always be written to suit the average woman. Editors must, after all, recognize facts. It is as well for the makers of women's journals frankly to recognize their limitations, and say mournfully, "As I can, not as I would." Though one would no doubt like to "raise the tone" of feminine literature, yet cash as a factor must of necessity be superior to sentiment. That is only political economy. Let not, therefore, the poor contributors to such periodicals be blamed for what they must perforce supply. Their duty is, beyond all else, to suit their public, and for every special magazine the experienced contributor will know well beforehand what style to adopt. The contributor may personally dislike the whole business of personal snobbery, she or he may, and probably do, feel utter indifference to the vagaries of the titled people they interview, or to the ambitions of the music-hall belle whose photograph they "write round"; yet the remorseless "tale of bricks" must be provided just the same.

Women's journalism has yet other dominant qualities. One of these seems to be a morbid desire to give its readers a little of everything, so that a mere penny weekly appears to aim at being an encyclopædia in little. Another is a continual straining after practical and methodical information, as if, indeed, the editor were in constant terror of being considered "undomesticated." The information is generally a trifle emotional, women being always in danger of making up by an excess of emotion for a deficiency of knowledge. A mere man will sometimes confess his entire ignorance of a subject, a woman, never. Ask a woman to write about the differential calculus, the philosophy of Kant, the rise of Buddha,

She will not fail or falter
But lend her to the task.

Most women journalists could write everything in their paper, and as for the dress-making article, there is hardly a woman alive who could not write that!

a plébiscite, started by an enterprising woman's recently unveiled them.

But the vast differences of women's and men's be easily seen by comparing the contents bill written for each. In the woman's paper, whatev absent, three factors are invariably present, viz.:

1. The Toilet and its Accessories.
2. How to make the Home Beautiful.
3. Spring Fashions.

The titles may, of course, vary, but the sub stantially the same. Possibly, there may be furt such as "Hints for Mothers," "Cookery as "Answers to (generally love-lorn) Correspondent would one think if in men's journals one can items as:—

1. Mornings with my Tailor.
2. Evenings with my Wife.
3. How to make my Office Home-like.

Yet, it should be remembered, when the co
the general scrappiness of women's journals, are the class of women for whom they are primar mainly half-educated, and are also, by reason domestic duties, too hard-worked to be able to ge than a few paragraphs at a time. Further, th distorted affection for details, though this, inde result rather than the cause of their "scra
They, like, for instance, to be told exactly w great authors wear, and how great authoresses do though they have never read any of their works, undiluted philanthropy on their part. I remem of education who told me that she had so enjo
"Life and Letters" of Carlyle. "I must real
"now try to read one of his books." That is jus
It is this unrivalled power of sympathy, I w curiosity, that makes her always so interest
"Answers to Correspondents" of ladies' magazi questions that, I strongly suspect, are often man office. Some feeling natures have been know thrilled over their imaginary fellow-creatures' and have melted almost to tears over "Forsake ment by her cruel lover, or over "Blighted sadder lot. Or if the correspondence reaches, depths that it is impossible to fathom, yet i interest thereby.

Women's private felinities, which are so muc real life, do not, strangely enough, come into their journals. Yet literary women are, as is always above that very human vice.

"Does Mrs. X——— write well?" I authoress ask of another.

"Ye-es" was the grudging answer: "but vilely."

"How old is she now?"

"Well, she was forty till quite lately, but

Of the quaint uses to which the Queen's English is often put in women's papers, and which some journals seem to encourage, I will not speak here, but will pass on to the last count in the indictment, the snobbery of which some ladies' periodicals are so often accused. Of course, they are not all of them entirely beyond suspicion; and yet, even in this, it seems to me that men are at least equal offenders. For to how many dignified and severe publications, not women's papers at all, does not the possession of a title prove an "Open Sesame"? Even the sacred arcana of party politics is in their case a trifle less sacred to the "noble born." The snobbery of women's journals is, perhaps, a degree pettier and more personal; but that is all.

And is women's journalism only read by women? There was a feuilleton that ran lately its gay course through a daily paper, a story where, if I remember rightly, a golden-haired lady hid her murdered husband in an innocent haystack, and was thereupon promptly collared by justice. I was not surprised that the story—which, by the way, excited the outspoken and somewhat envious gibes of all the feminine Writers' Clubs—was eagerly read by all the domestic and shopkeeping class; but what really astonished me was to find several learned men, scientists and professors, and the like, quite conversant with the mysteries of the haystack, and intimate with the vagaries of the plot.

Yes, women's journalism may have its faults, yet, after all is said, must we not fall back on Mrs. Poyser's well-worn remark "I'm not denying the women are foolish; God Almighty made them to match the men"?

ANOTHER BOSWELL.

The good taste and thorough workmanship which are apt to characterize Mr. Dent's reprints have never showed to greater advantage than in his perfectly admirable new three-volume LIFE OF SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL.D., by James Boswell, edited by Arnold Glover, with an Introduction by Austin Dobson (Dent, £1 2s. 6d. n.). In all externals it seems to us an almost ideal edition. The page is excellently proportioned, the press-work (by Messrs. Turnbull and Spears) is unimpeachable, and the publisher has chosen a very light though substantial paper, which gives the volume an easy feeling in the hand. But, beyond this, the charm of the edition is enhanced by some well-produced portraits, and by a series of dainty and delicate illustrations by Mr. Herbert Railton, portraying a great variety of Dr. Johnson's haunts, restored by the artist's imagination to the condition of his time. These illustrations are indeed delightful, and may be said to constitute the unique attraction of the edition.

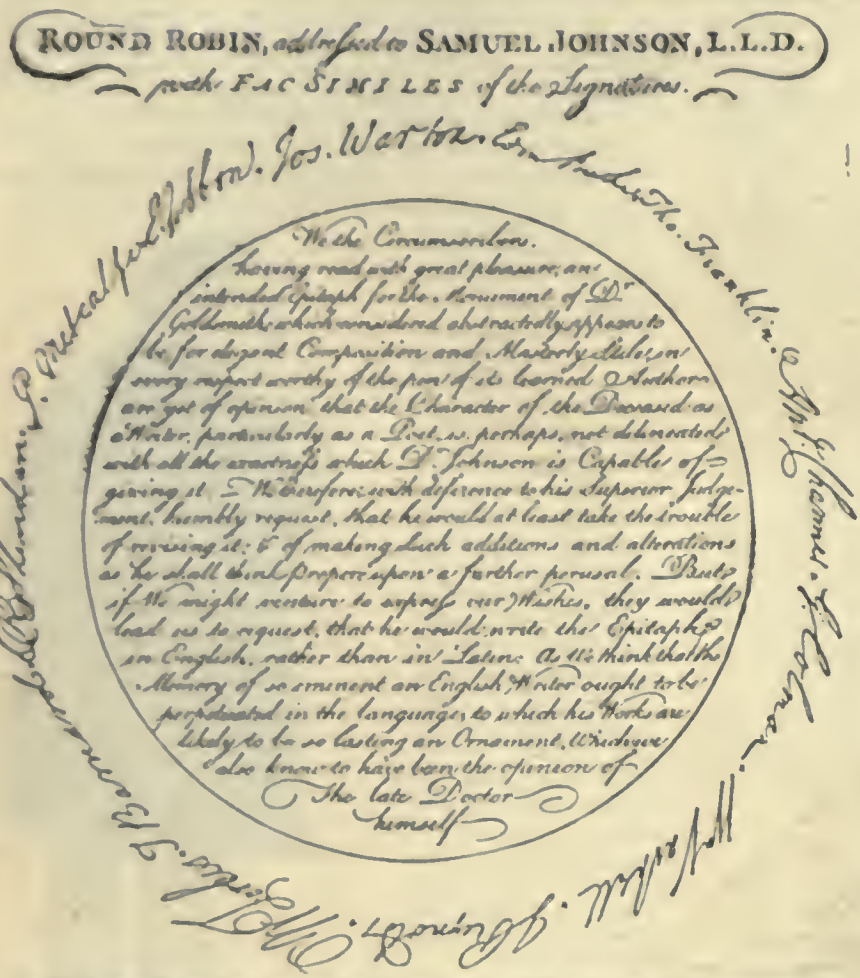
Mr. Railton's work is too well known to invite criticism at this time of day. It has certain patent faults of an over-elaborate and rather finical technique; but we notice gladly in a good many of these drawings a return to a more direct and simple method. For purposes like the present his work possesses individual qualities which quite outweigh its defects. We know of no artist who so happily combines fidelity to architectural detail with an atmosphere of sentiment; and the picture of Chesterfield-house, which we reproduce on page 416, is an admirable example of the combination. It is full of detail, and is yet pictorially charming and "suggestive." There are a hundred of these illustrations.

But the excellences of this reprint are not confine[illegible] of manufacture. The editorial work, without bei[illegible] or over-weighty, is thoroughly sound and comp[illegible] Arnold Glover's careful notes are already familiar t[illegible] the "Temple Classics," and Mr. Dent has been furth[illegible] in securing for the present edition a topographical [illegible] from the pen of Mr. Austin Dobson, than whom, of [illegible] is no one living better qualified for the task. It is [illegible] that Mr. Dobson knows what happened upon every day in the eighteenth century; and, though this may be a playful exaggeration, his present introduction abundantly proves that he can follow Dr. Johnson through every month of his life, from garret to drawing-room, with an absolutely infallible acquaintance with exteriors and interiors, and with the many figures with whom their histories have been associated. The introduction is indeed packed with intimate knowledge, and packed so closely that every subordinate sentence even contributes its addition to our information. We open at random and come upon the following:—

MR. AUSTIN DOB[illegible]
[Original Drawin[illegible]

> It was probably to the same bookish neighbourhood [i.e., Little Britain] (where Dorset, years before, had bought an unsaleable work called "Paradise Lost") that he gravitated in 1737, [illegible] who bade him buy a porter's knot, was also a[illegible] Little Britain bookseller.

The simple statement that Johnson migrat[illegible] Britain is here made to support four illustrative fa[illegible] purchase of "Paradise Lost"; the depression of t[illegible] poem in the market; Wilcox's business as a booksel[illegible] same person's surly discouragement of the future le[illegible] Ex pede Herculem! The introduction is full [illegible] illuminative phrases. It displays Johnson in his [illegible] sets him over against the world in which he moved, [illegible] as it were, a moving panorama of eighteenth-cent[illegible] manners. It is stimulating to compare such thorou[illegible] and quick allusiveness with the ordinarily perfunct[illegible] which many distinguished men-of-letters are conte[illegible] duce" the classics to the general public. And [illegible] Dobson's skilled and graceful work is thoroughly [illegible]



ROUND ROBIN ASKING DR. JOHNSON TO REVISE HIS EPITAPH ON GOLDSMITH.
[By permission of Mr. Dent from his new Edition of Boswell's Johnson.]

ACROSS THE BORDER.

GLASGOW, Oct. 28, 1901.

The Literature of the Exhibition.

The Glasgow Exhibition has produced a good deal more literature than it has revealed, and there has been a fair amount of gold in the large mass of quartz which represents that production. The city has enjoyed a round of carnival and congress during the past six months; the representatives of foreign universities, the friends of Peace, sanitarians, electricians, engineers, are a few of the "types" among the strangers within our gates who have been fêted at the Exhibition, and, as a return for their entertainment, have, in the shape of papers and addresses, supplied both information and didactic which ought to tend to edification. Carnival and Congress alike culminated in the meeting of the British Association, which strengthened the kingdom of the atomic theory, gave free scope to Sir John Gorst, and even more pronounced educational revolutionaries, and was merely rent in twain over the relationship between the decay in [illegible]

tional, and scientific standp alike complete and trustworthy Glasgow," by Mr. Robert R town clerk to the city, is es of note as a concise manual o history. The Exhibition has been "celebrated" by the p number of unofficial "Guides Head and shoulders above the of these is "Glasgow in 1901, Messrs. William Hodge and C on its title-page the name of " Muir" as author. In the co 250 pages it deals lightly, brig with "Glasgow of fact" and fiction," with the pensive ach the city's past; and its energe not quite prosaic, present. Th Hamilton Muir"—represents a men. One is Mr. Muirhead B the second is his brother, and young lawyer whose modesty d not to be mentioned, but wh make some stir in literature b of the most notable features o 1901" is its literary style, whic as good as that of Stevenson at the combination of authors p style must remain a mystery f
but of the fact there is no dou
in 1901" is, indeed, the best b dealing with Scottish life and been published since Stevenson' Notes" on Edinburgh.

Barring a few manuscrip and printing-machines, there is ing, no exhibit of literature i collection. No attempt has secure and show the manuscri works of a great and represen writer like Burns or Scott and thereby to reveal the formation, developme genius. On the other hand, the collection in the "Archæology" is probably the most important been seen in Scotland. It cannot but most permanent of all kinds of literature—devoted to the elucidation of history. Sir W who recently founded a chair of "Ancient Palæography" in Edinburgh University, did that the study of Scottish history might be based tact with "original sources," and Dr. Hume B occupant of the chair, agrees with Taine: "Wit which our archives offer us, we almost become the of those with whose history we are dealing; and t
as I have sat among them tracing the ancient hand mildewed pages, I have almost been tempted t alond." A certain amount, at all events, of "mildewed page" and the "original source perienced. Not to speak of the relics of the St Ages, of the canoes which recall the Ancient Brit markable sculptured slab of freestone found n [illegible]

England and Scotland. Meanwhile, the Glasgow Exhibition, especially on its archæological side, is to be handsomely dealt with in two forthcoming volumes to be published by Messrs. James MacLehose and Sons, publishers to the University. One will deal with the fine arts and historical loan collections, the other with Scottish historical antiquities as illustrated also in the loan collections. These are the only memorial volumes to be issued under the auspices and with the special assistance of the Exhibition authorities, and they will undoubtedly be found of considerable permanent value.

Glasgow Publishing.

The mention of "Glasgow in 1901"—not the only book of its kind called forth by the exhibition—serves, by the way, to remind one how far Glasgow has advanced in the manner of printing for its publishers. Messrs. William Hodge and Co. are well to the front in this matter. Time was when the University people of Glasgow found it necessary to go to Edinburgh in order to "gett one sheet right printed." That was not long after Cromwell declared that Glasgow was "a much sweeter and more delightful place than Edinburgh," and some days before Smollett celebrated it as "the pride of Scotland—one of the prettiest towns in Europe." Things have changed since then. Glasgow is not quite so charming now; but, on the other hand, there is no longer any necessity to go to Edinburgh to "gett one sheet right printed." Glasgow can do her own printing, and do it very well too.

As we have said, we are promised still another interesting addition to the literature of Glasgow. This is Mr. William Ernest Cameron's "Frivolous Glasgow," to be published shortly by Messrs. F. W. Wilson and Co., of 57, Hope-street. The book, which deals in a humorous way with life in the "sea-born city," will be profusely illustrated by Mr. Tom Browne and other well-known artists. Messrs. Wilson were the publishers of Mr. John Davidson's early works—of his story "The North Wall"—little known at any time, and now totally forgotten—and of "Bruce: A Drama," copies of which are now scarce and selling for as much as half-a-sovereign. Mr. Davidson was engaged in educational work in Scotland in those days. When Bruce was published he held an appointment as English master at Morrison's Academy, Crieff. Messrs. Wilson, it may also be noted, were the publishers of an excellent edition of Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass," with which the poet expressed himself as greatly delighted.

While Glasgow pays such close attention to the claims of local literature, she is not altogether unmindful of the classics. Long ago Robert Foulis, of Glasgow, produced an edition of Gray's poems, a beautiful quarto of some sixty-four pages, of which Gray remarked that it "must certainly do credit both to him and to me." "Dodsley's editions," said the poet, "are far inferior to that of Glasgow." The same thing might be said to-day, comparing some of the London cheap editions of Cervantes with that now being issued by Messrs. Gowans and Gray. Three volumes of "Don Quixote" are now ready in this fine edition; and the next of the series will be the "Novales Exemplares" of Cervantes, to be issued in February and March of next year. In this case the translation is being done by Mr. Norman MacColl from the editio princeps, and it is anticipated that it will be "the most exact yet published." The same publishers, it may be remembered, announced a complete edition of the works of Charles Lamb. This unfortunately has had to be

are "not entirely interesting to the general public" house staff of literary assistants numbers several known in the book world. Dr. Annandale has connected with the firm as an expert in dietetics cyclopædic work; and Mr. George H. Ely, another the literary staff, became favourably known to th couple of years ago as the translator of M. de Clavière's "Women of the French Renaissance." Mr. Ely has been engaged on the translation of a s by the same writer, which, as announced a fortnight published shortly by Messrs. Sonnenschein. Mr formerly assistant master in the United Westminster

"Keep your eye on Paisley," said Lord Rosebery memorable occasion. The advice was, of course, com politics, not with publishing; but Paisley can produce well as it once produced its famous shawls. There known story which relates how at a certain public Paisley the only stranger present was put up to health of the local poets; when he sat down every room rose to return thanks, with the exception of o was deaf! This story may be apocryphal, but the poets in Paisley. We have already mentioned s Gardner's forthcoming works. Messrs. Appleton, we have secured the American rights and ordered a larg Mr. J. R. Aitken's "Idylls of Eneichdhu," which wil almost immediately. Another Paisley firm, Messrs Parlane, have in the press what should prove a very History of Annandale, by Agnes Marchbank, whose Covenanters of Annandale, published some years ag well. Many notable names in history and literature be dealt with in this new volume. Ben Jonson certainly of Annandale descent, and no one is likely t fiery spirit who gave fame to Eccleftechan.

THE DRAMA.

"THE LAST OF THE DANDIES."

It was Mr. Pater, if I remember rightly, who s form habits is to fail in life. Mr. Tree is evidently opinion, for he declines to run into a groove, and theatrical world, renders the invaluable service things lively—making them hum, as the Americans we owe more to the manager in him, I think, than t for the actor has the limitations of his temperame there is no limit to the manager's artistic curiosity passion for experiment. One thing is certain. Th another man in London for the moment who could hav to put the Dandy on the stage. No doubt the concep Dandy as a protagonist of drama belongs to others W. E. Henley and R. L. Stevenson, in fact; but de rentibus et non existentibus, &c., and the actual pres Beau Austin in space of three dimensions was the wo Tree. Dandy plays, then, naturally became a recognize species. There was Mr. Clyde Fitch's Beau Brummel have been a success in New York, but never perhap country. And now there is The Last of the Dandies, b author, with Mr. Tree to play Count D'Orsay. It is a ing and polychromatic affair, from the plastic point o it will hardly satisfy those who go to the theatre for sort of august symbolism to appearances. He is what he is by virtue of personal magnetism, by a splendid contempt for ordinary standards of social value, dominating the world not by birth, nor yet by rank, neither by "grace" nor by "works," but by the cut of a coat and the adjustment of a cravat. That is to say, he is an animated paradox. He attracts us by what in other men would be repellent insolence, and wins our respect for sheer fatuity because it is carried to the verge of the sublime. It must be obvious to every one who knows the theatre that it is no proper home for this kind of character. For the theatre will only concern itself with characters on their human side, and the human side of the Dandy is just the side where his dandyism ceases to have any significance. In the theatre we see the fatuity but not the sublimity; we see a fop dropping his lorgnette to love and hate, laugh and weep, like other men, and we murmur to ourselves, with Faustus over Helen, "Was this the face that launched a thousand ships?" In a word, the absolute Dandy, like the absolute Geometer or the absolute Political Economist, is irreducible to terms of drama.

That is why, I submit, out of the half-dozen scenes of Mr. Clyde Fitch's play, one only (Act I.) exhibits the Dandy absolute. We see him at his dressing-table before his mirror and watch the various stages of the process by which the work of art (the Dandy is at once artist and work of art—that is his differential) becomes a finished masterpiece. But as soon as that process is complete the Dandy ceases to be a mere object of contemplation, because he has now to do something—namely, to take part in a dramatic action; and under that necessity, his dandyism becomes a mere side-issue. Superficially, it is true, the man retains his clothes and his air—the stigmata of his function—so that one might label the succeeding scenes—The Dandy at the ball, the Dandy in the gaming hell—the Dandy up the river, and the Dandy in articulo mortis; but the continuity of the character is only superficial, and we are now in reality considering the man for what he is worth as a man. I do not mean that we are applying any austere moral standards to him—that would be to break up the game altogether, for, judged by such standards, he is merely a libertine and a cumberer of the earth—but we are look genial and generous traits of humanity in him, that there is a heart under the brocade waiste under the macassar-oiled locks. To tell the perusing various memoirs of the Dandies, I a suspect that there is no such evidence. Mr. however, has, by the necessity of drama, to m His plan is to show us the Dandy purified and the awakening of the paternal instinct. D'Orsay twenty years' complacent ignorance of the fact son, and some sort of dramatic conflict is indicate to get this son happily married, even at the cost o to himself and his friend Lady Blessington. sought in the sentimentalizing of Lady Blessingto of her furniture and in the yearning of D'Orsay fo of the son whom he dares not openly acknowledge. this discovery of the son does not lead to a really tion—as it does, for instance, in Sardou's Vieux Ga sc. 7), where the father is challenged by the unac and has to keep his secret to himself and, by refu be branded as a coward. It merely leads to "tum plate" scenes—the river scene, with the Dandy pied in white silk, and the scene at Crockfo Dandy gambles to make a dowry for his son and the bank. Finally we have the Dandy dying, lik his panache, or like Richard III. "with armour—meeting death "like a gentleman," as he s brocade waistcoat and most elegant "frock." no play, whatever curious amusement it may provi of the costumes and manners of the time. As to could not be more carefully, more artistically done the introduction of walking gentlemen and l Disraeli, Bulwer Lytton, Countess Guiccioli, being the author's, not the manager's. Nor is Mr. Tree's fault that the character of D'Orsay dramatic character; he makes what he can—and actor could—of it, figure, rich, racy, style," with a red humour. The ladi Hanbury (Lady Bles Lily Brayton (her with D'Orsay's son), (Lady Summershir mother), all look ve their Early Victoria Edmund Maurice, Warner, and Mr. are good in rather

A. B.

The naming o streets is a matter to be discussed in th and for those who h it is worth noting t of Berlin it is prop two new streets Su and Hauptmannstra tainly testifies to a ciation of purely li

CURRENT LITERATURE.

MRS. CHARLES BAGOT'S REMINISCENCES.

LINKS WITH THE PAST. By MRS. C. BAGOT. (Arnold. 16s.).

This is, as we have already intimated, a "book to read." It contains nothing of great importance, but Mrs. Bagot writes so agreeably that her recollections of the whole Victorian period have a distinct value of their own. She kept diaries in early life, but destroyed them when she married, her husband being of the prudent opinion that dissensions and unhappiness have sometimes been caused by such writings. Fortunately, her good memory has enabled her to produce an amusing book which, we should think, cannot possibly give pain to any human being. In fact, so much delicacy is shown that when we are told that the "present possessor" of an estate is "on some points quite deranged," a foot-note adds that these words were written —of course, not by Mrs. Bagot—in 1817. We have no scandal of any sort in these pages, but only the kindly record of a long and pleasant life. Mrs. Bagot's father was Vice-Admiral the Hon. Josceline Percy, and her marriage with Colonel Charles Bagot, of the Grenadier Guards, connected her with Staffordshire as well as Northumberland. As a child, she saw William IV. and Talleyrand in his company; as a lady of seventy-five, she walked out to see the illuminations at the Queen's Diamond Jubilee. These Links, however, stretch back to a time long before the writer's birth, for Mrs. Bagot's own recollections are freely supplemented by those of some of her older relations, and, in particular, by copious extracts from the journals of Colonel Bagot's aunt, Miss Mary Bagot, describing Staffordshire and its worthies of a hundred years ago.

All this varied and inconsecutive matter hardly admits of criticism; nor, indeed, should we wish to criticize anything so entertaining. We may suggest, perhaps, that Mrs. Bagot, seeing life always through Tory spectacles of the best quality, seems a little unconscious of the great events of her time, and of the prodigious social changes, to say nothing of others, that she has herself seen. But this is the severest remark that we care to make of a lady to whom we owe an eminently readable book. A few quotations will do justice to it better than any criticism. Of herself, Mrs. Bagot writes:—

> I stayed with my aunt, Lady Ashburnham, in Eaton-square, for my first and only London season, as an unmarried girl. She was one of the finest of the fine ladies in the London world of that day, together with Lady Jersey and Lady Palmerston. I remember dancing with old Lord Huntly, who made a point of dancing with every débutante because he had danced at the Tuileries with Marie Antoinette. He used to be much at the old French Court before the Revolution of 1789. I imagine that there are not very many left alive in the world who have danced with a partner of Marie Antoinette's.

After a charming sketch of a lady of the generation preceding her own, Mrs. Bagot adds:—

> As an instance of the quaint formality of the times, Mrs. Greville Howard told me that after playing all day with her cousins, Lord Bagot's daughters, in London, a maid came to fetch her back to her aunt, Lady Suffolk's house. She had to make a low curtsey to her cousins, and to say, "Ladies I had asked whether he and his men might not pull English border town down, to revenge an imaginar the Scots! I cannot recollect what year it wa name of the small town. The old border spirit dying out; indeed it has not entirely died out yet.

And here a recollection of the Great Duke:—

> I remember interesting dinners at Sir Rob but Lady Jersey's evening parties dwell in my r as by far the most agreeable of any, for they w crowded. No one better knew how to tenir salon Jersey. One dinner at Lady Westmorland's rem memory; it was an early dinner, and we were t opera after it. The Duke of Wellington came into L morland's box, and then she reminded him that I h his great niece. He took my hand and kept it thro Act. My husband said to me afterwards "Why d speak to the Duke?" I had been brought up intense admiration of him by my father and uncles struck dumb. I simply felt that I was sitting ha with the saviour of England and Europe!

Miss Mary Bagot's journals, dated 1824, are as a those of her niece, and she in turn quotes what her lately dead, had to say of > Sir Walter and Lady Barbara Bagot, who used in three days every alternate year from Blithfield t whose sons rode post to Westminster school prece servant with a horn, before the invention of stage these sons who were, as young men, sometimes re their father for being late when they assembled o'clock in the morning to hunt in Cannock Wood same period no carpet was ever spread in the "L. or the old drawing room, except on state occasions. considered as a treat, and rarely allowed to the da the house. Sir Walter Bagot represented the county years, and entered the town of Stafford for his elect head of 1,500 freeholders on horseback. He was of the Tory faction, and perhaps Lord Denbigh without some reason for the alarm he felt on heari beat (which was, in fact, only a signal for dinner) halted at Blithfield with his troops on his way to the '45.

But we might quote almost endlessly; we can onl and recommend the book, and hope that an index of be added to the second edition.

SOME RECENT THEOLOGY.

Roads to Rome.

ROADS TO ROME, being Personal Records of so more recent Converts to Roman Catholicism, with duction by Cardinal Vaughan (Longmans, 7s. 6d.), whic compiled by the author of "Ten Years in Anglican consists of sixty-five essays by various persons who ha Roman Catholics—that is to say, of nearly as many ap the Papal claim. Some are argumentative, some d some extremely personal, some are written in the l while others are in questionable taste. Among the w Lord Brampton (who is very brief), Mr. Edward Berd Brownlow, Mr. Kegan Paul, Monsignor Croke Robin cause of their secession—that and the attraction on the other side of an authority professedly infallible. They are earnest, sincere, convinced; but this book reveals the fact that the men who "go over to Rome" are men of one cast of thought. Those who long to be told exactly what they are to think and do, those who are shaken to the depths by the freedom of thought and utterance which is allowed outside the Roman fold will naturally be attracted by a Church which says, as Monsignor Robinson joyfully proclaims, "I, and I only, am the one, true religion. All others are false, and not to be accounted religions at all." But, one asks sorrowfully, will either truth or unity be brought to mankind by such a method? The obvious reply to be given to Monsignor Robinson and the other Roman converts who have given us their experiences is, "This may be very well for you, but what good can it do to the rest of Christendom?" The unity achieved seems to be, as represented in this book, so limited, so far from that which is needed to draw Easterns, Anglicans, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Romans themselves into a united Christendom that is really Catholic. The men and women who have written for this book wanted a certain thing, and they have got it; we read with interest how they came to find it, but we do not see much to make us hope that their discovery will be of great value to other Christians.

The Sarum Use.

The Rev. C. Wordsworth, who is one of our most distinguished liturgiologists, has done good service in editing from a fifteenth century MS. SALISBURY PROCESSIONS AND CEREMONIES (Cambridge University Press, 15s. n.t.), with additions from the Cathedral records and woodcuts from the "Sarum Processionale" of 1502. The "Use of Sarum" for several centuries not only maintained a considerable prestige throughout England and to some extent on the Continent, but the continued interest that it excites is shown by the fact that so many of its service books have of late years been issued for the benefit of ecclesiologists and liturgical students. Amongst others, the "Processionale" of 1508 was printed (a very limited edition) in 1882, but this is the first time that a book has been issued which belonged in any special way to the actual mother Church of Salisbury. In old times, when the Bishop of Salisbury was at the Roman Court, a special place was assigned to him in the Pope's Chapel and at all great solemnities of Rome, as he was considered the ex officio Papal Master of the Ceremonies. Even now, in the Provincial Episcopal College of Canterbury, the Bishop of Salisbury could claim to rule the choir as precentor when the Primate of All England is celebrating Divine service. The MS. here edited is preserved in the Chapter Library of Salisbury and consists of fifty parchment folios; it is in many particulars a different book from that printed by Pynson in 1502 and reprinted by Dr. Henderson in 1882. It supplies directions for certain ceremonies to be performed at the altars of the parochial or monastic churches of the city, and details as to various rites which were peculiar to the Cathedral Church of Salisbury, such as "the publication of the Relicks by which the Cathedral was at once privileged and rendered famous." The relic list of Sarum, which was once a year read out or proclaimed in the church, was certainly by far the largest in England, and was popularly supposed to be the largest in Christendom. It comprised sixteen relics of our Lord and the Virgin, sixteen of the apostles, ninety-nine of martyrs, eighty-two of confessors, and twenty-seven of virgins. This represents a large majority of the whole of the saints canonized in the Church's Calendar. Those present at the formal proclamation of these relics, able ministers. Some of the picture details are speci
For example, the one for Palm Sunday is suffici show that the rami pro clericis on the altar were the East, whilst the frondes et cetera pro laic willow buds still called "palms" in many of tricts, and worn on Palm Sunday. The use o palm, now so common throughout the Western then apparently known. In the 400 pages o edited and annotated volume there is much that is and interesting, not only for liturgiologists, bu interested in the history of the pre-Reforma England.

Religion in the East and West.

We have already briefly noted the nature of THE HEARTS OF MEN (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.
study of it leaves us at once interested and astoni
as one always is in the history of the mental de able man, candidly and sincerely recorded, a the apparently quite unconscious ignorance displays of Western life and thought. In People" he revealed an intimate knowledge
Buddhism, and he has extended his studies wide Eastern religions. The result upon a mind w religious beliefs in a simple attitude of inqui adoption of the theory that religion is a matter
—a term left undefined—and emotion. The re discouraged by the extreme naiveté with whi announces the familiar difficulties of religion as of his own, nor by the portentous announce page, as a final conclusion, that "Religion is infinite echoed from the hearts of men"; for th is suggestive, much that is true and well pu
But Mr. Fielding, however well fitted to exp a single people, is not equally well-equipped tion of the heart of the human race. It is hardl examining his reasoning to introduce the questi cal relation between moral and religious beliefs, natural religion, or the ideas of primitive ma things are touched by him either superficially or comparison made at the outset between the East of religion—he quite ignores the vast indifferentis Oriental—and the West, where religion has a less the key-note to the inadequacy of the whole.
he says, "see Englishmen praying in the st never." Would Mr. Fielding be surprised to h historical phrase—that it is impossible to take any town in England without seeing this stran you ever hear," he asks, "of the worship of Protestant Germany, in England, in Scotla
Such a worship is impossible." Western people, for their religion the stimulus of miracle f reason that so many of them are solitary, and in life. After this we are not surprised to what can only be described as a travesty of C and a caricature of the typical religious We meet with such dogmatic assertions as that Christianity is due to the extended influence without a hint that the exactly opposite stat equally likely to be true. We need not purs further through his own pages. The book can serious contribution to thought; but it has inter exposition. The introduction is unusually suggestive. Perhaps the most noteworthy point in a brief survey of the present position of the synoptic question is an account of the "general motives" which led to the formation of the Gospel tradition.

> The formation of the tradition regarding Jesus was a work of enthusiasm and devotion, carried out by men on whom he had made an overmastering impression and in whom his spirit was living and active. . . . Thus we know on the one hand that the tradition contains historical matter; and on the other that that matter was put in shape under an ideal impulse.

Incidentally, Dr. Menzies argues forcibly against the authenticity of the First Epistle of Peter, but speaking generally the tone of the entire book is constructive. The translation is open to criticism, ; it is plain and literal even to baldness; and some renderings strike us as really unfortunate (e.g., ἐνεβριμᾶτο, "rated," "Jesus rated him saying, Stop speaking and come out of him"), but the translator has aimed at accuracy and vividness, and has, on the whole, been successful. The expository notes are scholarly and to the point, and have the merit of not being over-burdened with references. The only important passage in which the writer's judgment seems to us questionable is VII., 19, where instead of the R.V., "This he said, making all meats clean," Dr. Menzies translates, "It makes all meats clean." The note scarcely makes Dr. Menzies' meaning clear—but in any case he deprecates the idea that the words in question were intended to interpret Christ's words. "To interpret a parable," he observes, "is in general to spoil it." In spite of some defects this commentary may be commended as an independent and stimulating work.

The Apostles' Creed.

Mr. T. B. Saunders has done a useful piece of work in revising and editing Professor Harnack's article on the Apostolicum in THE APOSTLES' CREED, by A. Harnack, translated from Herzog's Real Encyclopädie, ed. 3, by S. Means (A. and C. Black). Harnack's view of the symbol is probably well known to scholars. The Apostles' Creed in its present shape appears to have originated in Southern Gaul, and was current in the West at the close of the fifth century. The relationship of the symbol to earlier confessions, Eastern and Western, is here minutely discussed. Professor Harnack points out that the original Roman symbol gradually "made its way into the Western provinces, without raising any claim to have been, in the strictest sense, composed by the Apostles," and to this he attributes the fact that it underwent many different modifications in these provinces. In its present shape the Apostolicum first appears in a sermon of Cæsarius of Arles. Among other interesting points is the suggestion (p. 79) that the Gallican symbol, containing the distinctive clause communio sanctorum, owed its final form indirectly to the catechetical teaching of Cyril of Jerusalem. The work of English scholars like Usher, Heurtley, Hort, and Swainson is generously recognized. In the note on page 2 "Foulke" should be "Ffoulkes."

The Coronation Service.

For some years the Coronation service of Queen Victoria, edited by Dr. Wickham Legg, has been published by the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge. As the time of another Coronation draws near, some more editions are inevitable. THE CORONATION SERVICE ACCORDING TO THE USE OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND, with notes and introduction, by the Rev. Joseph H. Pemberton (Skeffington, 2s.), has the with great exactness, and a good many useful explan are given; but we do not think Mr. Pemberton supposing that the two golden bowls in the fourteen Illumination are intended to represent the chalice an Christian Mysticism.

Mrs. Eleanor C. Gregory's INTRODUCTION TO Mysticism (Allenson, 1s. 6d. n.) was prepared for re a Society of Ladies. We should doubt whether such wholly understood it, if for no other reason because that they know the meaning of the word "Tran The book has an interest as a presentation of the po of the various mystics in carefully chosen extracts writings; but there are three important facts in con mysticism which are not brought into sufficiently e The first fact is that all Christianity—even the Chr those Christians who have persecuted the mystic implies a certain measure of mysticism implied in the that faith is the evidence of things not seen. The s is that specialized mysticism is, historically, as a rul against some system of religious jurisprudence: i instance, was in Germany a protest against the Lutheranism, and at Geneva the protest against th barrenness of Calvinism. In the third place Mrs. Gr to mention that mysticism has been very frequently with an unbalanced mind. To be complete, even limits of an essay, she should have recognized the not only of such writers as Plotinus, Thoma Emerson, and Maeterlinck, but also of Donadille whose indiscretions are mentioned in the Regis Council of that city, and of Nicolas Fatio de D mathematician who abandoned mathematics for attempted to introduce into England the tran illuminés of the Cevennes, and was stood for his English pillory.

The Apostolic Constitutions.

THE LITURGY OF "THE APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS, Cresswell (S.P.C.K., 1s. 6d.), contains a translation of book of the "Apostolic Constitutions," prefaced by duction in which the author discusses various points with the authorship and contents of the so-called " Liturgy." It would perhaps have been well if the brought out more clearly the tripartite division of th the peculiar features of each division. His critic eighth book, the author of which was probably the fi of the whole collection, are judicious, although we be work dates from an earlier period than the middle o century. It preceded, probably by some years, Council. Its interest, as Mr. Cresswell remarks, lie sentation of a Liturgy "at least a century elder other." It is strange that the Constitutions were unknown in the West until the sixteenth century, rianus published an edition of them at Venice. Mr. little book will serve as a useful introduction to which the subject of ancient liturgies is more fully de

The City of God.

St. Augustine's monumental work, so grandly con on the whole, nobly executed, notwithstanding the w blemishes caused by his ignorance of Greek and Hebr very limited knowledge of Biblical criticism, has been several times into English. The first translation of mo was that by Healy in 1610, based on Louis Vive

Krishna and his abominable life." The legend is one of great poetic beauty. Among the sources from which Augustine quotes might be given the names of Eusebius and Hieronymus.

Liturgical students are not a very numerous body; not all perhaps are interested in the ancient ceremony of the blessing of the waters; and still fewer can read Syriac and Coptic, as well as Greek, Latin, and English. Therefore the number of those who will be worthy of THE BLESSING OF THE WATERS ON THE EVE OF THE EPIPHANY, "the Latin by John, Marquis of Bute, K.T., the rest for him, and with his help in part, by E. A. Wallis Budge" (Frowde, 6s.), is small. However, a translation is placed alongside of four of the offices, so that one can understand even the Coptic by the help of Dr. Budge. The plainsong music of the Latin rite is given. The Syriac and Coptic are printed in their proper characters, the two Greek versions are given without translation, and of the Russian the translation only is printed.

Those who wish to know all about the Church of Cyprus will be able to do so by spending 15s. on A HISTORY OF THE ORTHODOX CHURCH OF CYPRUS FROM THE COMING OF THE APOSTLES PAUL AND BARNABAS TO THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE BRITISH OCCUPATION (A.D. 45—A.D. 1878), together with some account of the Latin and other Churches existing in the Island, by J. Hackett, B.D., Chaplain to the Forces (Methuen). The number of persons interested in the subject is perhaps not large, but we can commend it to them with the assurance that the book is a monument of conscientious industry and packed with obscure information.

THE ACROSTIC POEMS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT: An English Version, Metrical and Alphabetical, by J. N. Glanville, M.A. (Skeffington, 2s. n.), is a literary curiosity. Mr. Glanville has not improved on the language of received versions, but his rendering is aimed at reproducing the acrostic form, to which (as he admits) he has sometimes sacrificed accuracy. His pieces are eight psalms, a piece from the Proverbs, and four from the Lamentations. We do not understand his view of the Tenth Psalm, but the rest are clear and interesting. It must be added that he is not a poet.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Some Biographies.

Mr. W. K. Dickson's LIFE OF MAJOR-GENERAL SIR ROBERT MURDOCH SMITH (Blackwood, 15s.) is a well-written biography of a soldier whose victories were exclusively those of peace. In early life, he commanded the detachment of sappers which accompanied Sir Charles (then Mr.) Newton's archæological expedition to Asia Minor. In 1863, a convention having been concluded with the Shah of Persia providing for the construction, under English superintendence, of a telegraph line through Persia in connexion with the Indo-European Telegraph system, he was appointed one of the section superintendents of the line. Ultimately, in the course of a connexion of nearly twenty-five years with Persia, he became director-in-chief of the Indo-European Telegraph, from which post he retired in 1888, twelve years before his death. The book contains good descriptions of his life in Persia, but the account of Sir Charles Newton's expedition to Halicarnassus is, on the whole, of greater interest. It is not given to every one to discover one of prevailed on Lord Clarendon, the then Foreig obtain a firman authorizing further explorations a properly equipped expedition. The results of have been fully stated, both in Sir C. Newton's Blue-books. Murdoch Smith's letters to Sir show that he was the first to point out the a mausoleum, and it was his report and drawings

the key to the restoration of the building.
work, whether it was sufficiently recognized at was undoubtedly of great value. The book portraits and views, but, unfortunately, the pho tion of the all-important plan of Halicarnassus i cannot be studied without a magnifying glass.

Miss Violet Brooke-Hunt's life of LORD RON is ostensibly a book for boys; but it is so much slovenly work usually turned out for this pur reluctant to relegate it to that category.
really graphic, and in the chapters devoted to t characters besides Lord Roberts notably Joh Neville Chamberlain—are well and clearly indi praise the book with the more pleasure because t war book which lately passed through our hands prepared us to expect anything so good from tribution to military history it must, no doubt, the life of Lord Roberts lately written by G
but the avoidance of technicalities has its co vantages. The style, if not always quite gra formly spirited. Parents who buy the book for take the opportunity of reading it themselves.

Mr. W. B. Luke's LORD MILNER (Partridg a favourable example of the topical book whic expanded newspaper article in boards. It does thing about Lord Milner that we could not found out for ourselves; but it saves us the tro out, and it puts the facts well, without either the bitterness of partisanship. It is interest Lord Milner was in the same Honour Moderatio (Trinity Term, 1874) with the Editor of The Tim Conybeare, and Mr. Glazebrook, Headmast
Mr. Luke inaccurately adds to the list the name ford, which figures in the list of the following M
In "greats" Lord Milner took his first side by Iwan-Müller, of the Daily Telegraph, who h reviewing his career in the magazines, and Mr.
the Headmaster of the City of London School mentioned that Mr. Luke dwells at greater Milner's early career than on his South Afric drawing largely on Mr. Stead's account of his the Pall Mall Gazette.

Another book of the same sort in the sam MARQUESS OF SALISBURY by W. Francis Aitken ground having often been covered before, it expected that this new life could be much more tion. It is however rather a good compilation from the speeches are well chosen so as to il Prime Minister's gift of biting epigram, but principles of his foreign policy.

Mr. David Williamson's PRESIDENT McK
1s. n.) will satisfy the needs of those who requ biography. It does not attempt any general a is devoted largely to the religious side of the lat observing whatever there was to observe. The value of his book lies mainly in the fact that he has recorded his observations frankly, not suppressing things because they were horrible. Chinese and European atrocities are impartially recorded by him, and his candid admissions on the latter head invite confidence in his prediction that there will before very long be a recrudescence of the trouble. His comparison of the troops of the various nationalities is the more interesting because he had been in South Africa shortly before his trip to China. He thought the French contingent "absolutely beneath contempt," found the Germans admirable on the parade-ground but otherwise "heavy and slow in their movements," and the Americans too little disciplined, and he sums up thus :—

> From what I have seen in South Africa and China, I feel and know it—luminously know it in the marrow of my intelligence—that for that South African job, if it were to be done over again, I would select the British. They have done not only as well but better than any other nation would have done. Many things might have been done better, but when I saw the others there were everywhere signs of their probable failures being infinitely more numerous.
>
> There are only two armies that, granted the possibility of their being landed in South Africa, could have conceivably tackled the job. These are the Japanese and the Germans.

The book is quite interesting though only moderately literary.

The anonymous LETTERS FROM JOHN CHINAMAN (Brimley Johnson, 1s. n.) purport to be the work of a citizen of the Celestial Empire who has lived for many years in London. The lucidity and idiomatic accuracy of their style savours rather of the London journalist who knows China. Their object is to explain and justify Chinese points of view. They do certainly make the Chinese objection to missionaries intelligible, though the Chinese would be better people if they took some of the advice that the missionaries give them. Whatever may be the merits of Confucianism it has not prevented corruption, cruelty, and inefficiency in public affairs.

Before the Deluge.

THE LAST DAYS OF THE FRENCH MONARCHY, by Sophia H. MacLehose (MacLehose, 6s.), is a clear and simple sketch of the events preceding the French Revolution, and of the chief persons who took part in these, which should make the book a useful introduction for young people to the more important histories. It shows evidence of much reading, and the list of authorities given is an imposing one. There is a good index, and many interesting illustrations, such as that of the King's net, a precious and almost sacred vessel of gold, shaped like the ship, in the arms of the city of Paris, and holding the supply of clean table napkins to be used by the King during dinner. At each course a fresh napkin was taken out, and given to his Majesty, by which we see that an unlimited supply of table linen is the sign of true nobility, just as an unconquerable attachment to table napkin rings is the infallible sign of the middle classes, by which you shall know them. For its purpose we can thoroughly recommend Mrs. MacLehose's book.

The Germ.

Mr. Eliot Stock's reprint of THE GERM places within the reach of seven-hundred subscribers of the modest sum of half-a-guinea a close facsimile of a famous publication. The original four parts, published in January, February, March, and April, 1850, are sufficiently rare to command a high price. They are rare because people would not buy "The Germ" and would scarcely consent to know of its existence ; and they are interesta literary organ of the Brotherhood of which Hol Millais, D. G. Rossetti, Woolner, James Collinson, F. G. St and W. M. Rossetti were the members. We further le 200 copies of the 700 printed were sold of No. 1, and issue of No. 2 was reduced to 500 copies. "It sold le than No. 1," says Mr. Rossetti tersely, and he is sil regard to the fortunes of Nos. 3 and 4. The present repr line for line facsimile of "The Germ," says the pre and the four illustrations which appeared in the work by Hunt, Ford Madox Brown, James Collinson, and W Deverell, "are faithfully reproduced by a photographic which renders the originals exactly," says the same au We wish we could agree. The photographic process empl a very poor apology indeed for the copper plates or used. One has only to compare the frontispiece to No. 2 how black and "rotten" the reproduction is. In fact the of "thickening up" goes through all the process repr employed, whether for pictures or type pages. It is not of the publisher, who has done art lovers a real service reissue, but of indifferent "process work." It w interesting to know why No. 4 has "May" 1850 printe it ? Was not the "May" subsequently cut out and th "April" substituted ? Mr. Rossetti also refers so vaguely to two fly-sheets which—when the third number magazine was about to appear with a change of tit "The Germ" to "Art and Poetry" ("more, I th Messrs. Tupper, the printing firm than by myself," s Rossetti)—were inserted, and presents the two of them in fa We do not think that these fly-sheets formed part magazine. The one issued with No. 3 had the new titl and Poetry : Being Thoughts towards Nature. Co principally by Artists" printed twice upon an unbac sheet and the following note added :—"The first two of the publication appeared under the name 'The t but in consequence of some misapprehension of its inte arbitrary title has been discontinued. This change will productive of any ill consequence, as the title appeared wrapper only, over which the above labels may be p This fly-sheet might well have been included in the tasteful and welcome reprint.

Belgium.

Mr. Cyril Scudamore's BELGIUM AND THE BELGIANS wood, 6s.) is a book that one is tempted to compare w Meldrum's "Holland and the Hollanders," reviewed columns when it appeared ; and the comparison is to advantage of the volume now before us. Mr. Meldru was evidently inspired by intimate first-hand knowledge country and people of which it treated. Mr. Scudamor smells of the lamp, and more research than experience s have gone to the making of it. It is full of facts and taken from various sources—from guide-books, from h and from official publications. We learn from it wha worth seeing in some of the principal cities (though som most interesting of them, Ypres, for example, are n with), and we also get many interesting particulars a Antwerp Docks, the administration of the Congo Fre the Belgian Army, the Belgian Universities, the Belg Office ; but, on the whole, the reader is likely to find more instructed than entertained. Moreover, one omission must be remarked. The language questi receives the most casual mention. But the history question—the failure of the attempt of the French-s faction to suppress the Flemish tongue—has a particular

THE TRIBULATIONS OF A PRINCESS (Harper, 7s. 6d.) is the autobiography of the author of "The Martyrdom of an Empress." Those who go to it for revelations of Court life will be disappointed. The identity of the persons who pass through its pages is so carefully veiled that the whole thing reads like a fabrication, and as a fabrication it is devoid of interest. The tone is the tone of the penny novelette, the narrations offend continually against good taste, and the French phrases with which the book is plentifully besprinkled are principally needed as evidence of the author's ignorance of the language. One of them is our old friend tout coucheble, and another is une petite siege.

FICTION.

Mr. F. T. Bullen.

Mr. Bullen certainly has the gift of speech and has achieved much deserved popularity. But the sketches in DEEP SEA PLUNDERINGS (Smith, Elder, 6s.) are for the most part rather studies for stories than stories themselves. Nearly all of them would have bare rewriting, and all of them would have been better for compression. It sometimes seems to us that Mr. Bullen falls just short of complete success as a writer even in his chosen genre, because of his aptness to confuse two kinds of conviction. Difficult as it may be to define the difference, there is a method of obtaining an air of reality in pure fiction which is certainly alien from that employed by a writer in relating his own experiences. Mr. Bullen mixes both methods, with the result of making reality look as if it were partly invented and invention look as if its author did not quite believe in it. The book, however, contains excellent material. Mr. Bullen would probably be the last to deny his obligations to that great sea writer Herman Melville.

An Idealist.

We were attracted last year by a first novel from the pen of Miss May Bateman, and she now follows it with a second, THE GLOWWORM (Heinemann, 6s.), which has some of the qualities of the former book, and, so far as literary style goes, certainly reveals greater maturity. It is rather a slighter story than "The Altar of Life," but there is one feature about both books which gives them distinction. Miss Bateman deals in pathos and in tragedy; but she is not content simply to put in the requisite materials according to recipe, stir gently, and serve the result as a piquant dish of sensational romance. She has that essential for a work of art—a central idea, a conception that gives unity to the whole. This book gives us in its heroine the idealist, stumbling impulsively through the dark after the glimmering "ineffectual fire." Asenath, the child of strange fancies, leads on to Asenath with her girlish and mistaken passion for a pretty widow who has had a past, and to Asenath the woman who devotes herself to an unsatisfactory husband under the glamour of his heroic deeds in the Sudan. The child who is the tallest of her family and is "adored by the villagers" and the grooms is, one must confess, a little outworn; but the rest of the story is well knit together, and there is the true dramatic instinct in its tragic close amidst the hut-tax troubles in the West African bush. Miss Bateman has the merit—not too common a one—that she always writes in good taste of military and social life. Her new story is a good one, which would have borne a little more elaboration. But she writes with a real remainder of the volume rather disappointed Couch has hardly fulfilled the promise of his remains a pretty writer enough and can sel dull, but the humorous fancy which used to work seems rather to have evaporated. The might have been the work of any capable hand

Miss F. F. Montrésor.

Miss Montrésor's women are excellent; good. There are in THE ALIEN (Methuen, considerable tenderness and strength. It is, written, but it does not quite touch the reade Mordaunt and Cousin Becky are drawn wit many touches of fine workmanship, but th Major Iredale is the customary woman's pic straightforward soldier whose watchword is perpetually irritating more sensitive people So, too, Cesare Vivario is the customary vill half-bred, cringing, blackmailing scoundrel. author has obviously taken a great deal of tro none of them really sympathetic. Per co ingenious and strong; there is pathos in Jas his cousin; and there is much preaching "The Alien" is better and more serious than but it is not quite so good as we have a ri the author of "At the Cross Roads."

"The Secret Orchard."

THE SECRET ORCHARD, by Agnes and Eg millan, 6s.), is a clever, lurid, interesting nov and still more often merely theatrical; but it pleasant book. The plot is strong—the inv tion into the household of an adored wife o whom the husband has sinned. He has long s his silence while the intolerable situation penance. The end is perhaps inevitable—a one. The characters of the beautiful wife a old adorers are drawn with considerable tend soften the book. Without them the bald facts

If a stirring story of adventure and hair sought it will be found in William Westall's Arthur Pearson, 6s.). In point of fact, the h intimates excepted, the characters in this mostly devils. Truly they "banged those d children of the devil" pretty severely, but t to choose between General Morillo, the General Bolivar, the Venezuelan patriot l cruelty, for neither of them was used to story is an unhalting record of battle, murder over which assuredly no reader need fall aslee

THE CRIME OF THE CRYSTAL (Digby, Long ties of all Mr. Fergus Hume's other novels—the the feelings and no wit to move the intell usual clever unravelling of a mystery, the usu too unpleasing people, and it is written in go not reveal more of the plot than is told in th improbabilities in the story of course, p than usual, but, after all, what do they matte for the careful hand of the artist when we Hume; we only want to go smoothly along did the murder—and that is one of the leg of modern days.

CANON CARTER OF CLEWER.

The memory of Canon Carter, of Clewer, who passed away this week at the age of ninety-two, is one of an exceptionally devoted life. But it is well worthy of recognition also for the fact that he has been for half a century one of the most voluminous religious writers of the advanced school of the Church of England. It was in 1841, just after the closing of the first chapter of the Tractarian movement which he supported from the first, that Carter was presented to the Rectory of Clewer, after a distinguished career at Eton and Christ Church (where he was a contemporary of Gladstone, Keble, and Bishop Wilberforce) and twelve years of clerical work in Bucks and Dorsetshire. His first publication was "Three Sermons connected with the National Fast Day, March 24th, 1847," with an appendix on the Days of Fasting or Abstinence as enjoined by the Church of England. It was the time of the Irish potato famine. "Can we stop," said the preacher, "and discuss the political bearings of nice questions, when the unshrouded and uncoffined dead are hurrying past thick and wan as the leaves of autumn?" The same feeling of humanity showed itself in his work at home. As a faithful priest and assiduous visitor, Carter was shocked at the overcrowding of the poor of Windsor, who were then housed in ill-ventilated and ill-drained courts. He met with many a rebuff in the work of reform; but he succeeded in interesting the Prince Consort in the question. In 1850 he printed, for private circulation, "Some Remarks on the Physical and Social Condition of the Labouring Classes of Windsor," setting forth a general scheme for the benefit of the town under the immediate patronage of the Queen and Prince Albert. This strenuous pamphlet was mainly directed against overcrowding, and if others of influence had been as energetic in this direction as was the rector of Clewer for over forty years, the housing problem would not now be so insistent as it is. "There is a call," said he, "now, that we should endeavour to raise up and cherish among our cottagers the honourable and independent character which has been wont to distinguish the English labourer; and to mark the reign of our present gracious Sovereign, not by extended conquests, but by the increased health, decency, and comfort of the honest poor man's home." A striking feature of Church revival during the past fifty years is the growth of sisterhoods. It owes more to the devotion of Canon Carter than to any other half dozen of its earlier supporters. From 1849 to his death he was Warden of the House of Mercy, Clewer, of which the Hon. Mrs. Monsell was the first superior. In 1855 he published "The First Five Years of the House of Mercy, Clewer," and in 1861 an enlarged edition under the title "The First Ten Years of the House of Mercy." The most successful and pleasantly written of his books, outside pure theology, was the "Memoir of Harriett Monsell" (1884), of which the last edition appeared in 1890. A more recent memoir (1895) was "A Record of the Life and Work of Richard Temple West" (vicar of St. Mary Magdalene's, Paddington). Biography had a special attraction for Canon Carter, and he edited and wrote prefaces for many lives; such as "James Skinner, Vicar of Newland," 1883; "Nicholas Ferrar," 1892; and "John Kettlewell," 1895. But his writings were mainly theological and devotional. The British Museum Catalogue, exclusive of new editions, enumerates upwards of 150 separate works from his pen, many of them, however, single sermons, or brief essays. His five volumes of "Spiritual Instructions" issued between 1870 and 1891 have

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZIN

The most distinguished contributor to the mag month is probably Mr. Robert Burns. A hitherto un poem by the poet is unearthed in Macmillan's. Burn MS. has not been found, but a copy of the verses was d
among some papers belonging to the late Mrs. Berr Monmouthshire, who died in 1885. Apparently the au of the poem rests only on the fact that the late Mrs.
ton's copy has an endorsement to the effect that the ve addressed to a Mrs. Curre by Burns. Mrs. Curr daughter of John Bushby, of Tinwald Downs in Dumf Thus we are introduced to yet another Burns heroine, a new lyric. The poet actually compares her to his N girl that inspired "Had we never loved sae kindly," a

Just such was the glance of my bonnie lost Nancy,
Just such was the glance that once brightened h
But lost is the smile sae impressed on my fancy,
And cauld is the heart that sae dear was to me.

Ilka wee flow'ret we grieve to see blighted,
Cow'ring and with'ring in frost nippet plain;
The naist turn o' spring shall awauken their beauty
But ne'er can spring wauken my Nancy again.

In the same magazine an admirably-written paper
the humour of present-day novelists unfavourably with His humorous sayings and incidents belong essentia characters to which he attaches them. Quote a remark novels and the character that uttered it rises up vivid the eyes. This, the writer maintains, is what make so vastly superior to humourists like Mark Twain an who fasten their humour on to their characters indiscri

The Quarterly deals less extensively than the Edinb literature, though there is one notable literary article, the subject is the work of the late Charlotte Yonge.
daring, the reviewer compares her to Miss Austen, w much inferior to Miss Yonge in pathos as she exce satire." But surely to write like this is to compare sm with great. We think, too, that the reviewer exagge importance of Miss Yonge's contributions to history are not on a much higher level than Mrs. Markham's.
however, the writer's attitude towards the "problem which he contrasts with the novels of Miss Yonge:—

> We hear in these days a good deal about the "p > novel. In most compositions of this class the probl > stated in its simplest terms, comes to this—how to > passion or self-indulgence urges in one direction > accepted laws of good behaviour point in the other. S > an Uebermensch of the earlier world, solved it in > "Libito fe' licito in sua legge." Another way is > indicated by a worthy French dragoon officer, when > some point of conduct with a relative of the presen
> "Je trouve ça tout simple; c'était son devoir."
> this latter solution does not, as a rule, recommen > the heroes and heroines of much, and that perhaps > popular, modern fiction. Goethe's "Entbehren s > sollst entbehren" is wholly out of date.

In other respects the review is strong. "The C Austria-Hungary" is a most lucid presentation of most urgent problems of modern politics. A footnote i that the writer is of Austrian nationality. His anti are very gloomy. The long article on "The Pla exhaustive and alarming, though the writer's alarm is India than for England. The article on the Empress does not seem to be based on the same intimate perso ledge as the recent article on Queen Victoria; but it i and interesting appreciation. Other subjects treated a Revolt against Orthodox Economics," "Antique Gems
South Pole," and "Duelling in the Time of Brantôme."

The most notable literary article in the Edinburgh is o and the Novelists." The subject is treated without who left out of her books the things which she thought children ought not to know. "Whether," he writes, "psychological fiction and problem dramas, whether, that is, novel-reading and play-going, two of girlhood's most exciting amusements, are the fittest medium through which suggestions should be conveyed through which she should arrive at her first apprehension of the most intimate relationships, consecrated or desecrated, of womanhood and manhood, is an inquiry with which at the present day men, no less than women, will do well to concern themselves." "The Scandinavian Novel" is a third literary article. Comparing Scandinavian with English fiction the reviewer maintains that "the Scandinavian novel has something of the charm that a child has side by side with an affected man or woman of the world," and also that "with all its defects the fiction of these lands holds for the moment a more important place than does our own." The other articles are on "The French Expedition to Egypt in 1798," "Industrial Progress and Native Life in South Africa," "Life in Poetry and Law in Taste," "Magic and Religion," "Recent Russian Music in England," "The Macedonian Problem and its Factors," "The Fight against Consumption," "The Glasgow School of Painting," and "Party Politics and the War."

The articles in the English Historical Review are—"The Dedication of Kings in the Greek Cities" by Edwyn Robert Bevan, "The Dutch in Western Guiana" by the Rev. George Edmundson, "England and Sweden in the time of William III. and Anne" by J. F. Chance, and "A British Agent in Tilsit" by J. Holland Moss. Mr. Moss faces the question "How did Canning come to know of the plot matured on the Tilsit raft which he anticipated by the Copenhagen expedition?" The old story of the spy concealed on the raft is shown to be incredible. According to Mr. Moss, Canning's information was really incomplete; but, such as it was, he got it from one Mackenzie, who, in his turn, got it from General Benningsen, who betrayed as much of his master's designs as he was made acquainted with. This intimation, supplemented by Garlike's report from Copenhagen, was enough for the British Government to act upon.

The English Illustrated improves. The contributors to the new number include Mr. A. G. Hales, who writes an African love story, and Dr. Barry, and Mr. H. G. Wells, who supply a grave and a facetious essay respectively, the former on Anarchism, the latter mainly on what literary men should eat and drink.

Messrs. George Philip and Son send us a new magazine, the Geographical Teacher, which is to be the organ of the Geographic Association. Its object, as defined in an introduction written by Mr. D. W. Freshfield, is "to answer in the affirmative the question—Can you teach geography so as to make people think?"—that is to say, can the scientific teaching of geography be anything but the elaborate demonstration of the obvious. In this undertaking we wish the new magazine every success.

ART EXHIBITIONS.

The Fine Art Society has opened the autumn season in Bond-street with its usual enterprise. In one of the rooms there is a collection of water-colour drawings entitled "The Cities of Central Italy," by Alberto Pisa, and in another a collection of pen and ink drawings and a few sketches by Laurence Housman. The characteristic of Signor Pisa's work is that it is so unlike the drawings of Italy that we are accustomed to that it would seem as if the artist purposely saw sunny Italy on its few rainy days, and painted the South with all the sadness of the French romanticist or the sobriety of the typical Dutch painter.

Of Mr. Laurence Housman's work as an illustrator we have previously had opportunities to judge, more frequently through the medium of the reproduction than from the original

"The Arabian Nights." Dominated as he is however, Mr. Housman has a quality of line technique which is admirable. It is more Houghton of "Tom, Tom, the Piper's Son" boisterous draughtsman of such illustrations History of the Third Calendar; closer in beautiful Princess Parizade than to the "The Kite Darts upon the Meat" in The Hist Mr. Laurence Housman, dexterous as he is w moreover, the saving grace of humour which attach us to Arthur Houghton; but, whatev comparison with his great prototype, his dr at the Fine Art Society show rare imaginatio this quality is so generally absent from illustrators, and for this we are more than gr

True art lovers will turn their gaze fr dealers of the West-end to the galleries of the heart of the City. Once again Mr. Temp than is expected of him to maintain interest Gallery, and the latest exhibition is among th of a noteworthy series. It is some time exhibited in Conduit-street the first five of hi tions for the Boston Public Library in Ill Quest of the Holy Grail," and the remaining now to be seen at the Guildhall. They displa solid draughtsmanship, his bold and voluptu rare gift of invention. We envy Boston their should be seen by all who take an inte decorative art before they leave this country.

The great vogue that old coloured engrav late has induced Messrs. Graves to arrange i of "Ladies' Portraits" after early English m for the most part, interesting efforts to revive art of printing copper plates in colours—no worthless substitute of hand-colouring monoc are sometimes printed from the old plat from plates recently engraved in the sty stipple. Many are successful, and all especially as most of the coloured prints been produced in England. It has long artistic reproaches that this class of wor only be obtained in Paris.

The Society of Medallists is holding its van Wisselingh's small galleries in Brook-str have an autumn exhibition of the usual Marchant celebrates his proprietorship of th Goupil Galleries with an exhibition of works Dutch Romanticists which he understands so

LIBRARY NOTE

The Earl of Derby recently opened Art Gallery and Library which is the town Diamond Jubilee. The library contains 12,00 art gallery is enriched by the valuable W pictures.

The Library World takes exception to column. We remarked that the proceeding meeting of the Library Association were no in some former years. But the Library Worl meetings in the past were rather bibliograp tual. The distinction seems to be somewhat not bibliography an intellectual pursuit? the technical side of library work the papers by Ernest Thomas, John Winter Jones, an were scarcely rivalled at the last meeting. that the popular mind should be made to un of the more prosaic duties of librarians.

The local collection at the Newington Public Library has been enriched by an engraved portrait of John Revoult, who was Master of the Walworth Academy for several years, the gift of Mr. T. A. Gilbert.

The second number of the Library Record of Australasia contains a good article on Sir Redmond Barry, founder of the Public Library and Museums of Victoria, with an excellent portrait. We learn from "Some Magazines of early Victoria" that the first attempts were mainly distinguished by an early death, and their successors by "flagrant, calm, unabashed piracy." A series of hints for small libraries is also valuable, but we hope the printer is responsible for "Westcott" and "Cas Koden" as the names of two American novelists.

The Irish Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction make a good departure in offering to village and working-men's libraries gifts of books to the value of £3 on economic, industrial, and allied subjects.

The committee of the Bethnal-green Free Library are in want of funds to wipe out a debt that cripples the extension of their work. Contributions will be gratefully received by the treasurer, Mr. F. A. Bevan, at Messrs. Barclay and Co.'s, 54, Lombard-street, E.C.; or by the secretary and librarian, Mr. G. F. Hilcken, at the Bethnal-green Free Library, London, N.E.

Correspondence.

THE CASKET LETTERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir, At page 219 of his "Mystery of Mary Stuart" Mr. Lang refers to certain suggestions of mine in explanation of the close agreement of Moray's erroneous description of a Casket Letter with a précis in the Lennox MSS. I do not admit the correctness of Mr. Lang's summary; and, moreover, my suggestions were, as I told Mr. Lang, made extempore, and without examination of authorities. They were not intended for publication, and it will be evident to any one who reads the paragraph that Mr. Lang has made an unwarrantable use of my communication. I do not doubt, however, that he has done so from mere inadvertence—an inadvertence due to the openmindedness which is one of the most striking features of his volume.

On the question of the Casket Letters his openmindedness has, indeed, been almost Quixotic. Some ten years ago he expressed his strong conviction that the letters were "doctored"; after more minute inquiry he began a paper in Blackwood about a year ago "strong in the faith that they were 'genuine'"; he ended that paper in doubt; and now he is almost convinced of a doctoring process so homœopathically small as almost in no degree to affect the main question. But since Mr. Lang has referred to certain suggestions of mine, may I be permitted, being no longer partially in the dark as to the nature of his discoveries, to touch briefly on four cardinal points—the more especially as on those points Mr. Lang has either, as it seems to me, neglected or curiously misinterpreted evidence that was in his possession.

1. The main raison d'être of his present volume is, I take it, his discovery of the Lennox précis. It has shattered his strong faith in the genuineness of the letters by suggesting the probable existence—surely most improbable on many other grounds—of a forged letter afterwards dropped. This remarkable theory is based on the supposition that the précis was not founded on information supplied to Lennox by Moray, or the informant of Moray, or one whom Moray informed. Any of those suppositions Mr. Lang deems highly improbable, and in reply to the suggestion the same account of the letter as he gave to De Silva, or not, probably De Silva did. On either supposition, we do n to search further for the source of the Lennox précis main ground of Mr. Lang's doubt disappears.

2. Mr. Lang recognizes that if Du Croc obtained Scottish authorities copies of the letters, the French ment might have discovered the substitution of a ne but he accounts for its silence on the ground that Elizabeth by criticism of two sets of copies of le certainly not then the obvious policy of France." Th may not be true, but Mr. Lang has neglected to the risk which the Scottish Lords would elect to run l the letters after officially supplying a copy to th Ambassador.

3. Mr. Lang thinks that Maitland may have f suppressed letter and put it in the casket before t reached Morton on the 19th; but he had hardly m day to conceive and perfect the scheme, and could do s the supposition that the key was not in the pos Bothwell. That he did it afterwards is still more that he so bungled it as to require to suppress it the improbability, and that it was not suppres immediately before the Westminster conference is s incredible. Nor do I think that Elizabeth meant to h Silva that Maitland had forged the letters. She consid he "acted badly" in joining the opponents of the Ques Robert Melville being the informant of Elizabeth, this of Mr. Lang's, to which he over and over again refers, an extraordinary mistake. "Leaving Edinburgh," Lang, "on June 21, the day of the discovery, Melvi London on June 23 or 24." Now it is certain that Me in London about the date Mr. Lang supposes; but othe Lang's chronology is sheerly impossible. Riding as a for a wager, night and day, and with a constant shor swift horses, Maitland could hardly, in those days, have journey within the time supposed. Nor was such un haste necessary. But the simple fact is that Lethingto write "the bearer, Mr. Melville," but "the bearer Melville" (who was already in London as the represen the Lords). Nor is either Mr. Lang's palæography his copyist at fault, for he professes to quote the already printed in Skelton's "Maitland." Similarly a on Maitland's truthfulness is founded on a misread letter of Drury. Maitland is represented as stating Queen had threatened to cause "Bothwell to forfe goods, and life." "Could the Queen who said that," Lang, "be in love with Bothwell"—quite unaware reference is to Huntly. Indeed, most of Mr. Lang's st against Maitland seems to have been created by a minor misapprehensions.

4. As to the cardinal matter of Crawford's Declara not Mr. Lang unconsciously supplied proof that the De has been corrected by the letter—not the letter part from the Declaration? Quite innocently (p. 390) states that there is "a corrected draft" in the Lenn proving "that the Anglicizer of Crawford's Scots occ altered it into harmony with the English version of La One can hardly credit that, after being used to assist i the letter, it was corrected by a translation of the forge Lang's incidental remark seems to turn the balance of pr against his own theory, but why did it never occur t print the draft?

Yours faithfully,

for to me at least they seem remarkably strong. I have shown that the news of Amy Robsart's death startled Elizabeth and made Dudley very uncomfortable; that the jury, who were no friends of Dudley's, found it a case of accidental death; that Cecil, who had been previously jealous of Lord Robert's influence and had expressed the worst opinion of his conduct just before, befriended him after the event; and that Amy's wretched half-brother Appleyard, whose evidence as to the murder Froude thought convincing, not only made no such imputation at the time, but when he did so, years afterwards, first, revealed his own baseness by saying that "for Dudley's sake he had covered the murder of his sister," and then was obliged to retract the imputation, which he was offered every facility to substantiate, and made a most abject apology, confessing even that he had accused Leicester out of malice.

All this Mr. Sidney has read, but he considers the question still is simply, "Who killed Amy Robsart?" And why does he think so? He has "only to allude to a conversation which occurred, about a month after Amy's death, between Elizabeth and a messenger from the English Ambassador at Paris," in the course of which the Queen remarked that "none of his (Dudley's) men were at the attempt at Cumnor." And Mr. Sidney concludes, "If Amy's death were accidental, why did Queen Elizabeth make use of such an expression as 'the attempt?'"

Well, I think I would put exactly the opposite question. If Amy's death were not accidental, why did Queen Elizabeth use such an expression as "the attempt?" All the world had known, and, not merely for "about a month," as Mr. Sidney makes it, but for two months and more, that Amy Robsart was dead—had been killed, in fact, whether by accident or design; and it is the strangest way of palliating a murder which was actually accomplished to call it an attempt. Elizabeth surely did not refer to an attempt which had succeeded. She referred to one which had not succeeded. And in fact, this expression, "the attempt," is the very thing which, as I showed some years ago in the Athenæum, makes the story of Amy's death complete. She had insisted, in spite of remonstrances, on dismissing her servants that day that they might go to what was called "the fair" at Abingdon—the pastimes on the Nativity of Our Lady, 8th September; and some bad characters took advantage of the house being almost entirely deserted (only Amy herself and apparently two other ladies being there) to make an "attempt"—simply, I presume, at burglary. This, no doubt, was what caused the alarm that made Amy fall down the awkward corkscrew staircase, and so caused her death. Read in this light, I see no mystery in the case at all.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

JAMES GAIRDNER.

West View, Pinner, October 26, 1901.

HAWTHORNE AND "THE BLITHEDALE ROMANCE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In Mr. Hannigan's excellent Personal View of Nathaniel Hawthorne, I think he does less than justice to that remarkable book "The Blithedale Romance." Mr. Hannigan does, indeed, recognize the excellence displayed in the portrait of Zenobia, but I would submit that a careful study of the book will discover something more than this single triumph. It is indeed not difficult to see in the character portrayed. Take the scene between Zenob worth:—

"With what, then, do you charge me? worth, aghast and greatly disturbed by this me one selfish end, in all I ever aimed at, it out of my bosom with a knife!"

"It is all self!" answered Zenobia, w bitterness. "Nothing else; nothing but sel fiend, I doubt not, has made his choicest m seven years past, and especially in the mad have spent together. I see it now! I am awa disenthralled! Self, self, self! You have in a project. You are a better masquerader and gipsies yonder; for your disguise is First, you aimed a deathblow, and a treach scheme of a purer and higher life, which so had wrought out. Then because Coverda quite your slave, you threw him ruthlessly took me, too, into your plan, as long as the being available, and now fling me aside agai But, foremost and blackest of your sins, you inmost consciousness! You did a deadly own heart!"

Or, again, take the parting words betw Hollingsworth:—

"Up to this moment," I inquired, "how have you reformed?"

"Not one," said Hollingsworth, with on the ground. "Ever since we parted, with a single murderer."

This well illustrates the power of retic Hawthorne. Taking it all in all, I believe Romance" deserves a higher measure of p been awarded it by the leading critics.

I am, Sir, your obedient serva

MAJOR GRE

243, Hackney-road, N.E., October 25.

AUTHORS AND PUBLI

An English Reclam.

Mr. Laird Clowes, in the July Fortnigh English Reclam, who would do for English re with his encyclopædic reprints has done in is significant that it is an American who un the call. But Mr. Howard Bell is not conte Reclam's achievements in the way of chea Library" is to "go one better" and be the reprints in the world. Mr. Bell's ideas o immense, but it must be remembered that t proved remarkably successful in Germany. started his "Universal Bibliothek" at Le and it has been steadily growing ever since, h its 4,000th unit. Reclam's unit generally co which he sells for 2½d., but the number of Bell's unit will be strictly limited to 25 p sold to the public for a halfpenny, so that the author may be, will sell at the rate of pages, with extra charges for the covers advisory editor, and Mr. A. R. Waller, acting editor. The library begins on November 1 with six volumes, including Plutarch's "Lives," Emerson's "English Traits," Browning's Uncopyright Poems, and Doran's "Monarchs retired from Business." After that there will be a regular output of three volumes a week, with editions of 20,000 each. The Plutarch will contain a "Benediction" from President Roosevelt, who has always carried a copy of the work about with him.

Another book-selling experiment is that announced by Messrs. Harper in their Magazine for November. "If you wish to secure at half-price any book mentioned in the list given below," they advertise, "fill in the coupon with the title and your name and address in full, and hand the coupon to your bookseller. If your bookseller is unable to supply the book on these terms, send your coupon, with remittance, to the publishers, and the book will be sent post free to any address in the United Kingdom." The list includes Miss Mary Wilkins' new long novel, "The Portion of Labour," and eleven other novels, as well as Lord Charles Beresford's "Break-up of China," Mr. Ransome's "Japan in Transition," and the translation of Margaretha von Poschinger's "Life of the Emperor Frederick." It will be interesting to hear what the booksellers have to say on the subject, but no doubt Messrs. Harper will come to some working arrangement with them.

There is more than the usual proportion of literary disputes at present set down for the consideration of the Judges as compared with the number at the beginning of the Michaelmas sittings last year. Among the applications for new trials to be heard by the Court of Appeal is one by the Daily Mail in connexion with the action brought by Miss Chattell, to whom such heavy damages were awarded by the Sheriff's Court last July; and the appeals from the Chancery Division include the case of "Aflalo v. Lawrence and Bullen." Amongst the numerous libel actions are "the Netherlands South African Railway Company v. Chapman and Hall," "London and Provincial House Property Investment Company v. the Star," "Jackson v. the Star," "Barr v. the Yorkshire Conservative Newspaper Company," "Nicol v. Glenesk," "Bottomley v. Hess" and "Longman v. Hess." "Corelli v. De Beck," an action classified as "work," figures in the King's Bench Division. In the case of "Neufeld v. Chapman and Hall," decided on Wednesday, the two main questions whether Mr. Neufeld's agreement as to royalties affected arrangements made by Messrs. Chapman and Hall for serial publication by Messrs. Newnes and for publication in Germany were decided by Mr. Justice Walton in favour of Mr. Neufeld, with leave to appeal. On the question of the claim as to pictures, Messrs. Chapman and Hall were successful. The Divisional Court will also deal with "in re Henry Labouchere (ex parte John Kensit)" and "in re Kensit v. the Evening News."

The "French novel," which the adventuress of fiction secretes beneath her sofa cushion, is not exactly a fair representative of modern French romance, and we are glad to see the publishers treating French romance as part of Literary History. We have mentioned Mr. Heinemann's new "Century of French Romance" Series, edited by Mr. Edmund Gosse, and now Mr. Grant Richards is starting a series of "French Fiction of the Nineteenth Century." There is an important difference between the two series. Mr. Heinemann's idea is to display the progress of French romance from 1800 to 1900 by giving one characteristic example of the work of each of the twelve novelists who, by

A volume of sermons by an author who is not only but the editor of an important daily newspaper is an departure in theological literature. The author is Russell, the editor of the Liverpool Daily Post, who his reminiscences through Mr. Fisher Unwin not long the title of "That Reminds Me —." His new volu will shortly be issued by the same publisher, i "An Editor's Sermons on Days of the Church Year, Subjects." It has an introduction by the Bishop of who thinks that no small part of the special value consists in its being so largely addressed to the cler so seldom get at the inner mind of such men," says t "that we have reason to be grateful when any o expresses himself thus seriously and frankly, and lets know and feel what his thoughts really are on the most deep and serious moment, the mysteries that our earthly life."

The Solomon Islands are probably the only i history of an island race having been seen and described 350 years ago, and then left unvisited and by civilization almost to our own day. The Hakluy publish this month a translation (first announced some of the original Spanish MSS. describing Mendana's of the islands in 1567, during his search for the continent of the Incas. The Isles of Solomon were geographers that they were at last believed to be fal expunged from the charts. Meanwhile, during this lo the arts, the manners, and even the language of the p remained almost unaltered. Lord Amherst of Hackne Basil Thomson are the editors of the volume, whic copiously illustrated with facsimiles and photogravure Another Library of the "best novels" at popu (eighteenpence each) has been started. It comes fr Ward, Lock, and is called "The Great Novels a selection of the most popular books by famous illustrated and printed on antique paper and cloth. Dickens is represented by "Pickwick" an Copperfield"; Thackeray by "Vanity Fair" and "Pe Kingsley by "Westward Ho!" and "Hypatia"; "Ivanhoe" and "Old Mortality"; and Lord L "Last Days of Pompeii" and "Last of the Barons." dozen volumes will be ready shortly.

Mr. Hall Caine's new story, "Unto the Third a Generation," begins in the Christmas number of the Magazine and will be completed in two large instalmen

About the middle of this month will appear Mr. Menpes' new book on Japan, from Messrs. Adam an Black. Its great feature will be the hundred full-pag tions in colour.

The bicentenary of Yale College is approaching, a other memorial publications coming, a volume, edi committee of graduates and called "Two Centuries of Activity at Yale, 1701-1901," will be published b Putnam on both sides of the Atlantic. The tomb of self in Wales is the goal of many an American p Professor Goldwin Smith, being in bad health, is take part in the celebrations of the bicentenary of versity, where he was to represent Oxford University.

Lord Ronald Sutherland-Gower, the first volume "History of the Tower of London" will be publ Messrs. Bell shortly, has written another illustrate of reminiscences covering the last twenty years. It anecdotes of the Royal Family, Lord Beaconsfield, S Millais, Sir Arthur Sullivan, and J. A. Symonds. M will publish it. Two notable biographies have also b to Mr. Murray's list. One is "The Career and Corres Sir William Arthur White," our Ambassador at Const from 1885 to 1891, written mainly from Sir William's a full account of the formation of the force and its services during the present campaign, with details of the subscription list and expenditure and of the names of the men. A second series of "Last Essays," by the late Professor Max Müller (Longmans), will very shortly be forthcoming, dealing with the science of religion. The last two papers are entitled "Why I am not an Agnostic" and "Is Man Immortal?"

The life of the late Sir Henry Acland will be written by Mr. J. B. Atlay.

Mr. W. D. Howells has written a work on "Heroines in Fiction" as a companion volume to his "Literary Friends and Acquaintances."

The following works are announced by Messrs. Longmans:—"A History of Architecture in Italy from the Time of Constantine to the Dawn of the Renaissance," by Charles A. Cummings, member of the Boston Society of Architects, in two volumes (elaborately illustrated); and "Notes for Hunting Men," by Captain Cortlandt Gordon Mackenzie.

Mr. B. T. Batsford will issue early this month a revised and enlarged edition of "A History of Architecture on the Comparative Method," by the late Professor Banister Fletcher and Mr. Banister F. Fletcher.

The fine art business of Raphael Tuck is being turned into a limited liability company with a capital of £500,000. Dr. Conan Doyle is one of the directors.

Messrs. Longmans inform us that Mr. Rider Haggard's letters to the Daily Express, which appeared under the title "Back to the Land," will not be re-issued in their present form. Mr. Haggard, however, hopes next year to publish, under the title of "Rural England," a work dealing fully with the agricultural and social conditions of the majority of the English counties, and incorporating the substance of the letters.

Some new matter for anthropologists is said to be contained in "Savage Island: An Account of a Mission to Niué and Tonga in the Pacific Island," a book by Mr. Basil Thomson to come from Mr. Murray. It is, to some extent, a sequel to Mr. Thomson's "Diversions of a Prime Minister."

Messrs. Otto Schulze, of Edinburgh, announce a monograph on the historical Church of Santa Maria Novella at Florence by the Rev. J. Wood Brown, of Florence.

A second edition of the Poems of Richard D'Alton Williams ("Shamrock," of the Nation), edited by Mr. P. A. Sillard, will be published by Messrs. James Duffy, of Dublin.

Mr. Patchett Martin, who has long been very ill at Shanklin, has been allowed to undertake the voyage to Teneriffe, where he proposes to winter.

Books to look out for at once.

"The Great Boer War." By Dr. Conan Doyle. Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d.
[New edition (thirteenth), with seven fresh chapters and a new map bringing the history to date.]

"Anticipations." By H. G. Wells. Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d.
["A forecast of the reaction of mechanical and scientific progress upon human life and thought."]

"The War of the Polish Succession." By the Crown Prince of Siam. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.
[A volume of essays.]

"Jane Austen: Her Homes and Her Friends." By Constance Hill. Lane. 21s. net. Illustrated.

"Barry Sullivan and His Contemporaries." By R. Sillard. Fisher Unwin. 2 vols. Illustrated.

"County and Town in England." By the late Grant Allen. Grant Richards.
[A volume of historical and descriptive sketches of various counties and towns. With an introduction by Professor York Powell.]

"In an Unknown Prison Land." By George Griffith. Hutchinson. 12s. net.
[An illustrated account of the author's experiences and observations in New Caledonia.]

"Prosperous British India." By Wm. Digby, C.I.E. Fisher Unwin.
[With diagrams.]

"The Earth's Beginning." By Sir Robert Ball. Cassell. 7s. 6d.
[Based on Royal Institution Lectures, Christmas Course, 1900. Illustrated.]

"Three of A Kind." By Dora Hale. Hutchinson. 10s. net.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND R

With notes where required to guide the r contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude

BIOGRAPHY.

LETTERS OF JOHN RICHARD GREEN. Ed. 9×5¾, 511 pp. Macmillan. 15s. n.
[This is practically a biography, told part words, partly by the editor from information sup Mrs. Green, and from other sources. Three port

NOTABLE MASTERS OF MEN. By Edwin A. P Melrose. 3s. 6d.
["Modern Examples of Successful Lives Williams, Carnegie, James Tyson, &c.]

THE WOMEN OF THE SALONS AND OTHER F By S. G. Tallentyre. 9×5¾, 233 pp. Longmans [Essays reprinted from Longmans.]

MUHAMMAD AND HIS POWER. By P. D ORIGEN AND GREEK PATRISTIC THEO W. Fairweather. The World's Epoch Maker T. and T. Clark. 3s. each.
[The 10th and 11th volumes in this useful by Mr. Oliphant Smeaton.]

DISRAELI (MINISTRES ET HOMMES D'E Courcelle. 4¾×7½, 181 pp. Paris, 1901. - Alc

BOOKS FOR THE YOUN

TWO OF A TRADE. By the Author of "Val." 7 1s. 6d.
[A story of two sempstresses and of village

THE STORY OF ALFRED AND HIS TIMES. By 167 pp. Nelson. 1s. 6d.
[A popular life of Alfred for the young chapters on Saxon history before Alfred. Illust

GREAT EXPLORERS. 7½×5, 224 pp. Nelson. 2
[Marco Polo, Magellan, Mungo Park, Columbus, &c. Short and popular accounts copious illustrations.]

IN FAIR GRANADA. (Tales of History). By 8×5½, 439 pp. Nelson. 5s.
[The struggles between the Moors and the of Philip II.]

THE BARN-BOOKS.—THE FARM BOOK, by W. OF DAYS, by Clare Bridgman. 5×3¾, 2s. 6d. each.
[These are booklets, copiously and well illu

LITTLE CITIZENS. By Edith Farmiloe. 7¾×5¾
[A study of London children of the poor.

YOUNG BARBARIANS. By Ian Maclaren. 8 and Stoughton. 6s.
[Stories of life at "Muirtown Seminary"

CLEARED FOR ACTION. By W. Boyd-Alles Shaw. 5s.
[A story of the Spanish-American war, with the engagements.]

THE ADVENTURES OF ULYSSES. By Cha Prof. W. P. Trent. 7½×4¾, 120 pp. S.P.C.K.
[Cheap and attractive reprint. Fourteen ill by Flaxman. Red paper cover.]

THE HISTORY OF THE ROBINS. By Sara E. E. Hale. 7½×4¾, 90 pp. S.P.C.K. 6d.
[Uniform with "The Adventures of Ulys line, by C. M. Howard.]

IN SHIPS OF STEEL. By Gordon Stalles. 8
[A tale of naval life to-day. Illustrated.]

THE JACKDAW OF RHEIMS. From the Ing E. M. Jessop. 10×7½, 19 pp. Eyre and Spotti
[This "decoration" of "The Jackdaw of of print for some ten years. Its interesting illu in red and black gave it a great success when pictures have been redrawn.]

ACTON'S FEUD. A Public School Story. By F. S 7¾×5, 259 pp. Newnes. 3s. 6d.

A REAL QUEEN'S FAIRY BOOK. By Carmen S Newnes. 6s.
[These fairy tales by the Queen of Ru Illustrated by Mr. H. Nelson and Mr. A. Garth

IN THE DICTATOR'S GRIP. A story of Adventure in the Pampas and Paraguay. By J. SAMSON. 7¾×5, 298 pp. Blackie. 3s. 6d.

[A story of English emigrants, Spaniards, Indians, and the South American fighting for independence at the beginning of the 19th cent.]

GOODY TWO SHOES PICTURE BOOK. Walter Crane's Picture Books. Large series. 11×9½. Lane. 4s. 6d.

["Goody Two Shoes," "Aladdin," "The Yellow Dwarf." In big print and big coloured pictures.]

NORMAN'S NUGGET. M. OXLEY. 7½×5, 297 pp. Partridge. 2s.

[A search for gold in British Columbia in the middle of the last century—fights with Indians, &c.]

UNDER THE SHIDAR'S FLAG. By W. JOHNSTON. 7½×5, 316 pp. Partridge. 2s. 6d.

[School life followed by fighting at Atbara and Omdurman.]

IN THE DAYS OF THE DRAGONS. By the REVD. E. C. DAWSON. 7½×5, 110 pp. Seeley. 1s. 6d.

[These are sound practical "talks" with boys on matters of conduct.]

HOLIDAYS AND HAPPY DAYS. By H. HENDRY. (The Larger Dumpy Books for Children.) 6½×4½, 120 pp. Grant Richards. 2s. 6d.

[Papers for children on notable days in the year. Coloured Illust.]

EDUCATIONAL.

ALGEBRA, Part I. By E. M. LANGLEY and S. R. N. BRADLY. (Home and School Library.) 7×4½, 192 pp. Murray. 1s. 6d.

FICTION.

MARIETTA. A Maid of Venice. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. 7¾×5½, 450 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

[Mediæval Venice. Founded on the story of Zorzi and the secrets of the art of glassblowing.]

THE SHOES OF FORTUNE. By NEIL MUNRO. 8×5, 403 pp. Isbister. 6s.

[A romance of adventure in Scotland and on the Continent in the time of Charles Edward.]

THE PROPHET OF BERKELEY SQUARE. By R. HICHENS. 7¾×5½, 334 pp. Methuen. 6s.

[The amusing complications which surrounded a star-consulting resident in the square.]

COUNT HANNIBAL. By STANLEY J. WEYMAN. 7¾×5½, 368 pp. Smith Elder. 6s.

[France in the days of Charles IX., beginning with the massacre of St. Bartholomew.]

THE ROAD TO FRONTENAC. By S. MERWIN. 8×5½, 383 pp. Murray. 6s.

[The French in Canada in the seventeenth century.]

ARROWSMITH'S ANNUAL. PATRICIA AT THE INN. By J. C. SMITH. 7×4¾.

[A story of the wanderings of King Charles II. after the battle of Worcester.]

THREE MEN OF MARK. By SARAH TYTLER. 7¾×5, 331 pp. Chatto and Windus. 6s.

[A story of Scottish laird society at the time of the Napoleonic wars.]

KITTY FAIRHALL. By the Author of "Idlehurst." 7¾×5½, 311 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[A story of peasant life and romance.]

A SOCIAL PRETENDER. By WINIFRED GRAHAM. 7¾×5½, 314 pp. J. Long. 6s.

[The heroine is the orphaned daughter of a baronet who is persuaded to live with a wealthy guardian under false pretences.]

CYNTHIA'S DAMAGES. By R. TURNER. 7¾×5, 311 pp. Greening. 6s.

[A story of theatrical life.]

A LATE REPENTANCE. By T. W. SPEIGHT. 7¾×5, 328 pp. Digby Long. 6s.

[A "Tichborne claimant" story.]

THE STORY OF SARAH. By M. LOUISE FROSSLUND. 7¾×5½, 433 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

[A story of Dutch life in America.]

WIDOW WILEY AND SOME OTHER OLD FOLK. By BROWN LINNET. 7¾×5½, 307 pp. Seeley. 5s.

[Short stories of village life. With full-page photos from life.]

IRISH PASTORALS. By SHAN F. BULLOCK. 8×5½, 309 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

[Short stories.]

THE WORLD AND WINSTOW. By EDITH H. FOWLER. 7¾×5½, 369 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[In a country town and in London society, to which a draper's son gains admission through the Civil Service.]

LAW.

AN EPITOME OF THE LAW AFFECTING MARINE INSURANCE. By J. DIGGINSWORTH. [illegible]

MISCELLANEOUS.

A HISTORY OF POLICE IN ENGLAND. By CAPT. W. L. LEE. 7½×5, 416 pp. Methuen. 7s. 6d.

[From Anglo-Saxon times down to to-day. Englan Wales.]

THE BETTESWORTH BOOK. Talks with a Surrey Peas BOURNE. 7¾×5½, 325 pp. Lamley. 5s. n.

DREAMS AND THEIR MEANINGS. By H. G. HUTCHINSON 320 pp. Longmans. 9s. 6d. n.

[From the point of view of science and experience data supplied by correspondents, and two chapters on te premonitory dreams from the Journal of the Psychical Resear

AN IDLER'S CALENDAR. By G. L. APPERSON. 7×4½, 213 3s. 6d. n.

[Open-air sketches, mostly reprinted from the Globe.]

THE TEMPLE RECITER. Part I., Verse. Ed. by E. E 7½×5, 113 pp. H. Marshall. 1s. n.

[54 well-selected pieces, serious and humorous.]

THE THEATRE. The Development in France and England, an of the Greek and Latin Origins. By C. HASTINGS. Tra WELBY. 8¾×5¾, 368 pp. Duckworth. 8s. n.

[This book was fully reviewed in our columns when fir in French (Literature, February 9, 1901), by Mr. Walk conscientious and well-written history, closely packed w from the sixth century B.C. down to M. Maurice Donn Henry Arthur Jones.]

LETTERS ON LIFE. By CLAUDIUS CLEAR. 8½×5½, 277 p and Stoughton. 3s. 6d.

ESSAYS IN PARADOX. By the Author of "Exploded Ideas 200 pp. Longmans. 5s.

[Short essays on various subjects, written in a personal

HOME WORDS, Vol. for 1901. Home Words Office. 2s.

RAISON, FOI, PRIÈRE. Trois Lettres par CTE. LÉON TOLSTO du Russe par J. W. Bienstock. 4¾×7½, 32 pp. Paris: Stu

THE STALL PLATES OF THE KNIGHTS OF THE ORDER GARTER. Parts V. and VI. By W. H. ST. JOHN HOPE. 12s. 6d. net each.

SOME FEUDAL COATS OF ARMS. By J. FOSTER. 13½× Oxford: Parker.

[A very sumptuous work which has grown out of the over the book "Armorial Families." There are 2,000 ain from the Bayeux tapestry, heraldic rolls, &c., a catalogue coats of arms, heraldic introduction, &c.]

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE BOOK OF OLD-FASHIONED FLOWERS. Handbooks o Gardening, Vol. IV. By H. ROBERTS. 7¾×5½, 111 pp. Lan

[Hints for inexperienced gardeners on the growth o flowers, with half-tone illustrations.]

FROM A MIDDLESEX GARDEN. By A. H. HYATT. 8½ Wellby. 7s. 6d. n.

[Notes of a literary and reflective kind on each m garden. With a preface by "E. V. B." (the Hon. Mrs. Bo

NAVAL.

BRITANNIA'S BULWARKS. The Achievements of Our Se Honours of Our Ships. Ed. by COMMANDER C. N. ROBI 10½×14½, 96 pp. Newnes. 10s. 6d. n.

[This is a large-sized thinnish volume rather of the picture book, dealing with famous ships at every period of history. The illustrations are copious and the edition suppl letterpress written up to them. The great feature is splendid water-colour drawings of ships and fights by M Dixon, which are far more artistic than any we have seen.]

ORIENTAL.

A CATALOGUE OF SYRIAC MANUSCRIPTS, Preserved in bridge University Library. By the late W. WRIGHT. LL vols. 9×5¾. 1,290 pp. Cambridge University Press. 60s.

[Mr. S. A. Cook writes an introduction describing the of the collection.]

PHILOSOPHY.

THE ETHICAL PHILOSOPHY OF SIDGWICK. By F. H. H 7½×5, 275 pp. Sonnenschein. 4s. 6d.

[Hints for the study and a critical exposition of the t the "Methods of Ethics." Accepted by Cambridge Uni 1901 as an "original contribution to learning."]

INTUITIVE SUGGESTION. A New Theory of the Evolution By J. W. THOMAS, F.I.C., F.C.S. 8×5½, 160 pp. Longmans.

[Founded on the theory that the intuitive faculties ("

POLITICAL.

QUESTIONS AMÉRICAINES. Par T. Bentzon. 7¼×4¾. 310 pp. Paris: Hachette. Fr.3.50.

[Six Essays dealing with Socialism, feminism, colonial wars, &c. One is on "L'Armée Anglaise peinte par Kipling."]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

AYLWIN. By Theodore Watts-Dunton. (Snowden Edition.) 8×5. 436 pp. Hurst and Blackett. 3s. 6d.

[We are glad to see a cheaper cloth-bound edition of this fine novel (to which "The Coming of Love," though published earlier, was a sequel) with its mystical romance, its Romany lore, and its picture of D. G. Rossetti in D'Arcy. Mr. Watts-Dunton writes a preface discussing some criticisms.]

ITALIAN JOURNEYS. By W. D. Howells. Illustrated by J. Pennell. 8¼×6, 292 pp. Heinemann. 10s. n.

[This was first published in 1885. It has been not so much brought up to date as pruned and revised from the literary point of view. The abundant illustrations, many of them in Mr. Pennell's best manner, add much interest to the book.]

SACHARISSA. Some account of Dorothy Sidney, Countess of Sutherland, Her Family and Friends, 1617-1684. By Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Henry Ady). 3rd Ed. 9×5¾. 314 pp. Seeley. 7s. 6d.

[This excellent writer's account of Waller's Sacharissa was first published in 1893.]

AT THE COURT OF THE AMÍR. By J. A. Gray. 7¾×5¼. 523 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

[Mr. Gray was surgeon to the Amir. The book was first published in 1895; a short preface is now added on the succession to the Throne of Habibullah.]

THE ADVENTURES OF PICKLOCK HOLES. Together with a Perversion and a Burlesque. By R. C. Lehmann. 7¾×5, 172 pp. 2s. 6d. n. MR. PUNCH'S DRAMATIC SEQUELS. By St. John Hankin. 8×5¾. 246 pp. 3s. n. Bradbury Agnew.

[Both of these are familiar to readers of Punch, from whose pages they are reprinted. They are well worth republishing. "Picklock Holes" contains also "Lord Ormont's Mate and Matey's Aminta," and the Munchausen-like "Pink Hippopotamus." "The Sequels" are very amusing, and range from pure burlesque, like the sequel to "Hamlet," to present-day satire, like the sequel to "The Critic." The illustrations by Mr. E. J. Wheeler, with some by Mr. E. T. Reed to the "Pink Hippopotamus," add much to the humour.]

SCOTTISH ARCHITECTURAL DETAILS. By J. W. Small. 14×9¾. Stirling: E. Mackay. 25s., n.

[A reprint (with the exception of seven substituted plates) of the author's "Leaves from my Sketch Book" (1880), with the same beautifully-executed drawings.]

JEAN-PAUL MARAT, THE PEOPLE'S FRIEND. By E. B. Bax. 2nd Ed. 8×5¼. 253 pp. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

[This well-written attempt to defend Marat was published last autumn and reviewed by us on December 15, 1900.]

THE CHEMISTRY OF PAINTS AND PAINTING. By A. H. Church. Third Revised. 8×5¼. 355 pp. Seeley. 6s.

[This has long been out of print, and the present edition contains much new matter.]

ST. RONAN'S WELL. By Sir Walter Scott. (New Century Library). 6×4. 341 pp. Nelson. 2s. n.

[Another volume in this attractive series, with a capital frontispiece.]

THE LOVE POEMS OF BURNS. (The Lover's Library.) 5¼×3. 120 pp. Lane. 1s. 6d. n.

[Another of these dainty little books, which are now familiar to the public, printed in green ink with lilac decorations.]

COMING, OR THE GOLDEN YEAR. Third Edition. By Selina Gaye. 8×5¼. 340 pp. Seeley. 5s.

[This pretty tale of religious fancy was first published 1882.]

SONNETS. By R. C. Trench, D.D. Arrowsmith.

[A paper reprint of some of the Archbishop's Sonnets, handwritten, and very simply decorated by Miss A. J. Romilly.]

LA VIE MILITAIRE SOUS LE PREMIER EMPIRE. By Elzéas Blaze, Ancien officier de la Grande Armée. 4¾×7¼. 420 pp. Paris: Garnier. Fr.3.50.

[A reprint in one vol. of one of the best books ever written on the Grande Armée. The original appeared in 1837 in two vols., which have long been very rare.]

THEOLOGY.

GRACE AND CALLING. 74 pp., 2s. TESTIFY INGS. 219 pp., 4s. By H. W. Holden. 7¼×5

[Papers in the nature of sermons by the Vic The first expands the text "Called to be the doctrine that grace must precede the calling the teachings of St. Paul "to the state and tion."]

THE EARLY HISTORY OF THE CHURCH OF of Clifton. 7¼×5. 396 pp. Catholic Truth So

[Ecclesiastical history of the first two c Catholic Bishop of Clifton, who says, "I canno no controversial motive in publishing it."]

IMMORTALITY, AND OTHER SERMONS. Momerie. 7¼×5. 307 pp. Blackwood. 5s.

[Edited by Mrs. Momerie, with an Introdu explaining that he never left the Church. Ex views, two sermons supporting the theory of Fr

THE MONASTERY OF SAN MARCO. By G 130 pp. Dent. 3s. 6d. n.

[Mainly an account of the great men associa —Fra Angelico, Savonarola, and Fra Bartolom after the old masters. Well bound in green, wi

THE STORY OF JOSEPH. By J. R. Miller, Hodder and Stoughton. 2s. 6d.

[Lessons from Joseph's life, attractively g borders.]

UNIVERSITY SERMONS. Preached before the Ed. by Ll. J. M. Bebb. 7¾×5¼. 398 pp. Allen

[This selection of University sermons by tains a history of the "University sermon" as

THE TEMPLE BIBLE. Vols. I. and II.—GENES 170+143 pp. Dent. 1s. 6d. n. each.

[This series treats the Bible on its literary

A BOOK OF COMMON WORSHIP. Prepared New York State Conference of Religion. 6¼×

[The Conference is an indirect outcome of of Religions. The book attempts to provid used by members of all religions in common from the Bible; (2) readings from the "Ethn Persian, Buddhist, Mahomedan, &c.); (3) universality, of ethical and spiritual religion society and the State. The sources are given i

ROMAN LAW AND HISTORY IN THE NEW T Rev. S. Russ, LL.B. 7¾×5¼. 480 pp. Riving

[In four books—The Gospels, The Acts, Later Events.]

THE CENTURY BIBLE. The General Epistles. 6¼×4. 350 pp. Edinburgh: Jack.

[These capital little volumes are now w (Professor at New College and Hackney Colleg Fellow of St. Johns, Cambridge) gives comple comes the Authorized Version, then the Revis

TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW. By J. R. Mille Stoughton. 1s.

[One of the well-known decoratively i booklets by Dr. Miller.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRA

THE VICTORIA HISTORY OF THE COUNT WORCESTERSHIRE, Vol. I. Ed. by J. W 340 pp. Constable.

[This follows on the volumes on Hampshire Is the first of four volumes, and deals mainly w and antiquities.]

WANDERINGS ON THREE CONTINENTS. By R. F. Burton, K.C.M.G. Ed. by W. H. W Hutchinson. 16s. n.

[Mr. Wilkins is the editor of the "Burton forms the second volume published since Lady deal with the years 1853-1870, from Burton's his recall from Damascus—the years which "w life." Most of these essays were delivered many of his writings are now difficult to g popular form a consensus of his most important

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 212. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 431, 432, 433

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XXVII. Mr. Sidney Lee. An Appreciation by Dr. Richard Garnett 433

A PLEA FOR SATIRE.—A "Personal View," by R. E. V. 436

FOREIGN LETTER.—France, by W. M. Fullerton 437

THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 439

CURRENT LITERATURE—

Letters of John Richard Green 440

The World's History 441

The Windsor Shakespeare 442

Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare 443

Memoirs and Letters of Sir James Paget—Living London—What's What—Then and Now—Dreams and their Meanings—The Private Memoirs of Madame Roland—Women and their Work—Laity in Council—Maritime Law 444, 445, 446

Tales of Dunstable Weir—The Old Knowledge—D'ri and I—A Double Choice—The Purple Cloud—The Strange Disappearance of Lady Delia—The Million—King's End—The Bourgeois—A Gentleman Horsedealer—Dross—Farewell, Nikola—Tangles—Death the Showman—Severance—Mary Hamilton—The House of De Mailly—John o' God's Sending—Henry Hourland—Gyda the Goth—The Year One—A Deal with the King—The Lion's Brood—The Little Saint of God—In the Days of S. Anselm—The King's Ring—Edward the Exile—Gillette's Marriage—The Interloper—His Lawful Wife—Jesse—For All Time 446, 447, 448, 449

BOOKS AT AUCTION 450

ART NOTES 450

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—II. 451

CORRESPONDENCE—The Literary Agent—Was Amy Robsart Killed?.. 452

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for... 452, 453

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 453, 454, 455

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be

Mr. H. W. LUCY.

* * * * *

Books to read just published:—

"Diaries of the Emperor Frederick." (Chapman and Hall.)

"Mary Rich, Countess of Warwick." By Charlotte Fell Smith. (Longmans.)

"Country and Town in England." By Grant Allen. (Grant Richards.)

"Then and Now." By Dean Hole. (Hutchinson.)

"Angel." By Mrs. Croker. (Methuen.)

"King's End." By Alice Brown. (Constable.)

"The Ambassador's Adventure." By Allen Upward. (Cassell.)

* * * *

We hope next week to reproduce the cover design of a fine

An important Dickens announcement comes fr
We gave a list the other day of new editions now being issued in England. The novelist se moment equally popular in America. A New Yor
Mr. G. D. Sproul, well known through the sumptuou famous authors which he has launched, proposes to Dickens (called the St. Dunstan Edition) which wil number of distinguishing features. Each story will by a critical essay by one of the most prominent w day, and the following authors have already agreed t such introductions:—Algernon C. Swinburne, Edm Austin Dobson, Theodore Watts-Dunton, Sidney
Harte, Professor Saintsbury, George Gissing, Meynell, Miss Braddon (Mrs. Maxwell), Charles
Fitzgerald, Dr. Robertson Nicoll, Clement Sc
Pollock, &c. Among the artists engaged to fur illustrations are Harry Furniss, Gordon Browne (son Dickens' artist-in-chief), H. M. Brock, and Hugh Th preparation of the edition will be superintended b Kitton, who will supply notes (both bibliogra topographical) for each story. The St. Dunstan Ed divided into three sections, the illuminated bibliophiles' edition, and the autograph edition.
named, printed on special hand-made paper and comp volumes, will contain the autograph signatures of the and the bibliophiles' edition (also in fifty volume tinted borders on every page. The Illuminated edi very ornate, appealing to the wealthy collector of e
The text will be in a hundred volumes, printed o
only of selected skins of Italian parchment;
illuminated by hand, and the title-pages, chapte and tailpieces elaborately decorated. This illumina (In addition to the hundred volumes of letterpress) at least fifteen volumes of illustrations, chief impressions of all the plates and wood-cuts that hav produced to illustrate the writings of "Boz." A number of sets of the St. Dunstan Edition will be p English market. The issue, at the rate of one volu will begin in January next.

* * *

A characteristic figure of the old Oxford ge passed away in Dr. Charles Lempriere, D.C.L., Se of Saint John's College. He was eighty-three at the death, and the lives of himself and his father, the Lempriere of the "Classical Dictionary," covered (1765-1901). He was on the foundation of his college came, of course, from Merchant Taylors) for more five years. He would probably have repudiated journalists in the United States and in England, Dr. Lempriere will be remembered rather as a typical representative of the lay fellows of the unreformed University. He had travelled widely and he had a remarkable collection of stories, legal, political, social, and adventurous, which generation after generation of Oxford men heard with delight. In Oxford he has certainly not left his equal as a raconteur; and in his own college, to which he was devotedly attached, he must be keenly missed. The new system does not supply men like him; and with his death the change that has long been going on in academic and literary Oxford receives a further emphasis.

* * * *

Now that the lady publisher has arrived we shall probably have to discuss the possibilities of the book trade in general from the woman's point of view. Women booksellers, of course, have long existed in London, but mostly as dealers in second-hand books. There are two well-known lady booksellers in Kensington, however, who opened a regular shop as an experiment about eighteen months ago, and who have made a great success of it. Bookselling, they declare, is a delightful business for a woman, and one in which she has every opportunity of excelling. Publishing, of course, is a more serious matter and needs experience as well as capital to start with. "Florence White," the new publisher, begins appropriately with a "Home Series" which she edited for Mr. Grant Richards, and which she has taken over from him. We have also seen her Imprint on a new handbook on "Smallpox."

* * * *

It is nearly two hundred years since Elkanah Settle, the last of the City laureates, contributed to the glories of the Lord Mayor's Show. The poet made a popular organizer-in-chief of the yearly pageants, for he knew what his public wanted, though his attempts to flatter the Companies to which the new Chief Magistrates belonged were apt to be incongruous. On one occasion, for instance, when a Grocer happened to be elected, he introduced Diogenes into the pageant sitting in a currant-butt. It was characteristic of the ingenious Settle—years after he had measured his mediocre muse against the genius of Dryden—that he finally took to roaring in the body of a painted dragon for one of the shows of Bartholomew Fair. Hence the couplet which Pope puts into his mouth in the "Dunciad":—

> Yet lo! in me what authors have to brag on!
> Reduced at last to hiss in my own dragon.

There were dramatic representations, with songs, and orations in verse, when these "Triumphs"—or "London Pageants" as they were more commonly called—were in their prime; and they received the added dignity of being described in a separate official publication. "My Lord Mayor" in those days must sometimes have felt extremely uncomfortable amid all the poetic praise which was showered upon him:—

> You have done all things fair, no action foul;
> Your shereevelry gave relish of good rule,
> Nor need they doubt your mayoralty, therefore,
> Begging your pardon, I shall say no more.

This was in 1690, and followed after forty other lines in similar strain. One, "apparelled like a Moor," reminded the Lord Mayor of 1585 more sensibly of his duties to London:—

> This now remains, right honourable lord,
> That carefully you do attend and keep,
> This lovely lady, rich and beautiful,
> The jewel wherewithal your sovereign queen

Mr. Thomas Hardy denies the statement of that he has given up writing novels.

Mr. Shorthouse, we are glad to hear, is bett

Sir Theodore Martin, who has nearly rec recent illness, has left Llangollen for the South

Mr. Jerome K. Jerome is leaving Englar Brussels. He has completed his first long seri will appear in serial form first, and subsequen by Messrs. Hutchinson. His new play will be s by Miss Annie Hughes.

Among the literary birthdays of next w M. Louis Fréchette, the Canadian poet (Nov Mr. Joaquin Miller, "The Poet of the Sierras 1842), Mr. Winston Churchill, the American n ber 10, 1871), Mr. Julian Corbett, romance (November 12, 1854), Sir William Anson, the dis writer and Warden of All Souls (November Robert Hichens (November 14, 1864), and Mr. Aldrich, the American writer (November 11, 18

Emeritus Professor Masson has been obl health, to resign his seat on the Committee o Public Library Commissioners.

Mr. Owen Seaman has been elected a Committee of Management of the Society of Ant

The Rev. John Julian, LL.D., compiler of of Hymnology," has been presented to a canonry

Admiral Sir E. H. Seymour, was entertain the Authors' Club on Monday last, and made growing keenness of international competition.

A letter written by the late Queen Victori has been sold at Sotheby's auction rooms for £5

In a book sale in Wellington-street a copy Bacon's "Essayes or Counsels" was sold for £1 of the 1631 folio Shakespeare fetched £70, and Cities," first edition, inscribed "Charles D Macready, December, 1859," £25 10s.

Mr. Stanley Weyman's novel, "Count Han dramatised by the Rev. Freeman Wills and the Langbridge.

Next Friday Mr. Bernard Shaw will lectur hill under the auspices of the Northern He Society on "Literature on a Little Oatmeal."

The latest addition to the Tauchnitz seri selections from Swinburne, by Mr. William Sha

M. Rostand has announced his intentio inaugural speech at the French Academy in ver

The death is announced of Dr. Bruno Scho known German Socialist and Editor of the Leipz

The King of Italy is busily engaged upon hi Nummorum Italicorum," which is to be a liter history of the coinages of the 250 different mint

Publishers, Authors, and Agents.

Since we discoursed, in this column, upon literary agents, we have received letters on the subject from various correspondents, and have read a good many other letters on the same subject, addressed to the Author. Authors' agents have unquestionably, as the Americans put it, "come to stay"; and the reason is that they save trouble. One of the ways in which agents save trouble is pointed out in the communication which Mr. Arnold Haultain sends to us from Canada. To the colonial author who wishes to do business with a London publisher their existence is, as Mr. Haultain points out, an immense convenience, if not an absolute necessity. They place at his disposal information which it would be almost impossible for him to acquire in the colonies as to the status and the kind of business done by the different publishing houses, and, by providing a central depôt for manuscripts, save these manuscripts many superfluous journeys to and fro across the Atlantic or Pacific Oceans. To authors living in remote country places, or wintering abroad, or travelling for business or pleasure, they render a service less in degree but similar in kind; and indeed most of the authors who have taken part in the discussion pay the publishers the compliment of insisting upon the trouble which the agents save them rather than on the protection which they afford them against the possibility that an occasional publisher may, in his dealings with them, take advantage of his own greater knowledge and wider experience of the value of the literary property offered for sale or exploitation. Owing, indeed, to the desire of authors to save themselves trouble and to economize time which they could, or fancied they could, employ more profitably in writing, or studying, or meditating, or seeing life, literary agency was a flourishing business long before the literary agent was heard of. The publishers themselves did the whole of it in those days, and even now they still do a good deal of it. But, as it was not their main business, and as their main organization was directed to quite other ends, they naturally could not afford to act as agents for the marketing of serial, Continental, or American rights on such favourable terms as the men who were agents first and last and all the time. What an agent did for a ten per cent. commission, a publisher often felt himself obliged to charge as much as fifty per cent. for doing. Naturally, therefore, with the rapid and wide extension of American and serial markets, literary agency gradually passed into the hands of a particular set of men—several of whom, as a matter of fact, had retired from publishing in order to attend to it. The publishers themselves very constantly delegate to them any agency work with which they happen to have been entrusted. That fact alone would suffice to demonstrate their possibilities of usefulness to authors. Other reasons for looking favourably upon them are given by the Author's debaters. The agent, says Mr. E. F. Benson, "will be far more likely to know that magazine which will be suitable for his author's works, and, in the case of serialization, what magazines have openings, than the author himself." Mr. Eustace Miles says much the same in other words. Other authors frankly confess that their agents make better bargains for them than they were ever able to make for themselves. The array of argument is certainly weighty and the consensus of opinion is striking. But we are not prevented from thinking that the literary agency business, though good in itself, is a little over-done, and that some young authors are in too great a hurry to put their literary consciences into an agent's keeping. In literary, as in other matters, there are advantages to be gained by fighting the battle of life on your own account, instead of paying commissions to flesh-flies for your

Literature Portraits.—XX

MR. SIDNEY LEE.

Mr. Sidney Lee, regarded in the aspect with which are chiefly familiar, may be compendiously described a in biography. He is also much else, and perhaps might be characterized as an expert in early English, Elizabethan, literature. When, however, a man has thoroughly identified with a great undertaking as has M the "Dictionary of National Biography," it is no surprise if he bears his achievement about with him a and if the public almost resents his appearance in a unconnected with it. It is interesting to trace the co the scholar and literary critic into the biographer—a which, taking the term in its widest acceptation, we prepared to maintain. The progress of develop scholar into editor and from editor into biographer is Literary promise and University distinction gained College make Mr. Lee sub-editor of the dictionary commencement in 1883. After little more than during which twenty-one volumes have appeared, the of his unwearying services is felt to demand his assoc Mr. Leslie Stephen as joint editor. After little more t during which time six more volumes make their appe temporary failure of Mr. Leslie Stephen's health m Mr. Lee's appointment as the one man competen office, Mr. Stephen, upon his recovery, resuming his p foremost literary contributor. Mr. Lee carries on the Vol. 27 to its conclusion, in 1901, with Vol. 63, and add volumes of supplement recently published, leaving n business faculty, literary knowledge, tact, considerat urbanity never to be effaced from the recollection of had the good fortune to co-operate with him. M regressive movement has been observable, the edit his way back to authorship by the production o bound to develop into books. Mr. Lee had alread valuable contribution to Shakespearian literatu "Stratford-on-Avon, from the earliest times to the Shakespeare" (1885), and his acquaintance with eve spearian detail was so complete that his dictionary the poet, though most comprehensive, was evident ground-work of the book he was to write. It according (1898) into the independent work which has given M assured place among eminent biographers. Shortly a the necessity was imposed upon him of writing the li Victoria, and this obligation has produced a mem accurate, and impartial, so pervaded by a statesma and crowded with severely compressed facts, as to ne expansion which the biography of Shakespeare has to become in a certain measure the standard work on t There are respects, of course, in which no condens can aspire to so proud a place. The life of the Queen fully exhibited without access to a vast mass of do evidence, so much of which must be incorporated narrative as to render this a work of great extent. I be long before these materials become accessible, this is the case, although the ends of biography ma subserved by their publication, it may be otherwise ends of Literature.

The contrast between the methods of biography

times rightly, but more frequently without ground. If he has fatigued us with the merely trivial and irrelevant he is indeed open to reproof, but most commonly this is not the case. Everything that he has given us is in general really valuable, and it is rather his merit than his fault to have collected so much. His fault, if he has one, is to have claimed the standing of a biographer while he is in fact merely the purveyor of biographical material. Take one of the most notorious recent instances of a ponderous and inartistic biography—the official biography of Lord Tennyson—how much of it could we really spare? When it comes to be finally appraised by posterity the complaint will not be of the things inserted but of the things omitted. Or take what really does seem at the first view a brilliant example of thoroughly artistic treatment and a happy balance between narrative and document. This will be found for serious purposes a less satisfactory work than the Life of Tennyson. Froude's Life of Carlyle appears an almost perfect biography until the reader does what Froude never did—lift his eyes from the materials immediately before him and cast them upon the rich stores lying neglected around. If Froude had been a conscientious biographer, if he had not, like the monk in "The Misfortunes of Elphin," limited himself to "a single and simple draught of whatever happened to be before him," he, too, might well have sunk under the accumulation. As it is, the accident of material of the first importance as far as it went—though only a portion of a vast store—falling into the hands of an accomplished literary artist competent to shape it but too indolent to enrich it, has adorned our literature with a truly classical and very inadequate biography.

We conclude, then, that the official biographer, he who undertakes a task imposed upon him by a sense of duty or by his special relation to the deceased, will in general be obliged to resign himself to act as intermediary between the crude material on which he operates on the one hand, and on the other the artist of the future who will recognise that much which now cannot be overlooked will have proved itself of merely transient interest. Our literature does, indeed, possess something of the kind in the abridged biographies, which have of late years been so numerous; but the need for cheapness has constrained the writers to err as far on one side as the official biographer has been constrained to err on the other. Nothing, for example, can be more masterly in their way than Mr. Morley's miniature Lives of Burke and Walpole, but Mr. Morley would be the last to deem that the final words of biography upon such men could be uttered with such brevity. Lord Rosebery has almost shown how a bulky and unreadable Life of Pitt may be superseded; had his scale been about twice as large, Bishop Tomline might have passed from the library to the lumber room, whither it is hardly safe to remand him at present. In his lives of Shakespeare and Queen Victoria Mr. Lee has come nearer than any one to affording a model for the condensed, but not shrunken, biography of the future, and his success is due in great measure to his association with the "Dictionary of National Biography" so long directed by him.

The superintendence of an undertaking like the "Dictionary of National Biography" must indeed be a rare qualification for the work of a biographer. It involves acquaintance with every kind of character, the man of action, the man of thought, the man of art, nor less those phases of human life which attract mainly by eccentricity or picturesqueness. It implies endowment with that quality above all essential to a biographer, a just sense of proportion, and moreover that extensive knowledge without which a sense of proportion will find no scope for never been necessary to plead any. Equally combination of a high tone of general impartial openness in the expression of opinion, with abstinence from anecdotes that might give p that might give offence. When the great nu tors is considered, it is evident that this discr be largely due to the judicious supervision of Mr. Lee. Mr. Lee, indeed, has had but litt exercise of this wise moderation in his own chiefly relate to the literary figures of h numerous are they, however, that had he nev editorial office, he would still have been on spicuous persons in the history of the Diction of articles contributed by him, not including the Supplement, is 820, comprising 1,370 pages, have been furnished by the next most co The collective extent of these is almost exa three volumes, or nearly one-twentieth part of t a large proportion are short memoirs of indi known to be readily undertaken by ordinary therefore involving more troublesome resea names, many are upon personages of the first c great article on Shakespeare may be placed bethans who most nearly approach Shakespea awakening interest, and whose place in liter more nearly approached his but for their p Sidney and Marlowe. Sterne, a less sympa afforded matter for a memoir which, from its o even more of a biographical landmark. Au important biographies may be named those of F gist, Gower, Howard, Earl of Surrey, Nash, I Stanhope, Earl of Chesterfield.

Few modern books have from the first take a position as the standard works on their resp Mr. Lee's Life of Shakespeare. Two causes may and foremost Mr. Lee's great though simple dis from critical disquisition, Shakespeare's life cou The scantiness of our information about Sh parison with his stupendous position in liter such a commonplace that it had been almost fo information actually did exist, and readers the reappearance of a personality deemed ob emergence of a faded picture under the h restorer. By the dexterous use of every trai to depict the world in which Shakespeare u made Shakespeare himself, if not an altogeth perfectly visible figure. Such a feat could one thoroughly steeped in the atmosphere of and Mr. Lee's previous literary career may ne been a long unconscious training for it. The the special practice obtained by work o dictionary is perceptible in the Life of Shake pragmatic character, its lucid precision, an superfluities. Among these must be reckoned is no superfluity, the æsthetic criticism which case may worthily employ the highest tacu indulged without restraint, might easily subme Mr. Lee has been wisely content to indicat mentally demonstrating, his competence for the subject. Once, indeed, treating the vex "only begetter" of the Sonnets, he offers a s ling originality with which I, for my part, an But the question is not æsthetic, but of th

Queen's life and reign shall be written from official sources, and to resume this position when the more ambitious work, remanded to the library of the historical student, shall have ceased volitare per ora virûm. The only unfavourable criticism which I have seen passed upon this admirable memoir, objecting a certain austerity of tone, seems to me to indicate defective appreciation of the correct attitude of a dictionary of biography. The articles in such a work have something of a monumental character; they are to serve as authorities for a long series of generations, and it is necessary to consider how they will be regarded by posterity. Hence the enthusiasm which may be legitimate in dealing with personages whose place in history has long been settled must be restrained in the case of contemporaries; the reader of the twenty-first century must not be able to criticize the writer of the twentieth as carried off his balance by the emotions of his day. Should Mr. Lee's article become a book, we doubt not that it will be found to throb with the pulse of the time.

While Mr. Lee's special task might seem to be the development of that form of biography which the age especially demands, something intermediate between the storehouse of detail and the mere compendium, this is far from the only form in which trained intelligence and vast experience could be rendered useful to biography. The great Dictionary, one of the most remarkable instances of the application of the co-operative principle to literature, may be the prelude of more extensive manifestations of this universal tendency. Its publication, and that of the excellent German biographical dictionary of the Munich Academy, have brought the universal dictionary appreciably nearer; it would even now be perfectly possible to compile one for the Teutonic, Anglo-Saxon, and Scandinavian races. Again, our national archives and collections of manuscripts in private hands abound with unused biographical detail, only needing to be extracted and published on some systematic plan. Whether in any of these or in some other manner, we trust that Mr. Lee's proved ability and unparalleled experience will be made available on his return from the change of scene which, one regrets to hear, he has been compelled to seek as a consequence of the excessive strain imposed by the Supplement to the Dictionary.

R. GARNETT.

Mr. Sidney Lee's earliest published writings, which appeared while he was still an undergraduate at Balliol, consist of two articles in the Gentleman's Magazine—"The Original of Shylock" (February, 1880) and "A New Study of Love's Labour's Lost" (October, 1880). They attracted the favourable notice of Shakespearean scholars and critics, and thus was laid the first stone of the edifice of Mr. Lee's contributions to Elizabethan history and literature. The Shylock article formed the nucleus, so to speak, of the memoir of Roderigo Lopez in the thirty-fourth volume of the "Dictionary of National Biography" (1893), and that on Love's Labour's Lost was expanded in 1886 into a paper read at a meeting of the New Shakespeare Society, entitled "The Topical Side of the Elizabethan Drama." It was afterwards printed in the society's transactions and also in pamphlet form. In 1882 Mr. Lee edited, for the Early English Text Society, a reprint of Lord Berners' early sixteenth-century translation of the French mediæval romance, "Huon of Burdeux." Mr. Lee's first original work was "Stratford-on-Avon from the Earliest Times to the Death of Shakespeare." It was published in 1885, and formed a handsome folio volume, with illustrations by Edward Hull. A new edition (octavo), with Hull's illustrations, appeared in 1890. In 1886 Mr. Lee edited, with many valuable additions, the autobiography of Lord Herbert of Cherbury.

The rest of Mr. Lee's published writings group themselves under three heads—(1) the work done by him in connexion with

More, Jane Seymour, Edmund Spenser, and Whitgift. The list is not confined to the Eli Of memoirs of persons belonging to other most considerable are, perhaps, those of William C Herbert of Cherbury, and Laurence Sterne. The artic Victoria and Mr. George Smith (the originator an of the Dictionary) form Mr. Lee's most important to the supplementary volumes of the Dictionary;
that might be mentioned are the lives of James Dyk and G. W. Steevens. On January 31, 1896, Mr. lecture at the Royal Institution, London, on Biography," which was printed in the Cornhill
March of that year. By the wish of the late Mr. G it was also printed in pamphlet form and contributors to the "Dictionary of National Twenty-five copies were privately issued an by the author, with the concurrence of Mr. Ge for presentation to a few friends and colleagues are prefaced by a dedicatory letter from the
Mr. Leslie Stephen. The lecture was once agai for distribution among the members of the Internati Congress at the Guildhall, London, July 13, 1897.

The first edition of the "Life of Shakespeare" (t Shakespeare in the "Dictionary of National Biog published in June, 1897, in the fifty-first volume) November 22, 1898; a second was called for on and a third on January 2, 1899. The fourth editio in March, 1899. A library edition, illustrated with portraits, facsimiles, and typographical views, was December, 1899, and a Students' edition, entitled "S Life and Work: Being an abridgment chiefly for students" was put forth in November, 1900, at the half-a-crown. A German translation of the original duced by a highly appreciative preface from the Richard Wülker, appeared at the end of 1900. "S Hand-writing," a pamphlet with facsimiles of the fi signatures of the poet (extracted from the "Life of Sha was published in 1899.

Besides the lecture on "National Biograph mentioned, Mr. Lee has contributed the following the Cornhill Magazine—"The Death of Queen Eli Anniversary Study" (March, 1897); "Shakespea
Earl of Southampton" (April, 1898); "The Shake Folio: some Notes and a Discovery" (April, 1899); " and Shakespearean Drama" (May, 1900); and "
and Patriotism" (May, 1901). To the Nineteenth has contributed "Shakespeare in France" (June,
"On Shakespeare and the Modern Stage" (January the Fortnightly Review, "Shakespeare and the Earl of (February, 1898). An article on "The Admirable appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine (March, 188 Bibliographica he contributed a paper entitled bethan Bookseller" (cf. Vol. I., Part 4, 1895).

Among the most interesting of the pamphlet
Mr. Lee from time to time are "The Study of Eng ture, an address delivered at the inaugural meeting of Literary Association, at Toynbee Hall, Tuesday, 1893," which was printed for private circulation at
of the Committee of the Association; Shakespea Henry the Fifth," written on the occasion of the pr
the play by Messrs. Lewis Waller and William Moll Lyceum Theatre, Christmas, 1900; and "Shakespea Elizabethan Playgoer," a lecture delivered at Quee
Harley-street, London, on March 20, 1900, then "An English Miscellany," a volume presented to D in honour of his seventy-fifth birthday, February 4, afterwards reprinted as a pamphlet.

A book has just been completed under the aus United States Government which, apart from the its subject, will give a fruitful field to those enric in literature who amuse themselves by computing

A PLEA FOR SATIRE.

A "Personal View."

Twentieth-century literature seems to be remarkable at present for a dearth that would at any time be peculiar in a civilized community that knows the art of writing—a dearth of satire. For satire is not, like tragedy, the result of great poets being born in conjunction with great times; rather it is the very concomitant of putting pen to paper as natural to all the fins-de-siècle that have followed the age of innocence as ballad-making was to that age, as common as letter-writing, as necessary as billets-doux. Swift, in his preface to the "Battle of the Books," explained the reason of its popularity when he wrote—after his double-edged fashion—that "Satire is a sort of glass wherein beholders do generally discover everybody's face but their own; which is the chief reason for that kind reception it meets with in the world, and that so very few are offended with it." But Swift would have been a fish out of water at the present day, unless by his own efforts he could have made the tide flow again.

Some people, indeed, maintain that we are not without our satirists, mentioning Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Seaman, Mr. Max Beerbohm. And these no doubt are excellent in their way. Punch maintains its place, and its genial persiflage contributes greatly to the amusement of county families. But that, I gather, is mainly because they see their own faces in Punch, and not everybody's but their own. Where, then, does the satire come in? What do snobs learn from it, as in the days of Thackeray; what advice, gratis, to nations is there, as when Keene drew? In the works of Mr. Shaw, most people are apt to see Mr. Shaw's face, tolerably mocking, it is true—but a little too cock-sure to be taken for that of an evangelist in disguise. And much the same applies to Mr. Beerbohm, except that he is too modest. It might be said of him, as Matthew Arnold said of the poet Gray, "he never speaks out"—not even in the Saturday Review. If Mr. Seaman possesses the true qualities of a satirist, the ability, inter alia, of using his pen like a sword (which matter from sheer ignorance I leave to others to decide) he is the solitary exception, and may be taken to prove the saying with which I opened—that there is a dearth of satire.

Now a dearth of satire argues one of those two things—a dearth of satirists or a dearth of satirical matter, or perhaps both. That the number of satirists is not large I have already suggested. But not even the most serene of optimists—not even Mr. Hall Caine, let us say, or the Marquis of Salisbury—would seriously maintain that there is a shortage of opportunities for satire. In the world of religion, when has there been a greater abundance of monstrous folly than is to be found in those strange beliefs that appear to have become one of the chief exports from the United States of America? Not so very many years ago Mr. Mallock in his "New Paul and Virginia" made amusing havoc of the religion of humanity. And that, by comparison with some recent "religions," is the very essence of philosophic

I incline to think English Literature is one larly that romantic portion of it that deals wi Our novelists, at least, have never encour tendency to splendid isolation. Assisted by the tour in many countries and gather honey from understood why, in the circumstances, we are acc For whereas a French novelist lays his plots usua draws his characters from his compatriots, whom German in Germany and a Russian in Russia), narrow and more imaginative—"Imagination circular Tourist Ticket" is a title for an essay t written—our novelists, I say, lay their plots in Russia, with indiscriminate generosity. Ev the fatherland of our novelists. Perhaps tha not as prophets held in honour outside our own that is why it is worth while praying for anoth or even Junius.

Of all fields the political is surely the one batten on most. True, he was a party politicia the two—two for the sake of argument—part such an adherent! It is almost impossible to by a fatuity of circumstances it has come about when the two parties have reached the tw Jingoism and Pro-Boerism, there is hardly a wri of either that can deliver himself of more than art of political leader-writing appears to be re —enchantingly simple—of saying "You're ano different ways as will serve to fill a column. selves are no better. Sir Henry Campbell-Ban he blushes for Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Ch that he doesn't care, and so they go on. Pope's satire on Lord Hervey, for instance, wa say that it was more effective. And if matt come to such a pass that Pro-Boers conceive th in accusing Jingoes of being worked by a R capitalists, and Jingoes in accusing Pro-Boers money from Dr. Leyds, it does seem as if raison d'être.

Is personal satire then to be recommended that those social reformers who condemned on the ground that it was so abused in the ci have mastered the whole of the argument. liability to be misused is against it, and the m the private man is to be distinguished from the a more complete justice on the whole. Bu satire, which depended on its wit for its po than the nursery personalities that politicians in If we are to call each other names, why not giv stick? I do not see how I can call a certain a boor—merely in a Pickwickian sense. I h wish to do so. But other politicians have, and short at the wish. Therefore they call him a b result? Nil, except a loss, so to speak, to And yet they meant something, they were fu were earnest and conscientious. The mistak more convincing in its way, especially if it be compounded of savage indignation and wit. And yet no one sharpens his pen for the purpose. It may be, of course, that satirists exist, but will not declare themselves. Perhaps no one really does feel indignant at anything—not even a Liberal at Mr. Chamberlain or at the policy of concentration camps. Perhaps we all feel that we are all sinners together, and that even a Liberal Government would not immediately accomplish the millennium. Or, in other moods, that we are all flying so high that any attempt to call attention to the faulty wings of our meteoric neighbour will only result in fixing the popular gaze on our own absurdities. But what I venture to think is the chief reason for the dearth of satirists is this—that we are all in love with popularity. The twentieth century has made popularity into a virtue, whereas it is a vice of the worst description unless it occurs a hundred years after a man is dead. Popularity was not so desired by previous generations—possibly, of course, because they were not so bent on virtue. They liked to let loose their moral indignation at times, even though it provoked a counter storm. So satire flourished. It will flourish again when satirists are ready to run the risk—the almost certain peril—of not pleasing everybody.

R. E. V.

FOREIGN LETTER.

FRANCE.

THE SUMMER OUTPUT OF FRENCH LITERATURE.

If Shakespeare had been a modern Frenchman he would have answered to the question "Who stays Time still withal"? by the instance not only of the lawyer in the Long Vacation, but of the Parisian publisher between the middle of June and the middle of October. During this period criticism chiefly consists in spasmodic indications as to the merits of some novel fitted for railway travel or the seaside. Nevertheless, before mentioning the score, more or less, of volumes which have had their place in the satchels of French tourists during the last three months, there are a few literary events of interest to record:—The erection of yet another monument to one of those poetae minores, this time Gabriel Vicaire, of whom some months ago I spoke in these columns, the arrival at the National Library of the precious little package of the Goncourt archives, and the resuscitation of the long-forgotten Paul de Kock.

A posthumous volume by Vicaire, "Au Pays des Ajoncs: Avant le Soir," has just appeared, which may be commended to those whose acquaintance with the French poets is confined to the classics and the Parnassians. Le pays des ajoncs is Brittany, the Brittany of saints and fairies, of haunting superstitions, and the environing sea, a world that had become a second patrie for Vicaire. In the poems collected under the second title, "Avant le Soir," there are verses that have a wonderful, a Lamartinian, charm:—

> Parfois, nous semble-t-il, un reflet de l'aurore
> Illumine la lande où nous allons rêver.
> Mais ce jour incertain, qu'il est timide encore!
> Que l'aube de nos cœurs est lente à se lever!

seem little concerned with these matters of fi[illegible] being writers whose books sell admirably. Th[illegible] production of a Goncourt Academician, the "[illegible] (Plon) of the brothers Margueritte (although Pa[illegible] chosen by Goncourt) was a few weeks ago in its [illegible] edition. The volumes of Elémir Bourges, too, one [illegible] new Academicians—the other two being M. Ladem[illegible] M. Léon Daudet—are commanding in first editions [illegible] which the contemplated reprint by M. Stock be[illegible] already "Le Crépuscule des Dieux"—will natura[illegible] diminish. M. Descaves and the Margueritte[illegible] both army, but in a very different spirit. The former, in "[illegible] (Stock), records the significant episode of the Com[illegible] Vendôme column came crashing to the ground, and [illegible] the grognards of the Hôtel des Invalides is not [illegible] sons of General Margueritte would have signed. [illegible] Victor Margueritte have the same painstaking pati[illegible] ing with the war of 1870 as M. Descaves or M. Z[illegible] cannot forget that they are the heirs of a glor[illegible] name, and they do not let the cult à la Goncourt of [illegible] fact absorb them to the exclusion of poetic truth [illegible] bears as its title the famous exclamation of the [illegible] William when he beheld the sublime chemuchée [illegible] Sedan, and forms a stirring epic of the events of [illegible] banks of the Moselle and the Loire.

With the best good will in the world, it woul[illegible] within the limits of the period taken for this s[illegible] many more than twenty new books which sho[illegible] and not simply borrowed for an hour from [illegible] library. Let us begin with the French novel. O[illegible] curious literary phenomena of the moment is the su[illegible] the dead Jean Lombard's "Byzance" (Ollendorff) [illegible] years of almost complete oblivion, this new edition [illegible] the tables of the Paris salons by M. Paul Marg[illegible] unique performance in literary mosaic, full of [illegible] Byzantine in its play of barbaric splendours, but t[illegible] unreadable book, as well as the most un-French, w[illegible] sold to the extent of 50,000 copies within a month [illegible] "Quo Vadis" in the hands of the French public [illegible] its archæologic erudition to dwell on its meretric[illegible] ism. It is impossible for the faithful historian [illegible] it; it is no less impossible to assert its pleasure-g[illegible] for readers of taste and intelligence. The same m[illegible] the other reprint of a work by the same author, [illegible] (Ollendorff), although it is presented to the public [illegible] Mirbeau, who is, at all events, a man of inte[illegible] preface is the best thing in the book.

Hardly less widely-read, and not less frankl[illegible] but a finer product, is the "Aventures du Roi [illegible] M. Pierre Louÿs (Fasquelle), a new departure [illegible] manner on the part of the writer, but, despite much t[illegible] an English taste, no less noticeable than his other [illegible] excellence of style. There is much intellectual [illegible] be got out of M. Tristan Bernard's "Mari Paci[illegible] Blanche). The pacific husband, whose sensation[illegible] here depicts with quiet humour, is merely any a[illegible] married man in France, and it is of his every-day [illegible] his wife, his wife's family, and the little conve[illegible] world in which he moves that M. Bernard ha[illegible] historian. No one could have written the boo[illegible] appearance of the Monsieur Bergeret series. Noth[illegible] thinner than the texture, but it is of the very ve[illegible]

reveals rich sensibility in noting the more refined "states of soul" of the well-bred jeune fille as she evolves amidst the conventions of refined French life. The book has too little form of the sort which delights in the two novels just mentioned, but it has a tenderness and a charm of verisimilitude which distinguish it from most modern fiction. One is struck more and more by the documentary value of French fiction. A story like "Petite Ville," by Claude Anet (Revue Blanche), is, in its kind, as good as a chapter of Taine for the comprehension of French provincial life. And of the same kind of worth, but prodigiously unwholesome, offering the documentation, happily, of a very narrow world, are the "Monsieur de Phocas" of Jean Lorrain (Ollendorff), M. Alfred Jarry's "Messaline" (Revue Blanche), and "La Morte Irritée," by M. François de Nion (Revue Blanche), works which no doubt would be better in the hands of the modern psychologist than in those of the French jeune fille who has been looking at them askance. The latter story shows unmistakably the influence of such men as Professor Pierre Janet, or Dr. Paul Hartenberg, or Dr. Maurice de Fleury, on belles-lettres in France. The second of these specialists has even become himself a novelist, and, after having produced one of the most curious of monographs on that too-common type, the person suffering from an extravagant self-consciousness, in "Les Timides et la Timidité" (Alcan), he has attempted to illustrate his thesis in a story entitled "L'Attente" (Ollendorff). The novel demonstrates the correctness of his analysis of the timid type, synthesizing results at which he had arrived in his treatise. The two books should be read together, as an interesting example of a trained psychologist invading the field of pure letters for the instruction of outsiders. And it is to be regretted that M. Huysmans has not availed himself of the uncontested scientific explanations of the trances and flagellations which abound in the lives of Saints, and notably in the life of that Saint Lydwine of Schiedam to which he has devoted a characteristic but incomplete book (Stock).

We must not quit the world of fiction without offering to M. Jean de Mitty our congratulations on his discovery and preparation for the Press of an unpublished novel by Stendhal which, written in Italy between 1831 and 1836, has been sleeping in the portfolios of the Grenoble Library ever since, "Lucien Leuwen," (Revue Blanche). No one who has not grubbed among these manuscripts can realize the amount of patient labour required for such a task. But M. de Mitty is a pious Beylist, and among Stendhal's pages those which he has here saved from oblivion are well worthy to take their place; they are a psychological study of society in the time of Louis Philippe, meriting, like Dr. Hartenberg's book, an essay by themselves.

So much, then, for recent fiction. I turn to quite another class of production and note the appearance of a new, greatly enriched, edition of Professor Langlois' "Manuel de Bibliographie Historique" (Hachette), a book known already in its earlier form in every University in the world, and of the fourth volume of the "Année Sociologique" (Alcan), published under the direction of Professor Durkheim, in which we have, besides the original memoirs, some 500 pages of analyses of all the sociologic literature of the world between July 1899 and 1900. The utility of this publication needs no commendation. Sociological studies in France have highly developed in late years the monographs of French students vying in number and in interest with the series of the Johns Hopkins University. Among the most striking of these volumes is the study, just published by Alcan, on labour and food questions in Australia and New Zealand, in a book by Doctor [illegible]. He plays to-day for Australasia the seaweed. M. Seignobos, with a soul undaunted armchair to the strand, and, unlike Canute, det the waves. His method is not a new one, but for organon it certainly is. He explains how to test this mass of uncoordinated matter, and his book It is the companion volume, worthy of its pre now famous "Introduction" already named. O the more when one reads a book like "L'Opinio by M. Tarde, or "L'Évolution du Socialisme Bourdeau (Alcan), where the atmosphere is times journalistic rather than scientific, though the suggestiveness, the real brilliancy, of both of essays.

That the essay form, however, has compensa impossible in the soberer prose dominated by method, is certain; and we find this prove Chevrillon's "Études Anglaises" (Hachette), and in Mme. Théodore Bentzon's "Questions Américai These two volumes can be grouped together not the similarity of their theme—both deal with characteristics under different social milieux—b they supplement each other as a report of the of English and American life. Mme. Bentzon one of the "Anglo-Saxon" clans, that of N incomparable. No one is so well fitted as interpreter of the social aspects of life on the A communities to the readers of the Old World. has a prose style poetic and rich in literary allu random, and fall upon his reflections on the typ gentleman as portrayed by Millais, Watts, Wells

> Belles et braves âmes que celles de ces au regard si cordial et si droit, dont l'œil a frais de l'enfance, et la joue le premier inca n'a fait que se faner doucement. On aime à on se sent devenir meilleur et plus fort dev devant tout ce qui est harmonieux, juste e dans l'ordre. Ils nous disent la vie saine de s'encadrant dès l'enfance dans son groupe na dans un milieu de calme et de beauté, à l'abr des vilenies, enveloppé et protégé par l'Illu instincts héréditaires et les préjugés qui soutie dont il aide à former la substance, lié à elle, et pour elle, achève à se développer, et reste les êtres qui vivent en équilibre avec eux-mê leur milieu.

A portrait like this is as fine as any of t evoked it, and it is a fair sample of the quality of book. This is literature, literature without a tra such as a James Russell Lowell or a Charles Lam finer than issued often from the uncertain quil But there is much that is noticeable on a utterance. There lies before me a book inte informed, in which one of the younger Fre Charles Legras of the Débats, introduces to his English novelists from Mr. George Meredith an Miss Marie Corelli and Mr. Hamilton Aïdé catholic—and the English poets, the critics and eighteen little essays under the title "Chez No d'Angleterre" (Ollendorff). There has appeare a little volume of great talent by one of the French biologists, "Le Conflit" (Colin), by along the Dalmatian coast at Spalato and Salone, at Delphi, at Athos, Cyprus, and Jerusalem, and we shall have given a fair report of the best that has been thought and said in France during this last summer. As one looks back across the period two volumes conspicuously claim our attention; that of M. Seignobos and the "Études Anglaises" of M. Chevrillon. They prove once again the sanity and soberness of the French intellect, its interpretative power, and its superiority in artistic expression.

W. M. FULLERTON.

THE DRAMA.

"THE SENTIMENTALIST." "THE LIKENESS OF THE NIGHT." "SHEERLUCK JONES."

In appreciating the talent of Mr. H. V. Esmond in the last issue of this review Mr. Hamilton Fyfe confessed himself puzzled to find "the real Esmond." May I suggest that the real Esmond you cannot see because, like the Spanish Fleet, the real Esmond is not yet in sight? That the real Esmond is still in the making? That Mr. Esmond has not yet "found himself"? In other words, that he is not yet an intellectual adult? I put this point interrogatively, because I, too, am puzzled, with the rest of Mr. Esmond's admirers. "Quel est donc ce mystère?" as the man says in Racine's play. It is better to assume immaturity as the solution, because that leaves room for hope. Further one may justify the solution by pointing to the fact that Mr. Esmond's work is still in the imitative stage. Imitations and reminiscences—probably unconscious (and the more unconscious, the better evidence in support of my point)—abound in The Sentimentalist. The hill-top and its symbolism and even the dialogue between poet and sweetheart which is uttered there have traces of Ibsen and particularly of When We Dead Awaken—Ibsen banalized, unfortunately, and brought down from philosophic poetry to what Victor Hugo called "guitares"—that is to say, tra-la-la sentiment about the dawn and the storm, birds and flowers, the pure ether and "the great world down there," the marriage of true minds and a loveless union with a wealthy baronet. That is the worst of Ibsen; he won't mix with barley-sugar; nor is he to be given away with a pound of tea. Then Mr. Esmond gives us a hero who, after loving a lady, falls in love with the lady's daughter when she grows up to be the very image of her mother. See Maupassant's "Fort Comme la Mort," or an early Pinero called The Weaker Sex. That was never a pretty theme, with whatever tact it might be treated; but when Mr. Esmond brings in the mother grown ludicrously fat, and bewailing her thirteen stone, he makes the theme positively ugly, and so only fit for farce. In the three-and-twenty years which pass between the sentimentalist's passion for the mother and his passion for the daughter he lives a life of reckless debauchery. Why? Not because Mr. Esmond looking at life for himself has seen any sentimentalists behaving like that; but because he has seen plays or remembered novels wherein they behave like that. We all know that debauchee in fiction. "Ah, I, too, believed in pure love once; but a woman jilted me, and I swore to be revenged on the whole sex; and now I am what you see!" And, with Mr. Burchell, we whisper "Fudge!" That is a monosyllable I earnestly commend to Mr. Esmond. When these stage conventions beckon to him, let him whisper Fudge! to himself man, a Duke, and, of course, a cynic and a bla[illegible] youth and beauty with diamond tiaras, we know Esmond got him. He comes from that very F[illegible] which he accuses the sentimentalist of reading—th[illegible] I am myself the dupe of a convention when I ascribe to the Family Herald, which is, nowadays, ver[illegible] austerely scientific organ. It is safer, then, to [illegible] wicked Duke belongs to the literature of the kitche[illegible] does the murder of the Duke by means of a poiso[illegible] (or whatever the lethal weapon is). It is an excelle[illegible] melodrama, this murder, just as the thirteen-stone [illegible] excellent idea for farce, and just as the scene wh[illegible] hesitating between the confessing suitors A and [illegible] suitor C because he holds his tongue is an excelle[illegible] comedy. But to serve up these various ideas of co[illegible] and melodrama in one and the same play is a wil[illegible] and the most indulgent view one can take of it is t[illegible] be a boyish "lark." And yet the players—Mr. W[illegible] mentalist), Miss Miriam Clements (sweetheart), an[illegible] Somerset (duke)—are quite serious over it. Th[illegible] enough; for it is the business of actors to act—"t[illegible] reason why." It is the playwright's business, [illegible] reason why; and it is to be hoped that M[illegible] having fancy, stage-craft, vitality, and all sorts [illegible] qualities, will by-and-by see his way to makin[illegible] reasonable.

It is easy to be wise after the event, and t[illegible] must not say that The Likeness of the Night, [illegible] Clifford's play which Mr. and Mrs. Kendal brou[illegible] year at Fulham and have now revived at the St. [illegible] obviously the work of a novelist. Nevertheless [illegible] unmistakably illustrate M. Brunetière's favourite p[illegible] it is proper to dramatic characters to act, to exert [illegible] whereas the characters in a novel are acted upon. [illegible] this play, on discovering the "second household" [illegible] by her husband, does not show fight; she simply [illegible] fate and drifts into suicide. So the mistress, now [illegible] second wife, when she discovers that the first wife [illegible] suicide, makes no attempt "to see the thing thro[illegible] also bewails her fate, and shrinks from the husband [illegible] the corpse floating between them. And there are se[illegible] the various parties argue out the case of love [illegible] bonds, but no scenes wherein "passion and duty co[illegible] the grapple" in definite action. Everybody there [illegible] nobody an agent. But "novelistic" though it is [illegible] instead of dramatic, the play certainly ought to int[illegible] playgoer by the clearness with which its theme has b[illegible] out and the distinction with which it is presented. [illegible] there is the superb cri du cœur of Mrs. Kendal in t[illegible] and the hysteric passion of Mrs. Beerbohm Tree in t[illegible] please the lovers of "emotional" acting—whose pleasu[illegible] will be a little tempered by a vague surprise th[illegible] women as are here presented should sacrifice one her[illegible] other her honour for so weak and colourless a husband, poor Mr. Kendal, is compelled to play. M[illegible] has not, I submit, been at sufficient pains to explain us; he is really little more than a ficelle. Is he a [illegible] Or a "collector" of domestic specimens? Or a lad[illegible] "mere man?" The last, I fancy; for he is not [illegible] consistent character; a man who cannot say bah! t[illegible] pooh! to a hysterical woman would never have the p[illegible] two establishments.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

JOHN RICHARD GREEN.

LETTERS OF JOHN RICHARD GREEN. Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN. (Macmillan. 15s.)

It is difficult to realise that John Richard Green's laborious and fruitful life lasted for little more than forty-five years. He gave Tennyson the impression of being "as vivid as lightning," and vivid no doubt he was; but it would be truer to say of him that his genius, his energy, and the brightness of his nature were not fitful, but constant, in their quality. Let us call it rather vitality than vividness. It is clear from these letters that few men have had a greater power of learning and of enjoying the best things that life has to offer. Even at forty-five he had accomplished a great deal. When we consider what he had done, and what he intended to do, we shall see how great a historian was lost to us when he died.

For all practical purposes this volume of letters is as good as a biography. In some respects, indeed, it is much better, for it includes none of the trivial details which formal biographies too often contain. The letters, a continuous series from early manhood, cover nearly the whole ground, and speak for themselves. Whatever else is necessary in the way of narrative, and now and then of criticism, is supplied—we need not say, admirably—by the editor, Mr. Leslie Stephen, who has had the assistance throughout of Mrs. Green. From the first it is evident that Green's vocation in life was not Churchmanship but literature. For the practical duties of an East London clergyman—and almost all his active clerical life was spent in the East-end—his unselfishness and his natural kindliness well fitted him; but his leisure, such as it was, was devoted to historical reading, and to a long series of articles for the Saturday Review, most of which may rank as literature. This was in the three or four years from 1867, a period during which he worked far beyond his strength. His health gave him a more than sufficient reason for abandoning an active clerical career, though another not less imperative reason lay in the fact that, a Liberal in politics, he became, or thought he had become, too Liberal in theology. Consequently, without any abatement of his faith in Christianity, he turned to those historical pursuits which had long been a passion and almost an instinct with him. But for the details of these biographical facts we must refer the reader especially to Green's own letters to Professor Boyd Dawkins and the historian Freeman, to whom the greater part of the correspondence is addressed. The letters are mostly of an old-fashioned length and substance; but, whether serious or playful, they all possess the charm of humour and sincerity. They would have deserved to be published, even if Green had written nothing else.

Yet, if we were to draw up a list of the six most important English books of the last thirty years, it would be difficult to leave out Green's "Short History of the English People." It is not his only work, nor his longest, nor his most mature; but it is the book by which he will be remembered. It has gone through many editions, both here and in America, and has been translated into French, German, Italian, and Russian. A Nanking translator, who has not yet finished his task, declares that "it must be magnificent in English," and hopes to make it equally good in Chinese. Magnificent it is not, for the author was not misled into anything like magnificent writing. Its most cherish the novel design of interesting as wel his readers. It had faults, of course. The fi tained many inaccuracies now revised away.

more unfortunate, the prescribed limits of the bo author to treat the eighteenth and nineteenth surprising inadequacy. But it was a book which It was recognized as "real and original work, Stubbs' phrase, and met with little hostile crit
"Short History" practically superseded all othe almost as soon as it was published. It had occ time from 1869 to 1874, and was the work of a that the state of his lungs rendered his life pre said to himself (after a visit to Sir Andrew Clark omnis moriar." His letters have much to say History"—"Little Book," or "Shorts," as he
In October, 1872, he wrote to Mr. Freeman from

> I daresay you would stare to see seven p
> the Wars of the Roses, and fifteen or six > Erasmus, and Tommy More—"Great Tom," a > be called—however, so it is. I think this sec
> the New Learning, with the previous ones > Revolt, which was really an account of the wh > of agriculture and landed tenure from the Co > and on the "Towns," by far the best things I

This section on "the New Learning," by-the-those sixteenth-century chapters which Mr. Fresm weakest part of the book. Green wrote in 1878 with Mr. Freeman, and had done his best to " write" the period for his longer work. A ye replies to some remarks by Mr. Freeman, auth least, of the objections subsequently urge
History:—

> In the same way, the "putting things out > means, I suppose, putting things out of the > hitherto occupied in common histories. But > in many ways different from that of common h > (whether rightly or wrongly don't matter here > a wholly new epoch—which I choose (again rig > to call the "Reformation"—begin towards th
> VIII.'s reign with the Law of the Six Articles.
> I hold that at that time a certain form of reli > thought, calling itself Protestantism, which ha > confined to a small section of the nation, began > to get hold of the nation at large, and produce > that followed very weighty results on its h > make the origin of this mode of thought cl > back some way into the former period, and > appearance of overlapping and confusion an > out of their places. But if my plan be right, t > places; and if my plan is wrong, then the boo > beginning to end. I have always said to myself > possible the book may utterly fail, and tha > grumble if it does. I give English history in > which it is intelligible or interesting to me, > follow that others will find my rendering of i > intelligible.

After the publication of the book, writing to in January, 1875, he refers to a somewhat obvious

> As to the general feeling of all the r > haven't carried out my plan after 1660, it w > better had I frankly owned in the preface how t

ashes to me; nevertheless for truth's sake I did violence to the natural man and turned away from Sir Roger de Coverley and the "Rape of the Lock" to cotton-spinning and Pitt's finance. It cost me a lot of trouble, and I knew the book wouldn't be as bright and pretty, but still I think I did rightly. However, Belinda and Sir Roger will brighten the pages of the bigger book, and indeed my fingers itch to be at them.

But the letters treat of many subjects besides the "Little Book." Many of them, perhaps the best, describe visits to Italy and the South of France; for during the later years of his life Green was compelled to winter abroad. They show an extraordinary capacity for seeing at a glance the main physical features of places, a quality which constantly appears in his historical work, and an exuberant enjoyment of all that he saw. But his health failed more and more, and he died in March, 1883, working, with his wife's help, steadily to the last. The "Conquest of England," not in a fully revised form, was his last book. As Mrs. Green truly says in her preface to that work, "It was impossible for him not to know that his powers were only now coming to their full strength, and that his real work lay yet before him. 'I have work to do that I know is good,' he said, when he heard that he had only a few days to live." There would have been no arrogance in qualis artifex pereo.

A UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY: a Survey of Man's Record. Edited by Dr. H. F. HELMOLT. With an Introductory Essay by the Right Hon. James Bryce. Vol. I.—Pre-history—America and the Pacific Ocean. (Heinemann. 15s. n.)

This is the first instalment of an English "adaptation" of a "Weltgeschichte" in eight large volumes written by various contributors under the general editorship of Dr. Hans Helmolt. Several volumes of the original work have by this time been issued, and it must be on the verge of completion, if not actually completed. The special feature of the undertaking is that chronology is subordinated to geography—in other words, no attempt is made to present the story of man on the planet as a continuous whole, and the work proceeds on the principle of geographical distribution, each successive section dealing with a certain section of the earth's surface. Thus, the present volume, after a good deal of introductory matter, includes the entire history of America. The second volume deals with the populous nations of Eastern Asia and the islands of the Pacific and Indian Oceans; the third with the rest of Asia and the whole of Africa; the fourth with the nations on the shores of the Mediterranean Sea; the fifth with the nations of South-Eastern Europe, including the Slavonic peoples generally; the sixth with the Teutonic nation and the Roman Empire; the two final ones with Western Europe, the seventh bringing their history to the year 1800, and the eighth treating of the nineteenth century. There is much to be said both for and against a scheme of this kind; but it has one obvious advantage. The reader knows beforehand which volume to consult for any desired information; and as the volume before us has an excellent index little time is wasted in the process of looking things up.

From the publisher's prefatory note we gather that in preparing the English "adaptation" he has acted on the advice of experts in "the rejection here and there of sections which did not seem quite adequate from the point of view of its new circle willing to undertake it. In a few extremely lucid an written pages Mr. Bryce gives us his idea of what the World ought to be. He points out that duri century there has been an immense increase in the constructing it, that the progress of geography and a to say nothing of other sciences, has done much to f task, and that it may therefore be attempted with a aspect of success than formerly. On the other hand, that it is beset, for the same reasons, with increased and that it is easy to fall into the mistake of tre one point of view to the exclusion of another. At th he approves, on the whole, of the plan adopted in work, and compliments the contributors—a complim well deserved—on being thoroughly penetrated wi in which it is conceived.

From Mr. Bryce's introduction we pass on to D own pages, here entitled "The Idea, Universal which formed the original introduction to the work. entitled this interesting chapter "Object and Aim history," and the change is not conspicuously for Dr. Helmolt evidently possesses a considerable k modern literature, and he here picks out, as pl reader, the more or less smart sayings of many aut short comments of his own. The best of these is, o —for the translator, distrusting either his own abili it into English, or the capacity of the English read humour of it, has cruelly cut it out—an extract fro Hans von Held:—

> Sitzt das kleine Menschenkind
> An dem Ozean der Zeiten, > Schöpft mit seiner kleinen Hand
> Tropfen aus den Ewigkeiten.
>
> Sitzt das kleine Menschenkind,
> Sammelt flüsternde Gerüchte,
> Trägt sie in ein kleines Buch,
> Schreibt darüber "Weltgeschichte."

This is really excellent; and some couplets quo Helmolt from the poet Zitelmann are almost as good which runs thus:—

> Der Pendel schwingt, doch treiben ihn Gewi
> Und uns bedingt Gesellschaft und Geschicht

These lines, too, are omitted in the English translatio worth remembering, no less for the cleverness of the for the justice of the reflection embodied in them easy to select from Dr. Helmolt's own contribution t any extract which shall fairly represent his atti subject; but we take, almost at haphazard, a pass he comments apologetically on the circumstance t takes precedence of other continents in the arrang work:—

> Although we may begin with America an Europe, we will not say that the origin of a development is to be sought for in the former, and out from thence toward the west—the "east" of The historian does not feel called upon to de respecting priority of birth. America's being will neither support the opinion of certain ethno to the great antiquity of American history, nor question whether the United States will some day part once played by Rome in the world's develop

Dr. Helmolt, like the immortal Slender, is inspired by the best of intentions, though we fail to apprehend his meaning in all its fulness, and pass on to the next chapter, in which Professor J. Kohler discourses at length on the "First Principles of a History of the Development of Mankind."

Professor Kohler's chapter is also of an introductory character. He traces, on familiar lines, the progress of man from a state of nature to a state of civilization, culminating in Spiritual Culture, the Overcoming of Instinct through Liberty, and Social and Political Institutions. "Development," he observes, "fulfils itself in communities of men. Except in a human aggregate it cannot come to pass; for the germs of the development which are brought forth by the potentiated activity of the many may exist only in a society of individuals." Of this and the like of it the reader will probably say that it may be true, but that it does not after all carry us very far. Passing over Professor Kohler we come, in Chapter III., to "Man as a Life-Phenomenon on the Earth," by the eminent ethnologist, Professor F. Ratzel, who devotes more than forty exceedingly instructive and interesting pages to a discussion of the influence exercised over history by geographical facts and conditions. Dr. Ratzel writes well, though he is too fond of laying down general laws. We are not sure that "through the entire course of history an ever-increasing value attached to land may be traced," that "similar locations give rise to similar political models," or that "political growth is necessarily preceded by commercial development." But the whole chapter will be read with interest, and here and there the reader comes on a pregnant saying such as "Originally the coast was the threshold of the sea; but as soon as maritime races developed it became the threshold of the land." The contrast between ancient and modern times in the aspect presented by the ocean could not be better expressed.

The best piece of work in the volume, to our thinking, is the fourth chapter, in which Dr. Johannes Ranke, well known through his exhaustive treatise entitled "Der Mensch," describes human life in "Prehistoric Times." Dr. Ranke, who does not admit any evidence of man's existence earlier than the Drift period, skilfully traces the story of palæolithic man, his food, habitation, ornaments, implements, and habits of life—giving, amongst other things, a full account of the discoveries of the geologist Oscar Fraas near the source of the Schussen, which are less known in this country than they ought to be, considering their intrinsic importance and the thoroughness with which they have been investigated. The earlier neolithic period—that of the Danish shell-mounds—forms the transition to the fully-developed neolithic life in which man practised agriculture and pottery and possessed domesticated animals. The Swiss lake-dwellings and the remains found in a cemetery on Lake Hallstatt, in the Salzkammergut, best represent in Europe the change from the Stone Age to the Age of Metals; and a special interest attaches to the latter as being relics of the very race which, according to Professor Ridgeway, appears in Greece as the Achæan, and thus constitutes a veritable link between prehistoric and historic times. Dr. Ranke's chapter concludes with an admirable descriptive summary of the discoveries of Dr. Schliemann on the site of Troy.

The chapter which follows, contributed by Dr. Häbler, is the longest in the volume. It purports to give the history of America from the earliest times to the present day. A disproportionately long space is occupied in describing the aborigines in the period antecedent to the discovery of the new continent; and of this part it must be said that although Dr. Häbler has compassionately grappled with a vast mass of untractable material Dr. Häbler is unacquainted with Mr. Payne's "
New World," or he would scarcely have repe amongst other things the fable that the Mexi more accurate system of chronology than conquerors. The history of the European m and South America is allotted a comparativel occupying, as it does, less than half the v unfortunate, as Dr. Häbler's strong point is the authorities, and some important aspects of t necessarily been passed over altogether. The f volume are occupied by a chapter on the "Histo of the Pacific Ocean," written by the late Co and revised by Professor Charles Weale. The interesting illustrations. It is handsomely and c and should certainly commend itself to the Engl enterprising attempt to handle a large subject, recognized authorities, in an instructive way.

SHAKESPEARE.

The Windsor Shakespeare.

So far as the contents are concerned th SHAKESPEARE (Jack, 2s. n. each volume), of eight volumes have reached us—Romeo and J Midsummer Night's Dream, Macbeth, Julius
lanus, As You Like It, The Merchant of Venice identical with the Harvard edition, the work of published in America in 1881. The only differe lines are now numbered—a great convenience frontispieces are added to each volume. But these slim volumes, bound in red and gold cov hand yet large enough to look imposing in a immense improvement on the Harvard.

Mr. Hudson aims at satisfying the Shak without burdening the general reader, by put notes at the foot of the page to help the reader culties, and holding over the more elaborate com of each play. The notes that accompany the te helpful so long as they are merely explanatory.
is not so successful when he criticizes Shakespe to the visible appearance of Banquo's ghost on ground that the ghost is only visible to Macbeth is logical, and raises up again that old boge spearian critic—the subjective ghost. But, lo the scene more dramatic as Shakespeare planne somewhat rash attack is made upon Polonius' co

> To thine own self be true;
> And it must follow, as the night the > Thou canst not then be false to any

This [says Mr. Hudson] is regarded by high strain of morality. I cannot see it s indeed true that we have duties, indispensabl selves; that a man ought to be wise for hi
the being wise for one's self is the first and t
I do not believe. And the man who mak principle of morality never will and never ca self.

This is too literal a reading of the passage. To self may surely signify more than Mr. Hudson by "wise for one's self." It implies being t science and resolutions—being in fact unself

adopts emendations on the old text without saying so, and interesting facts with regard to Shakespeare's relations to his contemporaries—such as his indebtedness to Lyly for Polonius' advice or the reference to Spenser's Teares of the Muses in A Midsummer Night's Dream—might also have been mentioned in the notes intended for students. But Mr. Hudson's comments, if not always as full as they might be, have the advantage of being useful and to the point.

Dr. Furnivall and Lamb's Tales.

Nothing is more fascinating in biography than the glimpses we occasionally get of authors at work on the masterpieces which we have treasured from childhood. Such a glimpse is given us in the correspondence of the Lambs quoted by Dr. Furnivall in his new edition in two volumes of LAMB'S TALES FROM SHAKESPEARE (Raphael Tuck, 31s. 6d.) now before us :—

> You would like to see us (writes Mary Lamb) as we often sit writing on one table (but not on one cushion sitting), like Hermia and Helena in the Midsummer Night's Dream, or rather like an old literary Darby and Joan, I taking snuff and he groaning all the while. . . .

In a letter to Wordsworth Charles writes "Mary is stuck fast in All's Well that Ends Well :—

> She complains of having to set forth so many female characters in boys' clothes. She begins to think Shakespeare must have wanted imagination ! I, to encourage her (for she often faints in the prosecution of her great work), flatter her by telling her how well such a play and such a play is done. But she is stuck fast, and I have been obliged to promise to assist her.

Once more Mary sticks fast, this time in the preface, and Charles' portion of it begins at a problematic "which" where poor Mary had drawn up in despair. But, notwithstanding the groans, the snuff, and the fierce smoking of tobacco entailed, the work came to them as a welcome relief at a time when they were very poor and in low spirits. Charles had compared their companionship to that of "toothache and his friend gumboil, which, though a kind of ease, is but an uneasy kind of ease." This odd couple, toiling away to order, to keep the wolf away from the door, in their dingy lodgings in Mitre-court, would have laughed if any one had told them that a hundred years hence so distinguished an English scholar as Dr. Furnivall would devote so much loving care to their work.

But their tales can scarcely be praised too highly. To turn a play into a novel is always a perilous task ; and Shakespeare presents especial difficulties. His works are not only an embarras de richesses to the story-teller ; they are often rambling and discursive. The vast mosaic of the dramatist can only be conjured into the simple pattern necessary to the story-teller by the most tactful exercise of the art of selection. And here, we think, Dr. Furnivall a little misjudges the achievement of the Lambs :—

> The odd thing is [he says] that two such humourful folk as Mary and Charles Lamb were, two who so enjoyed Shakespeare's fun, made up their minds to keep all that fun (or almost all) out of his plays when they told the stories of them to boys and girls who so like fun too.

Where, however, the fun is intimately connected with the plots, as in The Taming of the Shrew, we have plenty of it in the tales, and the Lambs, no doubt,

—Love's Labour's Lost, The Merry Wives of Wi
Cæsar, Troilus and Cressida, Antony and Cleopatra,
This completes the tragedies and comedies. "For th or Historical Plays," writes Dr. Furnivall, ignoring Conch, readers must turn to Shakespeare's works.

Dr. Furnivall sets about his task in a very di to the Lambs. Far from attempting a separate art Lambs may be said to have done, his whole en interpret Shakespeare as closely as possible to chi result is descriptive accounts of the plays in all th aspects, rather than "tales." Dr. Furnivall blame them as sketches. He constantly refers to the stag Lambs were careful not to allude to the dramatic which the tales were derived. Moreover, each sk with some note of the date of the play dealt with a among the rest. Dr. Furnivall is able to be much the Lambs because he has really chosen quite a differ
He describes all the underplots, and is careful no amusing character or situation go by. His Coriol us with a vivid impression of the great scene whe saves Rome from her son's wrath, and with the gre
the play—"Think'st thou it honourable in a noble remember wrongs"—ringing in our ears. His A Cleopatra and Troilus and Cressida are not so but the humour of The Merry Wives of Wi Love's Labour's Lost is brought out with much his erudite introduction to the second volume Dr. Fu cusses briefly the printing and publishing of the pl theatres in which they were acted, and puts before to-day an amusing sketch of a boy's life in Shakespe taken from Francis Seager's "Schoole of Vertue a good Nourture for chyldren" (1557). It is perhaps hope that his introductions to the twenty plays told by will be deeply studied by children. But they should be useful to all pastors and masters who are coaxing the perusal of Shakespeare. The tales are now arranged logical order, so that the editor, besides bringing the salient points of each play, can trace the evolutio speare's art. We are surprised that he should con babble of the fool" as one of the drawbacks of K that same fool whose jests seemed to Leigh Hunt sighs of knowledge."

Mr. Harold Copping's copious illustrations are excellent examples of draughtsmanship. In many particularly in the full-page illustrations—he has poetic spirit of the plays. He adopts Mr. Forbes reading of the thoughtful and melancholy Hamlet—la trace, if any, of madness. His work and that of the the binder of these handsome quarto volumes, boun and gold, help to make Dr. Furnivall's edition a bea book for children and adults alike.

PORTIA AND NERISSA.

Drawing by Mr. Harold Copping to illustrate Dr. Furnivall's Edition of "Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare."

[By permission of Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons.]

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Sir James Paget.

Mr. Stephen Paget has shown both literary skill and editorial judgment in the MEMOIRS AND LETTERS OF SIR JAMES PAGET (Longmans, 12s. 6d. n.). The autobiography which forms the first part of the book was written by Sir James when he was at the height of his fame as a consulting surgeon (1880-1885), and gives an excellent idea of the qualities of mind and character that led to his success. He had a positively Teutonic power of application, thinking nothing of sixteen hours of hard work a day for months at a time; he had a genius not only for seeing the outward signs of health or disease in his patients, but for estimating their mental or moral fibre as well; and he never for a moment lost sight of the high responsibilities of his profession. The autobiography is annotated by Mr. Stephen Paget with the help of the Bishop of Oxford and others. Paget was the son of a successful man of business at Yarmouth, who, however, had suffered severe losses when it became necessary to educate his younger son. Like many another boy of sixteen, James was fired with an ambition to enter the Navy in his youth; but after much deliberation this scheme fell through and it was decided that he should learn to be a surgeon. After a period of "apprenticeship" at Yarmouth he entered St. Bartholomew's Hospital, helped by his elder brother (afterwards Sir George). When qualified, he had a long period of "waiting," occupied by hard unremunerative work of every kind, laborious days spent with no apparent reward. He had been a surgeon for sixteen years, he writes, before his income from practice amounted to £100. His reputation at the hospital earned him appointments which enabled him in 1844 to marry Miss Lydia North, and in 1851 he began private practice in Henrietta-street. Once fairly started he made rapid progress; he had always had the reputation of a man who was bound to "come on," and in a comparatively few

his reputation as one of the best after-dinner spe
In the latter part of his life he came naturally most of the distinguished persons and men of s and he corresponded with not a few of them. Sev of Paget are given in the book; perhaps the b
tion of his picture by Millais, made in 1872 eight years of age. We have nothing but praise
It presents an almost ideal picture of a great has the merit, too rare in such volumes, of not c fluous page.

Living London.

Messrs. Cassell's LIVING LONDON is be parts (7d. each), and, judging from the first part,
to be a very well-conceived and very attractiv has two main features. First, chapters on di London are written by different authors, an of writers in this first part, for a popular boo would be difficult to improve—Mr. G. R. Sims, Major Arthur Griffiths ("In London Barracks
Lowndes ("Marrying London"), and Count in East London"). The other main feature i from life of London types, incidents and in vivacious and admirably selected. We shall further instalments with interest.

"What's What."

We have anticipated with considera advent of a new encyclopædic book of such as was announced to come from Mr
It is an attack, necessarily demanding en preparation, upon a field already occupied by and other publications. WHAT'S WHAT (Sonnen stout volume, agreeably turned out, a wor candour of its confession that it is only at presen and its friendly invitation to its readers to w they approve or disapprove, rather disarms cri containing such an enormous amount of origin can only gasp with astonishment on learning t book was first conceived "at Mullion, in Cornw 2nd of September, 1900," and that "the final sent to press on Thursday, October 10, 190 most superficial glance at the book will sho has struck out a line of his own. He may ev discovered a "want." The book is not t compendious works of reference to which we is a book to be read rather than referred to;
statistics miscellaneous information; it is imp than realistic; it is for the drawing-room office. It consists, in fact, of an enormous nu written magazine articles on every conceivab are nine pages of statistical matter on th world; but, on the whole, we imagine t consulted not so much for exact facts and as for general knowledge, topics of conver reading. And inseparable from this metho the personal note. The book gives a conspe taken by a capable journalist with much exp wide interests in many things. A certain e inevitable result, and one may illustrate it by notice of Mrs. Humphry Ward among the ch day, and of any account of the solicitor's Professions; and the personal factor is, we Lords), but we have looked in vain for any full information about modern political life. Now we commend this suggestion to Mr. Quilter. If, as we suppose, he wishes to help the average well-informed man, let him remember that nothing is so difficult to keep in the mind as recent political history. Will he include in his next edition a brightly written sketch of the course of English politics, say, since 1875? Nothing could, in our opinion, be more useful. The lists of books in one or two different departments at the end of the book are useful and might be further developed. As we have shown, it would be easy to offer criticisms on what is omitted or included. But as a book to some extent experimental, we give it a cordial welcome. It is an undertaking of a new kind carried out with a great deal of skill and imagination, and likely to be read with both pleasure and profit.

Dean Hole on Social Changes.

It is perhaps superfluous to enter into any detailed and serious consideration of the views as to social changes expounded by Dean Hole in THEN AND NOW (Hutchinson, 16s. n.). Their value lies in the fact that they express a personality, and that they express it in a charming literary form. The Dean is a well-known anecdotist, who brings out of his stores things both new and old; and as an octogenarian, who has followed all the changes of the Victorian era, he has much to say on education, sports, home life, cycling, parties, and many other subjects. To our mind, the charm of the Dean's view of life is its extraordinary freshness. His optimism and benevolence is indeed old-fashioned; it recalls the days of Dickens and of his friend John Leech, but is none the worse for that; and few octogenarians are so entirely free from any of those prejudices against social innovations which have no basis except a dislike of novelty. The Dean does not cling to the very dangerous maxim, "The old is better." Another feature of his comparison of the present and the past is that, while strict enough on "the things that matter," he is extraordinarily tolerant about things which do not essentially matter very much; and we especially commend his manly advice on the relations between the clergy and laity. And a third note of the book is the Dean's wholesome and humorous contempt for pretentiousness. He is also a wide reader, and has much that is sensible to say on the modern novel and on the improvement in journalism. On the whole we like this book—the ripe experience of a religious man of the world—better than the "Memories," and we may warmly commend it as a "book to read."

Dreams.

Mr. Horace Hutchinson is a man of a good many interests, and it occurred to him one day to write an article on the different kinds of dreams which are familiar or common to nearly every one. It appeared in Longmans, and it brought Mr. Hutchinson a great many letters. The result is DREAMS AND THEIR MEANINGS (Longmans, 9s. 6d. n.). It is a magazine article very much extended in width and length, but not in depth. Mr. Hutchinson chats agreeably about what certain men of science whom he has read for the purpose of his book have to say about dreams and about the different classes of dream—the falling dream, the flying dream, the unclothed dream, and so on—which his correspondents write about. And he adds a good many of the well-authenticated instances of the premonitory and the telepathic dream such as the Psychical Research Society have accustomed us to. But the subject does not receive any new light; and one cannot honestly say more than that the book may be skimmed through with a certain amount of entertainment.

found impression upon her fellow-prisoners in the Conc including even those whose political opinions dif widely from her own. But when she has a pen in her h of the charm evaporates and the impression ceases to favourable. Madame Roland is then very self-very obviously aware of her own merits, and as if she were attending her own funeral and preachin funeral sermon. On the other hand, the historical of her writings is not great, and their literary mer than moderate; while they undeniably illustrate t side of her character, and in particular her longing of persons born to more exalted station than herself.
Richards, however, has turned the book out very ne several excellent illustrations taken from old paintings, and views. Goupil's and Helmsius' p Madame Roland are included among them. The short tion by Mr. Edward Gilpin Johnson is very good.

Women's Work.

Mrs. Arthur Lyttelton's little book on WOMEN WORK (Methuen, 2s. 6d.) contains sensible chapters on jects as the family, the household, philanthropic work, professions, and friendship. Her sentiments a cultivated women in general, and there is scarcely a the book that we should wish to criticize. It is sad the extreme difficulty of putting all this good a practice. As things are, there is certainly a gr ineffective philanthropy on the part of the rich, an petent and ill-paid work on the part of the poor. Mrs.
is quite right in deploring the undersellling that goes working women, and in recommending them to orga difficulty—of which she is fully conscious—is to bri better state of things. And so with most of the othe that perplex women, both rich and poor. The aim rich or well-to-do young women who remain single much more enviable than the battle for existence poverty would subject them. Yet, when those wh work wish to occupy themselves profitably, it is far fr find a rational outlet for their energies. If their object and benevolence, we cordially agree with Mrs. Lyt nothing can be done to any good purpose without ledge of social problems. Probably there are too man in this particular field.

Laity in Council.

Books like LAITY IN COUNCIL: Essays on Ec and Social Problems, by Lay Members of the Ang union (Wells, Gardner, 10s. 6d.), are not wholly sat they are, in fact, books that are not books, but rather essays which ought to have appeared in the magazine remained. Every now and then an exception occurs; brilliant men arises, united by the constant inte University life and by the stronger tie of a "move the result is "Tracts for the Times," "Essays and or "Lux Mundi." But how exceptional are the cir that can make many men write as one! "Laity in will not disturb society; people, no doubt, will dip pronounce one or two of the essays to be good. W (except, of course, reviewers) read each essay right
The book embodies the progressive High Church spiri
one of the most interesting features of the Church t it has therefore a value for those who wish to unde present position of religion; furthermore, it is by lay

Maritime Law.

Mr. A. Saunders' new treatise on MARITIME LAW (Ellingham Wilson), in spite of its painfully significant sub-title and singular literary form, will probably soon come to be appreciated as a work of sterling value, both as a text-book and a book of reference. The sub-title runs thus:—"Illustrated by the History of a Ship from and including the agreement to build her until she becomes a total loss." Surely this is a quaint sentence to appear as part of the title-page of a solemn treatise on law. When we reach the text we find the author's style equally quaint. It is in narrative form and begins with the determination of a shipping-owner to enter into a contract with a shipbuilder to build a new steamer by way of an addition to his fleet; and the last chapter tells us how on her ninth voyage the new steamer comes into collision with a French steamer off Ushant and goes to the bottom, the company owning the unfortunate vessel being eventually wound up. Between the beginning and the end of her career the steamer is supposed to have made nine voyages, the imaginary details of which are given in sixteen chapters. By way of showing that the book is well up to date we may take the fifth voyage to which three chapters are devoted. Here we find stated the rights, duties, and liabilities of the author's ideal ship (which he names the Malabar) as a neutral ship in time of war. The Malabar has been chartered on behalf of a Spanish subject residing at Havana to proceed there with a cargo of rice. After discharging this it has to go to Liverpool with a cargo of tobacco, and from Liverpool to return to Havana with a cargo of merchandize. Meanwhile war has been declared by Spain against the United States, and on her return voyage to Havana the Malabar is overhauled by an American cruiser, and eventually is found to be conveying munitions of war for the Spanish Government. The numerous points of law which might be expected to arise in connexion with such an apparently simple episode are sketched out by Mr. Saunders in a graphic and readable style. The lay mind can readily follow it and the legal mind may profitably consult it, since abundant references are given to reported Cases and to the judgments of the Courts. We find such questions discussed as the right of a captain to vary the route prescribed by a charter; his duty on the approach of a belligerent cruiser; his duty as to producing ship's papers and submitting to the inquiries of the officers of a cruiser; his liability and that of the shipowner when, unknown to either, his ship is carrying contraband of war fraudulently concealed and otherwise designated in the Bills of Lading—and so on, to dozens of petty details of practical importance in the routine of the merchant service. This analysis of one group of chapters will serve to furnish a clue to the construction and character of the book. We think highly of it as a text-book from a lawyer's point of view, and it is so well put together in regard to its array of facts that it will prove of the greatest usefulness to commanders of ocean-going steamers and sailing vessels alike. Indeed, every owner of large merchant vessels plying to foreign ports would do well to provide a copy for the use of every captain in his employ.

We note a few points which the author might remember with advantage when a second edition is called for. It would be useful to have dates attached to the Cases cited; and all the commas should be struck out after the volume-numbers of the various Law Reports which are cited. A chapter, or a few pages, devoted to flags and signals, their use and abuse, would be valuable, as also would a chapter specifically dealing with the rights and duties of the owners and captains of private pleasure yachts. Important questions of law arose as to the action of Mr. Lancaster in his yacht the Deerhound after the [illegible]

FICTION.

Zack.

Zack's West Country Stories are the real
OF DUNSTABLE WEIR (Methuen, 6s.), as in al does not merely write as the Devonshire c
she writes as they think. She is not to be c her accurate observation because she has obvi to observe. She has the sure touch of the with intimate, instinctive knowledge. We rem such West Country writers as Mr. Baring G Couch, and Mr. Eden Phillpotts, but we are n is not the one writer of the day worthy to we Richard Doddridge Blackmore. One never reading her work, that she has fabricated a knowledge of dialect and local colour. There struction, no ingenious machinery, or stage stories seem to flow from her pen as natural fountain. The notes of humour and pa unforced. The most unusual of the incidents improbable, and the most grotesque characters
"Zack" has so far worked only on a su highest flights may possibly be beyond her.
can tell until she attempts them. But s comparison with any writer who is working or on the same scale. Whether her Devo quite equal to Maupassant's Normandy st decide on a first reading. We must wait whether they wear as well. But, whether "Z of Maupassant or not, she is unquestionably i with him, and is one of the few of the younge of fiction from whom we confidently anticipate

In Donegal.

THE OLD KNOWLEDGE (Macmillan, 6s.)
Gwynn's first novel, and it shows an a Repentance of a Private Secretary." It find a novel, in these days of hasty writing manship, written throughout in such easy an and fulfilling so admirably all that it sets out knows his country—it is Donegal, and he has before—and he brings it before us here as set himself some time ago to describe its "high
We could not wish for a better picture o than he gives us in the Lisles, nor bette peasantry than we get in Margaret Coyle a and the rest. It is an excellent little love-s and the opening scene on the river, where the for the first time, is excellent. But it is the book something different from the custo is Conroy who gives Mr. Gwynn his title.
out of the common, and he is drawn with co mystic, a poet, a dreamer, full of the "Old K with the inalienable sadness of the Celt Frank and Millicent make a very charmi book ends pleasantly, in the orthodox fashion woman says, in one of her delightful proverb the sea-gull follow the plough together, b mate?" This is a book to read, and it will than once.

Mr. Irving Bacheller.

unhappy Britisher. Darius Olin (the "D'ri" of the title page) is the kind of figure your American novelist cannot well do without —the quaint, rugged, pure-bred woodsman, with sinews of steel and unfailing resource in time of need. They have the liveliest of adventures, these two, fighting on the Canadian frontier, capturing and being captured, and the love-interest is prettily worked out. Those Britishers are a low-down set, naturally, but Mr. Bacheller is perhaps not quite so hard on them as some of his compatriots have been recently, and Lord Ronley has even some tincture of fine feeling. The episode of the adventure in the Temple of the Avengers, chapter XIV., is exciting enough for anybody. We enjoyed "D'ri and I"—it is pleasantly written and very full of incident.

A Novel of Journalism.

A DOUBLE CHOICE, by James Baker (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), is the story of a young man with artistic perceptions and a great capacity for taking pains, who begins as assistant in an art dealer's shop in a provincial town and ends as Berlin correspondent of a great London journal. In tracing his career Mr. Baker manages to give a rapid and clever impression of the multitudinous interests of a capable "special's" life, and he knows his journalism well. It is difficult for a reviewer to be quite just in writing of books that deal with literary and journalistic "shop," partly, perhaps, because he is obsessed with his own ideas upon the subject and apt to be intolerant of anything that does not absolutely square therewith. Mr. Baker is terribly in earnest. We yield to none in our appreciation of journalism as a high vocation, but equally we believe in the saving grace of humour. In this grace Mr. Baker is deficient. His hero is not a prig, but he is a little dull. But if the book is liable to criticism from the point of view of literary art, it is nevertheless one which will please a great many readers.

Mr. M. P. Shiel.

Weird and uncanny are the epithets that do most justice to Mr. M. P. Shiel's latest romance. THE PURPLE CLOUD (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), like its predecessor, "The Lord of the Sea," professes to record the ravings of a patient under hypnotic influence. These take the curious form of a young doctor's experiences in an imaginary Arctic expedition. Alone of the party he succeeds in reaching the North Pole, but the punishment which his arrogance entails follows swiftly. The luckless discoverer fights his way back to civilization only to find the whole earth a charnel-house, and its entire population destroyed by an all-pervading poisonous vapour. After twenty years of restless wanderings, kaleidoscopic in their variety, he makes a second discovery, which we leave the reader to share with him. The story is as bewildering as a nightmare and defies serious criticism. Mr. Shiel's imagination carries all before it. "L'audace, encore l'audace, et toujours l'audace" must surely be his motto. One can only hope that some day he will make a saner use of his remarkable gifts.

A Detective Story.

Mr. Louis Tracy has fallen into line with the rest, and written his detective story. THE STRANGE DISAPPEARANCE OF LADY DELIA is its name (Pearson, 6s.); it has a startling but rather attractive cover in black and yellow; and it contains a stolid Scotland-yard inspector of the approved type, and a subtle young barrister with plenty of money and a fixed habit of meddling with other people's business. It is quite a reasonable story of its kind, and preserves its mystery up to within a few yards of the finish, although the experienced reader the river . . . stranded there . . . on the banks of ing Keremosz and forgotten by the march of Progre it an interest. So does the beauty and passion of th and the strange ambition of her father, who sacrifices to his yearning for Vienna, the great town that he seen, but whose every street he knows by heart. M should be above using the age-old device of the letter wrong envelopes, though we must admit that in thi more convincing than usual.

A New England Village.

The present craze for historical romance in Ame altogether to our taste, and it is a pleasant change to so simple a transcript from plain country life as K (Constable, 6s.) by a lady who signs herself Alice charming story, instinct with humanity, well written characterization far above the average, it carries o traditions of that New England literature to which tales of Miss Mary Wilkins. It is unobtrusive in ap It has no staring cover and no announcement enclos publisher of "phenomenal success" on the other s Atlantic. Perhaps it will be passed over in the press announcements. But it is well worth reading—muc than many books that receive their daily half-column of ment. There is more thought and originality and ten the back of this little volume than in a round dozen published stories of the Revolution or of the Civil Wa it may sell as it deserves—but we doubt it. Unobtru no doubt a good quality in itself, but the publishers given the public a chance by binding "King's End more attractively.

La Vie de Bohème.

THE BOURGEOIS (Unwin, 6s.), by Mr. H. de Vere Stac unconventional book about as strange a set of Bohemia as it is possible to imagine. The oddities of an ex-medic playwright, and hypochondriac, a pessimistic clown, a mathematician, an advanced absinthe drinker, and a who lives on his friends are set into relief by the philistine and bourgeois of the deepest dye. There of racy humour and picturesque incident, though Mr. in straining every nerve to be amusing, does n succeed, and is at times decidedly coarse in his allusio is little or no love interest in the book, the leading la out to be a shop thief, and Mr. Stacpoole commits th mistake of ending a comedy, bordering on farce, with tragedy. Nevertheless, "The Bourgeois" is a cle somewhat out of the ordinary run of novels.

Sporting Stories.

Messrs. Treherne's series of Shilling Sporting Sto well with Lady Florence Dixie's pretty little tale, and is now continued with a book of different type, means without merit, called REMINISCENCES OF A G HORSEDEALER, by Harold Tremayne. It is a series o and incidents of hunting and horsedealing, showing gentlemen who deal in horseflesh, though not immac certainly be much less black than they are generall They make bright and clever chapters likely to intere folk. From the same author and the same publis Dross. The story of a clergyman's infatuation for, and with, an adventuress with its tragic end is a subject t to us to want more detailed and careful treatment tha eyes, staring at us from the cover, seem larger than ever—and he is not yet safely dead; he is merely "a yellow-robed mysterious figure"—in short, a Buddhist priest. We take note, too, on p. 88, of these disturbing words, from the doctor's own mouth:—"The whole story I cannot tell you at present. Some day it will come in its proper place and you will know everything." These latest adventures of the Doctor are, we must confess, rather dull.

The Rock.

"Alix Orient"—we will assume it to be a pseudonym—who has written TANGLES (Digby, Long, 6s.), evidently knows Gibraltar pretty well, and brings the daily life on "the Rock" before us clearly enough from the civilian's point of view. This in itself is a merit, and the book is also pleasantly written and betrays tact, but there is no story, or at the best a very inconclusive story, and the mannerism of dubbing two characters "The Modern Maid" and "The Remarkable Boy," and generally referring to them by these cumbrous titles, is more irritating than amusing. It seems probable that the author—we must assume her sex—depicts herself under the former of these names. She has read more than most young ladies, and she has a modicum of original thought, but "Tangles" is not an attractive novel. It suffers from too much dialogue—cleverly done in places—but too flippant to be serious and too serious to be flippant. On the whole the general effect is dull.

"Death the Showman."

Those who have patience enough to push through the first fifty or hundred pages of John Fraser's DEATH THE SHOWMAN (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.) will be rewarded by a really strong story. The writer has, however, seen fit to indulge in such a wealth of obscurity at the outset that we fear few will reach the desired haven. It takes some perseverance to acquire the drift of things at the Villa Glück, but once this has been done the members of the astonishing house-party there assembled become extremely entertaining. The whole story centres round a prolonged intellectual and emotional duel between Dolores Alva and Mrs. Jack Cade, and both characters are drawn with firmness and perception. One is struck with the author's strength in description; there are imagination and virility rather than delicacy, and if only certain tendencies towards slang and deliberate obscurity were corrected the style would be admirable. Such words as "niff," "chuck," "fuggy," and a dozen others are too low in tone for a book that is not low-pitched. Sometimes, too, taste is offended by a metaphor, vulgar, if apt. "The sun had gone down in a pewter sky" grates a little, as certainly does "the sky was like a grape-skin that had been sucked and spat out." We must give up trying to discover what lies behind the baffling phrase "tearfully empirical." Yet there are symptoms of power, and we recommend the writer to subject his art to rigid discipline.

Mr. Thomas Cobb.

SEVERANCE (Lane 6s.) is an admirable, pleasant novel, of the type which Mr. Thomas Cobb, the author of "Mr. Passingham" and "Carpet Courtship" &c., finds little difficulty in presenting to the reading public. At least the clever character sketches, the commonplace but telling incidents, are effective, mainly, on account of a certain graceful facility. The story of the various severances of man and wife and lovers is not of great importance; the play of humour is the thing. The pleasant sequence of events is such as may befall any of us. Although Mr. Cobb hardly attains to his highest in "Severance" his book is

Scottish history and a method that at least His personages here are not very lively, a does not make matters much gayer by narration. As for the historical details are well enough; Queen Mary, of the Red Moray, Darnley, and the rest play th with grace and skill. Mary Hamilton does n with hooks of steel as she does her "sometim
The general effect is sometimes a little such the theatre when all the characters on the sta laughter or bathed in tears and the audience

THE HOUSE OF DE MAILLY, by Marga (Harpers, 6s.), treats once more that rather ha romantic and picturesque subject, the reign
the competition at Court for the post of favo life and tragic death of beautiful Marie Duchesse de Châteauroux, is very well pictur whose dramatic sense is true, and her dia interesting. The book is beautifully illustrat

The re-issue of the Lancashire roman SENDING, by Allen Clarke (Henderson, 6s.), attributed to local interest. As a story i author has no grasp on the wider issue of that of the Civil War. Allen Clarke has picture of the sack of Bolton from obviously p
while he is so careless in his more general m Lord Falkland among Puritan leaders. But even a quaint charm, about the homely
There is nothing very convincing in the love
Dick or the character of the foundling, John
But some of the elder townsfolk of Bol depicted, especially the Fal-staffian landlord Scythe."

HENRY BOURLAND: THE PASSING OF T
E. Hancock (Macmillan, 6s.), is yet another the American Civil War which are at pre produced and as tirelessly consumed in the U Hancock is a Northerner who has made a pr regard the war and its results from a Souther he has produced a sympathetic picture of the inevitable downfall of the Southern plante days. Henry Bourland, his sister, and his fine characters, but the account of their f and painfully devoid of style. In fact, th given an admirably conscientious study of conditions, the dash, romance, and poetry of t confined to its suggestive sub-title.

GYDA THE GOTH (Burleigh, 3s. 6d.) aim character and life at the Court of Consta the year 1066; but Mr. Ernest Western indifferent success. Gyda, into whose mou is his one outstanding virtue. She persua true feminine representation of the Norse Where the author fails is in the general story, in spite of its references to Norse Western gives us some stirring scenes wh stantinople; but we cannot accept a king eleventh century, who is named Makartee;
have been the name of a gossip a thousand ye

The French Revolution, with its rev

In A Deal with the King (Digby, Long, 6s.), a stirring romance of love and war, Mr. J. T. Findlay takes us back to the ill-starred Jacobite rising of 1715. The character of the Old Pretender has long since been torn to tatters, and the author has wisely made an adventurous young laird the hero of his story. How the latter, who bears the euphonious name of Pittendrigh of Auchmunziel, punishes his Prince's treachery and deserts his flag is told with much liveliness and variety of incident. The book is none the worse because it does not distort the facts of history.

The Lion's Brood (Heinemann, 6s.) is a thorough and, on the whole, a successful picture of the days of Lake Trasimene and Cannæ. Mr. Duffield Osborne has spared no pains in his attempt to reproduce the Rome of that time, and he has contrived an ingenious story with many surprises and with several stirring scenes. Over most novels of this kind there is apt to hang the shadow of the "Dictionary of Antiquities," but Mr. Osborne's careful particularity of description does not unduly obscure the human element. He draws for us Fabius, the Dictator (and has the courage to refrain from quoting the line of Ennius), Minucius, his magister equitum, Varro, the butcher-consul, as well as Hannibal, and Mago, and Maharbal, and some of the chief men of Capua. Marcia, daughter of Titus Manlius Torquatus, is the heroine; Lucius Sergius Fidenas the hero, and both hero and heroine prove themselves worthy descendants of old Rome. A good book of its kind, displaying some scholarship as well as ingenuity of construction.

The Little Saint of God, by Lady Fairlie Cuninghame (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.), is a spirited tale of the Chouan rising in Brittany. The author has kept conscientiously close to history without making her story tedious. Thérèse de Moellien, the heroine, is not the kind of "ministering child" suggested by the title and by her nickname among the peasantry, but a mixture of Joan of Arc and Flora Macdonald—a gloriously intrepid and beautiful creature. The Marquis de la Rouérie, the great Chouan leader, is the principal character. In his social capacity Lady Fairlie Cuninghame has made something of a coxcomb of him. But the adventurous part of the tale is capital.

Accurate knowledge of a period and facility in writing may enable one to produce a faithful historical study, but they are not sufficient if one would produce a live story. Miss Gertrude Hollis has chosen the years 1091-1100 as the period for her book In the Days of S. Anselm (London, S.P.C.K., 2s. 6d.), and her story centres round the appointment of the Abbot of Bec to the Primacy of All England. She knows her facts and she writes well—many of the descriptive passages are charming—but she is weaker on the dramatic side of life in that rude period; she lacks just that touch of genius which breathes life into the dry bones of the past. The book is well produced, and should be useful to teachers who want to convey to their pupils an idea of the social life of England under the feudal system.

In spite of its curious staccato style there is a fascination about The King's Ring (Jarrold, 6s.) which is difficult of explanation. A translation from the Swedish of Zacharias Topelius, it seems to voice the Swedish hero-worship of Gustavus Adolphus in whose personality and exploits during the Thirty Years' War the romance is centred. It possesses vivid colouring, some humour, and a certain nervous force reminding one in a measure of the delightful stories of another period by MM. Erckmann-Chatrian. The actual translation place soon after that of his namesake the "Confessor," as Miss Davidson suggests, he may have been poisone unscrupulous partisan who wished to secure the cr Harold. The book is praiseworthy and industrious. an immense amount of ground; we go with the cal most of the European kingdoms of the eleventh cen the curious may pick up much varied information o The book is dedicated, by permission, to H.R.H. the P Cornwall and York, who can, by the way, trace her it is said, from Edward the Exile through his Margaret.

To suggest that a story in its event is not tru only to court the rejoinder that the events as describe happened in real life; one hesitates, therefore, to Gillette's Marriage (Heinemann, 6s.) would not have as Mamie Bowles declares, but it certainly taxes habilities, Gillette being the woman that she was. T extremely unpleasant, and not one which can be rec to any one who wishes to preserve a healthy taste appropriate to fiction. But it is amazingly clever in less analysis of a rare character and in its revelati working of a woman's mind in supreme moments. Up Miss Bowles has focussed all her powers, and the searching study of a woman by a woman, written wi force and free from the weaknesses of phrase-making. a suggestion of reserved force that holds out great p the future. There is much that we dislike in the book, are errors in taste. But it makes us expect a good deal Bowles in the future, if she can find some theme more than a husband's persistent unfaithfulness.

As a picture of manners in a small and decaying Interloper (Griffiths, 3s. 6d.) may have interest; as is devoid alike of plot and incident. Miss S. Elizabeth is responsible for this history of Landwich and of its families, seems to have set about her task with no plan. Possibly she expected that the story would g writing, but if so we fear that she was disappointed left doubting until the very last chapter whethe Stoddart or Richard Upcher is to have our sympath lady. Apparently the author found herself afflicted w uncertainty, and decided to bring a very invertebra an unsatisfactory conclusion by killing Miss Lorain balking both her suitors. But for the evidence o page we should have put these errors down to inexper Miss Hall appears to have written at least one other n

His Lawful Wife, by Jean Middlemass (Digby, L concerns the daughter of an East-end shopman. H Kitty; and it suits her, for she is the unmeaning misc in the life of herself and her parents. After running home in a passion, somewhat justified by the words a of her overdry and pious father, she returns a suppos The first third of the story drags a little, then Miss M plunges into her plot in a manner that gives the rest until the happy conclusion is reached. Jesse, Marlowe (Digby, Long, 6s.), is termed "a realistic fa At the outset, Jesse, a "little boy," is made drunk with by his father; but where the "fairy" portion comes in is say. The chapters headed "His Metamorphosis," "H ness," "His Exceeding Foolishness," "His Asinin ness," and a dozen more of "His" doings do not, ala to the humour they suggest. Yet if this record of J

BOOKS AT AUCTION.

THE ELLIS SALE.

The Ellis collection sold by Messrs. Sotheby on Monday last was composed for the most part of examples from the Kelmscott Press. The 133 lots included in the sale brought an aggregate of £5,588, but eliminating from this the amounts paid for the pen-and-ink drawings, &c., the result shows that the books fetched the very high average of over £36 per lot. The following were among the principal books sold:—

Kelmscott Books, Presentation Copies from William Morris.
"The Glittering Plain," printed on vellum, 1891	£114	0
"Poems by the Way"	60	0
"News from Nowhere"	39	0
"Reynard the Fox"	44	0
"Poems" of Shakespeare	91	0
"Order of Chivalry"	41	0
"King Florus"	38	0
"The Glittering Plain" 1894	35	0
"The Life and Death of Jason"	20	0
Ordinary Copies Printed on Vellum.
"The Defence of Guenevere"	£42	0
"The Histories of Troye"	61	0
"The Life of Wolsey"	41	0
"Godfrey of Bolayne"	56	0
"Utopia"	51	0
"Sidonia the Sorceress"	48	0
"Gothic Architecture"	9	10
"Poems" of Keats	71	0
"Psalmi Poenitentiales"	27	0
"Savonarola"	27	0
"Poems" of Shelley	89	0
"Syr Percyvelle"	22	0
"Poems" of Herrick	59	0
"Poems" of Coleridge	37	0
"Sire Degrevant"	18	0
"Flower and the Leaf"	20	10
"The Shepheardes Calendar"	50	0
"Syr Launfrace"	20	0
"Works" of Chaucer	510	0
Ordinary Copies.
"The Glittering Plain," 1891	£22	0
"Poems" of Keats	25	10
"Poems" of Shelley	28	0
"Life and Death of Jason"	16	0
"Poems" of Herrick	19	0
"The Earthly Paradise"	23	0
"Sigurd the Volsung"	26	0
"Works" of Chaucer (one of 20 copies bound at the Doves Bindery at a cost of £13 each)	112	0
Miscellaneous.
Caxton. "Cronicles," 1611	£60	0
"Dictionary of National Biography," 63 vols.	34	10
Lamb. "Elia," presentation copy from the author	77	0
Morris. "The Oxford and Cambridge Magazine," 1856	11	10
"Purchas, His Pilgrimes," 5 vols., 1625-6	53	0
Whitman. "Leaves of Grass," 1871, with letter from the author	35	0
"Horae," Kerver's print of 1501, a perfect and almost spotless copy	140	0
Mill. "Principles of Political Economy," Ruskin's copy, with many of his MS. notes	23	0
Blake. "Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience," in 54 ll., illustrated by the author	700	0
Marbecke. "The Booke of Common Praier Notes." Grafton's rare print of 1550, fine copy	202	0
The Original Ink Drawings of the 87 designs of Burne-Jones for the Kelmscott "Chaucer"	800	0
Forty-four drawings by Burne-Jones to illustrate the story of Cupid and Psyche	74	0
Books Bound by Cedric-Sanderson.
Swinburne. "Atalanta in Calydon," 1865	£66	0
Shelley. "Adonais." A gilded reprint of the Pisa edition of 1821	47	0
Morris. "Sigurd the Volsung," 1887. Presentation copy	111	0
" "Dream of John Ball." Presentation copy	99	0
Keats. "Endymion." First edition	131	0
Morris. "Love is Enough." First edition, large paper	177	0 condition, and uncut, was sold for £41. The El fetched the extraordinary price of £131. Oth bound by the same artist at an original cost were the "Love is Enough," with water-colo the margins, and the "Sigurd the Volsun copy. The moral of their prices would app old-fashioned fixed belief in the monetary v untouched margins and "in paper boards as holds good, provided that the binder is, for least, a man who is fashionable and has the market.

The old discussions amongst book collecto of Blake are likely to be revived by the copy of the "Songs of Innocence and S ence." The present estimation of Blake m from 1867, when Mr. Swinburne practically poet into fame, but during the last few year for good copies of Blake's works have been In December, 1900, Blake's own MS. of "An with all the original drawings by the author, £235 at the Lakelands sale in 1891, was sold Some collectors argued from this that Blake's wane, but the price obtained this week falsifie The Ellis volumes, copies originally given by Calvert, consist of fifty-four leaves, printed on only, and each mounted in a heavy sunken mou catalogue described the plates as being "exq but this is just the question at issue. Many to give Blake all the praise that his work as they are not prepared to regard him as a grea is a good deal of weight in the contention, for illustrations in the cumbersome bundle of leav would have sustained the credit of even a seco century miniaturist.

Messrs. Hodgson's sale last week incl interesting lots in addition to the already "Œuvres," which at £665 more than doubled within a year, and compare with £315 paid by Mr. Quaritch in 1896. The first edition "Poems" would have brought more than £9 date, 1851, been erased; eight volumes of Byron, limited to 250 copies, now being Murray, fetched £7, as against a cost of a single page of the Kelmscott Chaucer £4 12s. 6d., or equal to about £1,300 for whereas the Ellis example brought £510.

The exhibition of the famous Chigi Bo Colnaghi sets at rest the question as to the p instance the Prince Chigi was tempted to def for the picture—much renovated we sho shown by the "kind permission" of Mrs. G Discovered by the painter, Morelli, and dec except for the frescoes in the Sistine Chapel, Botticelli in Rome, it was sold some two y £13,000; and it certainly is a very beautifu for the charm of the Madonna, but for the rare scape background, which is as interesting a painter's most delicate and yet forceful ma Should the picture ultimately go to America will come to something more than £2,000.

The fourteen examples of Sir Henry Ra which Messrs. Forbes and Paterson have adde of their gallery in Bond-street, should afford the followers of art in London to become bett the characteristics and qualities of a painter

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—II.

The editor of the Nineteenth Century supports in that Review the militia ballot. "Did Elizabeth Starve and Rob her Seamen?" asks Vice-Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge. He answers that her administration of the Navy "compares favourably with that of any of her successors' Governments." Mr. R. B. Marston asks "Can the Sea be Fished Out?" He thinks not. "It seems probable, indeed, that in every second, every minute, and every day, more fish is produced in the sea than all humanity combined could devour in the same time." And he proceeds to argue that "it is a disgrace to our nation, depending so entirely as we do upon the sea for our existence, that we do less than almost any nation to encourage and support our fisheries, both inland and sea." Mr. Wilfrane Hubbard explains the French Associations Law, and opines that "there is no reason why the present exodus (of the monks and nuns) should have more permanent results than the many that have taken place before." There is no article in the number that can legitimately be classed as literary.

In the Fortnightly Diplomaticus heaps ridicule on the South African policy of the Government in an article styled "A Comedy of Proclamations." The party politician will mark this as a useful article for reference. There are two papers on Afghan probabilities, one by Sir Lepel Griffin and one by Colonel Hanna. "Military Crime and Its Treatment" is the subject of a thoughtful discourse by Major Arthur Griffiths, to whom all classes of criminals are professionally familiar. Mr. J. B. Firth's article on "The Guerilla in History" is opportune, and shows us, among other things, how the Prussians dealt with guerillas in 1870:—

> When the railway bridge at Fontenay was blown up by the Chasseurs des Vosges, the Germans burnt down every house in the village and levied a fine of ten million francs, or £400,000, upon the entire population of Lorraine.

This admission, quoted from General von Widdern, is also interesting: "In such circumstances many a reprisal was made, and death was often inflicted upon innocent people." Literature is represented in the number by an article on Madame de Sevigné by the Hon. Mrs. Chapman, and by reviews of "Sir Richard Calmady" by Mrs. Hugh Bell and of Iris by Mr. W. L. Courtney. "In a flabby age," says Mr. Courtney, "when we chatter about temperaments, and imagine that they can excuse us for want of will, it is well that we should be reminded, as we are in Mr. Pinero's remorseless treatment, of the inexorable laws of ethics and life." But what does Mr. Courtney mean by the remark that Iris was "only weak, not wicked"? Between wickedness and the weakness attributed to her, there is no difference recognizable by the moralist. She only gets sympathy at the theatre because the part is in the hands of an actress who fails to render the wickedness.

In the Contemporary the inevitable character-sketch of the new United States President is by Mr. Albert Shaw. Mr. Shaw's prediction is that "his international attitude will be as pacific as that of Mr. McKinley, whose policies will be continued without perceptible change of direction." "Protestantism in France" is the title of an article by Mr. Richard Heath, who takes the responsibility of foreseeing "another movement founded on essentially the same Gospel as that preached by Haldane which will, we trust, see its way to making it plain to cities and villages, churches and families, that they are by nature steeped in sin." Frankly, though we know France pretty well, we see no signs of this. Revivalism like Haldane's is a thing which the French temperament seems constitutionally incapable of comprehending, though it certainly once flourished at Geneva, and inspired a few Frenchmen like Félix Neff. Mr. F. T. Jane writes on "The Seaworthiness of Destroyers." His main point is that, "by the nature of things, accidents must happen to destroyers, and disasters cannot always be avoided if a useful Navy is to be maintained." More-or any other known lady novelist—Miss Cor Cholmondeley, Miss Annie Swan—and you will find o

the task is easy for a man, or not. If, by impossibility, these ladies asked me to be her brownie I should be detected, even by the least expert reader, not to mentio though I think I would succeed best as an imitat Annie Swan." Perhaps. Yet Dumas found "collabora imitated his style successfully enough, though they compete with him in imaginative endowment.

The Monthly Review has latterly been taking th novelists for its special province, and has this month
Mr. R. Nisbet Bain on Maksim Gorky, whose name o transliterate as Maxim Gorki. It is a remarkable ca Mr. Bain relates. Gorky has been a cobbler, a draughtsman's assistant, a gardener's help, a turn kitchen of a steamboat, a baker, a railway porter, an
He only began to write in 1892, and he already ran Tolstoy in the estimation of his countrymen; his note glorification of vagabondage, and a contempt for resp and the moral consciousness. No doubt he is the sym roscola—of some deep-seated disease of the Russi organism. No doubt, too, translations of his tales wil be among the common objects of our library table
meanwhile a translation of one of them, done by M. appears in the magazine we are noticing. An artic Sydney Brooks in the same number explains the Tammany Hall, and Signor L. Villari shows us what prog and economic reform are making in Italy; Mr. T.
has a paper, equally well written and illustrated, Modern Thoroughbred," and Mr. E. H. Cooper di "Nurseries of the Twentieth Century," pleading for profession, the deputy-mother, the guardian with plena the mother's help enlarged and glorified into a authority over governess, nurse, and dressmakers, to refuse the requests of aunts."

Blackwood publishes another article describing tion of war from the pen of the pseudonymous "I Since the ultimatum was launched no one has done t thing better than this writer. If his literary gifts are those of G. W. Steevens, he has a greater knowle subject, and he has seen things at closer quarters.
attack—an exploit of Menné's Scouts in the Versam his theme this time; this picture is admirably graph are reviews of three recent biographies—those of Sir Gerald Graham, and Sir Robert Murdoch Smith—Musings without Method are devoted partly to Gene and partly to Count Tolstoy. The writer's admiration f the novelist is coupled with profound disdain for the message to the world.

The Sunday Magazine has an authentic account and work of Mr. F. T. Bullen. We gather that th nautical writer began his career as a landsman in the logical Office, and afterwards opened a shop in Lon where he framed pictures. His first literary co appeared in Young England and the Boy's Own Paper Words. Then he rose to the Spectator. His first gre was with "The Cruise of the Cachalot."

The Universal and Ludgate has two good "trick"
one on the Royal Clarence Victualling Yard at Gospor other on the Bismarck Museum at Schönhausen. Ther short story of some merit by the Earl of Iddesleigh.

The number of the Revue Blanche for November 1 long article by M. Gustave Kahn on "The Origins o ism," in which this literary movement from 1879 explained perhaps fully and clearly for the first t evolution of symbolism is, of course, not yet ended. Bu rightly thinks that the time is ripe to appreciate th emancipation in French verse of which he himself, no the Mallarmés and Verlaines, has been one of the he has therefore drawn up "notes" for the future h
the movement. They are personal and autobiograph

Correspondence.

THE LITERARY AGENT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May a writer exiled in the fringes of the Empire say on behalf of the literary agent that the employment of such a personage by such an exile bespeaks not surely a deep-seated distrust of publishers, but only a deplorable distance from them? If Mr. Heinemann would tell Australasian and Canadian writers how they should otherwise offer their wares to London publishers, I am sure they would thank him. To send a manuscript half-a-dozen times back and forth across the Atlantic or the Pacific maketh the heart sick—and uses up a lot of postage stamps. Yours faithfully,

ARNOLD HAULTAIN.

Toronto, Canada, Oct. 26.

WAS AMY ROBSART KILLED?

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your last issue Dr. Gairdner tells us that on the day of Amy Robsart's death at Cumnor that house was "almost entirely deserted (only Amy herself and apparently two other ladies being there)." But is this inference of his correct? Does not the same original information which proves that Amy would not go to Abingdon state also that "Anthony Forster refused that day to go to the fair"?

Dr. Gairdner proceeds to argue that, in the deserted condition of the house, a "burglary" took place, and that in the ensuing "alarm" Amy fell down "the awkward corkscrew staircase, and so caused her death." Now, I believe that I have read all the original evidence on the subject available, just as Dr. Gairdner has, and I have never found any account whatsoever of this extraordinary "burglary." No reference to these "bad characters" is offered in Blount's letters to Leicester. Moreover, how does Dr. Gairdner know that Amy fell down an "awkward corkscrew staircase"? Cumnor Place was admittedly a low building, and the idea of Amy twisting herself into such a position as to break her neck by falling down a short winding staircase on an alarm caused by the presence of burglars, whose existence is never even mentioned by contemporary writers, is, to my mind, improbable. Finally, although Dr. Gairdner contends that Cecil befriended Dudley "after" Amy's death, he seems to forget that Cecil, nevertheless, termed Dudley "infamed by his wife's death."

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

November 4. PHILIP SIDNEY.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The Trade and the Season's Novels.

The booksellers are passing through what a prominent member of the trade describes as the critical stage of the autumn season. A month ago everything was going well; now trade is comparatively slack, and the success or failure of the season as a whole depends on the next few weeks. This is not the normal course of events, but we are told that the same thing happened last year, when the book trade, after an alarming drop just before Lord Mayor's Show day, recovered so completely that [illegible] of the season's business was done during of Lord Ernest Hamilton's new historical romance [illegible] Hamilton," the story of the serving-maid of [illegible] Scots (Methuen). Lord Ernest Hamilton had [illegible] spurs as a writer of historical fiction, but this is h[illegible] "hit"; a third edition of "Mary Hamilton [illegible] press. So far as fiction is concerned Messrs. [illegible] reached the end of their programme, though th[illegible] one novels is their largest on record for any one [illegible] all these books, we are informed, have been rep[illegible] successful being Lucas Malet's "Sir Richard [illegible] in its fourth edition, and Mr. A. E. W. Mason's [illegible] while the new book of humour by Mr. W. W. [illegible] Freights," has already gone to a third edi[illegible] published less than a month ago. "Tristram of H[illegible] naturally went very well, but "The Benefa[illegible] authoress of "Elizabeth and her German Garde[illegible] has even exceeded expectations, selling bette[illegible] day since its first appearance four or five wee[illegible] the other outstanding successes of the season [illegible] tioned Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "New Canterbur[illegible] stable); Mr. Gilbert Parker's "The Right of Way[illegible] Maxwell Gray's "Four-Leaved Clover" (He[illegible] Carey's "Hero of Grace" (Macmillan); Sta[illegible] "Count Hannibal" (Smith, Elder); and Max Pe[illegible] Giant's Gate" (Cassell).

New Annuals.

It is scarcely correct to say that Messrs [illegible] completed their programme so far as fiction is [illegible] they have a new publication by Miss Marie Cor[illegible] for the market; for Miss Corelli, following [illegible] Dickens and Thackeray—and lesser lights of [illegible] bringing out a Christmas number. She has writ[illegible] and the contents include several short stories, [illegible] essay on a matter of current interest, and one [illegible] Quite a crop of new Annuals is springing up thi[illegible] the newcomers, as already announced in L[illegible] Louis Wain's. This is to be issued immediately [illegible] contributions by Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. T. [illegible] Frank T. Bullen, Mr. Herman Merivale, and Mr [illegible]

E. V. Lucas and Charles Lamb.

Mr. E. V. Lucas, who brought together the [illegible] of Lamb's Letters in his volume on "Charles [illegible] Lloyds" (1898) has discovered a little nurser[illegible] King and Queen of Hearts," illustrated, wit[illegible] there seems every reason to believe were comp[illegible] Lamb before he wrote the "Tales from Shakes[illegible] sister—the book which has hitherto been rega[illegible] juvenile work. A facsimile of this volume wil[illegible] lished by Messrs. Methuen, for whom Mr. Luca[illegible] a sumptuous reprint of the first editions of [illegible] Elia"—illustrated by A. Garth Jones—which w[illegible] about the 22nd inst.; this is to be followed [illegible] edition of the first and second series of "The [illegible] by Mr. Lucas for the Little Library. Next [illegible] Lucas begins the new series of "Little [illegible] Children," which he is editing for the same pu[illegible] being to get entertaining or exciting storie[illegible] children, the moral of which is implied rather [illegible] The first two volumes will be "The Air G[illegible] Mastermans and Dobson Major nearly lost the[illegible] T. Hilbert, and "The Beechnut Book," by Jac[illegible]

This month Messrs. Macmillan will publis[illegible] Fiske's last contribution to the literature on [illegible] evolution and its reconciliation with Christianit[illegible] lasting," as it is called, is the crowning volum[illegible] series on "The Idea of God," "The Destiny [illegible] "Through Nature to God," which also appear[illegible] editions through Messrs. Macmillan. Fiske wa[illegible] years old when he died some five or six months [illegible] long exercised a powerful influence over Americ[illegible]

The new novel by Ralph Connor, the aut[illegible] Pilot," which we mentioned some time ago, is t[illegible]

Books to look out for at once.

"The Times Life of Queen Victoria." 1 vol. Sampson Low. Two guineas net.
[With about 21 photogravure portraits covering the whole period of the life of the Queen.]

"Poems of the Past and the Present." By Thomas Hardy. Harpers. 6s.

"The Tale of the Great Mutiny." By W. H. Fitchett. Smith, Elder. 6s.
[With portraits.]

"The Art of Life." By R. de Maulde la Clavière. Sonnenschein. 6s.

"Caroline the Illustrious." By W. H. Wilkins. Longmans. 2 vols.
[A study of the life and times of the Queen-Consort of George II. Portraits and other Illustrations.]

"Before I Forget." By Albert Chevalier. Fisher Unwin. 16s.
[Mr. Chevalier's Autobiography. Illustrated.]

"Words by an Eye-Witness." By "Lineman." Blackwood. 6s.
[A book on the struggle in Natal, reprinted from Blackwood's Magazine, with fresh material.]

"The French People." By Arthur Hassall. Heinemann. 6s.
["The Great Peoples" Series.]

"Stag Hunting with the 'Devon and Somerset.'" By Philip Evered. Chatto and Windus. 16s.
[Illustrated.]

"The Making of a Marchioness." By Frances Hodgson Burnett. Smith, Elder. 6s.

"The House Divided." By H. B. Marriott Watson. Harpers. 6s.

"The Marriage of Lydia Mainwaring." By Adeline Sergeant. Hutchinson. 6s.

"Houses of Ignorance." By Frederick Carrel. John Long. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS,

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

ART.

ANDREA MANTEGNA. By Maud Cruttwell. (Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture.) 8×5, 132 pp. Bell. 5s. n.

BIOGRAPHY.

THOMAS WOLSEY, LEGATE AND REFORMER. By E. L. Taunton. 9×6, 230 pp. Lane. 15s. n.
[Deals with Wolsey as a Churchman, and studies the causes which led up to the Reformation. The author is a Roman Catholic priest, and wrote the "History of the Jesuits of England." Excellent Illus.]

BARRY SULLIVAN AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES. By R. M. Sillard. Two vols. 9×6, 275+257 pp. Unwin. 21s. n.
[A long and attractively bound life of the great actor by an admirer, with portraits of him at different ages.]

MARY RICH, COUNTESS OF WARWICK (1625-1678): HER FAMILY AND FRIENDS. By Charlotte Fell Smith. 9½×6, 377 pp. Longmans. 18s. n.
[Shedding some light on the social history of the seventeenth century at Court, in Essex—the home of the Riche—and elsewhere. By the authoress of the article in the "Dictionary of National Biography."]

LORD KITCHENER. By H. G. Croser. 7½×5, 216 pp. Pearson. 2s. 6d.
[A popular account of his career.]

DIARIES OF THE EMPEROR FREDERICK. Edited by Margarethe von Poschinger. Trans. by Frances A. Welby. 9×6, 369 pp.
[Giving the campaigns of 1866 and 1870-71, and the journeys to the East and to Spain.]

HENRY SCHOMBERG KERR, Sailor and Jesuit. By the Hon. Mrs. Maxwell-Scott. 8×5½, 413 pp. Longmans. 6s. 6d. n.
[Kerr (1838-1895), the grandson of the sixth Marquis of Lothian, was a Jesuit Missionary in India, Zambesi, and elsewhere.]

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

LITTLE PEOPLE. An Alphabet. (The Dumpy Books for Children, No. XI.) Pictures by Henry Mayer. Verses by T. W. H. Crosland. 5×3½, 94 pp. Grant Richards. 1s. 6d.

TRUE STORIES OF GIRL HEROINES. By Evelyn Everett Green. 8×5½, 571 pp. Hutchinson. 5s.

A LITTLE IRISH GIRL. By J. M. Callwell. 7½×5, 240 pp. Blackie. 2s. 6d.

THE DRAGON OF PEKIN. By Capt. F. S. Brereton. 7½×
Blackie. 5s.
[A story of the Boxer revolt.]

THREE GIRLS ON A RANCH. By Bessie Marchant. 7½×
Blackie. 2s. 6d.
[A story of Mexico.]

THOSE TWINS. By Eleanor D. Adams. 7½×5½, 211 pp. Black [The adventures of a mischievous but lovable little co nine. Illustrated.]

FOR THE OLD SCHOOL. By Florence Coombe. 7½×5, 308 pp.
[The doings of the boys at a small private school.]

THE CHILD'S BIBLE. Illus. New Ed. 10½×8, 410 pp. Cassell
[This gives consecutively parts of the Bible adapted t
Of the original edition 150,000 copies were sold. It is no large type, with 88 plates from pictures by modern artists a fine coloured pictures specially designed by W. H. Margetson

INTO STORMY WATERS. A story for girls. By Mrs. H.
7½×5½, 155 pp. Sunday School Union. 1s. 6d.
[A story of school and home life.]

GAMMON AND SPINACH. Illustrated by Stewart Orr.
John Bryner. 8½×11, 102 pp. Blackie. 6s.
[Coloured pictures, chiefly funny animals, with their in verse.]

ROUND THE WORLD TO WYMPLAND. By Evelyn Sharp
235 pp. Lane. 5s.
[Eight fairy stories. Illustrated by Alice B. Woodward.

THE ANIMAL BOOK. By F. Smith. 11½×9½, 96 pp. Black [Account of 32 animals in large print, with full-page pic

A GALLANT GRENADIER. By Capt. F. S. Brereton. 7½×
Blackie. 5s.
[A tale of the Crimean war. Illustrated.]

CLASSICAL.

NONIUS MARCELLUS' DICTIONARY OF REPUBLICAN
By Prof. W. M. Lindsay. Parker. 4s.

GREEK AND LATIN COMPOSITIONS. By R. Shilleto
441 pp. Cambridge University Press. 7s. 6d. n.
[This is a collection of the large number of "compositio among Mr. Shilleto's old pupils, and attributed to him. It with a brief preface, by Mr. Shilleto's two sons. The printed on one side of the page, the Greek or Latin on the

FICTION.

O'CALLAGHAN, THE SLAVE TRADER. By C. D. Lampen. 8×
Digby Long. 3s. 6d.
[A story of smuggling and robbery in France and savage and slaving adventures in West Africa. Illustrated.]

THE SHADOW OF THE PURPLE. By W. Beatty. 7½×
Gardner.
[Short stories of the days of Justinian, Richelieu, Q beth, Louis XV., &c.]

O'ER MOOR AND FEN. By J. Hopkins. 7½×5½, 340 pp and Stoughton. 3s. 6d.
[Methodist life in Lancashire.]

A FLOWER OF ASIA. By Cyril. 7½×5½, 399 pp. Burns and [A story of India, and its many religions, in the sixties.

LOVE IN ITS TENDERNESS. By J. R. Aitken. 8×5
Gardner.
[Stories of Scotch life, of a pathetic and rather religi

THE GOLDEN SPUR. By J. S. Fletcher. 7½×5½, 329 pp. J
[The story of a conspiracy to secure the person and German princess staying in a castle in Ireland.]

THE SACRED PRECINCTS OF THE CLOSE. A Tale of a City. By S. Wardase. 7½×5, 167 pp. Sands. 3s. 6d.
[A brief modern love story of Cathedral life.]

A DRONE AND A DREAMER. (The Dollar Library). B
Lloyd. 7½×5, 259 pp. Heinemann. 4s.
[Modern life in Pennsylvania. Told by the "Dreamer.

SALAMMBO. By Gustave Flaubert. (French Novels of teenth Century). Translated by J. W. Matthews. 7½×
Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. n.
[The first of this series which we described last week.
up book in yellow cover, with an admirable photograph and a good appreciation (7½ pp.) by Mr. Arthur Symons.]

KING FRITZ'S A.D.C. By Frank Hird. 7½×5, 305 pp. H
[The Court of "Ehrenfelberstein" supplies the salouro story. Time, to-day.]

AN ORIGINAL GIRL. By Ethel F. Heddle. 7½×5½, 387 pp.
[The romance of a girl's life begun among poor surroun

THE WINDS OF CORTHRIGG. By CHRISTABEL COLERIDGE. 8×5, 280 pp. Isbister. 6s.
[Story of modern life in Cornwall, with illustrations.]

VISITING THE SIN. By EMMA RAYNER. 7¾×5¼, 448 pp. Putnam. 6s.
[Mountain life in Kentucky and Tennessee, mostly founded on stories told the author by old residents.]

THE ARBITER. By Mrs. H. HELL. 7¾×5¼, 313 pp. Arnold, 6s.
[A social and political novel of modern life.]

THE FIERY DAWN. By M. E. COLERIDGE. 7¾×5¼, 360 pp. Arnold, 6s.
[Paris in the first half of the nineteenth century; introduces Victor Hugo, Gautier, and other literary characters, and contains passages borrowed from Imbert de Saint Amand, Louis Blanc, &c.]

HALF MY LIFE. By W. T. HICKMAN. 7¾×5¼, 303 pp. Arnold, 6s.
[An artist tells the story of his life up to his marriage.]

CYNTHIA'S WAY. By Mrs. A. SIDGWICK. 7¾×5¼, 322 pp. Arnold, 6s.
[A young English millionairess in German society.]

GOD SAVE THE KING. By R. MACDONALD. 7¾×5, 335 pp. Hutchinson, 6s.
[A tale of Charles II.]

TWO BABES IN THE CITY. By CHRISTINE SETON and ESTRA WILBRAHAM. 7¾×5, 229 pp. Arnold, 3s. 6d.
[The doings and experiences in society and business of two girls who run a typewriting office.]

ONLY A NIGGER. By R. MITCHELL. 7¾×5¼, 351 pp. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
[The nigger is an admirable and learned Hindoo. The story hinges on an Englishman's implication with an Italian secret society.]

TALES OF A DYING RACE. By A. C. GRACE. 7¾×5, 250 pp. Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d.
[Short stories about the Maoris, reprinted from Australian papers.]

OLD BLACKFRIARS. A story of the days of Sir Anthony Van Dyck. By BEATRICE MARSHALL. 7¾×5¼, 323 pp. Seeley. 3s.
[At the Court of Charles I. Based on Addison's story of Leontine and Eudoxus in the "Spectator."]

THE HAPPENINGS OF JILL. By "IOTA." 7¾×5, 378 pp. Hutchinson. 6s.
[At a landowner's home on an island off Ireland, and mining in Africa.]

GREAT LOWLANDS. By ANNIE E. HOLDSWORTH (Mrs. LEE-HAMILTON). 7¾×5¼, 377 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.
[Great Lowlands is a country town. It is a tale of (Independent) chapel life.]

STEPHEN KYRLE. By KATHERINE ANDREWS. 7¾×5¼, 383 pp. Unwin. 6s.
[An Australian story, beginning at Melbourne in 1852. One of the characters is a felon who is a sculptor.]

A MAN OF IRON. By J. MORGAN-DE-GROOT. 7¾×5¼, 312 pp. J. Long. 6s.
[Much concerned with a League of Terror for the reformation of society of to-day.]

WITHIN THE RADIUS. By A. KINROSS. 7¼×5, 281 pp. Duckworth. 6s.
[Another of Mr. Kinross' books of adventure in London, on the lines of Stevenson's "New Arabian Nights."]

ONE LIFE BETWEEN. By ALICE M. MEADOWS. 7¼×5, 423 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.
[A story of crime and its discovery.]

THE PERIL OF THE PRINCE. By HEADON HILL. 8×5¼, 317 pp. Pearson. 6s.
[The Prince is the Prince of Wales. A story of modern Anarchism.]

IN OUR COUNTRY. By MARION HARLAND. 7¾×5, 465 pp. Putnam. 6s.
[Stories of Virginia at the time of Mr. Harland's childhood, with illustrations of lake and forest.]

THE TRAITOR'S WAY. By S. LEVETT-YEATS. 7¾×5¼, 307 pp. Longmans. 6s.
[A novel of French history, introducing Richelieu, Condé, &c.]

HISTORY.

THE WAR OF THE POLISH SUCCESSION. By H.R.H. THE CROWN PRINCE OF SIAM. 7¾×5¼, 73 pp. Oxford: Blackwell. 2s. 6d. n.
[A brief sketch for Oxford "History men" and others.]

NOVA LEGENDA ANGLIÆ. Ed. by CARL HORSTMAN. 2 vols. 9×5¾, 2084-731 pp. The Clarendon Press.
[Gives the text of Wynkyn de Worde's Edition collated with MS. Cotton Tiberius E. i. This has been ready some years. The Introduction is not considered complete, but is issued to avoid delay.]

LITERARY.

DANTE AND GIOVANNI DEL VIRGILIO. By P. H. WICKSTEED and E. G. GARDNER. 9×5¾, 340 pp. Constable. 12s.
[An edition of Dante's Latin Eclogues and of the poetic remains of Del Virgilio, including the latter's poem to Mussato. There are

FREDERICK THE GREAT ON KINGCRAFT. Fr
By SIR J. W. WHITTALL. 9×5¾, 236 pp. Longm [Claims to give the text and translation of " de Prusse, écrites par lui-même, A.D." 1764, fro Frederick the Great's own hand, possessed by father. Carlyle denied the authenticity of Reminiscences of the travels and family of President of the British Chamber of Commer chapter on Turkish stories.]

BOOKBINDING AND THE CARE OF BOOKS.
No. 1.) By DOUGLAS COCKERELL. With Dra
7½×5, 336 pp. Hogg.
[This is the first of a new series of text-book and artistic craftsmanship. It is well illustrated

MISCELLANEOUS.

GALLOWAY GOSSIP EIGHTY YEARS AGO.
TROTTER. 7¾×5¼, 469 pp. Courier and Herald.
[Sketches told in broad Scotch of the aboriginal Picts of Galloway ("The Stewart already published a "Shire" volume) as they ex before they were "crowded out." Mr. S.
Preface. They were taken down mainly from Scotch lady, and the author claims that they gi of strictly grammatical Scotch.]

THE BRIDE'S BOOK. By Mrs. E. T. COOK, 7 and Stoughton. 6s.
[Chatty papers on matters before and after bound in white vellum, with blue ribbons.]

THE LIQUOR WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA. 7½×5 lishing Co. 3d.
[Papers on liquor legislation read at the Congress, 1900, and articles by Miss H. R. Sch Schreiner.]

THE QUEEN VICTORIA BIRTHDAY BOOK.
6¾×5. Hutchinson. 3s. 6d.
[For every day of the month some actions a and remarks of the Queen with numerous port bound in violet and gold.]

HOW SHALL I WORD IT? By One of the Aristo Pearson. 1s.
[How to write letters with examples of all k
a publisher to a proposal of marriage.]

THE DAWN OF DAY (1901). 9¾×7½, 286 pp. S.

A VERSAILLES CHRISTMASTIDE. By MARY
81 pp. Chatto and Windus.
[Humorous account of a Christmas spent France with character illustrations in line.]

A MEDLEY BOOK. By GEORGE FROST. 7¾×5
8s. 6d. n.
[Stories, sketches, and essays.]

THEN AND NOW. By DEAN HOLE. 8¾×6, 333
[See Review p. 415.]

BOOK-PRICES CURRENT, 1901. Vol. XV. 8¾×
[Mr. J. H. Slater's annual volume.]

AN ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF OLD
FOR SALE BY PICKERING AND CHAT
Pickering and Chatto. 6s.

THE MOMENTA OF LIFE. By J. LINDSAY.
Stock. 5s.
[Ethical, historical, and religious essays, rep

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE COUNTRY MONTH BY MONTH. By J
BOULGER. 8¾×6, 481 pp. Duckworth. 6s. n.
[A new edition of this popular book by the
With additional notes on the first edition by th

ORIENTAL.

BOOKS ON EGYPT AND THE CHALDÆA. T
Vols. I., II., III. By A. E. W. BUDGE. 7½×5
3s. 6d. n. each vol.
[These form the sixth, seventh, and eight of short popular "Books on Egypt and Chaldæa lation of the Theban Recension of the great funeral compositions copied out by Egyptia
B.C. 1600 to B.C. 900. The translations first a
"The Chapters of the Coming Forth by Day," 1898. They are now revised, with notes, i vignette pictures from papyri.]

POETRY.

JOHNNIE COURTEAU AND OTHER POEMS.

POLITICAL.

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES. Vol. C. Title, Appendices, and General Index for the whole Session 1901. 9½×6, 782 pp. Wyman. 16s. 1½d.

[Compiled by Miss Nancy Bailey.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE REVISED EDITION OF THE WORKS OF TOLSTOY. Ed. by AYLMER MAUDE. I. Sevastopol and other Military Tales. Trans. by Louise and Aylmer Maude. 8½×5½, 325 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

[The first volume of what promises to be a fine edition of Tolstoy's complete works, edited by Mr. Aylmer Maude, who is well known as a disciple and exponent of Tolstoy. He contributes a general preface to the edition and a special explanatory preface to these stories, and a note on transliteration. There are also brief notes on the text. The introductions are well adapted to help an intelligent and appreciative reading of Tolstoy; and Mr. Maude is in close communication with Tolstoy himself, who thinks highly of his translations.]

SELECTIONS FROM THE WRITINGS OF JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE. Ed. by P. S. ALLEN. (The Silver Library.) 7¾×5¼, 364 pp. Longmans. 3s. 6d.

[This extremely well-printed library series of reprints from modern authors is now very extensive. This volume contains historical scenes and portraits, with some more general sketches, taken from the History of England and the Short Studies, and one on "National Independence" from the "English in Ireland."

THOUGHTS IN THE CLOISTER AND THE CROWD AND COMPANIONS OF MY SOLITUDE. By SIR A. HELPS. (The Cloister Library.) 6½×4½, 271 pp. Dent. 2s. 6d.

[We are glad to see Helps brought before the public again in the series of dainty booklets. "Companions of My Solitude" brings in the characters first introduced into "Friends in Council," and it might, perhaps, be asked why the sequel should here appear as if it were complete in itself.]

THE GREAT NOVELS SERIES:—
Never Too Late to Mend, by C. Reade. The Last Days of Pompeii, by Lord Lytton. Old Mortality, by Sir Walter Scott. Pendennis, by W. M. Thackeray. Charles O'Malley, by Charles Lever. The Three Musketeers, by Alexandre Dumas. 7¾×5. Ward, Lock. 1s. 6d. each.

[We gave some account of this series last week. They are attractively bound books, very light in the hand.]

THE PROSE DRAMAS OF HENRIK IBSEN. Ed., with Introductions, by W. ARCHER. An Enemy of the People. Ghosts. 7×5, 211+174 pp. W. Scott. 2s. 6d. each.

[Two of the volumes of the edition of 1890 revised. The translation of "An Enemy of the People" is a revised version of Mrs. E. M. Aveling's; that of "Ghosts" is partly based on one by Miss Lord. The introductions by Mr. W. Archer give the stage histories of the plays with quotations from criticisms.]

THE WORKS OF CHARLES DICKENS. (The Rochester Edition.) Barnaby Rudge, two vols. Introduction by George Gissing. 7¾×5¼, 411+405 pp. Methuen. 6s.

[Further volumes in this excellent edition, with introduction by George Gissing, topographical illustrations by Beatrice Allcock, and notes by F. G. Kitton.]

DR. THORNE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. Ed. by Algar Thorold. 6×4, 840 pp. Lane.

[Fine paper edition, bound in black and gold, with Introduction.]

THE ROMANCE OF KING LUDWIG II. OF BAVARIA AND HIS FAIRY PALACES. By FRANCES GERARD. 7¾×5¼, 268 pp. Jarrold. 6s.

[We reviewed this book on December 23, 1899, when it was published at 16s. It ran through three editions, but is now out of print.]

THE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE. KING LEAR. Edited by W. J. CRAIG. 8¾×6. 249 pp. Methuen. 3s. 6d.

[Uniform with the "Romeo and Juliet," edited by Professor Dowden, which appeared last year. Handsomely bound in red and gold, with Introduction and notes at the foot of each page.]

THE HISTORY OF PENDENNIS. By W. M. THACKERAY. 7¾×5¼. 850 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

[Second volume in this New Uniform Edition of Thackeray, with author's own illustrations and preface. Bound in green.]

THE WORKS OF CHARLES KINGSLEY. Vol. II. Letters and Memoirs, Vol. II. Edited by his Wife. 9½×6. 250 pp. Macmillan.

[We described this edition on October 5. This volume carries the life from 1851 to 1856 with another portrait.]

MEMOIR OF SIR GEORGE GREY, Bart., G.C.B. By Dr. C[illegible] With a Preface by Sir E. Grey. 8×5½, 167 pp. Longmans.

[This new edition has a short preface by Sir Edward G[illegible] M.P., on the late Bishop's intimacy with the family, his write the memoir, and quoting Lord Northbrook's opinion "perfect as it stands."]

DID MOSES WRITE THE PENTATEUCH AFTER ALL? [illegible] SPENCER. 7¾×5¼, 291 pp. Stock.

[This was first published in 1892. This edition contai[illegible] preface in which especially instances are given to show [illegible] Bible is not "treated like any other book" by the critics.]

THE DRAMATIC LYRICS AND ROMANCES AND OTHER [illegible] OF ROBERT BROWNING. The Oxford Miniature Poets [illegible] 813 pp. Oxford University Press. 3s. 6d.

[A wee book printed on India paper text only.]

THE DAWN OF CIVILIZATION: EGYPT AND CHALD[illegible] Prof. MASPERO. 4th Ed. Edited by Professor Sayce. [illegible] by M. L. McClure. 10½×7½, 800 pp. S.P.C.K. 24s.

[We noticed this erudite and handsome volume on M[illegible] In this edition Prof. Maspero has brought the book up to [illegible] as Egypt is concerned by embodying the latest discoveries in [illegible] Valley and rewritten the account of the Early Egyptians, [illegible] some additions in the history of the people of the Euphrates.]

THEOLOGY.

THE UNIVERSAL OBLIGATION OF TITHES. By A B[illegible] 8×5½, 156 pp. Elliot Stock. 2s. 6d. n.

[Tithes among Jews and Christians; their equivale[illegible] heathens; the practical bearing of the subject to-day, &c.]

THE CROWN OF THORNS. A Story of the time of Chri[illegible] CARUS. 7×5. Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d. n.

[A little slim book, decoratively printed and illustrat[illegible] briefly the story of Christ and the conversion of Ben Midrash.]

"GOOD TIDINGS OF GREAT JOY." By C. H. SPURGEO[illegible] Truths' Series, Vol. I.). 7½×5, 152 pp. Passmore and Alabast[illegible]

[Short readings on The Incarnation as the foun[illegible] Christianity.]

VIA CHRISTI. By LOUISE M. HODGKINS. 7×5, 251 pp. The [illegible] Co. 2s. n.

[Short history of missions from St. Paul to Carey an[illegible] being the first of an American series of short books on missi[illegible]

APOSTOLIC OPTIMISM. By J. H. JOWETT, M.A. 8½×5[illegible] Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[Sermons on different subjects, with an address on [illegible] Mr. Jowett is a Nonconformist minister.]

CHURCH FASTS AND FESTIVALS. By Rev. E. C. M. CAR[illegible] MALLANDAINE, F. E. READE, and E. M. GREEN. 9½×7[illegible] S.P.C.K. 2s.

[Short papers (illustrated) for young children.]

MEMORANDA PAULINA. Sunday Readings in St. Paul's Epi[illegible] G. JACKSON. 7¾×5, 268 pp. Isbister. 3s. 6d.

[These are brief papers reprinted from Good Words.]

THE CHRIST IDEAL. By H. W. DRESSER. 6½×3½, 150 pp. 2s. 6d.

[Another little book by this well-known American religio[illegible]

THE BIBLE IN SCHOOL. By J. A. PICTON. 8×5½, 101 pp. [illegible]

[The author was one of three who voted against the te[illegible] the Bible in Board schools.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

WITH THE TIBETANS IN TENT AND TEMPLE. By SUSIE C. [illegible] M.D. 8×5½, 406 pp. Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier. 6s.

[An account of four years' (1895-1899) missionary resi[illegible] travel in Tibet. Illustrated.]

COUNTRY AND TOWN IN ENGLAND. Together with some [illegible] Churnside. By GRANT ALLEN. Introduction by Prof. F. Vor[illegible] 8×5½, 271 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

[These historical studies of the counties and representat[illegible] of England appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette, 1881-82, but prepared by Grant Allen for publication. Part of the bo[illegible] Chronicles of Churnside" attempts (with a map) to recons[illegible] history of a part of Dorset from savage to modern times.]

THE WESSEX OF THOMAS HARDY. By B. C. A. WINDL[illegible] 323 pp. Lane. 21s. n.

[An account based on personal observation of the pl[illegible] tioned by Hardy, with quotations from the novels, an[illegible] illustrations by Mr. E. H. New. Finely printed and bound [illegible] and gold.]

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. [illegible] by G. BRENANDER, Sweden

BLACK 9 pieces

WHITE 11 pieces

White to play and mate in two moves

PROBLEM No. [illegible] by J. KOHTZ and C. KOCKELKORN, Cologne

BLACK 11 pieces

WHITE 8 pieces

White to play and mate in three moves

PROBLEM No. 259, by Valentin Marin, Madrid.—White (10 pieces)—K at K R sq; Q at Q Kt 2; R at K Kt 2 and K 8; Kts at K Kt 4, Q 6; pawns at K B 5, Q 2, Q B 3, Q Kt 6. Black (8 pieces)—K at K Kt 2; R at Q R 6; Kt at K 8 and Q Kt 8; pawns at K R 5, Q 4, Q 6, Q R 3. Three moves. A masterly production and very characteristic of this noted composer's style.

PROBLEM No. 260, Dr. S. Gold.—White (5 pieces)—K at K R sq; Q at K 5; R at K Kt 2; pawns at K Kt 7, K R 7. Black (5 pieces)—K at K Kt sq; Q at Q Kt 3; R at Q 3; B at K Kt 3; pawn at K R 4. White to play and win.

PROBLEM No. 261, by the late G. C. Heywood, Newcastle.—White (4 pieces)—K at Q Kt 3; Kts at Q B 7 and K Kt sq; pawn at Q B 6. Black (4 pieces)—K at K B 8; R at Q 6; pawns at K Kt 2, Q Kt 4. White to play and win.

NEWS AND ITEMS. Several large tournaments are starting at the City of London C.C. (7, Grocers'-hall-court, E.C.). Old and new members compete in these. One is for the [illegible] and club championship, with £15 as first priz[illegible] Newnes, M.P., and Mr. F. G. Naumann give the l[illegible] A great number of matches are being played, bu[illegible] chess clubs the system of adjudication leaves mo[illegible] over, and only a few ever hear what has been [illegible] United States besides tremendous correspon[illegible] (East v. West, &c.), there is one now beginning [illegible] York and Pennsylvania with at least 230 players [illegible] Kent v. Yorkshire, Kent v. Devon, and East [illegible] Kent, and numerous other large matches are bei[illegible] commend the system; it forces studious [illegible] "skittling" system is of little use to any one. [illegible] for the study.—M. Tschigorin, the Russian cha[illegible] much for the game. We give one of several enco[illegible] strong players of Moscow.

GAME No. CVIII.—A splendidly contest[illegible] game, with varying fortunes, played recently in [illegible]

WHITE. M. I. Tschigorin.	BLACK. Allies.	WHITE. M. I. Tschigorin
1. P-K 4	P-K 4	31. P-B 4
2. Kt-K B 3	Kt-Q B 3	32. R-K 5
3. B-Kt 5	Kt-B 3	33. Kt-Kt 5
4. Q-K 2	B-B 4	34. Kt-K 6 ch
5. B-Kt	Q P×B	35. R-K 4
6. Kt×P	Q-Q 5	36. K-Q 2
7. Kt-Q 3	B-Kt 3	37. K-K sq
8. P-K B 3	B-K 2	38. R-K 2
9. Kt-B 2	Castles K R	39. Kt×Kt P ch
10. P-Q 3	Q R-Q sq	40. Kt-R 5 ch
11. Kt-B 3	Kt-R 4	41. P-K R 3
12. Kt-Q sq	P-K R 4	42. P-Kt 4
13. B-K 3	Q-K 4	43. R-B 2
14. P×P	R×B P	44. K-B sq
15. B×B	Q×Q ch	45. K-Kt 2
16. K×Q	Kt-B 5 ch	46. R×R
17. K-Q 2	R P×B	47. R-Q Kt sq
18. Kt-K 3	R-Q R 4	48. P-B 5
19. P-K Kt 3	Kt-Q 4	49. K-B 3
20. Kt-B 4	R (R 4)-B sq	50. R-K Kt sq
21. Q R-K sq	P-Q Kt 4	51. P-Kt 5
22. R×B	P-Kt	52. P-Kt 6 ch
23. P-Q R 3	P-B 6 ch	53. P×P ch
24. P×P	R×P	54. P-Kt 7 ch
25. Kt-K 4	R-R 4	55. R-Q R sq
26. P-K B 4	Kt-Kt 3	56. R-R 8
27. R-K 7	R-R 7	57. R-B 8 ch
28. R-Q B sq	Kt-B 5 ch	58. R-K 8
29. K-K 2	Kt-R 6	59. R×Kt
30. K-Q sq	Kt-Kt 4	60. Kt-B 4 ch and [illegible]

The Times Law Reports.

A WEEKLY REPRODUCTION

In Convenient Form

Of All Cases Appearing in "The Times" of Permanent Interest to the legal Profession, Bankers, Merchants, and the Public generally.

The Reports for the Weekly Number are Revised, and Appear with Headnotes, Tables of Cases, and Digest.

Annual Subscription, £1 5s., post free. Single Numbers, price 9d. each.

Address THE PUBLISHER, THE TIMES OFFICE, LONDON

PHOTOGRAVURE PLATES

MADE AND PRINTED IN ENGLAND AT THE MOST REASONABLE CONTINENTAL RATES.

Subjects obtained and Researches undertaken at the National Museums and Galleries.

Specimens and Prices on Application.

CROWDY & LOUD, 7, Pall Mall, S.W.

Works: Wickham Green.

EVERY HOME IS BEAUTIFIED BY PHOTOGRAPHS AND PHOTOGRAVURES

The

Twentieth Century.

A MONTHLY REVIEW.

Vol. III.—No. 11.—NOVEMBER, 1901.

CONTENTS:

ARE WE GOING DOWN HILL? A Review of the Situation.

THE PROSPECTS OF THE MIDDLE CLASSES AS SETTLERS AND PLANTERS IN GREATER BRITAIN. By R. Hedger Wallace

PRIVILEGE OF PARLIAMENT. By N. W. Sibley.

ONE-CHARACTER PLAYS.

THE GOSSIP OF A BOOKMAN.

"Literature P[illegible]

With Biographies and [illegible]

The following have already [illegible]

May 11	.. ..	Mr W. E. HENLE[illegible]
" 18	.. ..	Mr. ANTHONY H[illegible]
" 25	.. ..	Mr. RIDER HAGG[illegible]
June 1	.. ..	Mr OWEN SHAM[illegible]
" 8	.. ..	Dr. CONAN DOY[illegible]
" 16	.. ..	Mr EDMUND GO[illegible]
" 22	.. ..	Mr. AUGUSTINE [illegible]
" 29	.. ..	Mr. ARTHUR SY[illegible]
July 6	.. ..	Mr THOMAS HA[illegible]
" 13	.. ..	PIERRE LOTI.
" 20	.. ..	Mr. GEORGE GIS[illegible]
" 27	.. ..	ROBERT LOUIS [illegible]
Aug. 3	.. ..	VICTOR HUGO.
" 10	.. ..	THOS. CARLYLE
" 17	.. ..	IBSEN.
" 24	.. ..	JOHN RUSKIN
" 31	.. ..	COUNT TOLSTOY
Sept. 7	.. ..	WALT WHITMAN
" 14	.. ..	WILLIAM MORR[illegible]
" 21	.. ..	RALPH WALDO [illegible]
" 28	.. ..	THE BROTHERS [illegible]
Oct. 5	.. ..	ALGERNON CHA[illegible]
" 12	.. ..	H. G. WELLS.
" 19	.. ..	ROBERT S. HICH[illegible]
" 26	.. ..	E. F. BENSON.
Nov. 2	.. ..	H. V. ESMOND.
" 9	.. ..	SIDNEY LEE.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 213. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 457, 458, 459, 460

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XXVIII.—Mr. H. W. Lucy. An Appreciation by E. H. Lacon Watson 461

THE EVENING PAPER.—A "Personal View," by Harold Begbie 462

ACROSS THE BORDER 463

THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 464

CURRENT LITERATURE—

The Life of Queen Victoria 465

Anticipations 465

Study and Criticism of Italian Art—Giovanni Segantini—The Conversations of James Northcote, R.A.—Four Great Venetians 466, 467, 468

The Letters and Inscriptions of Hammurabi—Kalhana's Rajataranginì—Ancient India—The Tell el Amarna Period—Arabic Philology—The Syriac MSS. at Cambridge 468, 469, 470

Chivalry—The Women of the Salons—Letters on Life—The Mental Functions of the Brain—Notes on English Etymology—An Etymological Dictionary of English—Hermann and Dorothea—Commercial Knowledge—Map of Palestine—Sir Walter Scott Readers—A Kentucky Cardinal and Aftermath 470, 471, 472

The Embarrassing Orphan—Count Hannibal—Marietta—Light Freights—Ensign Knightley—Frédérique—The Disciple—Autumn Glory—The Joy of Life—The Honour of the Army—The Golden Fleece 472, 473, 474

BOYS' BOOKS 474, 475

LIBRARY NOTES 475

MORE MAGAZINES 475

CORRESPONDENCE—The Artist as Critic—The Coronation Service—Was Amy Robsart Killed? (Dr. James Gairdner)—"What's What" (Mr. H. Quilter)—Cretan Symbols—The New Dickens (Messrs. Chapman and Hall, Mr. George Etheridge)—Weltgeschichte 476, 477

BOOKS TO LOOK OUT FOR 478

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 478, 479, 480

NOTES OF THE DAY.

In our next week's issue will be published a Special Portrait of

MR. ANDREW LANG.

An article containing a full critical appreciation of Mr. Lang's literary work will be contributed by Mr. G. K. Chesterton; and in the case of so prolific an author special interest will attach to the full bibliography which will, as usual, be appended to the critical article.

* * * *

The number will also have a Special Supplement dealing with New Books for the Young, copiously illustrated. The subject of Books for the Young will also be dealt with in a special article written by Mr. G. A. Henty, under the heading "A Personal View."

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

The Royal Warrant for the new Accession Service w at our Court at Sandringham" on Saturday, the King's and made known shortly before noon. Later in the d editions of the Prayer-book, containing the alterati prayers for the Royal Family and the new Accessio were delivered to the King, the Queen, the Prince an of Wales at Sandringham, and graciously accepted. T and Princess of Wales have since sent, through S
Biggs, their sincere thanks to the employés of t
University Press for their congratulations on the con the ancient title on their Royal Highnesses. We have from the Oxford University Press two of their revise books in small and large size, elegantly bound in lea similar volumes from the Cambridge University Press taining Hymns Ancient and Modern.

* * * *

There is an idea that announcements will be too bea capped by Coronation news during the first half of ne be much good to the publishers. Booksellers discuss the of Coronation year with mingled hopes and fears. I almost for granted that no literature of any kind—sav tion literature—will be looked at during the heig festivities; but, on the other hand, there is likely to b influx of visitors, especially of Americans—always good to London booksellers—that the gains both before and great event are likely to make ample amends for the lo

* * * *

Meanwhile Messrs. Macmillan have made a start announcements. One of the volumes announced by the early part of next year is a volume of philosophical essays men, edited by Mr. Henry Sturt. Among the contrib Drs. Stout, Rashdall, and Bussell, and Mr. F. C. S whose object is to dispute the standpoint of the most p representatives of Oxford philosophy, and to show tha may be combined with a fuller recognition of experience. Two art books are also announced for by Messrs. Macmillan—a thirty-guinea work by M Frankau on John Raphael Smith, the eighteenth engraver (two volumes), and a two-guinea volume wood engravings by Mr. Timothy Cole after Old Masters, with articles on the artists by Professor Van

* * * *

The album containing the address which is to be presented to Earl Roberts, with the life-sized portrait o Lieutenant Roberts, V.C., on behalf of eighty-two fr admirers, is, in a measure, a triumph for the Londo Council's Arts and Crafts School, the design, inlay, an being entirely the work of two old pupils of the school, F. Sangorski and G. Sutcliffe, except the Arms and the Cross, which are worked by Mr. Harry Ford. The result i both to them and to their instructors, and comes as an en sign that the scheme of the Technical Education Bear provision of a Central School of Arts and Crafts for L taken practical shape. Messrs. Sangorski and Sutcliffe cover bears a similar design, with a Victoria Cross in bronze in the centre, and a raised shamrock at each corner for the album to rest upon. On the inside cover on opening the album is a

COVER DESIGN FOR MEMORIAL TO LORD ROBERTS
Designed by Messrs. F. Fitzgerald and G. Ratcliffe vellum panel, bearing a wreath design with the initials of Lieutenant Roberts in the centre and the dates of his birth and death. Then comes another vellum panel, with a miniature of Earl Roberts, painted in ivory by Mrs. Emily Barnard. In the centre of the album is the following written address :—

> This album, together with a portrait of Frederick Hugh Sherston Roberts, who died from wounds received when attempting a deed of splendid gallantry, for which he was at once awarded the Victoria Cross, was presented Field-Marshal Earl Roberts, K.G., &c., by his friends and admirers as a token of sympathy with him in the grievous loss of his son, and in recognition of the unparalleled services rendered by him to his country.

Then comes a written list of the eighty-two subscribers, followed by four vellum sheets containing their signatures. Among the subscribers are the Duke of Connaught, Lord Salisbury, Lord Halsbury, Lord Rosebery, Lord Ashbourne, the Dukes of Devonshire, Norfolk, Marlborough, Portland, Abercorn, and Fife, Lord Londonderry, Lord Ripon, Lord Cromer, Lords Milner, Brassey, Selborne, Tweedmouth, and

It is twenty-two years since Miss Kate Green died at the age of fifty-five, produced her first vo
the Window," to be followed by the "Kate Green Book." But she had already, as an illustrator of c and Christmas cards, struck an original note with old-fashioned children which charmed the child-artists of yesterday, and which continue their in Ruskin lectured upon her at Oxford, and sh influence on art illustrative work on the Continen indeed, to have been better known in France t suspected. At the news of her death, M. Ars published nearly a column article on the firs Figaro; the Débats had a leading article, a in general showed that even Pro-Boer appreciate English traits of another sort. loved her work. They call her "Kate," and are one so "original" remained, in her pers
"mysterious." They have gone to Vapereau, Grande Encyclopédie, even to Meyers' German E for information. And in the dearth of positive f little essays on the literature and art of childh
the same breath the names of Fénelon and Kate G

* * *

By a singular coincidence, on the day af Greenaway's death her publisher, Mr. Frederick the house of Warne and Co., also passed away.
prominent figure in the publishing world for years. He was born in 1825 and was only fo joined his brother, W. H. Warne, and his brot George Routledge, in the publishing business ca years under the title of Routledge, Warne, and R Frederick Warne's energy was unbounded. O with which he was associated in early days was Cabin," his firm issuing the first cheap editio England, an edition which had an enormous c was also largely responsible for the publica
"Natural History," another enormously succes
W. H. Warne died in 1856, but his brother rema to Mr. George Routledge for another nine however, Mr. Frederick Warne founded a bus in Bedford-street, Strand, where the firm has since. Bedford-street and its neighbourhood has famous publishing centre of late years that it is that the only other publishers in the distric Messrs. Macmillan, on the opposite side of Warne was joined by Mr. Edward J. Dodd—a and fellow-worker at Routledge's—and Mr. A. left Messrs. Dalziel Brothers for the purpose main idea was to popularize good healthy lit
"Chandos Classics" was the forerunner—ap library, which was rather more expensive—of all which have since become such a feature of the b
"Chandos Classics" Series now embraces near of which nearly 4,000,000 copies have been so Dictionary" was another lucky venture on Mr.
It came at a time when the Spelling Bee was al altogether it is estimated that considerably over must have been sold. The dictionary, revised still one of the best-selling books of its kind "Little Lord Fauntleroy" and all Mrs. Hodgso works—with the exception of the novel which Convocation at Oxford has accepted the £1,000 bequeathed by the late Mrs. Matthew Arnold for the purpose of founding a Matthew Arnold Memorial Prize on some subject connected with English Literature.

* * * *

Canon Gore, the Bishop-designate of Worcester, has been a voluminous author, but to the general public he is probably best known as the editor of "Lux Mundi," to which he contributed the well-known essay on "The Holy Spirit and Inspiration." His own works, most of which, like "Lux Mundi" and its appendix, come through Mr. Murray, have also had exceptionally large sales. His series of simple expositions of portions of the New Testament has been especially successful, the first volume, on "The Sermon on the Mount" (1896), being in its fourteenth thousand; the second, on "The Epistle to the Ephesians" (1898), in its tenth thousand; and the third, on "The Epistle to the Romans" (1899), in its sixth thousand. Canon Gore's "Bampton Lectures" for 1891 on "The Incarnation of the Son of God," which are almost as widely known as "Lux Mundi," are now in their tenth thousand. The smaller volume on "The Mission to the Church," which appeared in the same year, has run to 6,000; and his "Dissertations" is in its second edition. Mr. Murray also publishes the volume of "Essays on Church Reform" by various writers, which Canon Gore edited in 1878, as well as his four lectures on "The Mission of the Church," delivered in the Cathedral Church of St. Asaph in 1891, and his last work, an inquiry into the institution and doctrine of the Holy Communion, entitled "The Body of Christ." Although the latter only appeared in the spring a second edition, with a new preface, is already announced. Two of Canon Gore's books are published by Messrs. Longmans—"The Church and the Ministry" (1893); and "Roman Catholic Claims" (1889). Among his other works are "Leo the Great" (1880), "The Creed of the Christian" (1895), and "Good Citizenship" (1899).

* * * *

The countless readers of "W. V., Her Book" will remember the sad loss suffered by Mr. William Canton last April. The sympathy then shown, and "the suggestion of one who loved her, though he never looked upon her face," has induced Mr. Canton to write a little biography of his daughter, which will shortly be published under the title of "Winifred Vida" by Messrs. Dent. An interesting feature of the book will be a series of recollections of Winifred's schooldays, written a few weeks after her death by her cousin Phyllis, covering the three months they were at school together.

* * * *

Mr. Perry Robinson, who succeeds Mr. Canton as Messrs. Isbister's manager, is a Westminster and Cambridge scholar who has returned to England from America. He founded in the States several commercial journals which have been extremely successful; and has made a reputation there as a writer of short stories, as the author of a novel which still sells (published by Harpers, in 1895); and as a politician who was one of Mr. McKinley's managers during the Presidential campaign of 1896. As a journalist Mr. Robinson has been a regular contributor to American magazines, especially the Forum. It will be gratifying to English publishers to learn that Mr. Robinson returns to London convinced that the methods of the best English houses are the soundest methods that [illegible]

London, finding it increasingly hard to thi[illegible] names for its streets, has at length decided, app[illegible] take some of its literary associations and land[illegible] account. The other day a Smollett-street was [illegible] and this week the County Council has given the [illegible] "Little Dorrit's Playground" to the new open [illegible] Southwark, hard by what remains of the old Marshal[illegible] Two or three years ago it seemed probable that the [illegible] of Dickens' Marshalsea, which includes the wh[illegible] debtors' portion the portion which the novelist [illegible] personal experiences in the bitter days of his youth, [illegible] he afterwards immortalized in "Little Dorrit"—wer[illegible] be improved off the face of the earth. That danger [illegible] however, and we believe it is still possible to trac[illegible] footsteps as he went over to the Borough—as Forster [illegible] writing of "Little Dorrit"—"to see what traces w[illegible] the prison, of which his first impression was taken in hi[illegible] which had played so important a part in this his la[illegible] and every brick and stone of which he had been able [illegible] in his book by the mere vividness of his marvellous [illegible] It is still possible to climb the stairs to the "top [illegible] one," which in all probability included the very roo[illegible] by Dickens' father and family; and Little Dorrit's [illegible] be found without any difficulty.

* * * *

Professor Owen M. Edwards' volume on Wales, w[illegible] Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Story of the Nations" Series ([illegible] and pictures), is to be published the week after next. [illegible] Edwards is Lecturer on Modern History at Lincol[illegible] Oxford.

* * * *

The story of the revival of Italian art in the Mi[illegible] would not strike everybody as likely to make a suitable [illegible] for children, but Mrs. Albinia Wherry, the author of a su[illegible] illustrated volume entitled "Stories of the Tuscan [illegible] which Messrs. Dent will shortly publish (her "Greek [illegible] with Story and Song" is also published by Mess[illegible] thinks otherwise. Her plan is to give a sort of [illegible] history, relying largely on the illustrations—which inc[illegible] photogravure plates—to keep the attention of her [illegible] audience. Only a limited edition of the work will be i[illegible]

* * * *

The sixth issue of the Literary Year Book is now [illegible] preparation, and the editor, Mr. Herbert Morrah, wi[illegible] to hear from all Authors who are not yet represe[illegible] Directory of Authors; all letters to be addressed [illegible] Ruskin House, 156, Charing-cross-road, W.C., up to [illegible] inst.

* * * *

Some recent Book Auction American prices [illegible] following:—

"The Vicar of Wakefield," first edition, two vols., crimson crushed levant morocco extra, gilt backs and edges, by F. Bedford ... ... £8[illegible]

"The Traveller," first edition, with the rare half-title, olive crushed levant morocco extra, gilt edges, by Rivière ... ... [illegible]

"Oliver Twist," first edition, original wrappers, uncut [illegible]

"The Germ," original issue, bound at the Doves Bindery, presentation copy, with signed MS. poem by W. M. Rossetti at the end ... ... [illegible]

Shelley's "Alastor and other Poems," first edition, 1816, original binding (back broken), in case, by Riviere... [illegible]

A narrative of the colonial tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales, written by Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace, is being prepared for issue in book form by command of the King.

Next week's literary birthdays include those of Mr. W. S. Gilbert (November 18, 1836), Mr. R. Nisbet Bain, the Russian scholar (November 18, 1854), Miss Ada Cambridge (November 21, 1844), Mr. Quiller Couch (November 21, 1863), Professor Skeat (November 21, 1835), Mr. George Gissing (November 22, 1857), Mr. Justin McCarthy (November 22, 1830), and Mr. Gilbert Parker (November 23, 1862).

We hear that Lord Wolseley is writing his reminiscences.

Mr. G. C. Macaulay has been elected professor of English language and literature at Aberystwith.

The log-books of the "Agamemnon" have been added to the Nelson manuscripts in the British Museum.

Mr. Augustine Birrell has been invited by the Bristol North Liberals to contest their district at the next general election.

Mr. Charles Hamilton Bromby will lecture on the early life and works of Chaucer, at Kent-house, Knightsbridge (Lady Ashburton's), on Tuesday afternoon, November 19.

Dr. Garnett will take the chair at the lecture of the Dante Society, which will be given by Dr. Hodgkin, on November 20, at 45, Harley-street.

Only £001 has been subscribed for the proposed statue to Lord Byron at Aberdeen, and the sculptor's design is to be modified in consequence.

The Christina Rossetti Cross, which disappeared from Christ Church, Woburn-square, was discovered inside the church railings the other morning. The precious stones had been abstracted.

A Victor Hugo Society has been formed in Paris. The members call themselves Hugophiles, which sounds better than the earlier word Hugolâtres.

A new adaptation of Victor Hugo's Notre Dame de Paris has been produced at the Princess's Theatre under the title of The Shadow Dancer.

Victor Hugo's bust by Dalou, now on view at the sculptor's studio, will be placed in the foyer of the Théâtre Français, beside Houdon's bust of Voltaire.

The monument to Heine, subscribed for by the Viennese, is to be placed over his grave in the Montmartre cemetery.

A number of letters written by Verdi to the poet Ghislanzoni about the libretto of Aida are to be published at Bologna.

M. Jules Verne is shortly to undergo an operation for cataract which the specialists think will restore his sight. He has just finished his ninety-ninth novel.

* * * *

Mr. C. E. Plumptre is engaged on a "History of the Progress of Liberty of Thought during Queen Victoria's Reign." It will be published by the Rationalist Press Association.

A new work on Scotland's Cathedrals, by M. E. Leicester Addis, will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock immediately. It week, writes to say that she did not publish "Th

The only book which as yet bears her imprint is entitled "Smallpox; its Prevention, Treatment,

"The Hero" was Mr. W. L. Courtney's su Playgoers' Club, and it shall be our subject alleged hero of a work of art be he Heroes. that he need not, are any particula impossible as heroes? And if s
These are the questions; but, as both fictio art are progressive, it seems doubtful whet visional and tentative answers are possible.
began by ruling out the saint on the grou
passive creature . . . a dead white";
quite follow the argument. A saint is not bor may also be unmade; and a picture of a saint i the unmaking, or the resistance of attempts to un fraught with dramatic possibilities. The ten Anthony is, perhaps, the typical case; there is or of movement in that story. Nor is it strictly to the generally accepted definition, that a sain passive creature. "Havelock's Saints," for ins far from being passive creatures. Nor was passivity that Joan of Arc, that very dramatic canonized. So far, therefore, we find oursel with Mr. Courtney. He seems a truer phil draws attention to the modern tendency to people of no particular importance. This is, the great facts in literary and dramatic evolu
only the practice, but the avowed principle, French dramatists—to go no further back—to Mr. Courtney put it, "a position great enou significant person." The heroes of Corneille statesmen, nobles, Kings. It would have seem these writers to expect an audience to be conc fortunes of such a hero as John Gabriel B husband of the Second Mrs. Tanqueray; wher would probably seem a hopeless task to Mr. Pi
A. Jones to interest the public in such heroes Athaliah, or the Cid. To what extent Mr. Cou the causes of this radical change in the point of easily discover from the summarized report of h certainly cannot be attributed to any single ca has, no doubt, as Mr. Courtney says, been a fac Revolution and the kicking over of the traces things which have enlarged our literary as well outlook, and caused the average man to take emotions a great deal more seriously than his did. We should imagine that another factor has of comedy upon tragedy. At all events com way and tragedy followed it. If Molière c common people interesting, the tragedian wo tempted to break with tradition and try to do perhaps the most potent factor of all has be tendency of modern works of fiction, whether n treat ideas as of more moment than stories. T who objected to "Paradise Lost," that it anything," was an anticipator, and more of knew. The modern novelists and dramatists may indeed be aware that story-telling is not stration; but they also aspire to be somethin idle singers of an empty day. They want to ref

Literature Portraits.—XXVIII.

MR. H. W. LUCY.

It is as "Toby, M.P.," that the world best knows Mr. H. W. Lucy, and the creation of that silent but sagacious member of the House is undoubtedly his best title to fame. He has spent the greater part of his life in chronicling Parliamentary history, and he has made out of this apparently intractable subject a series of diaries at once instructive and humorous. It is a considerable feat, requiring for its execution a combination of qualities none too common. For the Parliamentary reporter who essays the difficult task of handling that solemn assembly from the humorous point of view must walk delicately along a narrow path. To amuse, he must of necessity be personal; and yet he must contrive to keep his personalities within the bounds of good taste. Even so, it must be impossible to avoid, at times, offending somebody. It says much for Mr. Lucy's tact that he has contrived for so many years to write the most outspoken criticism in so engaging a manner as to reduce the risk of offence being taken to a minimum. For since the early seventies he has been steadily employed in this particularly delicate business, often in two or three periodicals at once, and seldom failing to ridicule when ridicule was in any way deserved. That he should have been able to accomplish this without arousing the deadly enmity of his victims is a pretty sure sign that he possesses the great gift of humour—that humour which renders innocuous the criticism even of personal peculiarities.

Mr. Lucy might fairly be called a caricaturist in print. In fact, he has all the qualities common to the best caricaturists—a keen sense of humour, an unfailing eye for any personal eccentricity, and the power of exaggerating any deformity to a ridiculous degree without impairing the artistic value of the portrait or the excellence of the likeness. He is a Parliamentary portrait-painter, but he does not permit his models to pose themselves decorously in the approved heroic attitudes; he prefers to catch them unawares in the midst of their daily work; he watches them, with an observant eye, from the Press Gallery and remarks their behaviour at opportune moments. All the details, all the little mannerisms, are noted down with a remorseless precision and amplitude. Reading the volumes of republished Parliamentary diaries you may come across many scores of these thumb-nail sketches in which the slightest eccentricity of the speaker is seized with a surprising accuracy. Here, for example, is a passage from the last published of these collections, which gives a fair idea of the writer's manner, and the photographic particularity of his descriptions. Mr. Burdett-Coutts is the subject, and he is "reciting" the peroration of a certain speech:—

> There was no rude haste about the movement. Everything was done with orderly precision that betokened long practice before the appreciative cheval-glass. First the left arm, thrown out, grasped the back of the bench. A basis of security being thus obtained—and the highest art cannot ignore these vulgar considerations—the orator, slightly leaning over, rested on his left leg, bringing his right foot round with slow grace till it was poised on tip-toe on the other side of its fellow. Then, always with the impressive absence of haste, he, with long sweep, brought his right arm round till

It is Essence of Parliament, and the unnecessary particles are ruthlessly pruned away. Even on the r when he has ventured to write on subjects outside t Commons the old instinct pursues him, and he ac certain uneasiness when embarked upon a long ne Parliamentary characters are not readily banished fr and they crop up even in his novels. "Gideon example, which is ostensibly a story (and a rather story, too), is really valuable chiefly as a gallery of eminent Parliamentarians. It is not a bad way, for the author wisely chose his favourite sub chief thread in his plot, and made his rich sa son contest a borough in the Liberal interest. B never is quite at home in story-telling. Detache the book are excellent, especially when the write the action for awhile and turn to verbal descriptio almost hear the sigh of relief with which he unfamiliar vehicle to take care of itself while he p mouth of some character a criticism of Gladstone or own account a picture of Beaconsfield. The latter one of the best descriptions Mr. Lucy has done any

> Taken at a back view it would not be thoug very old man. He was smartly dressed in a coa year. In gracious recognition of this spring da strayed into winter weather, the garment was o with trousers to match. A blue necktie and l gloves (over which mittens were drawn, since it quite spring), completed an attire remarkable on on this particular day. But the wearer was himse man. He walked erect, and with a certain swi But his progress was slow, and there was a curiou about lifting his feet, which suggested that his soled with lead. Then his face was very old, lea and with deeply-furrowed lines by the side of which was adorned by a little patch of hair, su black, which just covered the portion of his appe diately under the nostrils, like an "imperial" tra

The remarks of Captain O'Brien on Gladstone leader, some pages before the passage quoted, are es and equally true to life. "Gideon Fleyce" is reading even now, for the sake of these and simil It is at once a novel and a note-book which Mr. Luc with sketches of his numerous acquaintance. His have the air of being drawn from the life, and I am think that the author would never feel at his ea model. Perhaps this is one reason why he has not d fiction. Three books represent, I believe, his tota this branch of literature, unless we are to include t able volume, "The Fate of Fenella," to which he co small share in company with twenty-three other writ or less distinction. The other two are "East and a volume of short stories called "The Miller's Some Distant Connections," which is not, perhaps, in happiest vein. The fact is, fiction is not his métier; the by-product of a busy journalistic life; and it is to criticize these experiments at any great length.

From an early age Mr. Lucy had set himself t journalist. In "Faces and Places," a little boo some years ago in the Whitefriars Library, he tell how he set about it, and with what perseverance he way upwards. His parents had apprenticed him to was there, the young assistant editor of a local daily paper. He gave me some trial work to do, and was so far satisfied that he promised me the first vacancy on the junior staff of reporters."

It is Mr. Lucy's chief praise that he has evolved a sort of personal journalism that is light and bright and without offence, and that has, furthermore, many of the qualities belonging to good literature. He has added his quota to the gaiety of nations; he deserves, with Garrick, his niche in the Temple of Literature.

E. H. LACON WATSON.

Mr. Lucy's bibliography should begin, we believe, with some juvenile poetry which appeared in the Liverpool Mercury while he was trying to serve his apprenticeship in a Liverpool merchant's office. He was only nineteen years old when, on the recommendation of Mr. (now Sir Edward) Russell—whose volume of sermons, by the way, is just appearing through Mr. Fisher Unwin—he was engaged as chief reporter on the staff of the Shrewsbury Chronicle. Five years later he went to Paris to study language and literature, and, returning to London, joined the staff of the morning edition of the Pall Mall Gazette in 1870, the P.M.G. being the first journal represented by him in Parliament. Six years later Mr. Lucy began his connexion with the Daily News, and added the Observer to his list in 1880. It was in the following year—in January, 1881, to be exact—that "Toby, M.P.," made his début in Punch. Mr. Burnand had asked Mr. Lucy to write "The Essence of Parliament," which had been contributed in succession by Shirley Brooks and Tom Taylor. "My only difficulty," Mr. Lucy once explained to an interviewer, in referring to this period of his career, "was to do something original. The 'Cross Bench' articles which I had been contributing to the Observer had attracted a good deal of attention, and having made that success, it was rather difficult to make another in the same line." Then the idea occurred to him to make use of "Mr. Punch's" idle dog "Toby" by sending him to Parliament, and "Toby" has been member for "Barkshire" ever since. Mr. Lucy's list of books, chronologically arranged, is as follows:—

1874.—"Men and Manners in Parliament," by the Member for the Chiltern Hundreds. Reprinted with additions from the Gentleman's Magazine. Tinsley Brothers.

1880.—"A Popular Handbook of Parliamentary Procedure." Chatto and Windus. Another edition was published by Routledge in 1886.

1882.—"Gideon Fleyce." A novel. Three volumes. Chatto and Windus. Now published in one volume.

1884.—"East by West." Letters describing Mr. and Mrs. Lucy's tour round the world. Bentley and Son.

1885.—"Speeches of the Marquess of Salisbury." "Speeches of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone." "Speeches of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain." "Speeches of Lord Randolph Churchill." Edited by H. W. Lucy. Routledge.

1895 and 1896.—"A Diary of Two Parliaments," in two volumes. Vol. I.—The Disraeli Parliament, 1874-80; Vol. II.—The Gladstone Parliament, 1880-85. Reprinted from the Daily News, World, and Observer, and dedicated to the Earl of Rosebery, who suggested the plan of the work. Cassell.

1896.—"The Emperor's [Frederick's] Diary of the Austro-German War, 1866, and the Franco-German War, 1870-71," (with Prince Bismarck's rejoinder). Edited by H. W. Lucy. Routledge.

1897.—"The Fate of Fenella." A twenty-fourth part of the experiment in literary collaboration which appeared serially in the Gentleman and was subsequently published in book form by Messrs. Hutchinson.

1892.—"A Diary of the Salisbury Parliament, 1886-92." Cassell.

1895.—"Faces and Places." (The Whitefriars Library of Wit and Humour, new series, with Mr. Lucy's portrait). Henry and Co.

1896.—"The Life of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone." A

THE EVENING PAPE
A "Personal View"

By HAROLD BEGBIE.

The other night, as I fell languidly throu slumber, my spirit bumped upon a somnolent no snatching forty winks in a quiet corner of the and without any intention of that kind woke h Although somewhat bored of late by the platit
the criticisms of Sainte-Beuve, and the m Shakespeare, I found the good nobleman excessi even anxious to discuss with me the affairs of s ture.

"The truth is," said he, plucking an asphod himself comfortably upon an elbow, "I have lo in my head for the advancement of culture o this appearance of yours—which I trust is an speedy, disembodied, and eternal sojourn amon the first opportunity of conveying my idea to Therefore," he continued, setting his forelock str your coming was a little abrupt and interrupted dream conceit, I am very glad to welcome you, shall be able to make your brief visit pleasant a

I expressed my gratitude for his great con promised to impart his views to the world by would ensure them receiving serious and profoun

He smiled and honoured me with a little bow
the asphodel he had plucked, and with one leg cr on the other, he entered slowly, yet carelessly, u

"Let it be known," said he, "that nothi pleasurable to a nobleman than the proprietorshi newspaper. I lay stress upon the vesperal c journal, because, although no newspaper in flowing with wealthy people should be in vulgar hands, the matutinal paper is more hastily r gotten, and less the topic of conversation at dinn journal should be published at five o'clock, and s of those evidences of hasty composition which i many of their morning contemporaries. And new least engrossing part of the ideal journal. Th and brings me back to my first point, the ownersh
Now, a nobleman should care very little for th fluctuating events of a day, but, by his tr character, he should care very greatly for the d interests of life, the main current of national ex spirit animating the steady progress of evolu choose for his editor a man of wide culture and br let him inspire such a man with his own notion and the public would be provided with a pa soothed their distracted nerves and corrected and vulgarity."

"But," said I, "would it pay?"

as vulgar. Shakespeare has never quite recovered from Lord Chesterfield's charge of vulgarity."

"Is Lord Chesterfield here?" I inquired.

The spirit shook his head.

"But my noble proprietor should have no thought of making his paper pay," the spirit continued. "He must review only such books as are deserving of serious mention; and so arrange his advertisements that they do not occupy a place on every page. He must turn a deaf ear to the blandishment of actors, and criticize only such plays as are of a literary character. This would free his columns of those eternal announcements which every day convince the newspaper buyer that it is impossible to keep abreast of the literary times; and it would rid him of the necessity for publishing demoralizing accounts of the millinery worn by actresses in every stupid play that struts its hour upon the stage."

"You don't think," I ventured to put in, "that such a paper would be—well, just a little heavy?"

He flung away the nibbled asphodel, and sat up. "My dear fellow," said he, "can anything be duller than the evening paper of to-day? No, there would be brightness and lightness rather than dulness and heaviness, in a paper that filled its pages with bright sparkling essays, with smooth verse, with witty anecdotes, and with short stories of only the highest excellence. Such a paper would gladden the soul of the jaded merchant returning to his hearth, it would speed the dullest railway journey to the most impatient clerk, and it would provide talk for the stupidest dinner-party in Belgravia. To read it every night would become the duty of England, and not to know its views on the subjects of the day would be to announce oneself vulgar and ignorant. Oh, such a paper would be the best-loved thing in England!"

He began to pluck asphodels quickly, filling his long hands with the beautiful flowers.

"Conceive the joy of the world in finding a paper in its hand which had order, neatness, and dignity in its appearance; the composition of the news agencies translated into polite English, and forming a connected narrative; the telegrams, thus translated, relegated to the back page; the wisdom of the war critic, the profundity of the politician, the lightness of the essayist, the brilliance of the novelist, filling the other pages in print that a gentleman may read without tears! What a boon! Would not such a paper come to each man as an old friend, a conversationalist to be welcomed at the fireside, a companion for slippers and pipe? Petrarch, I think, had been content to lay his dying head on such a pillow; Milton had deemed such a page worthy of his nightly pipe and ale. And that is the condemnation of the present evening paper; it has no sense of slippered ease about it, no friendly and genial companionship, no comforting sobriety, no character. Hysterics, hysterics, all is hysterics!"

He tossed the flowers he had gathered into the air, and they fell in a pretty shower about his smiling face.

"Oh, the joy that your rich men miss!" he exclaimed. "What the world a heterogeneous assortment of dead and dyi

He would be forming taste, not glutting the appetite."

I was growing enthusiastic. "Have you thought taking name for —"

"And let me point this out to you," he interru national character is fast being corrupted by vulgar prints whose one purpose and intention is commerc
a journal as I dream of would wage steady, persi contemptuous war on such sheets; it would dam vulgar, it would proclaim to the world that to be seen or reading such vileness is to convict oneself of sha open Philistinism; then would those crazy colum and the world be delivered from the jerry-builder
ture!"

He threw back his head, and the enamelled mead swerve upwards as though to pillow it; but the g flowed over and about the head, a purple cloud dess enwrapped the languid frame, and presently the blotted out in shuddering mists, and I woke to fi letters at my bedside.

Among those letters was a flattering request from of Literature for a "Personal View."

ACROSS THE BORDER.

EDINBURGH, Nov. 1

Whatever may be the ultimate position assigned to S it is certain that his countrymen have lost none of the in him. The new Life by Mr. Graham Balfour, th generally admitted to contain little fresh matter, is bei read and discussed. Even the letter-to-the-editor ma roused into activity. In particular, it is asked what has the memorial of Stevenson which was announced as a'm to be unveiled in St. Giles' Cathedral nearly a year ag to take the form of a medallion of Stevenson by Mr. St.
the American sculptor, whom Stevenson described as the handsomest and nicest fellows I have seen." No on to know the reason for the delay. Even the secret
St. Giles' Cathedral managing board can give us
"The last entry in my letter-book on the subject,"
"was under date May 26, 1900—that is, eighteen mo
In that letter I intimate that the managing board sanctio form of epitaph, and since then I have heard nothing m memorial." It is surely time that the committee were themselves, if only in justice to the subscribers, whom paid down their money in 1896. Meanwhile th people are proposing a memorial of Stevenson on account. In the Exhibition art galleries there is a f by Mr. D. W. Stevenson, the Edinburgh sculptor, a almost been decided to purchase this for the city. *
has, of course, had its say about the author of "
Island" in connexion with the new Life, and its attributed to Mr. J. H. Millar, the Edinburgh lawye upon the fortunate term which enables the critics to sp
"Kailyard" school. Mr. Millar is said to be pre volume of essays in which doubtless the "Kailyarde

Mr. Lang and he came into conflict. Now they are tilting over the character of "the good Regent Moray" or rather the reviewer accuses Mr. Lang of a change of front in regard to the "bastard of Scotland." It is a pretty quarrel, but only the closest students of this dark and troubled period of Scottish history can fully understand it. "Not yet, I fear," says Mr. Lang, "does your reviewer quite see the delicate point which divides us." A good many people will, we suspect, share the luckless reviewer's lack of perception.

The annual meeting of the Scottish History Society was held the other day in Edinburgh. "Gather up the fragments that nothing be lost" is the motto of the society, a motto to which the members have acted up with praiseworthy industry and precision. Judging by the announcements of forthcoming issues, the society's future programme will probably be even more interesting than its record for the past. Some time ago the council accepted the offer of Father Pollen, S.J., to set aside for publication by the society certain papers which concern the affairs of Mary Stuart during her reign in Scotland. This volume will be published almost immediately. It will be followed next year by another work connected with the unfortunate Queen—Mr. John Scott's "Inedited Narratives and Transactions of Rare Contemporary Tracts relating to the Life and Death of Mary Queen of Scots." Clearly the time has not yet arrived for the final word on Mary Stuart. There is another work of a very different kind announced by the society which deserves notice. This is the Register of the Abbey of Lindores, the well-known monastic house founded on Tayside by a brother of William the Lion on his return from the Holy Land about 1178. The charters of such kindred institutions as those of Kelso and Melrose have thrown much light on the mediæval life of Scotland, and doubtless the Lindores Register will be found equally worthy of attention.

Students of Scottish history will be glad to learn that the second volume of Dr. Hume Brown's History of Scotland is finished, and will probably be published before the year is out—bringing the narrative down to the Revolution of 1688. Dr. Brown, who was recently appointed to the Sir William Fraser Chair of History in Edinburgh University, was intended for the Church. He preferred educational work, and ultimately commenced author, his first book, a Life of George Buchanan, the Reformer, being published in 1890. Much of his work has appeared in Chambers' Encyclopædia and in the "Dictionary of National Biography."

It is rather a strong claim to make that one has written the first book ever published in "correct vernacular Scotch"; but the claim is made by Dr. Bruce Trotter, whose "Galloway Gossip" has just been issued by the Herald Press, Dumfries. Dr. Trotter declares that he knows six or seven languages in addition to his own, and "can curse fluently in a few others, besides knowing five dialects of vernacular English." He contends that all books hitherto professing to be in the general vernacular are hybrid mixtures of localisms and classic Scots. But what is classic Scots? Where and by whom is it or was it ever spoken? Dr. Trotter's book may perhaps be found to solve the problem, but it is disconcerting to find Mr. S. R. Crockett remarking, in an introduction which he has prepared for the work, that "not only is this Galloway which we have set before us, but it is Galloway of the Stewartry." In other words, Mr. Crockett thinks that Dr. Trotter has written in the Galloway dialect—and who should know better?

In support of literature, outside two northern county has a be published shortly in the Cambridge series Studies." The Aberdonians, we may add, are their University up to the status of Glasgow u the creation of additional Chairs, and among oth Lectureship in English will probably be raised t a Chair. Chairs and professorships are not th occupying the University mind, or, at any rate, students. The "Scottish Students' Song Book but it is to have a rival in "The Univers a volume of some 450 pages just about to be pu Grant Richards. The editor is the Rev. Miller I of the accompaniments have been composed by Lees, an Edinburgh musician. We hear also th and E. C. Jack, of Edinburgh, are adding a con their fine collection of miscellaneous songs publi title of "British Minstrelsie," and of which fo already appeared. The new volumes will each b an introduction by Mr. Cuthbert Hadden.

THE DRAMA.

"BEYOND HUMAN POWER

On my way out from the Royalty Theatre th I fell to discussing with two clever ladies the been witnessing—an English version of Bjornson' Power, Part I. It is a play about the Chris modification by a State Church, and the nature the question whether there are any contempor If not, why not—in short, about many subje aired in the playhouse—and we were all a lit by being confronted with them there. But one she had not spent the afternoon without edificat an obvious and salutary moral, she declared, in what is that"? I asked. "Why, don't you see? we ought to have faith without religion." The a more practical temper, declared that there wa ever in the play; it was all stark, staring nons my part, I think there is a moral in the p suggested, not remotely, in its title. It is a n dangerous in the spiritual as in the material wor edged tools, that mortals had better not t thunderbolts, that we must recognize some thing human power." At the same time, I fancy B less concerned with a moral than with the atten the psychology of miracle-working, the way in in the miraculous affects people's minds, and t miracles, given a certain atmosphere, are in a brought about. These questions, no doubt, a interest, whether we approach them from the p view, or merely as students of mental patholog stage of a theatre is an appropriate arena for th another matter. Before, however, offering any point, let me restate briefly what it is that Bjorn

The curtain rises upon a sick-bed, whose oc move from it throughout the first act. She can for her lower limbs are paralysed, she can only tos fro on her pillow, very wearily and half-hysteric she has had no sleep for six weeks. She is tellin returned from America, all about her husbar how he is all goodness, himself a man (the

"without a sense—the sense of reality," he sees the world not as it is, but as he wishes to see it. And so, but for the wife, the children's education would have been neglected in a household built, not on "deliberation," but on "inspiration." And, but for the wife, the household itself would have been ruined, through the extreme application of the text about taking no thought for the morrow. Thus the woman is distracted in mind and physically worn by the struggle between her love for her husband, her desire to see eye to eye with him, and, on the other hand, her common sense, her need to fight against his fanaticism. Pastor Sang enters, and we see that he is, indeed, of a beautiful character, of the stuff out of which saints are made. We see this in the touching faith by which he has convinced himself that at last he has found a way of curing his wife—by forming, with his children, a "prayer-chain" round her bed. We see it, too, in his behaviour when that experiment breaks down because his children have lost their faith. It is the heaviest blow that could have fallen on him, but he accepts it meekly, and forgives his children without one impatient word. He says he will pray alone in the church that his wife may find sleep. He goes out, the church bell begins to tinkle, and his wife does in fact fall into a deep slumber—so deep that she is not awakened by a landslip that suddenly makes a thunder in the air. There are shrieks, "alarums and excursions," but the church and its pastor are left unscathed.

In the second act the pastor is still in the church, round which, we hear, hundreds of people have gathered, attracted by the double miracle—the miraculous sleep and the miraculous escape. Drawn by the same attraction, all the travellers on board a "mission" ship in the fjord have landed, and, the clergymen with them—six pastors and a bishop—come to Sang's house to talk the wonders over. They discuss, from their half-dozen points of view, the right attitude of the Church towards supposed miracles; in fact they "preach at" one another for the greater part of the act. They are interrupted by what even the most sceptical of them accept as a genuine miracle at last—the entry of the sick woman from the next room, actually walking. (Remember—the student of mental pathology will say that she had fallen into a trance, with a strong "suggestion" from her husband that she should recover the use of her limbs). All the clergymen and the people outside welcome her with a chorus of Alleluias—it is a scene of great religious exaltation—and Sang, his face radiant with faith and love, takes his wife into his arms. She drops into them—dead. "This," he cries wildly, "is not what I meant"; and the shock stretches him dead by the side of his wife.

And what is one to say of it all? It seems to me that one act of monologue on a sick-couch, followed by another of pulpit oratory from a Church Congress, does not become a drama by the interpolation of two "sensation scenes." And yet the ideas of which the pseudo-drama is made the medium—the beauty of faith, the difficulty of the Church with miracles, and the curious pathological conditions underlying faith-cures—are so interesting in themselves, and are exhibited by Bjornson with so much poetic feeling and human sympathy, and at the same time scientific reserve, that one becomes almost indifferent to their unsuitability for dramatic treatment. Anyhow, one is bound to applaud Mrs. Patrick Campbell's enterprise in producing a play so far removed from the beaten theatrical track. And her performance of the sick woman is an entirely beautiful thing and an extraordinarily skilful thing. For it is no small feat to portray, as Mrs.

CURRENT LITERATUR

LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

THE LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA. Reproduced from T
(The Times Office; Messrs. Sampson Low. £2 2

"The Life of Queen Victoria" is the first and adequate biography of her Majesty to be giv public. We do not, of course, forget Mr. Sidney Lee's we recently reviewed. But that is embedded in the the "Dictionary of National Biography" and is ava by those who possess or can refer to that work. The Queen's life as it appears in the fine volume now in an edition of 1,000 numbered copies cannot but prized as a worthy memorial of the greatest reign in of England and of a period which has seen the most developments in the social and political life of the Em
The Times life of Queen Victoria is very different in that of Mr. Lee's. He had to bear in mind the requi the Dictionary, to adhere closely to his subject, succinct and exhaustive record of facts with such dispassionate judgment on them as the scope of his permitted. The life now before us takes a large presents us not only with a vivid picture of th personality, but with a graphic sketch of the social mov the foreign history of the times. It is not written, as in a biographical dictionary must necessarily be writt for purposes of reference; it is essentially a book
It is, in fact, a reprint of the extensive life which appea Times at the time of Queen Victoria's death. We do we go too far in saying that, by common consent recognized not only as the best life of the Queen published at the time, but as a work which touc seldom or never reached in journalism, whether on its literary style, its singular completeness, or its di interesting treatment of a remarkable epoch. Publi moment of the Queen's death it does not, of course, a judicial aloofness of the historical student, nor has th arrived when the general reader will be disposed to de an attitude. But it is a penetrating and weighty ap of the great services rendered by Victoria to her Emp well deserved to appear in book form permanently e the sumptuous setting here given it. The volume well-printed quarto in red leather binding, bearing a tal design with the Royal arms in the centre.
divided into chapters, each beginning with an in suitable to its subject very tastefully designed by Capper. The most important embellishment of however, we have yet to mention—viz., the extremely of full-page photogravure portraits of her Majesty at her life, in each case accompanied by an appropria quotation. Of these there are twenty-one, reprodu from paintings or drawings or from photographs. Som especially the earlier ones, are but little familiar to t and the whole series forms a most interesting collec adds enormously to the value of the book. A geneal of Queen Victoria's descendants forms a useful appen handsome volume.

he constructs the Ideal State towards which he believes us to be tending and pictures the life in it. It is very cleverly done, and there is more scientific knowledge behind the bundle of prophecies than in those, for instance, of Jules Verne, Lord Lytton, and Edward Bellamy. At the same time it is hardly likely that any other intelligent man, whether of equal, of less, or of greater scientific knowledge, will see eye to eye with Mr. Wells all through his pages. The data are at once too doubtful and too complicated to admit of any uniformity of conclusion. The most that even a sympathetic reader can easily allow is that things might conceivably turn out pretty much as Mr. Wells predicts if nothing happened to prevent them from doing so. He certainly does not seem to us to take sufficient cognisance of probable lets and hindrances. The world which he foresees is a world in which the inventors will go on inventing indefinitely, and the inventions will be rationally applied to the simplification of life by intelligent scientific men, who will, if the vulgarism may be pardoned, "run the show," and arrange for the survival of the fittest by the forcible sterilization of the unfit. By ignoring certain forces, tendencies, and contingencies, these conclusions may certainly be given the colour of plausibility. They seem particularly plausible if we concentrate our attention upon English conditions. But they are the conclusions of a scientific student in the narrower sense of the word scientific. The political student—and more particularly the student of foreign politics—perceives lions in the path which may arrest progress as effectually as did the incursion of the Barbarians into the Roman Empire, and establish a new condition of things necessitating an entirely new set of prophecies.

In so far as Mr. Wells contents himself with foreshadowing mechanical inventions, and certain consequences which seem involved in them, he does not seriously outrage any probability. It is credible enough that the increased facilities of rapid locomotion which he contemplates will affect the distribution of the population as he anticipates, that the dirigible balloon will become a practical engine of war, that labour-saving appliances in the house will diminish the need for domestic servants, and so forth. But much of the argument in the book is vitiated by the assumption that the development will be orderly and unimpeded by convulsions; that the intelligent classes will be strong enough and numerous enough to have things their own way; and that inferior classes and inferior races will disappear as though waved out of existence by a magician's wand. To assume such things is really to assume the most important of the questions at issue. Will the proletariat be contented to take a patient part in gradual evolution, now that they have a list of grievances as well defined as a Newcastle programme and the means of procuring lethal weapons? Or will they rise and demand to be made happy all at once by Act of Parliament? Will soldiers taken from the proletariat, and presently to return to the proletariat, obey orders when commanded to fire on them? Doubts on this point are openly expressed in France, and unquestionably felt in Russia. The doubts do not diminish but increase as time goes on, and though the material condition of the proletariat may be improving, it does not improve as fast as their discontent and their opportunities of giving expression to that discontent increase. There are clear possibilities of a great cataclysm here, a cataclysm which amounts to an anticipatory revolution in Mr. Wells' Ideal State.

And then there is the problem of the inferior races, black and yellow. Unlike the late Mr. Charles Pearson, Mr. Wells assimilate with dogs; but they bide their Empress Tsu-Tsi "lies low" in the interi Senussi-el-Mahdi in an oasis of the Libyan de is known to be importing weapons and munit latest European patterns through the ports of every reason to suspect that the former is armi too. The Senussi, moreover, is sending out h the hundred, with the result that the Maho which is, be it noted, a fighting religion— Africa. His attitude towards "infidels" is t Dowager Empress towards "foreign devils." a moment when Continental Europe was co revolution or war—when the Eastern questio Instance, or France is trying to recover her l the death of the Emperor Francis Joseph Europe into the melting pot—China and Is negroes, simultaneously saw their chance, w well-drilled hordes, armed with the latest weap It would be a new invasion of the Huns com invasion of the Saracens. There is no certaint such conditions, would be able to repel the any better than the Western Empire was able t or the Eastern Empire to repel the Turks. Mr. Wells' Ideal State be then? And what suggested cataclysm more improbable than t tion, unmolested by any kind of cataclysm, anticipates?

Mr. Wells' anticipations, in short, strike than convincing. Perhaps it was necessary, hedging hypotheses, to construct them from a p data that were available, and to imagine scien field unhindered by the catastrophic interventio people animated by hunger or race-hatreds, and ble through their numbers and their fecundit that is how they have been constructed, wit though they are very interesting to read, they contingencies to be really instructive to those into the future.

ART.

Mr. Berenson's Essays.

The writings of Mr. Bernhard Berenso provocative of thought. There are art critics superior to questions of attribution; but, s enhanced, whether in books or in pictures, wh certain works round a given personality. W unwilling to credit Bacon with the Shakespeare we relinquish without extreme regret the c Gioconda" being the creation of perhaps the the world, Leonardo da Vinci. Mr. Berenson attribute works by Italian artists in various p collections—many of them, despite the labou others, still ridiculously catalogued—is valuabl side of scientific criticism. Not until the c National Gallery and of similar collections revised shall we gain the maximum of æsthet the pictures. Mr. Berenson's STUDY AND CRIT ART (Bell and Sons, 10s. 6d. n.) contain written at various times during the last dec on Correggio in particular he is conscious now recognizes "how valueless . . . . in the life of the spirit" is the mere history of art. But if his use of the word "tactile" was open to misconstruction, the same may be urged against another word in the preface to the present volume. He asserts that "qualitative analysis" is essential—a truism incapable of challenge; but when it is implied that "quantitative analysis" means the systematic examination of types of ears, eyes, hands, &c., we must raise a protest. In chemistry, qualitative analysis discovers the ingredients of which a substance or fluid is composed, quantitative analysis measures and determines their relative proportion. Apart from this special use, however, the words do not seem to us to convey what we take to be his meaning. It is regrettable that the criticisms of Mr. Berenson are sometimes marred by reason of his not sufficiently scrupulous use of words. Thus in "Certain Copies after Lost Originals by Giorgione" the astounding statement is made that the work of "a real artist . . . . is of the same quality throughout"—as compared with that of the copyist who is interested in particular parts of a picture. Yet, surely, to achieve "the same quality throughout," if we are to take the phrase strictly, would be superhuman; and we have only to study Giorgione's exquisite "Fête Champêtre" of the Louvre—once credited to a follower of Sebastian del Piombo!—for an emphatic refutation. Mr. Berenson might with advantage, too, have brought his book up to date. The "Ecce Homo" (No. 1,310, National Gallery) has for long borne the name of Cima instead of Giovanni Bellini, and, at any rate in one case, catalogue numbers are wrongly given. We point out these shortcomings because we hold Mr. Berenson to be one of the most alert and able living exponents of Italian art. After due allowance is made for ill-considered assertions and slight inaccuracies, every thoughtful student will welcome this volume of essays. The paper on Giorgione—wherein Mr. Berenson remains loyal to the attribution of "The Shepherd Boy" at Hampton Court, despite rumours one had heard to the contrary—makes us the more eager for his promised monograph on the master whose Castelfranco Madonna haunts the memory as one of the supreme Venetian pictures. The "Lives" of Vasari, lessened in authority by modern destructive criticism, forms the theme of a delightful study; and many will follow with pleasure the footsteps of Mr. Berenson in his careful attempt to personify Amico di Sandro, who, it is suggested, may be no other than the Berto Linaiuolo of Vasari.

An Italian Romanticist.

There is such a timid voice amongst the critics that we cannot refrain from expressing an opinion that L. Villari's biography of GIOVANNI SEGANTINI (Fisher Unwin, 21s. n.) has come very much as a surprise. It is not because Segantini was a symbolist, that he painted the Alps in a new way, or that he was surprisingly clever at cattle that his work deserves to be recorded in the sumptuous volume issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Art has produced many symbolists, the Alps have attracted many painters as clever even if not so emotional as Segantini, and his cattle are not so good as those of Cuyp or Troyon; but the position of the Italian painter in contemporary art—for the day of his death is but as yesterday—is not to be accounted for by his proficiency in any one of these directions. It was because he came within the sphere of the influences that produced Millet, Corot, Mathew Maris, our own Millais of the "Chill October," La Thangue, and Henry Estall in art, and merely the beauty of the Alps in "Alpine Pas distinguish him above others. It is the unusual vision, the direct appeal to nature. He painted th was his own, the life of the peasantry. He made make pictures out of the superb natural effects whic him, but was content to paint simply what he saw then, into "the movement" from a country wh often triumphant at the expense of the merely beaut place. He was an elemental painter to whom clime provided all that was needful. And, in advance o painters of all nationalities, he not only saw simply sees, but he had a natural gift for composition, f seizing, that is, phases of nature at a moment and of view when they might be with some completen on canvas. His hills were large and spacious, but no his landscapes wide stretching but not interminal horizons distant without outdistancing conception. T ness of his composition is seen in such a picture as the Alps," the atmosphere crescent, the hills and th in tone, and the central figure-group well and fitt the picture. In the same way it is not the cow in t

"SPRING IN THE ALPS."
[From "Giovanni Segantini," by permission of Mr. Fisher Un

a Farmyard" so much as the farmyard that arres Free nature, the earth under his feet, the trees in th to their surroundings, the animals in relation to all th noble lines of mountain backgrounds, these, studied of light and form and colour, arrested him; his sol problems they presented raised Segantini into the the emotional painters of our time. It will be his if he is longer remembered by his flights into the symbolism than as a painter singularly gifted with that had not been attempted before, but the snow and the mountains, the cattle and the sheep, the new way of presenting distant facts were fresh even to the veteran connoisseur. "What imparts to Segantini's Alps such an air of intense realism," says his biographer, "is the fact that they were painted from their own level. They were not painted from afar by a mere outsider, but by one who lived in their midst, and who lived there always." He soon perceived that if he painted objects just as they appear in the rarefied atmosphere of the Alps, the results would be intolerably crude. To overcome this difficulty he invented a new method.

> In the panoramas which form the background of his Alpine pictures the construction and the formation of the mountains are given with the minutest exactness, but everything is so perfectly blended together that the ensemble is an effect of perfect unity. This result was obtained in the following manner. The horizontal or pyramidal construction of the planes in Alpine scenery, if portrayed in a smooth flat style of painting, becomes harsh and crude. But Segantini made of that construction a quality by means of his shimmering, glistening painting. He painted in short rapid strokes and points of light and divided the colours on the canvas.

He had early discovered that the secret of real light lies in the laying of pure colours side by side on the canvas instead of mixing them on the palette.

This is the picture of a rarely gifted artist which we have formed from his works. We do not think that his biographer quite understands that his symbolism was his least attractive and least characteristic possession, but we are much indebted for a carefully planned biography of a remarkable and romantic naturalist whose death is so recent as to leave us unaware of the extent of our loss.

Conversations on Art and Artists.

James Northcote, who comes before us in CONVERSATIONS OF JAMES NORTHCOTE, R.A., WITH JAMES WARD ON ART AND ARTISTS, edited from the notebooks of the younger painter by Edward Fletcher (Methuen, 10s. 6d.), was esteemed one of the best conversationalists of his time. He has not survived as a painter, but is sufficiently outspoken and observant to range with Horace Walpole as a chronicler of an interesting artistic period. For five years he was a pupil of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and those of his remarks upon the great President of the Royal Academy, remembered by James Ward, are among the most interesting portions of the book. He saw and spoke with Johnson, Goldsmith, and Burke; he knew Cosway intimately, and yet lived to paint the portrait of John Ruskin, and he draws a homely and human picture of the second Pretender and his extravagant brother the Cardinal York, whom he saw while he was studying at Rome. His art criticisms are always of interest. He places the works of Titian before those of Raphael; remarks that Vandyck's "thinly painted and unsubstantial" portraits are like beautifully executed models "standing up in glass cases, such as are to be seen in Westminster Abbey," and is firm in his belief that Franz Hals "for truth of character was the greatest painter that ever existed." "I think Titian's power of giving his great effects arose from his seeing his object all at once, whereas Vandyck appears to me," says Northcote, "to have seen his object too much by piecemeal." He might have had the New English Art Club in mind when he says that there is a spurious breadth; "that vice of careless finishing in the English school. again, he tells us, "is what Sir Joshua was alw yet he himself can't be acquitted of it, especia painting the eyebrows, nose, &c." But then Si used to say, "Don't look at an eye only, but l face!" The "Conversations of James Nort further illustration of how excellent a critic painter may be, and, on reading the present vo surprised to learn that Mr. Ruskin became Ward manuscripts and offered to superintend t

Four Great Venetians.

Mr. Stearns is an American writer of some n attentive and enthusiastic student of Renais His FOUR GREAT VENETIANS (Putnam, 5s.) is dev masters whose works "represent Venetian art and substance"—Giorgione, Titian, Tintoretto, Mr. Stearns is familiar with his subject and write He knows his Ruskin and his Crowe and Cavalcas and his Berenson; he is acquainted with Prof scholarly interpretations of Giorgione's and Titia when, as in the case of the great Borghese pictu to accept them, and he does not follow Mr. C doubtful works wholesale to the master of Ca opinions are, on the whole, sufficiently orthodo difficult to understand how any critic can see Gio the Three Ages of the Pitti, or describe that w "a decided advance on any Venetian painting century." As a rule, Mr. Stearns' historical info ful and accurate, but a few mistakes here and the of correction. Giorgione, as we know from I letters, died in October, 1510, not, as we find here and his death, as Taddeo Albano informed his aug caused by a sudden visitation of the plague. Gonzaga, the beautiful Duchess of Urbino whose has immortalized in the Venus of the Uffizi and Pitti, was not the daughter (p. 109) but the sis Gonzaga, first Duke of Mantua, and her fath Giovanni Francesco, the hero of Fornovo, w Mantegna's well-known Madonna della Vitto before Titian visited Mantua. The glowing pag Stearns describes the wonders of Tintoretto's bru di San Rocco remind us how profoundly another Phillips Brooks, was impressed by the lofty sp the great Crucifixion, and make us tremble l works should be ruined by the summary restora they are threatened. We can only hope tha protest of Dr. Frattin, the guardian of the ancie of San Rocco, will obtain a hearing, and trust wiser counsels may prevail. Several of Tint works, including the lovely Three Graces from th are reproduced in the present volume, but the inferior in quality and cannot compare with thos series of art books published by Messrs. Bell and this country.

ORIENTAL BOOKS.

Letters of the Time of Abraham.

THE LETTERS AND INSCRIPTIONS OF HAMMU BABYLON, ABOUT B.C. 2200. By L. W.

Horites, and was in turn defeated by Abram with his three hundred and eighteen servants born in his own house. There is very little doubt that Amraphel was the same as the Khammurabi of the early Babylonian inscriptions, and the only wonder is how so considerable a personage as the King of Babylon (to say nothing of his allies) could have been chased and smitten and ravished of his prisoners by a mere sheikh, albeit the progenitor of the Hebrew race. Kings, however, in those days—say, 2200 or 2300 B.C.—were scarcely more than local chiefs or burgomasters of towns; and at the time when Abram fell upon his rear, Khammurabi had not yet defeated and driven the Elamites away or assumed the crown of Sumer and Akkad.

Dr. Rogers, in his "History of Babylonia," pays a glowing tribute to the statesmanship of this ancient Sovereign and quotes the "ringing words" of his famous inscription in the Louvre; and there is no doubt that he was the first King of Babylon who worked great deeds for his people, built granaries, dug canals, "the blessing of men," and notably increased the prosperity of the country. Nevertheless, these letters of his, which Mr. King has carefully edited in two volumes of text, and of which he now supplies translations, transliterations, and ample commentary, read more like the orders of a big landed gentleman to his steward and gamekeepers—leaves torn out of his memorandum-book—than the despatches of a King to his Viceroys. They deal with the minutest matters, and, as Mr. King observes, "nothing was too small to come under the Royal cognisance, and the great mind of Hammurabi was as well able to superintend the conduct of a campaign as to note that his woodcutters in the forest were sending him dead or decayed wood instead of sound trunks." The letters sometimes give orders to clear a canal, setting a time-limit, which shows that Khammurabi understood the ways of the working man; or they instruct the agent to make an inspection of the Royal flocks, order additional shearers, and are very particular about the wool. Evidently this was a good farmer-King, as we should judge him from his portrait, only that he looks more like a grocer. Nor did he leave too much to his lieutenants, but commanded the shepherds and overseers of the cattle to come to Babylon and show up their accounts in person. He was also his own First Lord, and gave instructions as to the repair of his ships and the details of their crews. Many letters show his rigid justice, and how he enforced the return of lands wrongfully seized by usurers and others. The letters of the succeeding Kings, also included in this volume, refer to similar domestic affairs, such as the tribute which was overdue, an escaped female slave, the harvesting of corn, and taxes; though King Ammizaduga seems to have confined himself to summonses to sheep-shearings—an important source of revenue in Babylonia. One letter of Khammurabi's is particularly interesting, since it deals with the regulation of the calendar by the insertion of an intercalary month. Another tells the viceroy to send the Elamite goddesses to Babylon in a state barge, with the temple women, and sheep for the goddesses' food, and sufficient towing-men and soldiers to bring the divinities safely to the capital.

The series supplies an interesting picture—sometimes remarkably detailed—of the life and administration of the remote period to which the letters belong, and Mr. King's comments and explanations are all that can be desired—though occasionally we think he slightly forces a fragmentary text to get a wide deduction. The whole collection of documents included in the volume—notably the emended "Chronicle of the Kings of Babylon"—is extremely valuable. But who would be a postman in the days of Khammurabi? These letters [illegible] of history, and it seems almost incredible that the a of a King about the shearing of his sheep some four years ago should have been preserved on their tablets and be placed before the optics of any chuckle-headed who chooses to look into a glass case in Bloomsbury. K would have known exactly what to do with the pla make no doubt, and we should be sorry for the t crooked furrow in the kingdom of Babylon in B.C. 220

A Sanskrit Chronicle.

KALHANA'S RAJATARANGINI: A CHRONICLE OF THE KASMIR. Translated, with an Introduction, Co and Appendices, by M. A. STEIN. Two vols. (63s. n.)

History—if we except epic legends and princely containing fragments of fact—is the department of lit which the Brahmans gave least attention, and a Chronicle is among the rarest of Asiatic phenomena. special interest and importance of Kalhana's "River a metrical history of Cashmere from the misty ages o down to the date of composition in 1148-49. It is i not only by reason of its uniqueness, but on account of serious and independent attitude towards the hist country. He quotes his sources, most of which have disappeared, and he even uses the ancient inscri temples recording grants by former Kings. To find th antiquarian research in a twelfth-century Indian poet able; and if he is over-credulous and not by any mea in accepting the wild statements of his predecessors, employing inscriptions is some check upon his narr obviously aims at impartiality, and is singularly fr fulsome adulation of reigning Princes which is th Oriental Court poetry. Nevertheless, the Rajataranginī and Kalhana's conception of his work is influenced by sity he felt of treating it in the conventional for poetic tradition. Much less conventional, however, of its kind, comparatively free from tedious embel simple and direct in its narrative, the Chronicle is n a didactic poem, intended to illustrate the transitory earthly glory, the uncertainty of sovereign power punishment that follows sins against the moral law. also much more than this. It is a repertory of medi graphy and custom, religion and ritual, as existing in which though Indian was not of India, and the very and isolation of which form its peculiar claim upon our From very early times Cashmere maintained its inde and not only that, but deliberately excluded from its s valleys all intrusion of foreigners. If anywhere expect to find early Indian customs and traditions by time, it is in the Vale of Cashmere, and Dr. Ste this expectation by the minute local observations on whilst preparing his monumental work. As a c on ancient and mediæval India as represented in an exc unadulterated condition the work of Kalhana, now for time expounded by a fully competent scholar, is above

The Principal of the College at Lahore took up h task under the inspiration of the late Professor Bühl scholars had tried their hand on the Cashmere Chr hitherto no good text, still less translation, had been Bühler discovered at Srinagar in Cashmere the manuscript from which all other known (and generally comprehensive essay on Cashmere topography, accompanied by admirable maps, which may frankly be admitted to be the most important additions to mediæval Indian geography that have been made for many a day. Without such local investigations and a complete study of existing materials in Cashmere any translation of the Rajataraṅgiṇī must be totally inadequate. We have only to point to Mr. Jogesh Chunder Dutt's well-intentioned version—made from a bad text and entirely deficient in topographical knowledge—to show how useless such a work may be if carried out in ignorance of the special information which Dr. Stein alone possesses.

From the antiquarian and scholarly point of view we have nothing but praise for the manner in which this important work has been produced. It is a credit at once to the translator, the map-makers, the printers, and the publishers. The notes abound in valuable indications; the appendices and topographical memoir are priceless. The translation itself, however, is insipid. Dr. Stein had no time to do more than aim at a perfectly literal translation, and the result is not attractive as literature. Some one, perhaps, may think it worth while to put it into poetic prose or even metre, but we doubt the expediency. It is as a picture of Cashmere in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, a record of its traditions, legends, cults, manners, morals (such as they were), and life, rather than as a work of literature, that Kalhaṇa's "River of Kings" will be prized by students, and on such Dr. Stein has conferred a boon which will be gratefully appreciated by those who have learning enough to understand it.

Ancient India, as described in Classical Literature, with Introduction, Notes, and Index, by J. W. M'Crindle (Constable, 7s. 6d. n.t), is the last of a series of six volumes giving annotated translations of ancient texts relating to India. Only one other, the "Invasion of India by Alexander," has been published in England; and it has already gone through two editions. Its merit was very generally recognized by the Press, and we have nothing but praise for the present volume. The authors here drawn from are Herodotus, Strabo, Diodorus, Pliny, Aelian, Philostratus, Dion Chrysostom, Porphyry, Stobæus, Nonnus, besides the Romance of Alexander, the Itinerary of Alexander, and the Periegesis of Dionysius. The translations are mostly by Mr. M'Crindle himself, and are quite good; the notes excellent, giving references to ancient and modern authorities. Mr. M'Crindle identifies the gold-digging ants with the Tibetan miners. We can cordially recommend this volume, which both the Orientalist and the general reader will find most useful.

The Tell el Amarna Period, by Carl Niebuhr (London: Nutt, 1901), is the second of the series of "short, popular, but thoroughly scientific studies" of the ancient East which a number of German scholars are writing and Miss Hutchison is translating for Mr. Nutt. It is written with a brightness and lucidity not universal in Teutonic essays of the kind, and gives an excellent summary of the main results and interest of the famous Tell-el-Amarna correspondence. Professor Niebuhr differs considerably from Professor Flinders Petrie in his estimate of Akhenaten (otherwise Amenophis IV.), to whom many of these letters were addressed, and it is hardly necessary to say that he spells nearly all the names that occur in the despatches differently. Plain people would be thankful if uniform augurs would agree to wink together even over wrong spellings, rather than introduce a perfectly different form every six months. Or, if they must reform the orthography as frequently as an Irish Land Act, they might tell us in parentheses what the new form corresponds to in the effete system to which we await the second part, in which we a
"introduction and commentary to the Arabic t first part, along with a preface and bibliograp series," as well as an explanation of the princi editor has been guided in arranging his plan.
enough to say that the text of Ibn-Wallâd' treatise, the "Kitâb al-Maqṣûr," has been ed care from the MSS. at London, Paris, and notice of variants, and sufficient vowel poi valuable addition to the printed texts of A treatises. The Prussian Academy of Sciences Oriental Society contribute to the expenses o
it is unnecessary to add that with such printer of Leiden, the mechanical part of the work is w wish Dr. Brönnle all success in his spirited and Orientalists owe a debt of gratitude to M completing and editing the work which th

Wright had begun in A Catalogue of the Sy Library of the University of Cambridge, University Press). The acquisition of the the seventeenth century was the foundation and additions were received from time to tim until an important voluntary gift was made i 1887, of MSS. collected for the Society some for Mesopotamia and Kurdistan, that the work seriously begun. The collection of Syriac MS a whole, very remarkable, but it includes a series of MSS. from Southern India relating the Nestorian Church, and for Syriac scholars and complete volumes, with their full indice value.

OTHER NEW BOO

Chivalry.

Chivalry, being distinctly international less closely connected with English life than subjects of the "Social England Series"; Cornish's book Chivalry (Swan Sonnenschein well stand by itself, apart from its com
In these days, chivalry means rather generosity, and unselfishness. The chivalry of Cornish writes means the whole system of id the dominant military classes in the Middle A denounces the spirit of chivalry as the spi
Freeman, and Green following him, have sligh and un-English, and have censured as false Hallam thought it a "great source of hum and held that its principles "were not na of many evils." Mr. Cornish agrees on the w enforcing and amplifying almost all that Hall subject, and practically adopting his argument
He is, however, much more elaborate than copious in his quotations from Froissart, St.
authorities. From one source or another great many facts, and has spared no pains to m of the subject complete. In particular, he ha of his way to write an excellent and sensible ch which was by no means a "foolish business"
As he speaks, by the way, of Sir James A squires, he might as well have described the armour. But as regards the main questi chivalric notions, artificial as they were, w evil, the answer must be very much a matter of modern critic cannot effectively place himself

Women of the Salons.

Most, if not all, of THE WOMEN OF THE SALONS AND OTHER FRENCH PORTRAITS, by S. G. Tallentyre (Longmans, 10s. 6d. n.), appeared in Longman's Magazine. The essays would have made a more satisfactory volume if they had been elaborated and revised. They are interesting and well written; but one notices some omissions which detract from their value, and some inaccuracies which might just as well have been avoided. Some of Mlle. Germaine Necker's eccentricities are explained on the ground that she "was a French child." She was as much German as French, and more Swiss than either, her only French ancestor being her maternal grandmother, Madeleine Albert, who came from Dauphiné. Mme. Necker's relations with Gibbon, when they met at Coppet in their old age, are left unnecessarily vague. "Did he or Suzanne," the author asks, "remember those old days when they first met?" It is an idle question, seeing that we have Mme. Necker's letters to Gibbon telling him that his "leisure ought always to belong to her who has been your first love and your last," and that she found him "as it were a solitary tree whose shade still covers the desert that separates me from the first years of my life." The chapter on Mme. de Staël is somewhat too reticent for perfect accuracy as to that lady's affairs, and one would gather from it that it is not certain even that she loved Benjamin Constant, a position which has no foundation in the face of the correspondence and the "Journal Intime." Justice, however, requires us to say that the book is interesting in spite of its faults. Perhaps the best essay is that on Dr. Tronchin. Such omissions as there are in his case do not affect the value of the study; and his forgotten reputation was well worth reviving. He popularized inoculation for smallpox; he anticipated Rousseau's views about foster mothers; and he was the real inventor of the fresh-air cure. Special praise must be accorded to the illustrations—photogravures of well-known portraits.

Claudius Clear.

LETTERS ON LIFE, by Claudius Clear (Hodder, 6s.), consist of prelections, mainly on the minor morals, though of course the distinction between these and the major morals is rather a fine one at times. What we particularly approve in Claudius Clear's philosophy is his refusal to suffer fools gladly. He speaks the language which they understand, and says that they ought to be "fired out." This contemptuous treatment of them may very well prove more salutary than any moral or religious exhortation. Claudius Clear is also rightly severe on those who limit their opportunities of enjoyment by refraining from the cultivation of their minds, and he does not allow that devotion to work or to a creed is an adequate excuse for such neglect. It would be easy to reproach him supercilliously with insisting upon the obvious, but it would not be fair, for he is addressing an audience which habitually ignores the obvious. Nor are his harangues likely to be the less effective for being gentle and paternal, and even a shade patronizing, in tone. He writes agreeably, and has plenty of allusions and illustrations at his command, so that he is able to give a platitude something of the air of an epigram. Claudius Clear's "Lay Sermons" may do the armchair reader as much good as the sermon preached from the pulpit.

Scientific Phrenology.

THE MENTAL FUNCTIONS OF THE BRAIN, by Dr. Bernard Holländer, M.D. (Freiburg) (Grant Richards, 21s.), is a bold attempt to clear up the mystery that still involves "the funda- goes further, and adduces evidence to show that the of particular specially developed faculties is unifor panied by the unusually great development of some co area on the surface of the brain. To the layman who appreciate the complexity of the issues involved, Dr. deductions may well appear convincing; but there doubt that in many cases the interpretations he places are unduly strained, while in others they fall short of mate conclusion. Perhaps the most generally interest in the book is that wherein the author vindicates the of Franz Gall, the Viennese doctor who is commonly have discovered the science of phrenology. Gall himse repudiated this notion, and Dr. Holländer is but tardy act of justice in referring that discovery to what discreditable pupil Spurzheim. Dr. Holländer great conviction, and has succeeded in bringing toge quantity of useful material in his book; the worst said of it is that it tries to prove too much.

Etymology.

In NOTES ON ENGLISH ETYMOLOGY, chiefly rep the transactions of the Philological Society by Dr. W (Clarendon Press, 8s. 6d. n.), we have, alphabeticall notes on a number of obscure words, followed by English words of Brazilian origin, and a long list of words used in Anglo-French, with their various form with the last, such a list has been long wanted, for no easy matter, given your English word, to know w look for in texts or dictionaries. As regards the firs Skeat here throws new light on many words not full in the "Oxford English Dictionary," which will doubt useful to Dr. Murray in his future issues. Professor S gives his authorities, and marshals his facts in such their strength or weakness can be tested; hence, ev does not attain finality, he is useful. He has found in Swedish dialect, from which comes English boa derives it from basa, which is one step further back) is collected to prove that bronze is derived from aes (Brindisi), which before this note was published had guess. New light is given on a number of other wo difficult word martlet, Professor Skeat suggests a co merlet, a blackbird, which is the figure of the he while the name means the house-martin. Minx is d Low German and Friesic minsk—i.e., mensch, "man, For mug he has an earlier quotation than any g "N. E. D." under clay-mug. There is interest on ev the book, and new matter on many.

Professor Skeat could not have found in literat motto for himself than that which he prefixes to the of A CONCISE ETYMOLOGICAL DICTIONARY OF TH LANGUAGE (Clarendon Press, 5s. 6d.)—

> Were man to live coeval with the sun,
> The patriarch-pupil would be learning still

His first attempt at a concise dictionary was good, b fulness was marred by its arrangement of conne together. Professor Skeat finds that this is not conv at once re-writes the whole, arranging the words alp Moreover, in twenty years he has learnt so much th or corrections are made in nearly every article. It fessor Skeat to be modest; so, as he never sings his we will say at once that this is an ideal concise e dictionary, and indispensable. It is also like Profes that he was a revolutionist, and condemned to death in Austria, and lived in England because it was the only country in which he felt quite sure that he would never be surrendered to the Austrian Government.

COMMERCIAL KNOWLEDGE, by Algernon Warren (Murray, 2s. 6d.), is described as a "manual of business methods and transactions." It conveys much general information of the sort which every merchant ought to have at his finger ends in a fairly readable style. The elements of commercial law are given; the principles of banking are expounded; technical terms are explained; there is something about insurance and employer's liability; there is even a discourse on the department of commercial travellers. We hardly think that teachers will regard it as an ideal book for use in schools and colleges. It is a little too discursive for their purpose. But any lad entering a merchant's office might read it with advantage, and keep it by him for reference.

Messrs. T. and T. Clark are much to be congratulated on their TOPOGRAPHICAL AND PHYSICAL MAP OF PALESTINE, edited by Professor George Adam Smith, and prepared under the direction of Mr. J. G. Bartholomew. The scale is four miles to an inch; the physical relief is effectively shown by colouring in contours. About 3,180 names are printed and duly indexed. There are inset maps showing the environs of Jerusalem and the vegetation of Palestine. All the modern place names are given, while the accepted identified Biblical sites are added in bolder type. It is, in fact, the best map available, and may equally serve the purposes of the teacher and the tourist (10s. 6d. in case, 15s. on rollers).

To Black's "Sir Walter Scott Readers for Young People" (6d. n. per volume) THE STORY OF ROB ROY and THE STORY OF THE FAIR MAID OF PERTH and THE STORY OF THE PIRATE are added. To the uniform "Literature Series" (same publishers and price) there is added a selection from the "Poems of Longfellow," leading off with the inevitable "Psalm of Life," and including the no less inevitable "Excelsior," together with reasonably long excerpts from "Miles Standish," "Hiawatha," and "Evangeline."

FICTION.

Some Well-known Hands.

Mr. Norris, Mr. Weyman, and Mr. Crav written so much and on so consistent and approv criticism of their work bids fair to become super that the public cares to know lies in the stateme once again turn to these authors with a certaint qualities it has previously enjoyed in the EMBARRASSING ORPHAN (Methuen, 6s.), by Mr. ample, is one of those entertaining and ably put of modern social life that he so perfectly unde so often presented. The men and women are sne and often likes; there is the touch of humour scholarly feeling, the firmness and leisured a assured of a sympathetic hearing. The book end to end; graceful, amusing, and certain Of popularity, too, Mr. Weyman may be certai HANNIBAL (Smith, Elder, 6s.) is written in the and tells the same sort of story, or "historical is called, that the readers of "A Gentleman "Under the Red Robe" have acclaimed lo massacre of St. Bartholomew and the terrib days of 1572 are drawn with a vivid—almost a l interwoven "love interest" is sustained wit spirit, and the whole is effective, compelling story has already been put into stage form be produced. Mr. Francis Marion Crawford Venetian story in his latest book, MARIETTA with his usual cunning. The loves of Zorzi, the and the eponymous lady of the story take the p of true affection, but the end is such as novel to approve. The atmosphere of Venice in the fift admirably reproduced; the characters convinc cultural, and the dénouement delights. Mr. Cr once more (is it for the fortieth time?) succeed his admirers. What busy author need desire m

The humorous sincerity of Mr. Jacobs collection of short stories, LIGHT FREIGHTS (fascination difficult to resist. Most of the si of the quaint adventures of our old friends t river or coasting boats, and deal, in the wel with the wisdom of the foolish and the baffli uncultured. But Mr. Jacobs proves again th humorists, he can touch the sympathetic to t and light a hand as he can call up laughter. Jacobs' merit as a humorist is that he does not self to quotation. Such an amusing adventu Freak," for example, in which one of an extrem is persuaded to allow himself to be sold to East-end Barnum, as a wild man of Borneo, is as a whole, but ridiculously weak when seen in vein which the author of "Many Cargoes" h severely, but which has by no means petered o of the Cavendish," in which the wife of an A amusing part. Taken one at a time, these st the most dispirited.

Mr. A. E. W. Mason appears at his best that gives its name to ENSIGN KNIGHTLEY AN (Constable, 6s.). It is a really admirable examp

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE FRENCH.

M. Marcel Prévost and "Feminism."

M. Marcel Prévost has, at least, this claim to be taken seriously—that he has divided public opinion ever since the publication of "Les Demi-Vierges" made his name widely known. Some held that M. Prévost had written that book to pander to morbid tastes, others that he merely desired to call attention to certain increasing social evils. Since then M. Prévost has specialized in "feminism," and other questions have arisen. Is he a great thinker? Is he a great novelist? Is he in earnest? Or is he merely a clever adaptable journalist who has seen and seized a chance of swimming philosophically with the tide? The appearance of Miss Ellen Marriage's translation of FRÉDÉRIQUE (Duckworth, 6s.) seems a fit occasion for trying to make up one's mind about this very popular French writer.

Our own impression is that M. Marcel Prévost is by nature more journalist than novelist, but that he has a certain qualified earnestness inspired by a purely intellectual sympathy with the wrongs, real or supposed, of women. He is not exactly eaten up with his zeal, like certain women writers on the subject who have known something of the bitterness of wrecked lives or cramped ambitions. It is absolutely inconceivable that he can have deduced his moral (or his message) from the story which he tells, for it is inconceivable that the story can have happened as he tells it. It is obviously a made story and not, as the French say, vécu. But M. Marcel Prévost does seem to have been convinced—we say "been convinced" advisedly, for he does not seem to have felt—that there was a great deal to be said for the views, claims, and aspirations of the feminists, that women—and more particularly French women—are apt to be "put upon," and that their status can only be raised by means of revolutionary changes in the method of their education. Convinced of these things he has got up his case very carefully, and stated it in a novel which leads up to an elaborate exposition of his views on educational reform. There are twenty-five pages of this exposition, given in the form of a speech delivered by a feminist at the opening of a new school for orphan girls. It makes a very fine essay, well thought out and well informed. It would have been admirable as a magazine article. But when it turns up as the summary of the moral of a story it confirms the impression that it was not the story, that suggested the moral but that the story was fabricated to enforce the moral. And that, of course, is both ethically and artistically bad—artistically bad because it introduces the ring of insincerity, and ethically bad because it makes a good moral depend upon the evidence of false witnesses. We should not, of course, have written of M. Marcel Prévost's novel at this length if it had not been a work marked by considerable ability. It contains much that is good besides the essay on education which we have referred to. The author may be congratulated on having described life in London at considerable length without making mistakes, and on having displayed an intimate knowledge of the intimate characteristics of the women of various nationalities. But he knows them in the lump and not as individuals. With all their eccentricities not one of them stands out of the canvas, or is likely to linger in the memory. We have only to compare M. Prévost's Christine Legay—the poor little girl whose rich lover betrays her—with Daudet's Désirée Delobelle, to see how the character-drawing of a journalist differs from that of an artist. Finally we may note that, though M. Prévost cannot tell, even now, which of you is the fair heart inclined little by little to Léa, no doubt is nearer the primitive type.

And all this and much more to the same effect given as though M. Marcel Prévost really thought by means of such speeches in such circumstances tha the world go round. Truly the French novel has t since the gay days of Dumas the younger, and Marg de Kock.

M. Paul Bourget.

M. Paul Bourget dedicates his book THE D which Mr. Fisher Unwin publishes a fairly fluen American, to his young countrymen—those between eighteen and twenty-five—apparently in the expe they will find in his work the answers to several questions as to the conduct of life. "The Disciple," be new to many English readers, is undoubtedly psychological study, but we cannot but be doubt influence upon the youth of France. Briefly, the sto a young man who at twenty-five has run through "th all ideas," whose critical mind has precociously assi most subtle philosophy of the age. The result is t come to regard the human soul as a piece of mechan he dissects as a matter of scientific interest. The disciple is sudden and salutary, and we are not so him. M. Bourget's book is designed to show the terrib bilities of the teacher, especially of the literary craft the careful analysis of so morbid a type as Robert hardly make pleasant reading. It is a curiously book, the main part of which is taken up with disciple's explanatory dissection of his own chara might be called the "Confession of a Young Man of th

M. René Bazin.

M. René Bazin is one of the few French nove reckoned with who can be read without blushing eve most prone to that vanishing habit. He is also one of whom the boulevard is not the world. His task is the tion of the provinces and the provincials, and he fulfils it In AUTUMN GLORY (Jarrold, 6s.), now translated by Waugh, his theme is the life of the farmers of La Vend
the few parts of France where the Feudal feelin respect for religion linger. His story is as simple ever was put into a book, but he tells it like a liter Even in a translation it leaves that impression of and not invented which is only found in work o rank. The book is one to compare and contrast with
M. Bazin is not documenté like M. Zola, who appe worked with a bundle of press cuttings from the Pet and to have constructed a narrative into which every a crime that he ever heard of could be worked. Bu to know more than M. Zola, and his picture is proba in spite of the sentimentalism which he permits him dominating tragedy of the story is the drifting awa land by the younger generation—a phenomenon e supposed to be incompatible with peasant proprietors translation is, on the whole, well done, though an expression like "breeding-mare" is not the most equivalent of the French that might have been found.

M. Zola.

M. Zola's books; he has never drawn a more complete household than that of the Chanteaus, their son Lazare, the old Norman servant Véronique, even the dog and the cat. It is a wonderful gallery of portraits, but it is very depressing.

Mr. Vizetelly has also translated a selection of short stories by M. Zola, which he calls THE HONOUR OF THE ARMY (Chatto, 3s. 6d). They display the novelist in various moods—one, "The Spree at Coqueville," in the very unusual mood of Rabelaisian joviality. The first story, which is a translation of "Le Capitaine Burle," is one of the strongest in the collection, and is interesting as having afforded a handle to certain of M. Zola's more unscrupulous enemies at the time of the Dreyfus affair. The translations are by different hands, but the editor has revised the work of his collaborators and has contrived to secure a certain uniformity of style throughout the volume.

M. Amédée Achard was, we believe, a contemporary of Dumas, and there is a similarity in the style of the two writers. "Le Trésor d'Or," is now issued in an English translation, THE GOLDEN FLEECE (Macqueen, 6s.), with some sufficiently remarkable illustrations by Mr. Victor Searles. It is a dashing romance, dealing with the adventures of a young Gascon gentleman fighting against the Turks in the reign of Louis XIV.

BOYS' BOOKS.

[BY ONE WHOM THEY CONCERN.]

TO THE EDITOR OF "LITERATURE."

Dear Mr. Editor,—My father being the important contributor of your valuable columns he says I can do it for him this week, it being only about boys' books which I know more about than he does having been stood on the form for reading them in prep. and he'll do my Latin exercises for me instead and put in some mistakes so as nobody shall know it was him but not too many so as not to make it hot for me.

I will now take up my pen and write the first book on my list and a rattling good book too being HELD TO RANSOME by F. B. Forester (Nelson 5s.). It is about brigands not in Italy like Jack Harkaway, but in Spain where I didn't know they had brigands but they do, and a price was put on the boy's head, but afterwards he got away being a public school boy like me only I've never been carried off with blood-curdling adventures to a brigand's cave but you never know your luck.

I will now turn to the next book it is ONE OF THE RED SHIRTS by Herbert Hayens (Nisbet 6s.) and it is about another brave English boy who got an Italian called Garibaldi to help him to overturn the government and make a bloody revolution that was badly wanted, and they were called red shirts because that was what they wore for uniforms, including trousers of course, the climate being too hot for coats. The story is full of blood-curdling adventures and people being thrown into the deepest dungeons and got out again in the very nick of time, and it is partly history but more exciting than the history you learn at school, and another book of the same author from which you can learn a lot of history is FOR THE CROWN (Nelson 6s.). The colours mean the good old Union Jack which braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze, but in this book it only braves the battle and not the breeze because it is a book get into the cavalry than into the infantry, b good fighting at the end of the book, though the thing about tearing a piece out of a will which d

if it would be possible.

We will now turn to FOR THE FAITH by E
(Nelson 3s. 6d.). This is about the Reformation w had more wives than sense, and they used to b just as my form master burns penny dreadfuls in them so as to learn things they didn't know b learn things you didn't know before out of this good thing I suppose, as you don't get much fur it there being too many religious arguments to needn't believe everything the Pope tells you he doesn't know himself. Having made the will now make some more about another book out of the pen of that truly great auth Stables, the same one who rides about in car saucepans but for a lark and has rows with fa book is called WITH CUTLASS AND TORCH (Nisb about the slave trade and the hero is a midshipm terror who fights the dastardly slave-dealers, hand first bearded them in their lairs. The next book i being OUT ON THE LLANOS by Achilles Daunt (S.P.
the scene being now changed to a place called C America. It takes you a lot of chapters to get t a man overboard on the way, and a dastardly nig out a razor instead of fighting fair, and then the and shoot alligators with their trusty rifles an blood curdle to read how the gallant hero was the place by a big snake and took refuge in the a tree where the snake couldn't follow him, and close he prodded it with his trusty hunting knif

I must now pass on to FROM PLAYGROUND by Frederick Harrison (S.P.C.K., 2s.6d.). The boy away from school, and no wonder either as i school he was at and the head was a caution and and dripping for tea, so he took the Queen's shil a King in those days and he was at Waterloo a dastardly foe by throwing a bucket of water ove though the Frenchman had a gun which would afterwards he came back to England and w school and cuned the head with his own cane w been an awful lark.

I will next criticize the books about red Ind
being THE HERO OF THE HILLS by G. Waldo B 3s. 6d.). It happened a long time ago whe Americans were French as well as English, and the Indians at each other like you set a dog a they took each other's scalps and made splendid full of noble words and heroic deeds done by o are also two other Redskin books by E. S. Ellis ARROW AND THE CHIEFTAIN AND THE SCOUT
each), also about the cunning backwoodsman savage and his dusky squaw, and I will copy out exciting passages which makes your flesh creep furious exclamations were yet trembling on the the crack of a rifle broke the stillness. The mi resounding shriek, leaped clear of the bridge and like a meteor, the spray flying high in the vanished from human sight." Another book w now is SIR PHILIM'S TREASURES by H. A. Hi want to pay back Robinson Secundus fourpence I borrowed off him on Saturday. So no more at present, with kind regards from,

I remain yours truly,

JOHNSON PRIMUS.

P.S.—I think writing for papers is much better than going up for the Army, especially there being no exam. and you keeping a man to put the spelling right, so I mean to be one when I grow up.

LIBRARY NOTES.

No less than four new public libraries have commenced work, each in a populous district, this month. Three are in London, the fourth is at Hull. At Poplar and Stepney the way has been smoothed by Mr. Passmore Edwards. The Woolwich library and the new central library at Hull were opened by Lord Avebury, whose text on both occasions was the imperfections of our educational system. These undoubted imperfections suggest the regretful reflection that the public library must be regarded more as an antidote to the education afforded by our School Boards than as its natural complement.

"Some Art Books in the Public Libraries" was the subject of a lecture delivered by Sir W. B. Richmond, on November 1, in the Town-hall, Hammersmith. In illustration of his lecture there was an exhibition of fine art and other illustrated books from the reference library. We wish there were more of such lectures. They cannot fail to be helpful to the public who desire to make the best use of the libraries.

The Bishopsgate Institute has abolished "open access" in favour of the indicator system.

The public libraries committee of Swansea are in want of a sub-librarian who must possess a thorough knowledge of the Welsh language and must also be sufficiently acquainted with Celtic literature to advise in the selection of books and to catalogue them. The salary originally proposed was £2 per week, but upon a protest this was altered. In most libraries the alteration would imply a higher figure, but in Swansea the sub-librarian, when found, will be allowed 38s. weekly.

Mr. Carnegie continues his Irish gifts with the offer of £7,000 to Limerick on condition of finding £350 per annum. Wales has begun to benefit by £1,500 to Treeynon, Aberdare, where the rate will produce less than £100. The gift of £37,000 to Dundee appears to be meeting with opposition, the argument being that a good central library, one branch, and the full rate is sufficient for the present needs of the town. A sum of £10,000 has been offered to Hawick on the usual conditions.

A gift of £100 has come to the Southwark Public Library, in Walworth-road, to be expended upon reference books. The donor is the widow of a tradesman of the locality, and the gift is in memory of her late husband. The Hampstead Public Library has received a fine collection of local pamphlets and broadsides dating back some sixty years, the gift of Mr. Henry Sharpe. A small similar collection of earlier date has just been purchased. The department of local literature, so far as the beginning of the nineteenth century is concerned, is now fairly complete.

The perilous question of discarding stock has been agitating the Twickenham Library Committee. It has come very near to adopting the rule of thumb method. Two members were appointed, and apparently the procedure was that one should note for removal as many works as he chose (about 250 in this case) and that the second member should follow and adopt a similar course. The librarian, we are told, should be able to tick off about a thousand. Such a method of solving the problem to librarians seems rather drastic.

We notice reports from Durban, the Imperial Library of Japan (Tokio), Leeds, and West Ham. Despite the war there has

MORE MAGAZINES.

The latest French magazine to establish definite relations is La Grande Revue, of which Messrs. Sam have taken charge. The editor, whose name is given a Labori, is no other than the Maître Labori whose clear to England by his plucky conduct of the Dreyfus contributes to the number before us an essay on polit sophy. Some documents about Fouché are examin Baron Albert Lombroso. There is the conclusion of story by M. Camille Lemonnier, and a presentation of th question by M. René Puaux.

The Journal of the African Society (Macmillan which the first number has reached us, begins well. T interesting tribute to the memory of Mary Kingsle J. R. Green, who knew her intimately, and the list butors also includes such eminent names as those of Johnston, Dr. C. T. Hagberg Wright, and Archdeacon who gives an account of the African Association of 178 his grandfather, Sir John Sinclair, took a leading part.

The current National Review is chiefly notabl "unauthorized version" of General Buller's hellog we must leave that matter to those whom it immedi cerns. Special attention is also invited by the ed anonymous article on "British Foreign Policy." however, proposes an entente with Russia—which may proposal, but certainly is not a novel one. Mr. G. S. an incisive and bitter attack on those modern Jews their backs upon their race, and Mr. Leslie Stephen ironical demonstration that Shakespeare wrote the Bacon. Bacon, it is argued, was too busy to write books himself, and was quite unscrupulous enough to "ghost." Shakespeare, who, as the author of Ha proved himself a poet as well as a philosopher, would have been introduced to him by Southampton, and sum of £1,000, which Southampton is believed to have to Shakespeare, may very well have been Bacon's ho Moreover, the books which Bacon published after Shak death are notoriously inferior to those published duri speare's lifetime. It is a clever argument, well elabo not too long drawn out. Sir Charles Warren cont Lessons from the South African War: and Mr. Ma gives a satisfactory account of President Roosevelt.

The Empire Review for November ranges from pap Monroe Doctrine and our position on the North-Wes of India to an article on "Overgrown County Crick most distinctively literary matter is to be found in " Literature," which contains two most appreciative " Kim," and "The Right of Way," the former from the William Lee-Warner, K.C.S.I.

Mark Twain is always amusing, and he contribu Little Tales" (in his later manner) to the colum Century, which is, as usual, excellently illustrated. Trent has a paper called "A Retrospect of American and there is also a page or so of "Recollections o Ward." An authoritative account of the Santos-Dumon fully illustrated, is among the most interesting feat good number. In Temple Bar, Mr. Crockett's sto Firebrand," advances by four chapters; Mr. Arthur a rather smart little dialogue "On Egoism," and some "Babuisms" are collected by a lady signing hersel Sorabji. Perhaps the best specimen is this (from the La —"The witness . . . cannot be allowed to raise the air by beating upon a bush."

Correspondence.

THE ARTIST AS CRITIC.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir, You have recently discussed the question whether a critic should be an artist. It seems to me worth while to ask whether a good artist is likely to be a good critic?

A really good critic must essentially be broadminded and catholic in his tastes. He must make every effort to avoid the "personal fallacy," as Matthew Arnold terms it; to understand the aims of artists whose works do not happen to belong to the particular "genre" which most appeals to him. Can we expect an artist to do this? Genius is, as a rule, an abnormal power in a particular direction. Men who possess it are apt to lose in range what they gain in concentration. While the critic may and must worship many gods, the artist is building his own shrine. There are, of course, exceptions to this among giants like Shakespeare and Beethoven, and a few among lesser men, such as Matthew Arnold. But against the exceptions the failure of so many artists properly to appreciate the work of others must be reckoned. Some instances at once occur to the mind. In literature we have Byron's opinion of Wordsworth, Wordsworth's criticism of Burns' love lyrics, Ben Jonson's estimate of Shakespeare, Samuel Johnson's attack on Lycidas and disparagement of Gray. Coming to art we have a recent example in Ruskin's famous remark about Whistler and the paint pot. And looking back can it honestly be said that, with the single exception of Sir Joshua Reynolds, any one of the Presidents of the Royal Academy has shown himself to be a good critic? Are the artists who choose the majority of the canvases for the Academy remarkable for their gift of selection? The history of music also supplies plentiful instances to show that the great artists have often been anything but good judges of each other's work. Witness Spohr and Weber on Beethoven, Beethoven on Schubert, and Wagner's criticism of some of Mendelssohn's best work. Of The Midsummer Night's Dream overture he coldly remarks—"it must be taken into consideration that Mendelssohn wrote the overture at seventeen." Most of these criticisms were honest but injudicious. But artists are often consciously or unconsciously prejudiced against the work of contemporaries. To this fact we owe much of the slashing invective indulged in by Pope and Dryden at the expense of their brother poets, the publication of "Judaism in Music," and Sir Joshua Reynolds' opinion of Romney as an artist.

Finally, let us suppose that an artist is entirely unprejudiced and catholic in his tastes. He has trodden the path of the Muses, and surely he must be the best guide for others who wish to make the same journey? But the road to Parnassus is not similar to other paths. It is so full of enchantments, of bewildering mazes that the traveller is often unable to define, even to himself, the forces—human or magic—that help him to thread his way. And where the obstacles are greatest and his experiences would be most valuable as a basis for the critical guidance of others, the artist is often least conscious of the means which he employs. There are certain canons of art which are known to critics who are not artists as well as they are known to artists. Then there is the inexplicable something which lies beyond the canons of art and separates the artist from the mere worker according to rule. Can the artist himself explain it?

not resemble a modern chalice and paten, but I think that they do on the following grounds. itself does not depict any particular moment service. It gives us the King as the central t by those who take a leading part in the servi cases, the symbols of their office. This I ha explain in the book under review. The bowls which two bishops handle and are essential to the illumination two bishops figure most promi hold up the golden bowls. The two leading Coronation service are the Bishops of Durha Wells. These two attend the King, supp and left throughout the whole service. The the principal bishops next to the two arch figures of two bishops on either side of the the bowls in the illumination are doubtless in Now what do these bishops carry? They carry the paten and chalice for the celebration of the Is it not likely that the artist wished to re holding up that which they held for the King? not these, then what are they? They are not might at first be supposed, for no bishop handl oil; it is laid on the altar before the service, an received back from the archbishop by the Abbo It should further be remembered that no b these, takes any part in the Coronation serv his See.

Another point to be borne in mind is this. figures as the frontispiece of my book is illumination in the Norman-French version of At the period when this was executed the King successfully claiming a right of which they wer of being deprived—the right of Kings at th receive the Blessed Sacrament in both kinds. to suppose that the artist, knowing all this, wi the point that the King, being by virtue of longer an ordinary layman, receives the Ho both kinds?

JOSEPH H.

WAS AMY ROBSART KILL

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Sidney's last letter suggests controversy. But I think a very brief reply sidering that my original object in writing completely achieved. Mr. Sidney wrote a li title which prejudged a matter of fact by a que had to write letter after letter under the hea Robsart killed?"—a question which he ought of before inquiring who killed her. Charles succeed in the inquiry he proposed to the Roy fish out of water weighed heavier than the sam water; for experiment proved that it did not. question was a joke; he did not write a h himself.

Now, if Mr. Sidney, with all the evidences that Amy Robsart was really murdered, he is opinion; only he has not proved the case, a think the probabilities are exactly the other way he raises, they are exactly four in number, arisi letter.

1. He thinks Anthony Forster was in the

and a half after the death of Amy Robsart. But why should an attempted burglary have been "extraordinary" in those days? It would have been "extraordinary," I think, to call a successful murder an "attempt."

3. Mr. Sidney asks how I know that it was an "awkward corkscrew staircase" down which Amy fell. Mr. Bartlett, after very careful inquiry, found that it was "a circular newel stone staircase"; which is very much the same thing.

4. In contending that Cecil befriended Dudley after Amy's death, Mr. Sidney says I seem to forget that Cecil himself termed Dudley "infamed by his wife's death." No. I did not forget it; but out of consideration for your space I did not say everything that would have made my argument stronger. Cecil befriended Dudley though he knew that he was "infamed by his wife's death." He noted the scandal merely as an objection to Dudley's marrying the Queen; but he did not show by his conduct that he believed it.

I am, Sir, yours very truly,

West View, Pinner, Nov. 9. JAMES GAIRDNER.

"WHAT'S WHAT."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—While thanking you for a most generous and critical notice, will you kindly allow me to say two things?

First, that I cordially welcome your suggestion of inserting in my next edition a sketch (as "brightly written" as we can ensure) of the "Course of English Politics since 1875." Secondly, that I have not, as your critic implies, omitted to consider Mrs. Humphry Ward's claim to notice as a novelist of considerable reputation. Her work is mentioned on pages 944-5, in connexion with some others, of which I remark that they are "imaginative, witty, original, and interesting." I proceed to give my reasons for withholding from them only one special kind of merit, but to quote these would be to intrude unduly on your space. As a matter of fact I am, personally, an admirer, to a very considerable extent, of "Robert Elsmere," and I regret that more works of that character do not issue from the press. But to define my full position with regard to such writing was impossible within the limits of space assigned to this subject in "What's What." Lastly, that I must not claim, as your notice would appear to suggest, the authorship of "What's What." The book has been written by fifty-five contributors, in conjunction with the Editor, and my name only appears upon the title-page because these authors have preferred to be anonymous, and because I accept responsibility for all the opinions expressed in the work.

I am the more anxious that you should allow me to add this explanation as I find the same attribution of authorship has been made in another journal. I am, very truly yours,

HARRY QUILTER.

36, Great Russell-street, W.C., Nov. 9.

[We noticed the remarks about Mrs. Humphry Ward to which Mr. Quilter refers. She is there spoken of as the author of "Robert Elsmere" only, and as an instance of a writer whose fame has passed away, one of the novelists who "come, blaze, and go out." Among the popular writers of the present day, who are afterwards treated at some length, she finds no place.]

CRETAN SYMBOLS.

I do not think I am alone in the tendency to ref cruciform symbols to a common origin. If this be g question remains whether the double axe belongs to category. About this it may be remarked that sym get confused with some object to which they bear fanciful resemblance. So the Swastika became Thor and, as we all know, cross-hilted swords were taken t the Christian cross.

The theory I have proposed (in all diffidence, mere folklorist) would not interfere with the belie double axe was the sign of the Carian and Cretan Swastika belongs to times very long before Zeus wa It dies hard. Last year, at the Folklore Congress in Paul Sébillot gave me a brand new Breton button used by peasants, on which there was a beautiful Swa

I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

EVELYN MARTINENGO-CESA

Nov. 1, 1901.

A NEW DICKENS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir.—In your issue of the 9th inst., under th of "Notes of the Day," there appears a lengthy esting announcement concerning the publication of complete Edition of the Works of Charles Dickens, lished in England as well in America by Mr. G. D New York.

This announcement seems to us to be somewhat inasmuch as no arrangement has as yet been made with for granting him important and obviously very nec cessions, viz.:—

1. The supplying him with impressions from th steel plates and woodcuts, the drawings for which under Dickens' personal supervision.

2. The right to associate our name with th America, we being directly interested in the working of our own Editions in America, all of which bear our

3. Last, but not least, the right to sell complete England, as the copyrights of the complete works do for many years to come.

As proprietors, therefore, of the copyrights of th Works in their complete form, we trust you can se to amend Mr. G. D. Sproul's announcement in your

Yours faithfully,

CHAPMAN AND HA

GEORGE ETHERIDGE

11, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London, W.

Nov. 13.

WELTGESCHICHTE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir.—As there appears to be no translation of th lines on the writers of world's histories, the followi may possibly be acceptable.

Sits the little human creature
On the edge of Time's vast sea,
With his feeble hands distilling
Drops from out eternity.

Sits the little human creature,

Books to look out for at once.

"Napoleon's Letters to Josephine." Edited by H. F. Hall. Dent. 7s. 6d.

"In the Land of the Blue Gown." By Mrs. Archibald Little. Fisher Unwin. 21s. net. Illustrated.

"Schools at Home and Abroad." By R. E. Hughes, M.A., H.M. Inspector of Schools. Sonnenschein.

"The Son of Man." By Miss Fox. Elliot Stock.
[A new life of Christ, with special reference to the everyday habits and customs of the people among whom He lived.]

"A Christmas Greeting." By Marie Corelli. Methuen. 1s.
[Miss Corelli's Annual.]

"The Firebrand." By S. R. Crockett. Macmillan. 6s.

"The Mating of a Dove." By Mary E. Mann. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

"Poems Goodwood." By Maclan Conky. Fisher Unwin.
[A story of the merchant class of Eastern Russia.]

"The Apostle of the South-East." By Frank T. Bullen. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS,

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

ART.

FRA FILIPPO LIPPI. By R. C. Strutt. 9¼×6¾, 191 pp. Bell. 12s. 6d. n.
[A well got-up illustrated life, with bibliography, genealogy, and documents referring to the painter, &c.]

MARINE PAINTING IN WATER-COLOUR. By W. L. Wyllie. 7¼×9¾, 56 pp. Cassell. 5s.
[Excellent coloured sketches with short instruction and notes on each drawing.]

SIR HENRY RAEBURN. By Sir Walter Armstrong. 16×12, 116 pp. Heinemann. 45 5s.
[An immense volume, with splendid reproductions of pictures (copperplate and photogravure), an Introduction by R. A. M. Stevenson, and a biographical and descriptive catalogue by J. L. Caw, Curator of the National Portrait Gallery of Scotland.]

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA. Reproduced from The Times. 12½×10, 120 pp. The Times and Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.
[See Review, p. 465.]

THE LIFE OF SIR WILLIAM WILSON HUNTER. By F. H. Skrine. 9×5½, 400 pp. Longmans. 16s. n.

RUSKIN AND THE ENGLISH LAKES. By the Rev. H. D. Rawnsley. With photographs. 7¾×5, 228 pp. Maclehose. 5s. n.

THE LIFE OF JOHN HOWARD. By E. C. S. Gibson. 7×4½, 207 pp. Methuen. 3s. 6d.
[Short life of the famous philanthropist and prison reformer (1726-1790), based on his own writings and Brown's "Memoirs." Illustrations from old prints, &c.]

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

FIFTY-TWO STORIES OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS. FIFTY-TWO STORIES OF COURAGE AND ENDEAVOUR FOR GIRLS. Ed. by A. H. Miles. 8×5½, 462 pp. Hutchinson. 5s. each.
[Collections of illustrated stories by various writers.]

FIFTY-TWO STORIES OF GREATER BRITAIN. Ed. by A. H. Miles. 8×5½, 464 pp. Hutchinson. 5s.
[Stories by various well-known authors (some of them from magazines). Written to familiarise the boys and girls of England with the life and manners of their fellow-subjects in lands beyond the seas.]

THE CHILD'S PICTORIAL NATURAL HISTORY. Pictured by C. M. Park, 10×8½, 74 pp. S.P.C.K. 1s.
[Accounts of twelve animals, with good half-tone pictures.]

NONSENSE, NONSENSE! By W. Jerrold. 10¾×8½. Blackie. 6s.
[Full-page coloured illustrations, with rhymes and illust. cover.]

SEA FIGHTS AND ADVENTURES. By J. Knox Laughton. 294 pp. THE OPEN AIR BOY. By G. M. A. Hewett. 267 pp. 7½×5. Allen. 6s. each.
[These are the first vols. of a promising series, "The Young England Library," intended for amusement, but with the least bit of ethical powder in the jam. Mr. Knox Laughton is a well-known

A HANDFUL OF REBELS. By R. Jacherns. Jarrold. 3s. 6d.
["The escapades of five young pickles." Illust

QUEEN MAB'S FAIRY REALM. Illust. by H. Cole 310 pp. Nownes. 6s.
[Fairy stories very beautifully illustrated.]

THE PATTY POTS. By H. E. Inman. 7¾×5½. 321 2s. 6d.
[Adventures of the Patty Pots "with the Niddl in the land of Once upon a Time," &c.]

GRIMM'S FAIRY TALES. Trans. by Beatrice M 637 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.
[Complete edition, with short Preface, and full

WONDERS IN MONSTERLAND. By E. D. Cuming Allen.
[How Walter and Jenny see and talk to the dea ago. Excellent Illustrations by A. Shepherd.]

DEAR. 7¾×5½, 312 pp. Ward, Lock. 2s. 6d.
[Quiet domestic stories.]

TOPSY'S FOUR HOMES. By Isabel Wartley. Jarrold. 3s. 6d.
[Topsy is a dog, who tells the story.]

A POPULAR GIRL. By May Baldwin. 7¾×5½, 301 pp [School life in Germany.]

OUT OF BOUNDS. By Andrew Home. 7¾×5½, 348 pp.
[Short stories of school life.]

LASSIE. By the Author of "Laddie." 7½×5, 122 pp.
[Lassie is a nurse, who has to look after a good-

THE KING'S "BLUE BOYS." By Sheila E. Brai Jarrold. 3s. 6d.
[A story of the Giant Grenadiers of Prussia. T

A NEST OF GIRLS. By Elizabeth W. Timlow Chambers. 6s.
[An American tale of boarding-school days.]

THE ARGONAUTS OF THE AMAZON. By C. R. Keny Chambers. 3s. 6d.
[Treasure seeking adventures in Brazil.]

OUR RULERS. By J. Alexander. 9×7, 144 pp. P
[An account with some portraits of Englis William I. to Edward VII.]

THE KOPJE GARRISON. By G. Manville Fen Chambers. 5s.
[The Boer war.]

JENNY DODDS, MILLIONAIRE. By H. Barrow 328 pp. Chambers. 3s. 6d.
["A school yarn of merriment and mystery."]

IN SEARCH OF MADEMOISELLE. By George Gi Hutchinson. 6s.
[The struggles between French and Spanish colo of Florida.]

THE SECRET OF MANSHELLING. By E. Everh 320 pp. Shaw. 5s.
[In the days of Queen Elizabeth.]

A LITTLE BROWN TEA-POT. By Brenda. 7½×5, 19
[The West Country in the days of George III.]

FATHER TIME TOY BOOK. OUR PETS' PICTURE HAPPY PLAYMATES. By J. D. SWEET BLOS [Large children's picture books.]

LITTLE FOLKS (1901). Cassell.

WITH WELLINGTON TO WATERLOO. By H. Ave 128 pp. Wells Gardner. 1s.

LEO, A MUFF. By Julia Hack. 7¾×5, 152 pp. We
[A school story for boys. Illustrated.]

SIDNEY YORKE'S FRIEND. By E. A. Bennet Wells Gardner. 1s.
[A modern tale of how one boy helped a Library.]

FATHER'S STORY BOOK OF ANIMALS. 9½× Gardner. 1s.

FAIRY TALES FROM HANS ANDERSEN. Illus. by 8½×6, 420 pp. Wells Gardner. 6s.
[A pleasant book copiously and well illustrated, tion on Hans Andersen by Edward Clodd.]

THE YOUNG STANDARD-BEARER, 1901. 1s. 6d.

STRANGE ADVENTURES IN DICKY-BIRD LAND

DRAMA.

DOMESTIC EXPERIMENTS AND OTHER PLAYS. By J. E. M. AITKEN. 7×5, 133 pp. Lamley. 2s. 6d. n.

[For amateur theatricals; mostly from Black and White, Hearth and Home, and The Minute.]

THE TALE OF A TOWN and AN ENCHANTED SEA. By E. MARTYN. 8×5½, 211 pp. Unwin. 5s.

[The Bending of the Bough, by Mr. George Moore, performed at the Irish Literary Theatre in 1900, was adapted from "The Tale of a Town." Mr. Martyn was also the author of "The Heather Field."]

ECONOMICS AND SOCIOLOGY.

ANTICIPATIONS. By H. G. WELLS. 7¾×5¼, 318 pp. Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d.

[See Review, p. 465.]

THE MIND OF A CHILD. By ESSIS RICHMOND. 8×5½, 176 pp. Longmans. 3s. 6d. n.

[By the authoress of "Boyhood" and "Through Boyhood to Manhood."]

REPORT ON THE CENTRAL PUBLIC HOUSE TRUST ASSOCIATION. 9½×7, 70 pp. Central Public House Trust Association.

EDUCATIONAL.

ESSAYS ON THE TEACHING OF HISTORY. By F. W. MAITLAND, A. M. CUWATKIN, R. L. POOLE, and others. 7¾×5, 104 pp. Cambridge University Press.

[Eight Essays on the teaching of various sides of history and one on teaching in America. Owing to Lord Acton's illness Professor Maitland writes the introduction, sketching the history of the teaching of history in English Universities.]

A GUIDE TO ADVANCED GERMAN PROSE COMPOSITION. By E. EHRKE. 7×4½, 187 pp. Clarendon Press. 3s.

[Grammatical introduction, passages from English writers for translation, and notes.]

BELL'S LATIN COURSE. For the First Year. By E. C. MARCHANT and J. G. SPENCER. Part III. 7½×5, 148 pp. Bell. 1s. 6d.

CÆSAR'S GALLIC WAR. Book II. Ed. by J. BROWN. (Illustrated Latin Series.) 7×4¾, 116 pp. Blackie. 1s. 6d.

THE EUMENIDES OF ÆSCHYLUS. Ed. by L. D. BARNETT. (Illustrated Greek Series.) 7½×4¾, 151 pp. Blackie. 3s. 6d.

THE MATRICULATION FRENCH COURSE. (The University Tutorial Series.) By E. WEEKLEY. 7×5, 361 pp. Clive. 3s. 6d.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. By W. H. LOW. (University Tutorial Series.) Sixth edition, revised. 7×5, 255 pp. Clive. 3s. 6d.

JUNIOR LATIN EXAMINATION PAPERS. By C. G. BOTTING. 6½×4, 80 pp. Methuen. 1s.

JUNIOR FRENCH EXAMINATION PAPERS. By F. JACOB. 6½×4, 75 pp. Methuen. 1s.

GEOMETRIC EXERCISES IN PAPER FOLDING. By T. S. ROW. Ed. and Revised by W. W. BEMAN and D. E. SMITH. 8×5¼, 148 pp. Kegan Paul. 4s. 6d.

[A Kindergarten method for teaching geometry.]

PRACTICAL SCIENCE. By J. H. LEONARD. (Home School Library.) 7×4½, 138 pp. Murray. 1s. 6d.

FICTION.

ESTHER ALINGTON; or, A New Investment. By ROSE HARRISON. 8×5¾, 233 pp. Ideal Publishing Co. 1s. n.

[A plea for the suppression of the drink traffic.]

THE WOMAN OF ORCHIDS. By MARVIN DANA. 8¼×5½, 261 pp. Treherne. 3s. 6d.

[A sensational tale, largely in South America.]

THE CURSE OF EDEN. By the Author of "The Master Sinner." 8×5, 298 pp. John Long. 6s.

[Too love affairs of a country doctor's daughter.]

THE REDEMPTION OF NEIL MACLEAN. By DAVID LYALL. 7¾×5¼, 264 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[The story of an art student in Scotland and London.]

ST. NAZARIUS. By A. C. FARQUHARSON. 8×5½, 308 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

[The scene is a castle in a German forest.]

FANCY FREE. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. 8×5, 302 pp. Methuen. 6s.

[Short fanciful and farcical stories, well illustrated.]

MEN v. DEVILS. By T. KINGSTON CLARKE. 7¾×5, 453 pp. Sands. 6s.

[A story of financial sharks.]

A SPORTSWOMAN'S LOVE LETTERS. By —? 7½×5, 268 pp. Everett. 2s. 6d.

[This is a kind of parody, for sporting folk, of "The English-

THE BALLET DANCER. By MATILDE SERAO. 7¾×5, 266 mann. 6s.

[A realistic story of the Italian stage.]

THE FAILURE OF SUCCESS. By MABEL HOWARD. 7¾ Longmans. 6s.

[The story of a girl who is tempted to retain a fortune in Hamilton-place to which she was not really entitled.]

DUMB. By the Hon. MRS. W. R. D. FORBES. 7¾×5, 254 and Windus.

[Aristocratic Scotch society.]

HALIL THE PEDLAR. By MAURUS JOKAI. Trans. by R. N 7¾×5, 275 pp. Jarrold. 6s.

[Founded on the rebellion of Halil, a costermonger, in for six weeks governed the Ottoman Empire. First publish

MRS. PEDERSON'S NIECE. By ISABEL STUART ROSS 279 pp. Cassell.

[A modern story of a young girl, whose energy brings through all difficulties. Suitable for the older girls. Illus

IN OUR TOWN. By ROSALINE MASSON. 7¾×5, 306 pp. Stoughton. 6s.

[A quiet and very pleasantly told love story, full o sphere and legal life of modern Edinburgh.]

SWEETHEART MANETTE. By MAURICE THOMPSON. 7¾ Macqueen.

[Manette is the "Belle of New Orleans," and the b Bostonian famous for his wealth. Illustrated.]

CONCERNING SOME FOOLS AND THEIR FOLLY. SANDARS. 7¾×5¼, 307 pp. Sands. 6s.

[The theme is the ill-matched marriage of a clergyman.

THE KING'S GUIDE. By N. COVERTSIDE. 8×5¼, 352 pp Marshall. 6s.

[A thirteenth century story founded on the histor Llewelyn of Wales.]

FARDEN HA'. By JOANNA E. WOOD. 7¾×5, 336 pp. Blackett. 6s.

[The scene is a Scottish mining village.]

RICHARD HALPIN. By M. ROBERTSON. 7¾×5, 309 pp. Smith

[A story of the modern American navy.]

LIETTE. By A. DOURLIAC. 7¾×4½, 287 pp. Hachette. Fr.

[A French illustrated story in the "Petite Biblio Famille."]

CHRISTOPHER DEANE. By E. H. LACON WATSON. 8× Elkin Mathews. 6s.

[Life at Winchester, Cambridge, and afterwards.]

THE TORY LOVER. By SARAH ORNE JEWETT. 7¾× Smith, Elder. 6s.

[A story of American revolutionary times in which figures.]

JACQUETTE ET ZOUZOU. By "GYP." 4¾×7½, 288 pp. 3f. 50c.

[Another volume of those malicious, but witty an sketches, frequently Anti-Semitic, which caricature the " of Paris, and which, while useless as documents, are the p the esprit rosse.]

HISTORY AND GEOGRAPHY.

LIFE AND LETTERS IN THE FOURTH CENTURY. GLOVER. 9×6, 386 pp. Cambridge University Press.

[A study of the age of the Gothic Invasions and Paganism in the life and writings of typical men.]

THE DAWN OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY. Part II. By C. BEAZLEY. 9×6, 642 pp. Murray. 18s.

[The first volume was published in 1897. This treats from the end of the ninth to the middle of the thirteenth c

ANNALS OF CHRIST'S HOSPITAL. By E. H. PEARCE. 9 Methuen. 7s. 6d.

[An illustrated history of the school by a former "G Assistant Master.]

THE GREAT PERSIAN WAR AND ITS PRELIMINARIES. GRUNDY. 9×6, 591 pp. Murray. 21s. n.

["A study of the evidence, literary and topographic Mr. Grundy is University Lecturer in Classical Geography

LITERATURE AND BELLES-LETTRES.

MISCELLANIES. By AUGUSTINE BIRRELL. 7×4½, 285 Stock. 5s.

[Some of these are reprinted from magazines. The ne on Christian evidences, the Ideal of a University, Ba Browning.]

MILITARY.

WORDS BY AN EYEWITNESS. By "Lynxman." 7¾×5¼, 343 pp. Blackwood.

[Sketches of the "human side" of the Boer War, reprinted from Blackwood's Magazine.]

FRENCH'S CAVALRY CAMPAIGN. By J. G. Maxson. With photographs. 7¾×5, 198 pp. Pearson. 3s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE LAW RELATING TO THE RECONSTRUCTION AND AMALGAMATION OF JOINT STOCK COMPANIES. With forms and precedents. By P. F. Simonson. 10×6, 174 pp. Effingham Wilson; Sweet and Maxwell.

STUDIES IN HETEROGENESIS. By H. C. Bastian. 10¼×7, 58 pp. Williams and Norgate. 7s. 6d.

[Part I. of a work for scientific investigators, favouring the theory that the really different or heterogenetic products can result from the parent organism or germ. Photographs. Paper bound.]

STAG-HUNTING ON EXMOOR. By P. Everard. 9¼×7, 378 pp. Chatto and Windus.

[A fine book with an immense number of interesting photographs, and a popular account of the hunt from all points of view, with many hunting experiences and advice and information for sportsmen.]

PHILOSOPHY.

AN INTRODUCTION TO PSYCHOLOGY. By Mary W. Calkins, Professor of Philosophy and Psychology in Wellesley College, U.S.A. 9×5¾. 500 pp. The Macmillan Co. 8s. 6d. n.

LOGIC. By G. H. Smith. 7¾×5, 259 pp. Putnam. 5s.

[An American book founded on the theory that logic includes the matter as well as the form of thought.]

POETRY.

COLLECTED POEMS. By M. Bell. 7¾×5¼, 232 pp. Burleigh. 5s. 6d. n.

[Contains the poems in "Spring's Immortality," and "Pictures of Travel," with a few new ones.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE GREAT BOER WAR. By A. Conan Doyle. 8¼×5¼, 658 pp. 7s. 6d.

[Revised and brought up to date.]

LORENZO LOTTO. By B. Berenson. 9¼×6¾, 276 pp. Bell. 15s. n.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF MIGUEL DE CERVANTES. Saavedra, Vol. VI. Don Quixote, Vol. IV. (The complete Library.) Ed. by J. Fitzmaurice-Kelly. Trans. by J. Ormsby. 7×4¾, 209 pp. Gowans and Gray. 1s. n.

[We have often alluded to this handy-sized scholarly edition.]

THE IDYLLS. Ed. by J. P. Briscoe. 5×2¾. Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. 134 pp. The Essays of Sir Roger de Coverley. 152 pp. Gay and Bird.

[We have often mentioned these delightful little books, the note of which is strong paper and firm binding. Each has an introduction.]

UNDINE AND ASLAUGA'S KNIGHT. By La Motte Fouqué. 6¼×4, 172 pp. Nonnes. 3s. n.

[An elegant, leather-bound booklet, very suitably illustrated.]

PEG WOFFINGTON. By Charles Reade. (Temple Classics.) 6¼×4¼, 234 pp. Dent. 1s. 6d. n.

[With a short bibliographical note by the editor, Mr. J. Gollancz and a frontispiece from the picture of Peg Woffington at Kensington.]

DANIEL DERONDA. By George Eliot. Two vols. (The Warwick Edition, Vols. IX. and X.) 6¼×4, 601+627 pp. Blackwood. 2s. n. each.

[These handy and very clearly printed volumes are bound in red.]

MIDDLEMARCH. By George Eliot. (Library Edition.) 8¼×5¾, 667 pp. 10s. 6d. n.

[This is a fine series; and there is a capital frontispiece.]

TIPCAT. By the Author of "Laddie." 7¾×5¼, 336 pp. Ward, Lock. 2s. 6d.

THE HOUSE OF ATREUS. Being the Agamemnon, Libation-Bearers, and Furies of Æschylus. Trans. by G. H. A. Mordshead. 6¼×4¼, 185 pp. Macmillan. 2s. 6d. n.

[First published 1881. Now included in the Golden Treasury Series.]

THE POEMS OF R. D. WILLIAMS. Ed. by P. A. Sillard. 2nd Ed. 6×4, 234 pp. Duffy.

[Richard D'Alton Williams was the poet of "Young Ireland" (1822-1862) and on the staff of the Nation, who went to America in 1861, where he practised as a doctor.]

EVERY MAN'S OWN LAWYER. By a Barrister. 7¼×5, 754 pp. Crosby Lockwood.

VANITY FAIR. By Thackeray. Ed. by Walter . 329 pp. Dent. Three vols. 3s. n. per vol.

[A preface and a bibliographical note by the edition with many good illustrations by C. G. B chapter headings.]

JACKSON'S BOOK-KEEPING. Revised by H. T. Effingham Wilson.

[A thorough revise of Jackson's book, of whic was published 75 years ago, when there were few, i existence.]

THE CALIPH VATHEK. By Beckford. Ed. by 149 pp. LIGHT VERSE. Ed. by A. C. Deane. Little Library.)

[Mr. Ross' introduction discusses the bibliogra Beckford's relations with Henley, who translated French. "Light Verse" is a chronologically arran Wither and Suckling to A. D. Godley and Owen Se maintains that the true light verse writer is of mo frontispiece is a portrait of Calverley.]

LECTURES AND ESSAYS. By the late W. K. Cliff Stephen and Sir Frederick Pollock. Two vols. 7 Macmillan. 10s. (The Eversley Series).

THEOLOGY.

THE AT-ONE-MENT, Or, the Gospel of Recon SPIRITUAL TEACHING OF BIBLE PLANTS ARGUMENT OF ADAPTATION. 64 pp. CHRIS OF EVOLUTION. Rev. George Henslow. 68 and Norgate.

[Three little shilling books by this well-k naturalist. The third explains briefly the chang place in the old "Argument of Design." The views of Huxley and Mr. Leslie Stephen on morality.]

A HISTORY OF THE PLYMOUTH BRETHREN. By 8¼×5¼, 318 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[The author claims that this is the only hist Brethren. Partly reprinted from the British Weekl

THEOLOGY OLD AND NEW. By W. F. Cobb. 7 Stock. 2s. 6d. n.

[The first volume of a new series called "The for the Twentieth Century," treating present pro to unite Anglicans. This book is not for the s men who wish to keep abreast of the Theology of t

AN EDITOR'S SERMONS. By Sir Edward Russ Unwin. 6s. n.

[Papers on religious subjects by a layman an addressed to the clergy. Introduced by the Bishop

BIBLIA INNOCENTIUM. Part II. By J. W. Mack Longmans. 5s.

[Mr. Mackail has already "written anew fo of the chosen people before Christ." Here he ment narrative and early Christian stories. Th brief, with well-chosen headings and written in a style.]

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH FROM WITHIN. 8×5¼. 6s. 6d. n.

[Written by a Roman Catholic layman, with and an introduction by Cardinal Vaughan.]

MONASTICISM AND THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. Adolf Harnack. Translated by E. G. Kellett 7¾×5¼.

[Two lectures delivered by Professor Harnack.

NOTES ON THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENC October, 1900, on the Doctrine of Holy Communio in Ritual. By the Rev. N. Dimock. 9×5¾, 140 pp.

REGNUM DEI. By A. Robertson. 9×5¾, 387 pp. [Bampton Lectures, 1901, by the Principal of K

HANDBOOKS TO THE BIBLE AND PRAYER B Edited by the Rev. M. Stevenson. 7¼×5, 259 pp.

[For teachers, especially in training colleges.]

THE SOUL IN THE UNSEEN WORLD. By R. 403 pp. Rivington. 6s. n.

[An historical inquiry into the doctrine of the by the Chaplain of St. Margaret's, East Grinstead.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVE

JOHN CHINAMAN. By E. H. Parker. 8¼×5¼, 359

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 211. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1898.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 481, 482, 483

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XXIX.—Mr. Andrew Lang. An Appreciation by G. K. Chesterton 484

WORKS FOR THE YOUNG.—A "Personal View," by G. A. Henty 487

THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 488

CURRENT LITERATURE—

The Life of Lord Russell of Killowen 489

Botticelli 489

Mexico as I Saw It—The Sherbro and its Hinterland—John Chinaman—The Deserts and Forests of North America—The Log of an Island Wanderer—Sunshine and Surf—A Ribbon of Iron—With the Tibetans in Tent and Temple 490, 491

Essays of an Ex-Librarian—The Reformer of Geneva—The War of the Polish Succession 491, 492

The Failure of Success—Kitty Fairhall—The House with the Green Shutters—A Modern Artaeus—Love Like a Gipsy—The Prophet of Berkeley Square—T'Bacca Queen—A Pair of Patient Lovers—Widow Wiley—Two Moods of a Man—Tessa—An Old Woman's Tragedy—Puffs of Wind—The Separation of the Beresfords—Tom Flaherty's Ghost 492, 493, 494

CORRESPONDENCE—Mr. Henderson and the Casket Letters (Mr. Andrew Lang)—Lions in the Path (Mr. H. G. Wells) 494, 495

BOOKS TO LOOK OUT FOR 495

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 496, 497, 498

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"The Life of Lord Russell of Killowen." By R. Barry O'Brien. (Smith, Elder.)

"Recollections of the Old Foreign Office." By Sir Edward Hertslet, K.C.B. (Murray.)

"Mediæval London." By Canon W. Benham and Charles Welsh. Illustrated. (Seeley.)

"The Firebrand." By S. R. Crockett. (Macmillan.)

"Love Like a Gipsy." By Bernard Capes. (Constable.)

"Christopher Deane." By E. H. Lacon Watson. (Elkin Mathews.)

"Dumb." By the Hon. Mrs. W. R. D. Forbes. (Chatto and Windus.)

* * * *

The name of Mr. Andrew Lang, of whose writings we give a full account this week, is by no means unfamiliar to the collector of editiones principes; indeed, at this moment he is one of the very few living writers any of whose works command a considerable premium at auction. The exceptions include Mr. George Meredith, whose "Poems" of 1861 has made as much as £25; Mr. Kipling, whose "Schoolboy served as library. "Here is my collection," said his co

From floor to ceiling the double shelves held editiones p of Mr. Lang's many works. Every copy of each book, was here.

* * * *

But the dream does not accord with truth. Mr.
first volume, "Ballads and Lyrics of Old France, wi Poems," a crown 8vo. of 164pp., issued by Messrs. Long 5s., fetched £3 10s. in April, 1898, the example being i white parchment, uncut. A presentation copy fro Dobson who contributed a chapter on modern illustrated books—to the late Colonel Francis Grant o Library," 1881, large paper, published at 10s. 6d. fetch guineas in 1900. It is worth noting that whereas in gene paper copies are worth only about twice as much as the issues, in Mr. Lang's case the relative increase is Seven years ago a book-expert stated that one of the six examples on Japan paper, with the frontispiece in two of "Aucassin and Nicolette," 1887 (New Ed. 1896) w something under £4. In March, 1898, however, an u unopened example in original pictorial wrapper made £ auction.

* * * *

Nor are these by any means the only instances in i values that might be cited. One of 100 copies issued paper of "Lost Leaders"—articles which appeared orig
the Daily News—fetched £1 10s. in May last; "T Fairy Book," 1889, large paper, containing Mr.
introduction, not to be found in the small paper issu
£1 15s. four years after publication; "The Dead Le Other Tales from the French," 1889, large paper, wa in December, 1893, at three guineas; while similar of "The Red Fairy Book," 1890, "The Blue Poetry 1891, and "The Green Fairy Book," 1892, have changed hands respectively at two guineas, £1 11s., guineas.

* * * *

In the selection of sermons preached before the Un published by Mr. George Allen there is, by way of p history of the institution written by Mr. Ll. J. M. B appears that there are references to sermons "preache students as such" as early as the twelfth century, and the fourteenth century, such sermons served a double They not only exhorted to godliness, but also "offered means of making known any matter of general interes a long period the duty of preaching in turn was enforced b ten shillings; but afterwards a tax was levied on all g in holy orders in order that the preacher might be remu
The honorarium is now five guineas.

* * * *

Mr. Bebb also gives some interesting notes on the l sermons:—

It had been found early necessary in some Univer pass statutes de quantitate sermonum, and a time fixed at Ingolstadt of an hour and a quarter, at Vie

A five-minutes' sermon, it may be conjectured, would be about two-thirds of a column of Literature; while a two-and-a-half hours' sermon would fill about twenty of our columns—always assuming that the preachers preached deliberately, without either gabbling or hesitating and hawing.

* * * *

"Matters of general interest," though not perhaps in quite a fourteenth-century sense, are attended to by American preachers of to-day much more than by English preachers. In New York City the subjects of the sermons preached on Sunday are always advertised in Saturday's paper, and some of those announced for Sunday, November 10 (the Sunday after the municipal election) are:—"New China and New York as Mission Fields," "The City of the Future," "Christianity and its Modern Substitutes," "The Public Schools," "Personal Liberty," "Brass or Gold—Which?" "Has Christ come to New York, or has this City been redeemed," "The Responsibility of the Victors—a post-election sermon," "Practical Social Remedies," "Moral aspects of the Modern Theatre," "How to make the moral victory of last Tuesday permanently and truly effective," "What can the Reformers do?"

* * * *

The chief items of Messrs. Sotheby's sale completed on Wednesday were:—Thackeray's "Comic Tales and Sketches," first edition, £11 5s.; Burton's "Arabian Nights" with the "Supplemental Nights," 16 vols., £34 10s.; "Archæologia Cantiana," 1843-1897, £20 10s.; Earl Coningsby's "Collections Concerning the Manor of Marden," 1813, £105; "Dover Press 'Tacitus,'" £75 (£4 10s. in May last); Author's presentation copy of Fogar's "Italy," 1836, £11; "Zoological Society's Transactions," 1833-1838, £41; Keat's "Endymion" and "Lamia," first edition, £8 and £6 10s.; Shelley, facsimile reprint on vellum of "Adonais," £5, "Rosalind and Helen," and "Prometheus Unbound," first edition, £3 10s. and £6 5s.; Apperley's "John Mytton," first edition, £10.

* * * *

The American Critic for November in referring to Mr. Fisher Unwin's purchase of the English Illustrated Magazine, expresses the opinion that "for some reason or other English magazines are weakest in the line of illustration." Undoubtedly American magazines spend more money and take more pains with their illustrations, though English magazines have certainly improved in this matter. The Critic itself is extremely well illustrated, and in the present number it presents photographs, lent by Mr. Pierpont Morgan, of the Du Barry Decorative Panels by Fragonard, which have never, we believe, been reproduced in their entirety.

* * * *

The present excavations in the Roman Forum aim for the first time at reaching the lowest depths, touching a point not reached by former operations. The endeavour of the excavators is to reach the early Imperial, the Republican, the Kingly, and even the prehistoric strata, wherever it was possible to do so without disturbing the higher structures. Hence one may look forward with interest to a new volume by Professor Lanciani, called "New Tales of Old Rome"—about to be published by Messrs. Macmillan—which should throw light on the controversies which have followed the important discoveries already made in the Forum and its neighbourhood. One of the most interesting chapters describes the discovery on January 10, 1899, of black marble slabs in the

A sumptuous volume on "Killarney's L will be published by Messrs. Downey next feature of which will be a series of mezzotint e F. S. Walker, from pictures painted by himself two summers. For the text, the editor, Mr. has relied upon the recorded impressions of the letters who have visited Killarney, and given, complete account of the scenery, legends and the lakes. Thackeray is represented by "(1842), and "Stag Hunting on the Lake" "Blow, Bugle Blow"; Tom Moore by "Sw "The Echoes," and "O'Donoghue's Mistres P. Graves by "The Killarney Hunt," and "Rock," and Mr. Alfred Austin by "Sprin (1890).

* * *

THE DEPARTURE.

He comes no more to plead with me in v
To vex me with the pity in His eyes;
No night shall fall nor any dawn arise,
And find him waiting at my door again.
Unburdened by the echo of His pain,
The summer winds in summer woods sha
His shadow shall not dim the April day,
His voice molest me in the autumn rain.
And since He went His way my days ha
Unmarred by doubt and dread; secure, Henceforth I dwell at ease and all is we
"What better heaven could God Himse
I asked my soul exultant. Very low,
"If this be Heaven," she whispered, "

H. C.

The will has been proved of Sir Walt personal estate is of the net value of £6,58 value of the whole estate being £8,812 19s. 7d.

Among the literary birthdays of next wee Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett (November 21 Gardiner, Professor of Archæology at Oxfo 1846); Mr. Leslie Stephen (November 28, 18 Spencer Churchill (November 30, 1874) Mommsen, the distinguished historian (Nov Mark Twain (November 30, 1835).

A bust of Richardson, the novelist, Wednesday at the St. Bride Foundation Insti not far from his old printing-office, in Salish Goldsmith acted as his reader.

Lancashire is arranging for a memorial to whose dialect poems were a power in the land cotton famine. Mr. Hall Caine has writte scheme.

A handsome brass has been placed in Church to the memory of Miss Mary Kingsle

Last Thursday (November 21) the Elizabe produced Shakespeare's Henry V. in the Lect Old University Buildings, Burlington-gardens

A medal, bearing the portrait of George Charles Holroyd, is on view at the Dutch Gal

The house where Byron lived with his Broad-street, Aberdeen, is being pulled down the enlargement of the Marischal College.

with special reference to Mr. Graham Balfour's recently published Life.

During the twelve months ended September 30 more than 24,000 persons inscribed their names in the visitors' book at Burns' Cottage in Alloway, while quite half as many entered without signing.

It is said that letters have been discovered in the Vatican Library which tend to prove that Rizzio was not a professional musician, but a priest who had adopted that disguise in order to minister in safety to the Queen and her attendants.

A new portrait of Schiller has been discovered in an edition of the poet's works dated 1812, and it is said to be the work of Schiller's eldest sister, Christophine.

The Bradford Observer, founded in 1831, changed its name on Monday last to the Yorkshire Daily Observer.

Siam has passed a Copyright Law based on the English statute. Copies of all Siamese works have to be presented to the Royal Buddhist Library at Wat Benchamabopit.

The admirable Liberal-Catholic organ in France, La Quinzaine, has published the following statistics to show that the French language has more vitality than is believed in "Anglo-Saxon" countries. In Switzerland, according to the census of 1888, the number of persons speaking German has fallen from 714 to 697 per 1,000, while those speaking French have risen from 218 to 230, and those speaking Italian have risen from 53 to 67.

Mr. Balfour is said to be revising "A Defence of Philosophic Doubt." "The Foundations of Belief" is just appearing in its eighth edition, with a new preface.

The Committee of the Bible Society has engaged Mr. William Canton to write its official history, in view of its approaching centenary.

Oxford is responsible for a bit of Christmas humour to come from Messrs. Williams and Norgate. It is a skit upon the "Absolutism" just now fashionable in English philosophy. It is to be called "Mind," and is a sort of comic "double" of its namesake. It will contain parodies in the style of most of the famous philosophers written under transparent pseudonyms.

"The Kiss and its History," to come from Messrs. Sands, is the work of Dr. Christopher Nyrop, a philologist of high reputation, which has gone through two editions in Denmark, and has been translated into German, Swedish, and Russian. It is translated by W. F. Harvey, Lecturer in English at the University of Lund (Sweden).

Mr. Ralph Hall Caine, son of the novelist, has purchased Household Words, with a view to reviving its ancient glories.

Messrs. Treherne have purchased Crampton's Magazine, and the December number will be issued by them. Among the contributors are Mrs. Croker, E. Nesbit, George Paston, and Louis Wain. In January several new features will be introduced. The magazine will be edited by Mr. Harold Tremayne.

Messrs. Macmillan have a number of interesting books due this month, including "Poems from Victor Hugo," translated into English verse by Sir George Young; a life of Sir William Molesworth, formerly Secretary of State for the Colonies, who died in 1855, by Mrs. Fawcett; a life of the Emperor Charles V., by Edward Armstrong, in two volumes.

The British Resident at Selangor, in the Malay Peninsula, Mr. Hugh Clifford, is continuing his studies of brown humanity, and is to state his results in the form of a novel called "A Free-Lance of To-day," of which the scene is laid in Acheh, the little State on the north-west of Sumatra, commonly called Acheen by Europeans, which has a romantic history.

The third volume of Mr. Philip Hore's "History of the County of Wexford" containing the history of [illegible]

The Decay of Imagination and Other Matters.

The "lecture session" of the Edinburgh P[illegible] Institution has made an excellent start this year. M[illegible] with Lord Rosebery as his chairman, [illegible] cessings with a suggestive duet on t[illegible] of biographies and autobiographies, and [illegible] lecture of the course, given last Tues[illegible] Miss Marie Corelli in the novel rôle of [illegible] the title of her paper being "The Vanish[illegible] It is not surprising to learn that th[illegible] crowded. Miss Corelli, as a writer, has seldom been spok[illegible] than warmly—one might say hotly. She has been ext[illegible] lauded and virulently abused; she numbers many thous[illegible] voted admirers and many hundreds of bitter opponent[illegible] has very rarely alienated her friends or conciliated he[illegible] A personality of this kind was bound to attract he[illegible] will probably attract the attention of the gentl[illegible] "Eccentricities of Genius" to the appearance of a ne[illegible] who should prove a decided acquisition to his ranks. [illegible] lecturer, it seems that Miss Corelli possesses sev[illegible] qualifications not always to be found in writers of con[illegible] have essayed the art of speaking in public. She spoke [illegible] "in clear and pleasant tones, and with considerable el[illegible] ability," while she emphasized her points with suitabl[illegible] and displayed no trace of nervousness. It is possibl[illegible] author of "The Master-Christian" may have dis[illegible] last a method of appealing to the public that shall [illegible] venom of the critic. For in the spoken word the erro[illegible] the critic fastens do not count for so much as in th[illegible] book. They pass and are forgotten, before the critic [illegible] to commit them to memory for future comment. Nor [illegible] a lecture, the same temptation (so often fatal to the l[illegible] to introduce scraps of some other language with whi[illegible] not quite perfectly acquainted. In a lecture, too, [illegible] readiness of speech are always of more importanc[illegible] novelty or truth of the thesis—to the ears, that is, of t[illegible] public. The lecturer, we must admit, did not ov[illegible] difficulty of saying anything fresh on the subject of th[illegible] imagination. It is an ancient theme, that crops up [illegible] again with never failing regularity with every a[illegible] science. "Romance is dead, the Cave-man cried [illegible] Kipling's verse; the advent of the steam-engine was [illegible] hailed as the last and fatal blow to poetry. Yet there [illegible] poets at all events since the days of the cave-dwellers [illegible] few perhaps have lingered on since the discoveries o[illegible] Stephenson. It is not an uncommon complaint wit[illegible] sensibility that we live now in a world of ceaseless [illegible] unrest. Other people have echoed it before Mis[illegible] others will, not improbably, repeat it after she and [illegible] are alike forgotten, but it does not necessarily mean [illegible] faculty of imagination is dying out. It may mean [illegible] more likely—that many writers of the present day ca[illegible] the time to restrain their imagination within due bo[illegible] set out in artistic fashion the gifts with which t[illegible] faculty has presented them. Undisciplined imagination [illegible] enough in modern fiction. In her remarks, howe[illegible] Vandalism, personal journalism, impressionist paintin[illegible] many other subjects to which the lecturer passed as t[illegible] or less connected with the main theme, there was m[illegible] sense expressed in trenchant and forcible language. M[illegible] denounced the little men of literature who carped at th[illegible] with great gusto, and waxed merry over the attemp[illegible] Shakespeare of his fame by cryptogram theories. She [illegible] that we might have, one of these days, a Scott c[illegible] proving that George the Fourth wrote the Waverley N[illegible]

Literature Portraits.—XXIX.

MR. ANDREW LANG.

Mr. Andrew Lang is a mass of charming and triumphant contradictions. He is a Scotch dilettante, he is a reliable fisherman, he is a spiritualist who is truly spiritual. He was born at Selkirk in 1844, and he was educated at two great Universities, St. Andrews and Oxford, the contrast between which he has painted in a singularly perfect and moving poem called "Almae Matres."

> The strange enchantments from the past,
> And memories of the friends of old,
> And strong tradition binding fast,
> The flying terms with bands of gold.
> All these hath Oxford: all are dear,
> But dearer far the little town,
> The drifting surf, the wintry year,
> The college of the scarlet gown.

The beautiful lines are worth quoting, since with Mr. Andrew Lang as with all Scotchmen, the most that we can hope is that he finds our English order good. The best is a secret sealed in another land.

His first important work was "Ballads and Lyrics of Old France," which was published in 1872. Some of these poems were republished in his "Grass of Parnassus," which appeared in 1888, and the two together form a sufficient test of Mr. Lang's poetical faculty. As a poet he belongs pre-eminently to what may be called "The Great School of the Refrain." The fascination which the old French ballade and rondeau had for so many of the most brilliant men of the nineteenth century was not a mere accident of metrical regularity. The neatness of the old French form undoubtedly satisfied Mr. Lang's highly epicurean literary taste; but a far deeper value lay in the very fact of the infinite recurrence. The refrain represented to such poets as he the fact that there are some conclusions to which we all come back. It represented a certain class of ancient and genial proverbs which are light at the same time that they are weighty.

Mr. Lang, however, was vastly too good a poet to confine himself to poetry; he felt that a poet should at least make some attempt to understand all the thousand things that may be made poetical. After adding to his poetical reputation with "Ballades in Blue China," "Helen of Troy," and "Rhymes à la Mode" he passed on to the study of religion and folk-lore in "Custom and Myth," "Myth, Ritual, and Religion," and "The Making of Religion." A third side of his literary activity is represented by his admirable cycle of books of light literary criticism such as "Books and Bookmen" and "Letters to Dead Authors;" a fourth side by his delightful editions of the fairy tales of all nations; and a fifth side by his researches into Scottish history, in which he has shown that he possesses, perhaps in a greater degree than any other living writer, the power of writing sound history in a bright and interesting manner. Upon the face of it a career like this is so brilliant as to amount to a chaos of light more confusing than the chaos of darkness. We feel as if we were reading of the lyric poems of Mr. Herbert Spencer or the ethnological researches of Mr. Norman Gale. In order to understand these things we must go further and endeavour to estimate the irrepressible personality of Mr. Andrew Lang, and the methods whereby he contrives with critic and a great fisherman. But the rem this, that he follows every one of these widely for its own sake. He has covered more ac than any other man, and yet he is not so muc a specialist upon everything. We feel that thing for itself, that he delights in each because it is special, that he collects blue c blue, and catches fish because they are fishy.

book appeared called "Soul Portraits." I hav idea what it was about, but if its object wa souls instead of their bodies it should have bee ing volume. In such a volume Mr. Andrew been depicted as a kind of Indian god with one hand holding a golf-club, another a pot o cricket bat, another a volume of Homer, and another a pen. But the great truth about may be expressed in the suggestion that the not only a hundred hands but a hundred face each face fixed with burning intensity upon its peculiar hand. His portrait is indeed the of all things, but it reaches this position by be portrait of a hundred monomaniacs. This qu of immeasurable addiction to certain specia selves is in reality of considerable ethical in great deal of difference between the universal object in the universe is contemptible in c whole, and the universalist to whom every obj and sacred that it could if necessary become a universe itself. We can imagine that Mr. Lan intense that for one of them he might even sa
We can conceive him throwing a whole hoard of dust bin because somebody was waiting to tell about Homeric unity. We can conceive him the last word about the principles of primeva some one was waiting for him at the front do blue china. His universalism is an overwhelm specialities, just as true religion may well be confluence of idolatries. Mr. Lang is indeed tion of this latter truth. He has approached should be approached, not only with enthusiasm as a whole, but with an immeasurable enthus scrap of its stone or weed that he happens to true universalist would not be the man who sh men as equal, so much as the man who should as separate. The true universalist would se as it is seen by its peculiar patriot and every seen by her lover. Every man who diligent pursues a hobby works in some degree for t and the man who pursues many hobbies comes
It is easy enough to sneer at the bibliophile blue china, but it is far more difficult to app product of existence as it should be appreciat Lang has not praised old books or blue china t with his conscience whether he has even pra Every material object has a value which we long as we regard it as material. Mr. Andrew chosen to collect blue bags instead of blue have studied old boots instead of old books written ballades of "shove halfpenny" inste cricket, and the value of his work would still is the great truth that justifies the collector, a fies the lover—the truth that we draw nearest things when we love some single object for its

out in the course of his insane researches something that we have missed. A man of such real culture may find anything, for there is no end to the riches of the world. To the ordinary observer all the great piles of books and china which men have lived and died to collect are so many rubbish heaps; but to a flash of the higher insight there is no such thing as a rubbish heap, and an excited antiquarian might cart away with gestures of indescribable triumph the dustbin from our own door. In order to criticize Mr. Lang with propriety we should have to be not only critics but eminent bibliophiles, brilliant cricketers, and distinguished anglers. In order to criticize him we should have to know more about fishing than Isaac Walton and more about Homer than Mr. Gladstone. We should have to be ourselves a fascinating compound of Mr. Edward Clodd and "W. G." It is not necessarily to be inferred that Mr. Andrew Lang has equalled all these gentlemen in their various departments. But the critic would have to equal them before he could discover what was the real vocation and what the most prominent speciality of Mr. Andrew Lang.

Upon the whole, however, we may be forgiven if we assume that Mr. Lang is most interesting in his literary aspect. Literature may or may not be more important to him than golf or spiritualism, but as the world is at present constituted it is at least more interesting to the world. In literary criticism Mr. Andrew Lang is a type of great importance. He is the emancipated conservative. He belongs to that great class of literary men of whom Aristophanes was the greatest. They are those who attack the despotism of novelty with the same breezy bitterness with which the great revolutionists have attacked the despotism of antiquity. It requires fully as much intellectual independence and spontaneity to fight for a forgotten king as to fight for an undiscovered republic. Aristophanes, Dr. Johnson, M. Brunetière, Mr. Andrew Lang are all examples of this kind of rebellious royalism. They are a sort of literary Jacobite. Perhaps the very best part of Mr. Lang's work is to be found in this reactionary luxuriousness, this happy and genial pessimism. Throughout all his admirable criticisms of contemporary productions we feel the presence of the general sentiment that Cervantes or Fielding could have done the thing so very much better. Sometimes, perhaps, this attitude is exaggerated. It may be scarcely more reasonable to ask a modern realist why he does not write like Fielding than to ask him why he does not write like Isaiah. In both cases no doubt one primary answer is, because he cannot; but another and perfectly valid reason is that he never intended to. But this concentration of Mr. Lang's attention upon the great existing achievements of literature is one of the most valuable tendencies which a critic or a school of criticism can show. For a great book, or a great man that is two hundred years old, is not dead—rather it, or he, has just begun to live. There is a certain quality in the very names of Homer, Job, Shakespeare, Dante, that shows that they have only lately come into their kingdom of life; their names are growing younger every day. Some day, perhaps, in far off ages there may be a mellow music in the name of Ibsen, and a rich roll in the word Huysmans. But Mr. Andrew Lang is no more living in advance of his time than he is living behind it. If he were really living behind his time he would not think so much of Fielding and Smollett. Mr. Lang's literary Toryism is his most striking and superficial characteristic, but it is not his deepest. As we have suggested, his conservatism springs largely, as the best conservatism and the best radicalism alike spring, from a capacity for enthusiasm. By a deep and noble paradox he loves old things because they are problems so gloomy and bloody and full of an evil fear a very robust and genial race can really enjoy the only people with good appetites who sup upon bo Walter Scott, a typical Scotsman, was at once the mo and the most superstitious of men. But any one followed this characteristic side of Mr. Lang's work noticed how much he owes in treating of Scotch lore possession of a peculiarly Scotch mind.

Mr. Lang inherits from his Scotch ancestry tendency towards a peculiarly masculine type of criticism. It is remarkable that most Scotchmen ha for literature; it is even more remarkable that the Sc for literature has hardly ever been effeminate or perver have been great Scotch Puritans and great Scotch de but there has, as far as we know, never been in the hist world such a thing as a great Scotch decadent. Even of it is like speaking of an American troubadour or knight-errant. Mr. Andrew Lang is heir to the gre tradition of which Walter Scott was the most striking since he was the greatest of novelists and the most o men. We get the same sentiment in Professor "Noctes Ambrosianæ," where literature is conceived the obvious and primitive activities of a gentleman wh possession of good health. This is the great and v tradition which Mr. Lang, like Stevenson, and Mr. B all genuine Scotchmen, inherit. As a nation they have had something to teach to those whom Professor Wilson idiotically called "the cockneys." Literature does n their heads like brandy, it diffuses itself over all their li food. Scotchmen have done much to preserve in exist important and interesting person who is called "th letters." For other literary schools have too often ev disposition to pay overwhelming attention to the letter neglect to procure the man. What we preeminently some school or fashion which should reckon a defect i culture or refinement precisely as they would reckon in physical courage or reasonable physical accompl Scotland alone, perhaps, has really effected this inevita ciation between broad shoulders and broad views. M so thorough a Scotchman that he cannot help fulfil genuine tendency. Even when he is a dilettante he ca being a Puritan; even when he addresses himself to th being a literary dandy he cannot avoid being a man fathomable and essential manliness marks all his childis and investigations. Above all it marks his literary which is full of this impalpable and incontestable a of maturity. It is from this maturity that Mr. Lang's literary conservatism comes. He is a t of the old and admirable Scotch school of convivi ship. He realizes, as the heroes of the "Noctes Amb realized, that learning is not a theme for the qu pedants, but for the uproarious communion of frie more infinitely friendly man perhaps has appeared in for many years and centuries than he. In an admirable in his admirable volumes of light literary criticism list of the only authors of station and universal rep attraction he fails to understand, and if we remember ri whole list amounts to only two items. In all the curre versies of literature he is a moderate critic. But mode his type is not a frigid thing. It is a fire capable of e the world. He has achieved the great achievement moderation. He is so enthusiastic upon all sides of all that a genuine stigma and a patent perdition attac such a state of affairs there is a primary peril and disadvantage that a man cannot be liberal-minded about literature without being liberal-minded about everything else. Mr. Andrew Lang, unless we are mistaken, is a man peculiarly impressed with that most profound and essential of sentiments, a sense of the richness of the world. Life has given him so much happiness, by means of aims and investigations which most men will call insane, that he naturally doubts whether any form of aim or investigation is necessarily worthless because it is accused of insanity. From the sum total of a thousand trifles he has learnt a philosophy that is far from trifling, the philosophy which teaches that more real facts are neglected in this practical world than we shall ever know. The trivial examples of men's credulity and collapse are small indeed in his eyes compared with the amount of truth which may have passed into darkness because it was incredible. He is fascinated by those dark treasures of truth which are buried for ever under the bitter seas of rationalism. From this arises his interest in folk-lore and even in spirit-rapping, and all those aspects of his philosophical personality which leave upon the public mind only a vague and general sense that he collects ghosts as he collects china. Undoubtedly he is what is vulgarly called a spiritualist; as a term of abuse the phrase is a queer one, since every one who thinks for himself must be a spiritualist, unless he prefers to be a materialist. Mr. Andrew Lang's contributions to folk-lore and the philosophy of religions have been entirely conceived in the spirit of a true spiritualist, a man who believes in the mysterious and inexhaustible character of the human mind. He has viewed the whole history of religions, if not always with the exactitude of a man of science, yet always with that far more exact inexactitude, that illimitable common sense, which is the peculiar prerogative of a literary man. In his dealings with folk-lore he has surprised one great truth which Mr. Herbert Spencer persistently eluded or ignored. He has realized the great fact that the early worships of the world should be approached in a literary spirit and not in a scientific one. The reason for this lies in the simple fact that savages are often literary, but savages are never scientific. The discussion of any creeds however ugly, of any gods however gross, from a purely scientific standpoint is like discussing a performance by Joachim in terms of wire and catgut. Nothing perhaps has been so strange and so fortunate in the whole of the nineteenth century than the chance which has led a great literary man into this corner of anthropology and permitted him to look upon the problems with his own eyes without scientific spectacles. In his views of fetish worship he may not have all the authority of an anthropologist, but he is more than an anthropologist, he is a fetish worshipper. He is attuned to the eternal human tendency which makes men worship blue china or black lumps of stone. Other men may be specialists and authorities and collectors of incontestable fact upon savage matters, but he is a savage, which is the first part of a poet.

G. K. CHESTERTON.

A chronological classification seems to be the simplest way of dealing, bibliographically, with the whole library of books for which Mr. Lang is responsible. But even the classification must necessarily be incomplete. The British Museum Reading-room can afford to give up ten pages of its general catalogue to the 100 odd entries under Mr. Lang's name, although this list is far from being exhaustive. The bibliography in Mr. C. M. Falconer's "Catalogue of a Library" (1898), privately printed at Dundee (only twenty-five copies were issued), giving a list of books written by Mr. Lang, or associated with his name, enumerated add, have long been out of print. His record the Gadshill Dickens (Chapman and Hall) edition of Scott's Poetical Works (Black), a edition of Scott's "Lyrics and Ballads"; the the Waverley Novels (Nimmo), first in forty-afterwards in a large-type edition of twenty-American edition of "The Rubáiyát of Omar K volumes—Mr. Lang has since, by the way, wr Khayyám as a Bore"—"A Collection of Ballad Hall's "Diamond Library"); "Selected Poems
Paul); "Selections from Wordsworth and Coleric
"Æsop's Fables," two volumes (Nutt); "Gri volumes (Bohn's Library); "The Arabian Nigh other story-books and fairy tales—including t which began with "The Blue Fairy Book" in 18 sented in the "Violet" volume noticed in our s art critic Mr. Lang wrote the "Notes on a Coll by Mr. J. E. Millais, exhibited 1881," f Society; and he was joint author with Mr of "Pictures at Play, or Dialogues of illustrated by Harry Furniss, and published 1888. As a sportsman he has contributed to the B on "Golf" and "Cricket," and writte
"Classical Allusions to Sport" in the Badm
"The Poetry of Sport," in addition to two cricket and angling. No wonder we find h clopædia Britannica" writing on subjects from to "Zeus."

Poetry.

1872.—"Ballads and Lyrics of Old France."
1880.—"Ballades in Blue China." (Kegan Pa
1882. "Helen of Troy." (Bell and Sons.)
1884. "Rhymes à la Mode." (Kegan Paul.)
" "Ballads and Verses Vain." By Andrew by Austin Dobson. (Scribner, New Yo from "Ballads and Lyrics of Old France Blue China," and from other verses prev and uncollected.] 1886.—"Lines on the Inaugural Meeting Society." [Privately reprinted from the " Selections in "Sonnets of the Century."
1888.—"Grass of Parnassus." (Longmans.)
1893.—Selections in "Scottish Contemporary 1894.—"Ban and Arrière Ban": a Rally of (Longmans.)

Critical and Miscellaneous

1881.—"The Library," with a chapter on M Books by Austin Dobson. (Macmillan.)
1885. "That Very Mab," with May Kendall.
1886.—"Letters to Dead Authors. (Longman
" "Politics of Aristotle." (Longmans.)
" "Books and Bookmen." (Longmans part of a series of "Books for the Biblioph New York.]
1889. "Letters on Literature." (Longmans.)
" "Lost Leaders. Reprinted from selected and arranged by Pett Ridge. (K 1890.—"How to Fail in Literature." (Leader
" "Old Friends: Essays in Epist (Longmans.)
1891.—"Essays in Little," with portrait (Longmans.)
" "Angling Sketches." (Longmans.)
1893.—"Homer and the Epic." (Longmans.)

History and Biography.

1882.—"Oxford: Brief Historical and Des Illustrated. Folio. (Seeley).
1890. "Life, Letters, and Diaries of Sir St First Earl of Iddesleigh." Two vols. (Bl 1896.—"Life of John Gibson Lockhart." Tw
1897.—"Pickle, the Spy." (Longmans.)
1898.—"The Companions of Pickle." (Longm

1897.—"Modern Mythology: A Reply to Professor Max Müller." (Longmans.)
1898.—"The Making of Religion." (Longmans.)
1901.—"Magic and Religion." (Longmans.)
,, "Psychical Research of the Century." Chapter by Andrew Lang in The Nineteenth Century. (Putnams.)

Novels, Fairy Tales, and Parodies.

1884.—"The Mark of Cain." (Arrowsmith's Library.)
,, "Much Darker Days." [A parody of Hugh Conway's "Dark Days," written under the pseudonym of A. Huge Longway. A new and revised edition appeared in the following year.] (Longmans.)
,, "The Princess Nobody. A tale of Fairy Land." (Longmans.)
1886.—"In the Wrong Paradise, and other Stories." (Kegan Paul.)
1887.—"He," by the authors of "It," &c. [A parody by Andrew Lang and W. H. Pollock on Rider Haggard's "She."] (Longmans.)
1888.—"The Gold of Fairnilee." (Arrowsmith.)
1889.—"Prince Prigio." (Arrowsmith.)
1893.—"Prince Ricardo of Pantouflia: Being the Adventures of Prince Prigio's Son." (Arrowsmith.)
1896.—"A Monk of Fife: A Story of the Days of Joan of Arc." (Longmans.)
1898.—"The World's Desire." (With Rider Haggard.) (Longmans.)
1900.—"Parson Kelly." (With A. E. W. Mason.) (Longmans.)

Translations.

1883.—"The Iliad." Into English prose. With Walter Leaf and Ernest Myers. (Macmillan.)
1889.—"The Odyssey." Into English prose. With Professor Butcher. (Macmillan.)
"The Dead Leman, and other Tales from the French." 8vo With Paul Sylvester. (Swan Sonnenschein.)
1896.—"Aucassin and Nicolete." (Nutt.)
1897.—"The Miracles of Madame St. Katherine of Fierbois." (Dent.)
1899.—"The Homeric Hymns: a New Prose Translation." With Essays literary and mythological. (George Allen.)

WORKS FOR THE YOUNG.

A "Personal View"

By G. A. HENTY.

Enormous as has been the increase in all the output in all branches of literature during the past half-century, it has in no department been so great as in that of books for the young. Sixty years ago it can hardly be said that it existed. "Peter Parley's Annual" was almost its only representative, for such heavy and pedantic volumes as "Sandford and Merton" bore no relation to the books now written for boys. On looking back upon that time I can remember only "Peter Parley," a volume brought out, I think, by the same publishers, called "Sergeant Bell and his Raree Show," the "Swiss Family Robinson," and a capital book, that I can still enjoy, named "Holiday House." There were, of course, other books read by boys, such as Captain Marryat's tales and Cooper's Indian stories, but these were not primarily written for the young. After a time publishers began to see that there was a new field open to them, and men and women began to devote themselves to the production of books for boys and girls. Kingston and Ballantyne were the pioneers of this new departure, while Edgar may be con-amount of religion was indispensable, and that it was that the heroine, or at least some of her friends, s For years girls fed upon this depressing pabulum; it their natural buoyancy to counteract its tendency.

Up to the beginning of the 80's the number of who made juvenile literature a speciality was small; ranks received a large and sudden accession. The S Promoting Christian Knowledge and the Religious Tra may, with the house of Griffith and Farran, claim pioneers of the great movement, and so rapidly did th that whereas some half-dozen books for boys and a girls at 4s. and 5s. each were deemed sufficient in number had increased twenty fold in 1900. The differe pains bestowed upon the get-up of books increas equal ratio, while in point of printing, paper, in han tasteful covers, and, above all, in illustrations, the ad been extraordinary; indeed, in all these respect brought out for the young are at least abreast of any oth of literature. Among books for boys historical tales very much to the front, and as these are generally stri rate in their history and geography, however large may be filled with episodes of adventure, there can be that their educational value has been great. School at one time served as the theme of a considerable pro books for boys, has fallen into desuetude, and now fo small proportion of the season's issue. This perhaps for some extremely bad boys, cheats, thieves, and ra generally introduced as foils to the good ones, and h may believe that such characters and such doings indeed among British boys.

Among books for girls the change has been eve In the gradual emancipation of the sex during the l years girls have had a large share and publishers gradu that the sentimental, the mournful, and the semi-religio lay unsold upon their shelves and that girls had taken to healthy and lively books of their brothers. Naturally of things corrected itself, bright stories with an histor were turned out for them also, and this style speedil popular. But even now most girls prefer their brothers those written specially for themselves, and the result that the production of books for girls bears but a sma tion indeed to that of those for boys. But this improv not been effected in the class of books turned out as presentation volumes in primary schools. Here it is sidered necessary that there should be a very strong n out of the scores of books published this season for thi it is not too much to say that there are not half-a-do and cheerful stories. This is much to be regret children of the working classes need even more than d the rank above them lively and interesting reading, that would induce them to read, for it is notorious th proportion of them after once leaving school rarely op No doubt they may once, with much labour and w pleasure, read the prizes presented to them, but the p of such books that achieve a second perusal must other sort of literature. But while boys avail themselves so largely of the privilege, girls, whose lives are much duller than those of their brothers, and who therefore need bright reading very much more, very rarely take out books, and it would be well indeed if every library were furnished with a class of book suitable to them, which would brighten their lives after the dull monotony of their school cramming and the absence of those sports and games in which their brothers indulge.

I cannot but think that boys' books of the last twenty years have had a large effect in producing the patriotic feeling that has of late exhibited itself so strongly. This has been shown in various directions; and it may be fairly claimed that the readiness of the Volunteers to go upon foreign service, and the ardour with which lads enter the two useful organizations the Boys' Brigade and the Church Lads' Brigade, which between them have eighty or a hundred thousand enrolled members, is due largely to the books now provided for them. Another proof of the general existence of patriotic feeling among boys is given in the fact that more than a dozen books of the season are devoted to stories of the war in South Africa and that not one among them is written on pro-Boer lines.

It cannot but be regarded as unfortunate that the greater portion of what may be called good books for boys are published at a price that places them beyond the reach of meagre purses and even beyond the amount at the disposal of managers of schools. Six shillings, even with the discount off, is a large sum to pay, and yet few publishers find it worth while to turn out cheaper editions. The get-up of the books is necessarily very expensive, they contain as many words as the old three-volume novels, the covers form an expensive item of the cost of bringing them out, the illustrations are numerous and costly, and although the fees to authors are for the most part very low in comparison to those paid for other literary work, it all adds up and the books cannot profitably be issued at a cheap edition for anything less than 3s. a volume. One great and unquestionable good has been effected by the issue of sound and interesting literature for boys—namely, the decrease that has taken place in the sale of the gutter boy-literature, the half-penny or penny serial tales of crime in all forms. These were unable to withstand the competition of such healthy and excellently get up periodicals as the Boy's Own Paper, although this was intended for a class considerably higher than that of the patrons of the penny dreadfuls, which seem to have been specially written to make crime attractive in boys' eyes, to hold up highwaymen and other criminals as heroes, and to present immorality in enticing forms.

Upon the whole, the alteration in literature for boys and girls during the last five-and-twenty years has been an unmixed good, and it would be difficult to suggest any changes that would improve that of the present day, at least as far as that intended for the boys and girls of the middle and upper classes. Good work sells readily, and young people have come to be very fair judges of what is good work. A very great improvement, however, will be made in the books intended for prizes for voluntary and crown and under. For these anything appears to b enough, and a few pounds are regarded as ample authors. There is plenty of room for an enterpris will bring out a series of prizes for primary s authors capable of producing work that, in point adventure, would equal those of greater bulk a Such a series would give an impetus to reading ls of the highest importance to boys and girls

The various matter now crammed into them almost repulsive, and a book a hateful obj Almost everything they have learnt is lost in t after leaving school, and the power of reading al power, if kept up, affords them a key to all othe fourteen they certainly will not study scie histories, but if they have bright and interestin they will continue to read until they reach an of reading becomes engrained in them, and they and appreciate more solid and useful volumes.
seldom open a book until they come to man's read little beyond a weekly or sporting paper.
be spared to put into the hands of young peo would amuse them and, at the same time, teac amount of history and geography. Books already in the hands of boys and girls of the classes, but there is at present a deplorable d in the quarters where they are most needed.

THE DRAMA.

"THE SHADOW DANCE."

Theatres like little books have their destin
Princess's, famous in the fifties of the last cent Kean, as the house of what was then called "
and at least notorious in the eighties as the sc Barrett's exploits in the late Victorian roman longer—as theatrical topography reckons situa
It is on the suburban list, and thus offers We opportunities of learning what kinds of pl outside the cab radius. Sometimes this repe Pailleron's Duchess said of Englishw
"d'aimables surprises." It is, for example, sing to come upon a great romantic classic like Not even in the strange transmogrification of it Ben Landeck—who is, if I mistake not, a me popular with the East-end public—under the t Dance. Probably, however, Mr. Landeck is all the deviations from the original. His "h take only one instance, wherein Esmeralda is hangman by Phœbus, aided by the beggar-king
M. Paul Foucher (and authorized, it is said, b in the original stage-version produced about conversion of Phœbus from a handsome, tippli eminently respectable young man "engaged (changed in her turn, to a simpering miss who ment at a "finishing" school) is no doubt a nec to the ideals of the public to whom this p addressed. If Gringoire ceases to be the fantasy and becomes merely "Sir Harry Bum

Literature

(SUPPLEMENT).

No. 214. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1901.

HURST & BLACKETT'S PUBLICATIONS.

MEXICO AS I SAW IT.
By Mrs. ALEC TWEEDIE. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs and Sketches by the Author, and New Map of Mexico. 1 vol., crown 4to, 21s. net.

TO THE SOUTH POLAR REGIONS.
Expedition of 1898-1900. By LOUIS BERNACCHI, F.R.G.S. Fully Illustrated by Photographs taken by the Author. Maps, Plans, &c. 12s. net.

THE HEARTS OF MEN.
By H. FIELDING, Author of "The Soul of a People," &c. 1 vol., demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

TO THE MOUNTAINS OF THE MOON.
Being an Account of the Modern Aspect of Central Africa and some little-known Regions Traversed by the Tanganyika Expedition in 1899 and 1900. By J. E. S. MOORE, F.R.G.S. 1 vol., crown 4to, with numerous Illustrations and Maps, 21s. net.

FROM THE CAPE TO CAIRO.
The First Traverse of Africa from South to North. By EWART S. GROGAN and ARTHUR H. SHARP. Fully Illustrated by Drawings by A. D. McCormick (from Sketches made by E. S. Grogan), Original Drawings by E. S. Grogan, Photographs and Photogravure Portraits of the Authors, Maps, &c. 1 vol., crown 4to, 21s. net.

THE NEW NOVELS.

IN SPITE OF ALL.
By EDNA LYALL, Author of "Donovan," "We Two," &c. 6s.

FLOWER AND THORN.
By BEATRICE WHITBY, Author of "The Awakening of Mary Fenwick," &c. 6s.

THE MARRIAGE OF MR. MOLYNEUX.
By CECIL HEADLAM, Author of "The Story of Nuremberg," &c. 6s.

FARDEN HA'.
By JOANNA E. WOOD, Author of "A Daughter of Witches," &c. 6s.

STRAWS IN THE WIND.
By CARLTON DAWE, Author of "The Yellow Man," "A Bride of Japan," &c. 6s.

THE LITTLE SAINT OF GOD.
A Heroine of the Red Terror. By LADY FAIRLIE CUNINGHAME,

BLACKIE & SON'S LI

New Stories by G. A. He

"Year after year Mr. Henty excites admiration, astonishme . . . He has seldom given the boys anything better."—The

WITH ROBERTS TO PRETORIA:
the South African War. With 12 Full-page Illustrations Rainey, R.I., and a Map. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olivi

AT THE POINT OF THE BAYONET of the Mahratta War. With 12 Full-page Illustrations by and 2 Maps. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olivine edges, 6s

TO HERAT AND CABUL: A Story of Afghan War. With 8 Illustrations by Charles M. She Map. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olivine edges, 5s.

WITH BULLER IN NATAL; or, A Bor
With 10 Illustrations by W. Rainey, R.I., and a Map. cloth elegant, olivine edges, price 6s.

Mr. Henty's Previous Books

Price 6s. each.

WON BY THE SWORD.
A ROVING COMMISSION.
UNDER WELLINGTON'S COMMAND.
BOTH SIDES THE BORDER.
WITH FREDERICK THE GREAT.
WITH MOORE AT CORUNNA.
AT AGINCOURT.
WITH COCHRANE THE DAUNTLESS.
A KNIGHT OF THE WHITE CROSS.
THE TIGER OF MYSORE.
WULF THE SAXON.
ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S EVE.
THROUGH THE SIKH WAR.
BERIC THE BRITON.
IN GREEK WATERS.
THE DASH FOR KHARTOUM.
REDSKIN AND COWBOY.

Price 5s. each.

NO SURRENDER.
AT ABOUKIR AND ACRE.
A MARCH ON LONDON.
ON THE IRRAWADDY.
THROUGH RUSSIAN SNOWS.
IN THE HEART OF THE ROCKIES.
A JACOBITE EXILE.
CONDEMNED AS A NIHILIST.
HELD FAST FOR ENGLAND.
MAORI AND SETTLER.
ONE OF THE 28TH.
IN THE REIGN OF TERROR.
ORANGE AND GREEN.
BRAVEST OF THE BRAVE.

Price 6s. ea

THE LION OF ST. MARK
CAPTAIN BAYLEY'S HE BONNIE PRINCE CHAR
FOR THE TEMPLE.
THE YOUNG CARTHAGI WITH WOLFE IN CANA
WHEN LONDON BURNE
THE LION OF THE NO
WITH CLIVE IN INDIA.
IN FREEDOM'S CAUSE.
THROUGH THE FRAY.
UNDER DRAKE'S FLAG.
TRUE TO THE OLD FLA
IN THE IRISH BRIGADE
BY RIGHT OF CONQUE
BY ENGLAND'S AID.
WITH LEE IN VIRGINIA
BY PIKE AND DYKE.

Price 5s. eac

A FINAL RECKONING.
THE CAT OF BUBASTES DRAGON AND THE RAV
ST. GEORGE FOR ENGL
BY SHEER PLUCK.
FACING DEATH.
OUT WITH GARIBALDI.
FOR NAME AND FAME.

Price 3s. 6d. e

THE YOUNG COLONISTS
A CHAPTER OF ADVEN

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

A GIRL OF GALWAY. With 8 Full-page
tions by John H. Bacon. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 6s.

By ETHEL F. HEDDLE.

AN ORIGINAL GIRL. With 8 Full-page tions by Gordon Browne. Cloth elegant, 6s.

By FRED SMITH.

THE WORLD OF ANIMAL LIFE. E
FRED SMITH. Profusely Illustrated with Engravings Specht and other eminent Artists. Cloth elegant, olivine

By Capt. F. S. BRERETON, R.A.M.C.

THE DRAGON OF PEKIN: a Story of t
Revolt. With 8 Full-page Illustrations by W. Rainey,

Mr. HEINEMANN'S NEW... BOOKS.

SIR HENRY RAEBURN, R.A.

BY SIR WALTER ARMSTRONG,

Director of the National Gallery, Ireland.

With an Introduction by the late R. A. M. STEVENSON, and a Catalogue Raisonné of Raeburn's Works by J. LAW, Curator of the National Portrait Gallery of Scotland.

With 40 Plates, of which 36 are in Photogravure, and two in Lithographic Facsimile. Large Imperial 4to. £4 4s. net.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY.

A Survey of Man's Record.

EDITED BY DR. H. F. HELMOLT.

With an Introductory Essay by the Right Hon. JAMES BRYCE, D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S.

To be completed in Eight Super royal 8vo. volumes. With many Maps, Coloured Plates, and Black and White Illustrations. Price in cloth 16s. net per volume; or in half morocco, gilt edges, £1 1s. net per volume.

VOLUME I. With many Plates and Maps.

PRE-HISTORY: AMERICA AND THE PACIFIC OCEAN.

THE BOOKMAN.—"Throughout the volume scholarship, vigorous thought, and a desire for truth are impressed upon the writing, concerning the reader that the history when finished may be looked upon as a complete picture of the world and its progress."

A full and complete prospectus will be sent on application. The first volume may be obtained on approval.

ITALIAN JOURNEYS. By W. D. HOWELLS.

With 11 Photogravures, 32 Full-page Plates, and many Text Illustrations from Original Drawings specially made for this work by Joseph Pennell. 1 vol. 15s. net.

OUTLOOK.—"A charming narrative with equally charming pictures."

UNIFORM WITH THE ABOVE.

A LITTLE TOUR IN FRANCE. By HENRY JAMES. With 12 Photogravures, 32 Full-page Plates, and 40 Text Illustrations from Original Drawings by Joseph Pennell. 1 vol. 10s. net. [Second impression.

FASHION IN PARIS: the Various Phases of Fashion Taste and Esthetics from the Revolution to the end of the Nineteenth Century. By OCTAVE UZANNE. With 24 Hand-coloured Plates and 250 Text Illustrations by François Courboin. New and Cheap Edition. 1 vol. 15s. net.

FAIRY TALES. From the Swedish of Baron G. DUCKLOU. By R. L. BRAEKSTAD. With Illustrations by T. Kittelsen and Eva Wuorenheimo. 1 vol. 3s. 6d.

THE TIMES.—"The North is the land of myth, fancy, and saga, and very good are these fairy tales."

THE SOUL OF A CAT. By MARGARET BENSON.

With Photographs and Illustrations by Madame Henriette Ronner. 1 vol. 3s. 6d.

ATHENÆUM.—"A dainty volume which will delight those who try to grasp the inner life of beasts and birds."

FICTION.

A CENTURY OF FRENCH ROMANCE.

Edited by EDMUND GOSSE.

A Library Edition in Twelve Volumes, demy 8vo. cloth extra, limited to 1,000 Sets. Price 5s. 6d. per Volume, or £3 3s. for the set of Twelve Volumes.

VOLUME I.

THE CHARTREUSE OF PARMA. By STENDHAL. With an Introduction by Mr. Maurice Hewlett. With 4 Coloured Plates by Eugene Paul Avril, 4 Photogravures and Portraits.

The DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Suggestively Stendhal stands for very much; and historically he stands for even more. No study of contemporary fiction is complete without reference to his influence, and the present worthy presentation of him deserves encouragement and gratitude."

An Illustrated Prospectus post free, and the first volume can be obtained on approval.

VOLUME II.

COLOMBA: CARMEN. By PROSPER MERIMEE. Introduction by Mr. Arthur Symons. With 4 Coloured Plates by Parys, 4 Photogravures, and Port ails. (Friday.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS AND STORIES.

THE RIGHT OF WAY. By GILBERT PARKER.

THE ETERNAL CITY. By HALL CAINE.

SONS OF THE SWORD. By MARGARET L. WOLIGE.

THE BALLET DANCER: and ON GUARD. By MATILDE SERAO, Author of "The Land of Cockaigne."

SPINDLE AND PLOUGH. By Mrs. HENRY DUDENEY, Author of "Lady Carew."

JOSEPH KHASSAN: Half-Caste. By A. J. DAWSON, Author of "African Nights' Entertainment."

THE GLOWWORM. By MAY BATEMAN, Author of "The Altar of Life."

SOME WOMEN I HAVE KNOWN. By

Illustrated Edition of Social

Just Published, Price 12s. net.

The FIRST VOLUME

The Illustrated Editio

SOCIAL ENGL

A Record of the Progress of the People in Learning, Arts, Industry, Commerce, L
Manners, from the Earliest Times to th
By Various Writers. Edited by H. D. TRA
and J. S. MANN, M.A. With about TRATIONS and numerous Coloured Plates re authentic sources.

Volume I. contains 800 pages, with about 400 and 7 Coloured Plates and Maps.

In selecting the illustrations the primary a elucidate the text. They are taken either from or from contemporary or nearly contemporar latter class many, it is believed, have

NEVER BEFORE BEEN REPR

while the majority of the originals of the rest ha accessible only through the medium of drawings tained in books quite out of the reach of ordina very rare exceptions, the illustrations in "S have been

PHOTOGRAPHED DIRECTLY F OBJECTS REPRESENT

of which they may therefore be regarded as worthy representations. It has been found poss many curious and little-known MSS.

CAREFUL NOTES ON THE ILLUS

with references to authorities, accompany the w

* An Illustrated Prospectus will be sen* application to the Publishers.

CASSELL and CO., Ltd., London, Paris, New York,

HANDSOME GIFT BO

STRANGE ADVENTURES IN D LAND:
Stories told by Mother Birds to Amuse their Chicke
R. KEARTON, F.Z.S. Illustrated from Phot
Cloth, 3s. 6d.; and cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s. Rembra

WITH REDSKINS ON THE WAR
By S. WALKEY. With Eight Full-page Illustra

LITTLE FOLKS.
CHRISTMAS VOLUME. With Pictures on nearly with Six Coloured Plates and numerous Illustrations Picture boards, 3s. 6d.; cloth, 5s.

CHUMS YEARLY VOLUME.
With 13 Coloured Plates and over 1,000 Pictures. Cl

PERIL AND PATRIOTISM:
True Tales of Heroic Deeds and Startling Adventur
trated by Leading Artists with stirring Pictures ex
the Work. Two Vols. in One, cloth gilt, 5s.

FAMILIAR BUTTERFLIES AND
By W. F. KIRBY, F.L.S., F.E.S., Assistan
Department, British Museum (Natural History) Magnificent Coloured Plates. 6s.

UNDER THE GREAT BEAR.
By KIRK MUNROE. With Twelve Illustratio

MRS. PEDERSON'S NIECE.
By ISABEL SUART ROBSON. With Eig
trations. 3s. 6d.

TOM AND SOME OTHER GIRLS.
By JESSIE MANSERGH (Mrs. G. de Horne V
Illustrations. 3s. 6d.

BLAZING ARROW.

Literature (Supplement).

CHILDREN'S CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

"THREE PRINCES AND THEIR BEASTS" (LITHUANIAN FAIRY TALE).
[From "The Violet Fairy Book" (Longmans).]

FAIRYLAND, FABLE, AND FARCE.

This year the supply of fairy tales is remarkably good. Happy children to find so many clever people to provide the mystic wand which shall, as Ruskin said, animate for them the material world with inextinguishable life, and fortify them against the glacial cold of selfish science!

In the preface to THE VIOLET FAIRY BOOK (Longmans, 6s.) Mr. Lang tells us that he is often asked, by ladies, "Have you written anything else except the Fairy Books?" He is obliged to explain that he has not written the fairy books, but has written almost everything else. However, he edits them in the interests of his young friends, and this year produces as good a volume as any of its chromatic predecessors. The world is searched so that Mr. Lang's book may be filled. If the hieroglyphs of Egypt or the Babylonian cakes of clay are not drawn upon, many languages are translated and every treasure-house of legend scoured to suit his purpose. This year Miss Blackley translates five stories, Mr. W. A. Craigie one, and the rest, a large number, are from Mrs. Lang. Mr. H. J. Ford, an old friend of the readers of this series of books, presents us with eight of the most beautiful coloured pictures that even fairies could suggest to a gifted artist. Added to these are 25 full-page drawings and 33 pictures in the text in black and white. We hope the one we reproduce will send many to view the book.

From America, and the pen of Mr. Thomas Page,

"JOYCE."

[From "The Lily Princess" (Skeffington).]

work is as well known to the young as it is to the not quite young. The captain, the princess, and Tom in THE LILY PRINCESS (Skeffington and Son, 2s. 6d.) are likely to become great friends with children. They are the friends of the fairies, and Miss Marguerite Lloyd knows how to make Olive, Tom's sister, tell her story in a way that her readers will fully appreciate. Mrs. Farmiloe adds two interesting drawings. This lady, whose work we have often praised, writes, as well as illustrates, another book, LITTLE CITIZENS (S.P.C.K., 4s.), in which she gives fashions of her amusing and clever drawings of children, and some humorous stories such as "Kitty in the Country" and "Rosie's Cousin Beck." An artist who observes so closely as does Mrs. Farmiloe has a good deal worth saying about those denizens of the streets and courts whose humours and sorrows she has known so long. The story of "Horace," for example, is as good a sketch of child life in a slum as one need wish to see, and the characterization of "'Orris" is worthy of a far more ambitious work.

THE RAINBOW GARDEN AND OTHER STORIES (Brimley Johnson, 5s. n.), written and illustrated by Miss Gratiana Chester, contains many very pretty ideas, such as that, for

Hatter, Miss Muffet, and other charac known books of the past. If there be the one and only "Alice," who will reminded of so pleasant an old friend?
there is a great deal that is new and well. One of the charms of "Alice in was the ever-welcome figure of the litt Minor," too, walks through dozens of Allan Wright, who, clever as he is,
Baker with any particular grace. Indee surroundings he looks uncommonly lik little boys that the wholesale clothier thousand at a fairly modest price. B full of fun and will provide many FAIRY TALES FROM THE SWEDISH (Heine by Baron G. Djurklou, with many Mr. Th. Kittelsen and Mr. Erik W bring the reader into a very different world to that with which we have Baron Djurklou has studied the folk-lor peasantry, and the result is a very ch lection of tales, many of which, while, n children, will interest folk-lorists in ge Norwegian artists provide some une if not always pleasant pictures (see p.3).
appears to have been admirably done b whose book adds some new things English fairy stories. There is a touc of bold humour, and imagination in the which gives them no small distinc
HOLDA'S STORIES (Allen, 3s. 6d. n.), by Scott, is a charming collection not intent. Holda, or Bertha, is the nam Mother who occasionally visits childre them in another world. Miss Scott's stamp of wide information and sho sympathy with folk-lore and with chil
Alice M. Morton's drawings are excell

FANCY FAR-LAND (Chapman and Hall, 5s. n.) is an original, graceful collection of stories for young people by Miss Myra Hamilton. The long list of illustrations is by a number of famous artists, among whom Mr. Millar's excellent work stands first. His pictures, for example, to "The Rosy Palm" leave nothing to be desired.

When the children are tired of the fairies who live above ground they will find THE FISH CROWN IN DISPUTE (Skeffington, 3s. 6d.) shows them some of the extraordinary things that may happen in the sub-marine world. The ad-

MOTHER HOLDA.
[From "Mother Holda's Stories" (Allen). See p. 2.]

permission, to the lady who is now Princess of Wales.

Among all the gay and elaborately illustrated books that we have been through we must place very highly the true annals of fairyland which the editor, Mr. J. M. Gibbon, calls THE REIGN OF KING COLE (Dent, 4s. 6d. n.). These old stories redressed—from Grimm, Hans Andersen, Swift, and Keightley—are very welcome. Mr. Charles Robinson illustrates almost every page, and wherever there is a drawing of his there is freshness and beauty, laughter or grace. Children will be delighted with the originality and cleverness of the three books in the "Brownie" Series from the "Peartree Press" (Brimley Johnson, 2s. n. each). The first is JOHN GORITZA, by Miss Dolly Pentreath; the second, SNOWFLICK, OR THE LITTLE WHITE YEAR, a story for boys, by the same lady; and the third, GWYN, DEE, PERO, AND COMPANY, by Mrs. Williams. The second and third have each a very good drawing by Mr. James J. Guthrie.

One of the most successful servants of children is the Queen of Rumania, who, in her name of "Carmen Sylva," has written some dozen tales that are collected under the title of A REAL QUEEN'S FAIRY BOOK (Newnes, 6s.). They are instinct with the charm of faërie and are narrated after a fashion likely to hold the childish fancy note in regard to her writing of fairy stories. The the book are increased by the admirable drawings of Nelson and Mr. A. Garth Jones. The Illustration page 5 is by the former artist, and presents an exa of the imaginary world to which the tales introduce

Among the best of the gay and original story-season is ROUND THE WORLD TO WYMPLAND (John La Miss Evelyn Sharp. She has invented the wymp an knows all about him, but the children of her eight li she has observed with uncommon acuteness. With and a keen eye for effect Miss Sharp weaves tale enthral her readers, while, in case some of the gue feast of fun desire to see their mysterious friends, Woodward translates them into convincing black and lings (see page 4). There is a kindness and charm abo the World to Wympland" that will make it a welcom

In a totally different manner is Mr. Cuming's W MONSTERLAND (George Allen, 6s.). Here the autho a hint from Mr. Hutchinson, the author of "Prehi and Beast," and written a book introducing children monsters of long ago. The idea has been happily With the aid of that wonderful artist of animals-as-th be, Mr. J. A. Shepherd, Mr. Cuming gives us one o amusing and original books for young people that we
We have not quite finished laughing at "The Sea-co parion" yet.

MULTUM IN PARVO.

Those who like to have their nursery books bot good are always on the look out for "The Dump Children" (Grant Richards, 1s. 6d. each). Numbe eleven are before us, and each in its different way i able and amusing child's book. THE PINK KNIGH comic coloured pictures, is as funny as need be, and M Cobb's addition to the series, THE LITTLE CLOWN, is monly good example of how to interest the young and A HOUSE BOOK, by Miss Mary Tourtel, is made

"HE TOOK OFF THE RED SHOES THAT HUNG AT HER WAIST AND SLIPPED THEM OVER HER PINK TOES"

(In the Prince's Shoes)

[From "Round the World in Wymp'land" (Lane), see page 3.]

coloured pictures of equestrian incidents and merry verses which will delight all lovers of man's best friend. For younger people Mr. H. Mayer draws and Mr. Crosland sings an excellent LITTLE PEOPLE alphabet in which, for example, B stands for Beer :—

Here is your little brother Beer,
Of course, you've heard of him before ;
He has a naughty Uncle Paul,
Who used to want to eat us all.

Although he does not wear a tie,
He's just as white as you or I,
And just as fond of cake and fruit ;
The difference is that he can shoot.

From which it will be seen that the young idea may learn a good

Day" to "Boxing Day," and manages to m of them interesting and, we fancy, rather in Howard and Miss Gertrude Bradley prov the series, PILLOW STORIES, which very e some old friends with new faces and some friends.

On a very small scale, too, is THE S BLACK MUNGO (James Nisbet, 1s. 6d.), by the on "Little Black Sambo" of last year. T as good as its forerunner will recommen read the "Sambo." The "Bairn-Books" ( series for the very little people. Those bef
THE FARM BOOK, by Mr. Walter Copeland, DAYS, by Miss Clare Bridgman. Both of give pleasure to the audience, large in numb that they are intended to reach, more es Charles Robinson illustrates them with doz coloured drawings and quaint sketches.

"AROUND THE WORLD, AV

From Nelson and Sons comes an anonym
EXPLORERS (2s.), in which are told the historl
Ferdinand Magellan, Mungo Park, Sir John Livingstone, Christopher Columbus, and so fo a neat and comprehensive one ; an admiral boy. In the same category, also, might be Du Chaillu's work, the result of close persistent study of animals, birds, reptiles Africa, which he calls THE WORLD OF THE (Murray, 7s. 6d. n.). Mr. Du Chaillu b birds and beasts of the woods talk among the
we have not the ears to hear, and his relatio incidents of forest life in the denizens' ow convincing piece of work. There are ove illustrations by Mr. C. R. Knight and M who appear to have caught the spirit of unusually interesting undertaking. We see birds, reptiles, insects talk, think, work, a Du Chaillu's book should be widely popular

Since Mr. Kipling gave us the "Jungle certainly been an increase of reported conve neighbours of the forest. In MOOSWA AN BOUNDARIES (Pearson, 6s.) Mr. W. A. Frase idea in the most agreeable spirit. He tells u seasons on the Athabasca and Saskatchewan North-West of Canada, and that "Long ever pleasantly, swiftly, as sitting over a smoul have listened to famous trappers as they spoke vividness of the most fascinating life in the winner's callings." These tales of the trapp into the history of his hero, Rod MacGregor, return for his kindness to some of the animals o is helped by them when at death's door.
splendid book for boys ; humorous, kindly, w of interesting natural history and admirable t natures. New Zealand forest voices may be hea agreeable stories of woods, and bush, and seas

Bright calls THREE XMAS GIFTS AND OTHER TALES (Simpkin, Marshall). They show us that elfin maidens, sprites, and gnomes are as much at home among the Kauri trees or flax bush as in our own familiar scenery. "Three Xmas Gifts" will make a very nice Christmas present and will help to teach the young folk at home to love the old folk in the colonies.

DREAMS AND DOMESTICITY.

Mr. Tom Gallon has long since caught the popular ear. His latest book, THE MAN WHO KNEW BETTER (Constable, 6s.), reminds us that its author has been likened before now to Charles Dickens. Certainly the present "Christmas Dream" contains some echoes of another dream published many years ago. Such names as Tolderoy, Bob Judkin, Saggers, and Mrs. Bleak are pleasantly reminiscent of our youthful reading. Even Mr. Gordon Browne, who illustrates "The Man," is inspired by the spirit of emulation and sets aside his own excellent style for that of the late Fred Barnard in the drawing which depicts how "Mr. Tolderoy's conduct is peculiar." Shortly the story is this, Mr. Andrew Judkin is a self-satisfied and unkind man who undergoes some remarkable experiences (a little like those of Mr. Hawtrey recently at the Avenue Theatre), and then becomes a much better person. There is a good deal of cheap sentiment and a good deal of clever observation in the book. When an able author puts these two together he may be sure of a wide and eager audience.

Mrs. Molesworth provides two books this year, THE BLUE BABY AND OTHER STORIES (Fisher Unwin, 2s. 6d.), with some rather poor illustrations, and THE WOOD PIGEONS AND MARY (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.). Both of these volumes are in the well-known and effective manner of the author of "Carrots," and the latter is fortunate enough to have some eight pictures from the pen of Mr. Millar which would lend interest to an even less attractive prose by Miss Johnston (see p. 7). We are sorry to l at last, although, after all his domestic troubles, he l the birds and the bees in the old high-walled gar happy, too, as they, when the sunshine turns to oth all the gold of ophir roses."

"HANS' ADVENTURE WITH THE SHADOWS."
From "A Real Queen's Fairy Book" (Newnes). See p. 3

In Browning

The comm
yours, m one's,
Is, not to were fair Provided
—but find What may find how fair
Up to our

"The Wom is a brave a story, with rous pictur
Gordon Bro

For gir
also is Mis
Fenyre's
THE (Ho well written adequate at for the entertainme moral sugge
Sydney C
trates it
HAMMOND'S (Brimley
4s. 6d. n.)
Mary Straff
the advanta well illustra is a domest thoughtful able kind.
OF DAGO (Ja
by Miss Fe
ston, is in more amu
This tale o is depicted and white by as cleverly

PICTURES: PROSE AND VERSE.

When tiny hands are folded,
And tiny eyelids sleep,
Nursery friends come forth, dears,
Their welcome tryst to keep,
The pain of going to bed, dears,
Is soon lost in the joy
Of playing with these friends, dears,

"LAURA WOULD KNEEL BY THE BED AND READ TO HER."
(From "Laura Richmond" (Wells, Gardner). See p. 5.)

Mrs. Praeger makes a very comic book of BRYAN O'LINN (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.), the Irish gentleman who had no breeches to wear until he secured a sheepskin to supply the deficiency.

Mr. Walter Jerrold writes and Mr. Charles Robinson draw a wildly laughable book which they call NONSENSE! NONSENSE! (Blackie, 6s.). The pictures may be too funny for words, but nevertheless, Mr. Jerrold fits some wonderfully inconsequent rhymes to them. For example—

There was an old fellow named White,
Tried to fly on the tail of a kite;
He rose with a bound,
A whole inch from the ground,
And fell in a terrible fright.

From the design on the first end paper to that on the last the drawings and verses are highly enjoyable.

Miss Florence and Miss Bertha Upton call their book THE GOLLIWOGG'S "AUTO-GO-CART" (Longmans, 6s.) this year. It is in the same style and quite as funny as their other Golliwog volumes. A thousand trumpeters could say no more than that.

THE ADVENTURES OF A JAPANESE DOLL (Grant Richards, 6s.) is told by Mr. Henry Mayer in many delightful coloured pictures. It is a toy-book that is

Mr. Walter Crane's volume this year is called GOODY TWO SHOES' PICTURE BOOK (John Lane, 4s. 6d.) and has eighteen coloured designs. Although Mr. Crane was the pioneer of children's gay and lively picture-books, his work appears rather crude and stiff among modern neighbours. Such a drawing, however, as those which illustrate the "Yellow Dwarf" show the master hand.

We look forward with great interest each year to the book of Mr. Carton Moore Parke, but, so far, we have only received the first part of THE CHILD'S PICTORIAL NATURAL HISTORY (S.P.C.K., 1s.). When finished this will be a valuable volume, for Mr. Parke's drawings of animals have all the power and grace we have already praised in his work. Such pictures must aid enormously the æsthetic taste of children.

"A BRISK LAD
IGNOR
(From "Stories from (Sunday School

The most diverting Christmas book of have seen is that by the late Mr. Cosmo Monkho NONSENSE RHYMES (Brimley Johnson, 2s. 6d.), ar equally amusing drawings by Mr. Gilbert C
"Greybeards at Play" we found particularly go of the cleverest verses in this book is illustrate

"ALL WENT WELL UNTIL WE REACHED AN ALLEY CROSSING."
[From the "Story of Dago" (Jarrold), see page 5.]

we give. The characterization in the picture, which deals with the gentleman who gave his daughter in marriage to a man who could eat more porridge than he himself, is very quaint, and the picture to the lines:—

There once was a man in a boat,
Who drowned his papa in a moat,
He said, "Ere you sunk
You were frequently drunk,
But now you're my little teetote."

is quite convincing, although hardly more so than that which shows the wedding party of the following little history:—

There once was a lady named Lena
And certainly no one had seen a More beautiful face,
Or more exquisite grace,
But she married a spotted hyæna.

TOY BOOKS.

Among the most gaily-coloured of this class of production are those published by Messrs. Dean and Son, whose long series includes an interesting and informing ADVANCE AUSTRALIA, SOLDIERS OF THE CENTURY, SAILORS OF THE CENTURY, and THE GREAT POWERS OF THE WORLD all by Mr. R. Simkin, who makes his subjects really live. Dean's BON-BONS' A.B.C. and ANIMAL A.B.C. are well-drawn and boldly coloured aids to learning, while their RULERS OF THE SEA and THE EXPRESS are the sort of picture-book of which children never tire. Among their books of stories and rhymes are JACK'S RETURN, THE TOP OF THE MORNING TO YOU,

taining many good designs to t paints, and a palette and a book with coloured drawings by Mr. Ing who illustrates verses of this ch

Some knickers were ordered f
Who gorged till the tailor was His waist grew so fat
They'd to iron him out fla
Even then they went on all as

The CHILD'S COMPANION and C Days (R.T.S., 2s. 6d. each) are f
tures and pleasant reading for litt as are the lighter TOPSY TURVY the Annual TINY TOTS (Cass each). Mr. Neilson's comic an ried in "Topsy Turvy"; the dr
"Tiny Tots" are rather old fash good in their particular style.

THE NEW PLAYFELLOW (Sun Union, 1s.), by Miss Vaughan, is forward story for children with scut illustrations; it is one o Letter Series.

CLASSICS REDRESSED.

STORIES FROM THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS (Sunday Sch 1s.) compiled by E. A. Macdonald, is illustrated with good and some rather poor drawings by Mr. J. Sinclair ( Another classic which has been cleverly redressed is t in THE BOY'S ODYSSEY (Macmillan, 6s.), where M Perry has employed Mr. Butcher's and Mr. Lang's of Homer" as the ground work of his undertaking. M Hood appears at his best in the pictures which give important points of the immortal story in a rich and fashion.

"THE HUNDRED YEARS HAD EXPIRED" (THE SLEEPING BEAUTY).
From "Grimm's Fairy Tales" (Ward, Lock).

CHURCH FASTS AND FESTIVALS (S. P. C. K., 2s.) is an arrangement of short papers for young children by the Rev. E. Osborne and some others, dealing very fully and very interestingly with this subject. The admirable drawings by Mr. W. S. Stacey are worthy of the subject of the book.

A new issue of that tremendous collection GRIMM'S FAIRY TALES (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.) is always welcome, and the present volume "for children and the household" will no doubt be eagerly bought. There are numbers of illustrations, some the grotesque and powerful work of Doré, and some others, not quite so good, but always gay and amusing. At the end of our list, but merely on account of its importance, is the splendid issue of our old friend UNCLE REMUS (Grant Richards, 6s.). If anything were required to give the coming-on generation an interest in Mr. Fox, Mr. Rabbit, and Mr. Terrapin, no one could have had a happier idea than to get Mr. J. A. Shepherd to illustrate their various adventures. This he has done, and done excellently well. Some sixty humorous drawings in black and white and colour go to make Mr. Joel Chandler Harris' classic an irresistible lure to the buyer of books this season.

Cassell's Saturday Journal, the annual well-known and widely-read publicatio ally illustrated and printed is Cassel which appears "Kim" and "The Messrs. Cassell are also represented by by side with which we may put Good the Sunday Magazine (Isbister) and the (Religious Tract Society)—all volumes excellent gift-books of a wholesome attractively written and illustrated. said of that capital magazine the L Paternoster-row), which contains "T Anthony Weir," by Silas K. Hocking. address comes the Girl's Own Annual, t volume of the Girl's Own Paper, and Annual the twenty-third volume of the Dr. Gordon Stables is generally well t periodical with tales of gallant advent contributes a story of polar exploratio usual series of articles on "How to r various things, from prismatic fountai phone.

Young England (Sunday School rather a good serial, "The Emperor's Albert Lee, detailing the adventures in the days of Napoleon. "Stories of Public Schools," is another feature which has reached its twenty-second y

One of the most handsomely appare mas annuals for boys is the bound vol Empire (Andrew Melrose, 7s. 6d.), w varied a stock of fiction and informat of any schoolboy could desire. Natu serial story of the Boer war—"Cont it is called, and the author is Mr. A of the magazine is the weekly portra of some athletic hero. Among the a we notice a series on "The Boy S General Baden-Powell, and another c Strong," by Eugene Sandow. especially some of the larger coloure good. This is the first volume of "Bo and it makes an excellent start.

The Century Magazine annual issued, in England, by Messrs. Macmi is well recognized over here, and the "Dri and I." From Messrs. Mac that admirable publication for the yo We also have annuals of Home Words (Home Office), the Child's Own Magazine (Sunday S Dawn of Day (S.P.C.K.), Chums and Little Rosebud Annual (J. Clarke), and the Young (Wells Gardner, Darton).

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

"Albert Chevalier's Autobiography"

Before I Forget. Being the Autobiography of a Chevalier d'Industrie. Written by ALBERT CHEVALIER. With over 60 Illustrations full of interesting experiences and bright stories by a unique entertainer. 16s net. Early application will be necessary to secure copies of the first edition

"Gorky is to be the new illumination for the world of the thoughtful

Foma Gordyeeff (Thomas the Proud). By MAXIM GORKY. Translated from the Russian by Isabel F. Hapgood. Cloth, 6s.

"Prosperous" British India. By WILLIAM DIGBY, C.I.E., Author of "The Famine Campaign in Southern India 1877-79." With diagrams and maps. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12. 6d.

An Editor's Sermons. By Sir EDWARD RUSSELL, Editor of the Liverpool Daily Post Introduction by the Lord Bishop of Hereford. Cloth. 6s. net.

Barry Sullivan and his Contemporaries. By R. M. SILLARD. Two vols. Illustrated. 21s. per set net.

Alcoholism: A Study in Heredity. By G. ARCHDALL REID. Cloth, 6s. net.

A Jilt's Journal. By RITA. (Unwin's Green Cloth Library.) 6s.

Yorko the Adventurer. By LOUIS BECKE. (Green Cloth Library.) 6s.

Wales. By O. M. EDWARDS, Lecturer on Modern History at Lincoln College, Oxford (Story of the Nations Series.) 5s.

Professor Edward's History possesses a special advantage as being the first continuous popular history of Wales. It is full of detail, and at the same time has a broad and clearly defined plan and point of view in regard to the different periods, enabling the reader to understand the evolution of Welsh history, political and social, and the relation of period to period. It contains, moreover, some very charming writing, especially when dealing with the literature of Wales—writing with the Celtic "note" of delicacy, simplicity, and colour. For the many Welshmen abroad with their active literary interests in home matters, it should prove very attractive as well as to the general reader.

The Story of the Nations on the Instalment Plan.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN takes this opportunity of drawing attention to a subscription edition of the Nations Series which he has prepared in 56 volumes

This edition is got up in very handsome form on special paper, and with new binding designs, and issued at a reduction of more than 40 per cent. from the usual rates.

These 56 vols. (including the above-mentioned work on Wales) will be supplied on the INSTALMENT plan in cloth bindings on receipt of a preliminary payment of 8s. (which is less than 2d. per vol.) and 16 further payments of 10s. each; in half-morocco for a preliminary payment of 15s., and 15 further payments of £1 each.

Those who prefer to pay cash may buy at a still further reduction—viz., £8 for a set, cloth; and £15 for the morocco edition.

The STORY OF THE NATIONS is the greatest Historical Library in the World, and is a widely-popular series written by specialists in history.

Only a limited number of sets have been prepared, and immediate applications for them should be made to insure delivery.

Sets of the Library, both in cloth and morocco bindings, may be seen at the Publisher's Offices, 11, Paternoster-buildings, London; and also at many of the booksellers'.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster-square, E.C.

PHOTOGRAVURE PLATES

MADE AND PRINTED IN ENGLAND
AT THE
MOST REASONABLE CONTINENTAL RATES.
Subjects obtained and Researches undertaken at the National Museums and Galleries.

Specimens and Prices on Application.

CROWDY & LOUD, 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Works: Walham Green.

JARROLD & SONS'

NEW BOOKS.

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

MAURUS JÓKAI'S NEW NOVEL.

HALIL THE PEDLAR (THE WHITE ROSE).

By MAURUS JÓKAI. 6s. Authorised Edition. Translated by R. NISBET BAIN. With a recent Photogravure Portrait of Dr. Jókai.

The theatre of the story is Stamboul in the Eighteenth Century, and every phase of life in the great metropolis is described with singular fidelity. The chapter on the Tulip Gardens of the Grand Seignior and their fatal influence on character is moreover an exceedingly fine piece of grim humour in the master's best style.

THIRD EDITION.

TALES FROM TOLSTOI.

Translated from the Russian, with a BIOGRAPHY OF COUNT TOLSTOI. (The First of its kind in English.) By R. NISBET BAIN. 6s.

"The profound simplicity of subject and treatment alike exhibits the Russian genius to the happiest advantage." St. James's Gazette.

"Admirably translated .... they are eminently characteristic of the man and the enthusiast."—The Times.

A POWERFUL STORY OF SOCIOLOGICAL QUESTIONS.

GOD'S REBEL.

By HULBERT FULLER, Author of "Vivian of Virginia." 6s.

"The book is alive; the struggle it records is of real dramatic interest, the incidents are powerfully described, and the passion of social revolt which penetrates the story gives us a real insight into some forces in American life."—Manchester Guardian.

FROM THE SWEDISH OF ZACHARIAS TOPELIUS.

THE KING'S RING.

Translated by SOPHIE ÖHRWALL and HERBERT ARNOLD. 6s. With a Photogravure Portrait of the Author.

"We doubt if there will be anything better than 'The King's Ring.' It gives vivid descriptions of the Thirty Years War, of battles, storms, and sieges, with sketches of the great leaders on either side."—The Times.

FROM THE FRENCH OF RENÉ BAZIN.

AUTUMN GLORY.

Translated by Mrs. ELLEN WAUGH, with a specially-engraved portrait of René Bazin. 6s.

Mr. Edmund Gosse, in reviewing M. René Bazin's novels in the "Contemporary Review," says:—"The most successful and, I think, the best of his books is the latest, 'Autumn Glory.' The subject, briefly, is the draining of the village by the city. . . . He takes in 'Autumn Glory' the agricultural class, and shows how towns, with their offices, cafés, railway stations, and shops, are tempting it away from the farms, how—under the pressure of imported produce—the land itself is dying of a slow disease."

A STORY OF THE EARLY DAYS OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC.

KING STORK OF THE NETHERLANDS.

By ALBERT LEE, Author of "The Gentleman Pensioner," &c. 6s. A strongly-dramatic, historical romance of the stirring days of William the Silent, Prince of Orange, and the Spanish Terror in Holland.

A STORY OF LIFE IN NEW ENGLAND.

MEMORY STREET.

By MARTHA BAKER DUNN, Author of "Sleeping Beauty," "Lias Wife," &c. 6s.

"There is a powerful charm about this simple chronicle of New England life, with an abundance of humour. . . . Many of the characters are delightful."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THIRD AND CHEAPER EDITION.

THE ROMANCE OF KING

T. NELSON & S

NEW BOOKS

.* ILLUSTRATED LIST, POST FREE, OV

Tales of Adventure, Xmas

FOR THE COLOURS: a Sketch of the British Army. By HER Author of "In Memoriam of Eng and Green, &c. With Coloured Pr Illustrations by Archibald Wood, and Artists. Crown 8vo, bevelled board top, 6s.

IN FAIR GRANADA: a Ne
Tale. By E. EVERETT-GREEN, A Worcester. "A Jacobite Highlander" Illustrations by Walter Arthur. C boards, cloth extra, gilt top, 6s.

HELD TO RANSOM.
FORESTER, Author of "The Span Settler's Story," &c. Illustrated by Crown 8vo, bevelled boards, cloth extra

JACK RALSTON: a Tale o
Far North-East of Canada. By HA
HAM, M.A., Author of "Canadian Service." With Coloured Illustrations
Crown 8vo, bevelled boards, cloth extra

FOR THE FAITH: a Story Formation Times of England. By GREEN, Author of "The Heir of
"French and English," &c. Illustr Margetson. Post 8vo, cloth extra, 3s.

SCOUTING FOR BULLE
of the South African War. By HER Author of "A Fighter in Green," "A lars." With Coloured Illustrations.
extra, 3s. 6d.

THE CAPE AND ITS S
The Struggle for South Africa. With tions. Post 8vo, cloth extra, 2s. 6d.

JIM'S SWEETHEARTS.
HAVERFIELD, Author of "Rhoda," Illustrated by Miss Preston Margoun
extra, 2s. 6d.

ON HONOUR: a Story of Home Life. By E. DAVENPORT A
"A Girl of To-day," &c. With Colou R. Farquhar. Post 8vo, cloth extra, 2s.

MADAMSCOURT; or, The
of a Fugitive Princess. A New Story MAY POYNTER, Author of "A
"Scarlet Toon." Illustrated by R.
8vo, cloth extra, 2s.

GREAT EXPLORERS: an Exploration and Travel in Many Lands page Illustrations. Post 8vo, cloth ex

TWO OF A TRADE: a Ne
Girls. By the Author of "Val." 8vo, cloth extra, 1s. 6d.

DICKIE: a Story of Life in Show. By Mrs. HAMILTON SYN
"Glory," &c. Illustrated. Post 8vo, c

THREE SAILOR BOYS: o
the Pacific. The Adventures of Three Boat, on a Coral Island, and among VERNEY LOVETT CAMERON, C
mander Royal Navy. Author of "J Illustrated. Post 8vo, cloth extra, 1s.

THE STORY OF ALFRED TIMES. A Popular Life of Alfred the People. By M. DOUGLAS. Author o
Record," &c. Illustrated. Post 8vo, c

A LAD OF DEVON: a Stor
By Mrs. HENRY CLARKE, M.A., A Lamacrell's Lodger," &c. Illustrated.
extra, 1s.

THE QUEEN'S SHILLING Story for Boys. By Mrs. GLASGOW, A to the Flag," &c. Dedicated by perm Marshal Earl Roberts, V.C., K.G.
8vo, cloth extra, 1s.

PROFESSOR ARCHIE: A
the Young. By LEILA PERCIVAL.
8vo, cloth extra, 1s.

THE CHILDREN'S TREA PICTURES AND STORIES FOR Illustrated. With Choice Illuminated
Little Ones' Own Magazine. 1s.

NEW CENTURY LIBRA

A SELECTION FROM

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO.'S LIST.

Burma Under British Rule. By Dr. JOHN NISBET. 2 vols. 32s. net.

The Life of Pasteur. By RENÉ VALLERY-RADOT. 2 vols. 32s.

Travels Round Our Village. By ELEANOR G. HAYDEN. Illustrated by L. L. Brooke. 7s. 6d. net.

A Ribbon of Iron (The Trans-Siberian Railway). By ANNETTE MEAKIN. Illustrated. 6s.

With the Flag at Sea. By WALTER WOOD. Illustrated by Scoggings Wright. 6s.

Dante and Giovanni del Virgilio. By P. H. WICKSTEED and EDMUND G. GARDNER. 12s.

Dante's Ten Heavens. By EDMUND G. GARDNER. Second Edition. 12s.

The Chronicles of Vallini. Edited by P. H. WICKSTEED. 6s.

Women and Men of the French Renaissance. By EDITH SICHEL. 16s. net.

Lake Geneva and its Literary Landmarks. By FRANCIS GRIBBLE. 18s.

A Journey to Nature. By J. P. MOWBRAY. 7s. 6d. net.

Pictures of War. By JOHN STUART. 7s. 6d.

Oliver Cromwell. By THEODORE ROOSEVELT (President U.S. of America). 10s. 6d. net.

Asia and Europe. By MEREDITH TOWNSEND. 10s. 6d. net.

Kalhana's Rajatarangini. A Chronicle of the Kings of Kashmir. Edited by M. A. STEIN. £3 3s. net.

The Eighth Duke of Beaufort and the Badminton Hunt. By T. F. DALE. Illustrated. 21s. net.

Amateur Fish Culture. By CHARLES WALKER. 2s. 6d.

Through Siberia. By J. STADLING. Edited by Dr. F. H. H. Guillemard. 18s.

Where Black Rules White (Hayti). By HESKETH PRICHARD. 12s.

The Paston Letters, 1422-1509 A.D. A Reprint of the Edition of 1872-75. Edited by JAMES GAIRDNER, C.B. 4 vols. 21s. net.

Selected Poems of James, First Marquis of Montrose, and Andrew Marvell. Edited by ROBERT S. RAIT. 2s. 6d. net.

The Mind of Tennyson: his Thoughts on God, Freedom, and Immortality. By E. HERSHEY SNEATH, Ph.D. 5s. net.

A History of Education. By THOMAS DAVIDSON. 5s. net.

Constable's Time Table of Modern History. Edited By M. MORISON. 12s. 6d. net.

Constable's Hand Atlas of India. Arranged by J. G. BARTHOLOMEW. 14s.

Ephemera Critica. By J. CHURTON COLLINS. Second Edition. 7s. 6d.

A Russian Province of the North. By J. STADLING. Edited by Dr. F. H. H. Guillemard. 18s.

Ancient India as Described in Classical Literature. By J. W. MCCRINDLE, M.A. 7s. 6d. net.

The Chronology of India. By C. MABEL DUFF. 15s. net.

The Rise of Portuguese Power in India. By R. S. WHITEWAY. 12s. net.

The Life of Rekhmara, Vezir of Upper Egypt. By PERCY E. NEWBERRY. 21s. net.

Lusus Regius: Autograph Works by King James VI.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S

NEW LIBRARY EDITION.

THE LIFE OF NAPOLEON BON

By Professor WILLIAM MILLIGAN SLOANE, I Illustrated with all the Pictures in the Original Editi in their Original Colours the great Napoleonic Pain and with hundreds of full-page Engravings in T White. In 4 vols. Large 4to., 63s. net.

LETTERS OF JOHN RICHARD

Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN. With 3 portrai

THE LIFE OF THE RIGHT H

SIR WILLIAM MOLESW

BART., M.P., F.R.S.

By Mrs. M. G. FAWCETT. With Photogravure crown 8vo., 8s. 6d. net.

THE ISLE OF THE SHA

Written and Illustrated by CLIFTON JOHNSON.
8s. 6d. net.

THE GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.—NEW

THE HOUSE OF ATREUS

BEING THE AGAMEMNON, LIBATION-BEARE
OF ÆSCHYLUS. Translated into English Verse b
HEAD, M.A. Pott 8vo., 2s. 6d. net.
OBSERVER.—"A welcome addition to the ever-fresh 'Golden

NEW BOOKS FOR THE

Mrs. Molesworth's New Book.

Crown 8vo., cloth elegant, 6s. 6d.

The Wood-Pigeons and

MARY. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH, Author of "Carrots," &c. With Illustrations by H. R. Millar.

WORLD.—"Mrs. Molesworth has, perhaps, never written a more charming book."

Demy 4to., Picture Boards, 6s.

Old King Cole's Book of NURSERY RHYMES. With Illustrations in Colour by BYAM SHAW.

"Extremely pretty. . . . Each rhyme is accompanied by a full-page Illustration, beautifully drawn and coloured, and full of quaint details."—Westminster Gazette.

4to., Picture

The Old Ir

BRIAN O'LIN
by S. ROSAMON
"Amusingly w Illustrated."—Punc
Crown 8vo.,

The Boys'

WALTER CORI Illustrations by GLOBE.—"Mr. I
many juvenile rea
. . . Altogether
Crown 8vo.,

God Save

By the Rev. H
by Gutzon Borg
"An interesting adventure....Schol
Illustrated."—Scotsv

THE WORKS OF RICHARD LEWIS NETT

Fellow and Tutor of Balliol College, Oxford. Wit
EDITION. In 2 vols. Extra crown 8vo., 8s. 6d. n
Vol. I.—PHILOSOPHICAL REMAINS. Edited, w
Sketch, by Prof. A. C. BRADLEY.

Vol. II.—LECTURES ON THE REPUBLIC OF PL
G. L. RENSON.

THE HISTORY OF HUMAN MA

By EDWARD WESTERMARCK, Ph.D., Lectur
the University of Finland Helsingfors. With P Wallace. Third Edition. 8vo., 14s. net.

THE EVERSLEY SER

Globe 8vo., 5s. per volume.

Contains 154 volumes, among which ar

in Oxford-street at this time of day. What, by the way, would Hugo have said to the songs and choruses of this version Hugo who detested music? For my part I rather liked the scoring of M. Napoleon Lambelet, who very conscientiously avoided any reminiscences of Mr. Goring Thomas' Esmeralda. And I rather liked the Quasimodo of Mr. Charles Cartwright, a very strenuous performance, duly "noble" and not unduly repulsive, and Miss Cartwright's winsome Esmeralda (a little too missish, however, a little too like a well-bred daughter of Podsnappery who has elected to "go as a gipsy" to a fancy ball), and Mr. O'Neill's Frollo, of which it may be said that the scowl makes the monk.

A. B. WALKLEY.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN.

THE LIFE OF LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN. By BARRY O'BRIEN. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d.)

Like almost all biographies of great lawyers, Mr. Barry O'Brien's "Life of Lord Russell of Killowen" is full of good reading. Russell's vigorous personality makes him a tempting subject for a biographer, especially for one who is able to write of him as a fairly intimate friend. Mr. O'Brien was his friend, but his feelings of friendship and admiration have not prevented him from painting a just as well as a kindly portrait. As we read these pages, we perceive that it was not a very difficult portrait, after all. The single adjective "strenuous" seems to sum up the greater part of Lord Russell's nature. He worked hard and played hard; whatever he did, he did it with his might. One thing at a time, and that done to the very best of his ability, with infinite pains and energy, was the rule of his life. An apparently simple rule, which will ensure success to any barrister if only he has such brains, health, and opportunities as Russell was blessed with. Russell's professional career was a success from the very first. At the outset he dabbled in journalism, but he was able to abandon it almost before he could really and truly call himself a journalist. While other men of his age, who cannot be said to have been his inferiors, since they include Lord Herschell, were in a desponding mood, and talked of emigrating, Russell made £120 in his first year, and doubled his income every year for four years. We need not analyse the fee-books of succeeding years to show the steady advance of the quondam Belfast solicitor to the summit of his profession. A few causes célèbres helped him, such as the Windham lunacy case and "Saurin v. Starr," but, most of all, with his clear head and great power of mastering details, he helped himself. "The things he liked best," says Mr. O'Brien, "were accuracy, lucidity, brevity, and keeping to the point. . . . He was only intolerant of stupidity, folly, verbosity, and affectation. Upon one occasion he asked a pretentious coxcomb, 'Have you ever read "The Newcomes"?' 'Yes,' drawled the coxcomb. 'Well,' said Russell, 'you are very much like Barnes Newcome.'"

Russell was an Irishman, and, in spite of his originally English name, with good reason asserted himself to be a Celt. Mr. O'Brien gives us the family pedigree in as extended a form as any one can desire, and proves that the Russells, by many successive marriages, had become purely Irish. But Russell himself was by no means a typical Irishman. He had something one, and he would have found it difficult to get als had no twists and turns in his composition. Ir not readily comprehend, he found other methods of readier to his hand. Badinage had to be pretty bla grasped what was intended." Nor was he a well-read he knew his Shakespeare. His knowledge of th Ireland, until the preparation of his speech before Commission, was as scanty as that of Mr. Parnell hi for all that, real and serious as are these defects, he advocate, and a man whose presence was felt, wheth or in private life. As a barrister is nothing without triumphs, Mr. O'Brien rightly lays stress on them, miss one of the most sensational of all Russell's probably, is too recent to be described without inju living. A good many pages are devoted to Russell's the Parnell Commission, and Mr. O'Brien prints at his book the report of the Judges, so that the reader Russell's success in the most dramatic incident against the more prosaic facts which he failed to disp is fairness itself, nor do we for a moment dissent from Hannen's opinion that Russell's was "a great speech a great occasion." All who heard that speech will the President of the Court. In making it, one of the of Irishmen spoke in what he deemed the inter country.

At the same time, Russell was not more suc other lawyers as a member of the House, and as law o Crown. Now and then, perhaps only once or twice in a law officer may show himself as great in statesmansh profession. These are rare instances; they are foun on the woolsack, and not in the House of Commons; a never reached the woolsack. The truth is that the absorbing and as exacting as the Bar. Only the genius can command preeminence in both. Russell' advocacy; he was never so great, either in the Hous Bench, as in fighting a difficult case against men himself. But after his elevation to the Bench he tained his reputation, and rendered, as in the Venezu tion, great services to his country. We can hardly justice within the narrow compass of a review. M has written of him generously and impartially, and, has omitted nothing of material importance.

It should be added that the volume contains one admirable photogravure reproduction of Mr. Sargen of the Lord Chief Justice in his judicial robes.

BOTTICELLI.

BOTTICELLI. By ERNST STEINMANN; translated by DODGSON. (Grevel. 4s. n.)

This monograph on Sandro Botticelli is the late to the excellent series of artists' lives, edited i by Herr Knackfuss, and translated into English Campbell Dodgson. Dr. Steinmann is well known a and brilliant writer on Renaissance art, and his Botticelli is the best life of the Florentine painter yet appeared. We may not always be able to accept sions or agree with his theories on many points the history of the artist and the chronology of his pai he has at least succeeded in giving us a clear and viv of this interesting master's life and works, and has skilfull fine work had hitherto been commonly known as the "Temptation of Christ in the Wilderness." The incidents in the Temptation do indeed appear, on a small scale, in the background, but the chief subject of the fresco, as Dr. Steinmann shows, is the "Sacrifice offered by the cleansed Leper," according to the law of Moses, while in the grand Renaissance temple which occupies so prominent a position in the picture he recognizes the façade of the Hospital of San Spirito, which had been recently erected by Pope Sixtus himself. The monograph is adorned with a profusion of excellent illustrations; among them a full-page reproduction of the lovely early "Madonna," long in the possession of the Chigi family, and now in America. But we notice with regret that Dr. Steinmann includes several feeble and inferior works by scholars or imitators in his list of Botticelli's genuine productions. It is difficult to understand how so learned a critic can accept the very poor "Entombment" from the Poldi Pezzoli collection, or the Louvre "Madonna," while the well-known "Assumption" in the National Gallery, supposed to have been painted for Mattei Palmieri, has long been recognized as the work of a minor artist. On the other hand, we are glad to see that Dr. Steinmann's volume contains several reproductions of the Dante drawings, formerly in the library of Hamilton Palace, and now in the Gallery at Berlin. Our author considers that these illustrations of the Divina Commedia could not have been completed until the last years of Sandro's life. "It must," he writes, "have been his preoccupation with Dante that caused the master, as he grew old, to forget the outer world, and though we know nothing about a commentary on Dante by Sandro, Vasari's assertion at any rate bears witness to the diligent study which he gave to the greatest poetical genius of Italy. It seems more than probable that the artist fell into poverty and actual want while he gave himself up to the serious intellectual work which bore such splendid fruit in the illustrations to the Divine Comedy: and he made repeatedly unsuccessful attempts to have his designs, which won the highest admiration from his countrymen, engraved." None the less, Vasari's account of the misery in which the great painter ended his days was certainly exaggerated; and we know from documents published by Milanesi that at this period of his life Sandro owned both a home in Florence and a country house in the neighbourhood. The same writer's statement that Botticelli produced nothing after he became a follower of Savonarola is equally refuted by the "Adoration" of the National Gallery, a work which Dr. Steinmann justly pronounces to be as masterly in technique as it is true in expression and original in invention.

ABOUT THE WORLD.

Mexico as I Saw it (Hurst and Blackett, 21s. n.) is much the kind of book that one would expect from the author of "Through Finland in Carts," that is to say, it is superficial, but vivacious, full of information though devoid of learning. It is not to Mrs. Tweedie that we should go for suggestive criticism of Prescott's views of the Aztec civilization; but she tells us all that we want to know about cock-fights and bull-fights and the position of Mexican women and the manners and tone of Mexican society and the life of the cowboy in his lonely ranch. A certain amount of history, too, is woven into the narrative and is the more acceptable because good histories of events in Mexico subsequent to the Spanish conquest are few and difficult to [illegible]. The account of the rebellion against Maximilian is emergency, and Napoleon himself, if born a Me done no more. Mrs. Tweedie is not to be c but she "did" Mexico very thoroughly for a by rail from the United States, and proceeding the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. She saw the ru lately submerged, at one end of her journey Mitla at the other. The one important neglected to do was to climb Popocatapetl. W she describes agreeably and without any o wounding Mexican susceptibilities by her prediction that, owing to the incursion of fore the material resources, Mexico will presently b Uitlander question with the United State interesting political vista. Especial praise Tweedie's illustrations. The frontispiece is a colour drawing, and there are about a hundred admirably taken, developed, and printed. I Mexican tourist will require the book, and other will find pleasure in reading it.

The Sherbro and its Hinterland. B (Macmillan, 15s. n.). The Sherbro is proba name even to many people who imagine tha acquaintance with geography. It is, in fact West Coast of Africa, which forms a part of th Sierra Leone, and trades extensively with Alldridge has been District Commissioner of many years, and his book gives a full, t rambling, account of the life, the scenery, sport, and the products, together with a excursions into the interior, undertaken fo concluding treaties with chiefs, and a histo Rising of 1898. It should be placed on the sh standard works of reference. The student aboriginal manners and customs will be able t it. Much new information is given in the c Ordeals; though those who turn to the four c Societies will be disappointed. The ceremon societies is given in some detail, but there is the inner mysteries. Mr. Alldridge is "sati no one outside the societies who really knows are"; and he himself, he says, always tells me he comes in contact that he "has no wish t divulge anything that they have sworn to ke own suspicion is that secrets so well kept are secrets that really amount to anything; but not the view generally taken on the West Coa on which Mr. Alldridge's remarks seem to us is malaria. "My own belief is," he writes and mangroves go together. When you are o of the mangroves you are beyond the region o malaria, though certainly very prevalent in m is also found in some of the African highl miles away from the mangroves, and is nowhere Italy where no mangroves grow. The mosqui Mr. Alldridge, singularly enough, does not me a much more scientific application and evidence. In conclusion it should be noted—a lain, to whom the book is dedicated, will note satisfaction—that Mr. Alldridge does not attri Rising to the hut-tax, but to the prohibition of t of slaves through the country. The book con of Sherbro and the Hinterland on the scale of and most of the departments of Chinese life are dealt with. Mr. Parker exhibits hostility to missionaries though he protests friendship for them; and he translates with evident gusto Dr. Hance's advice to Chinamen who complained of missionary activity:—

> Do what we do. Let the missionaries preach away any religion they like. No bones are broken, and no one is forced to believe.

The book contains some misquotations from the Latin—pare bellum, and etiam dona ferentes.

Many of the books nowadays published about North America, and especially those about the United States, tend to be wearisome to English readers. But Mr. Paul Fountain in THE DESERTS AND FORESTS OF NORTH AMERICA (Longmans, 9s. 6d. n.) has the seeing eye and the simple mind which give a rare value to his work. For it is as simple as the prairie itself, and has something of the very attraction of the great plains. Mr. Fountain has read little, and most of his natural history observations have already been discounted by other and more learned observers. But that matters nothing if the book has charm, and it has the charm of a discovery. Mr. Fountain writes as if he were a Columbus of the plains, as if he had discovered the new world between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains for himself, and his naive ignoring of the world of travellers since Lewis and Clark makes one forget that railroads now bind East and West together, and that even all Texas is fenced in at last. In truth there are no real deserts in North America; even the Mojave with its white glare and its monstrous cactus growths will some day blossom like the rose when irrigation waters it. Nor has Mr. Fountain ever visited the real forests of the continent. They are even yet to be found north and west of his main "stamping ground." But though the title be rather a misnomer and the date thirty years ago, these wanderings are still fresh and sweet, and if, as Mr. W. H. Hudson suggests in a preface, which is more properly a just appreciation, the author writes again and lets his book take a more human and autobiographical turn, his new volume will be as welcome as this.

As a literary equivalent of the kodak and its snapshots in the South Seas Mr. Edward Pallander's LOG OF AN ISLAND WANDERER (C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd., 6s.) is far from being badly done. It is written with a will, and has the merit of movement, and does not lack at times a certain picturesqueness of phrase, even if that picturesqueness verges at times on the most cheerful slang. And when the wanderer lands in beautiful and wicked Papeete he becomes very bright indeed. For the condition of Tahiti would wring striking phrases out of the dullest journalist. According to Mr. Pallander's calculations, and they, as likely as not, are more modest than his style, Tahiti is kept in order by five hundred officials. There is one road in the island, but every rut in it has a clerk to itself. Crime is rare (Mr. Pallander puts it at a burglary once a month and a murder every decade) yet seven Judges sit and smoke cigarettes perpetually. In the author's language, "there is barely enough capital in the entire island to float a liver pill, yet it takes a quarter of a mile of benches" to look after the budget.

> And the elaborateness, the complexity of it! The dovetailed, angle-ironed, water-logged, steel-faced, time-locked completeness of the whole thing. A German verb is nothing to it. It is the apotheosis of protocollardom.

If it belonged to England it would be run by "three men awhile at the Navigator Islands, whose strikingly women evidently pleased them as much as they did Ro Stevenson and every other traveller; and then we Fiji group. If the narrative which is the result o casting of nets does not go very deep into the thousand of politics and ethnology which belong to this sea of isl any rate compares very favourably with a hundred o of the same class. It is illustrated with some excell graphs of the beauty and fashion of the South Seas.

A RIBBON OF IRON, by Annette M. B. Meakin t 6s.), is a relation of a journey by rail and steaml Siberia. It hardly adds to the sum of readily available on the subject, but it is pleasantly written; and the account of the terrible massacre at Blagovestchen Chinese, Miss Meakin says, had formed a plan to rus
"and each man had been provided with a rope to Russian in his bed." A premature attack gave the then the Cossacks, by order of General Gribsky, h Chinese unceremoniously into the river. Miss Mea passed through Blagovestchensk about three weeks tragic occurrence. This criticism passed by a Sibe English novel is interesting:—

> "I can't remember the name, but it is about a y > who was very religious. He fell in love with a beau > girl, and his love for her conflicted with his religion
> "Was the girl called 'Glory'?" I asked.
> "Yes," he replied. "It is a fine tale an > written, but the abbot was not quite right in the he

The title of Mrs. Perrin's book EAST OF SUEZ Treherne, 6s.), and the quotation on the cover from known poem of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's, aptly indicate source of the inspiration in this volume of short stories were not sufficient the titles of the stories themselves enough, but there resemblance to Mr. Kipling ceases. his vigour and his dramatic instinct. She fails in he tion of the way men think and talk; but she p knowledge of Hindostan, and her "local colour" is th ing feature.

WITH THE THIBETANS IN TENT AND TEMPLE, by Sus Rijnhart, M.D. (Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier
frankly announced as a "missionary book." The aut American widow of a Dutch propagandist who disappe was presumably murdered, in Tibet. She travelled and abode with him in Buddhist Lamaseries. Her bo particularly well written, but it is an interesting stor experiences in a region very difficult to explore.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Dr. Garnett's Essays.

Dr. Richard Garnett's new volume, ESSAYS O
LIBRARIAN (Heinemann), is substantially a reprint of p have already appeared in magazines or as introducti essays provide ample evidence of the width and judgm author's critical taste. His sympathy with Shelley or does not prevent him from appreciating Byron and M
the latter poet is at present in much want of Dr.
judicious advocacy. In the essay on "The Date an of The Tempest," he supports a theory which we can

ers, the Island princess who has never left her home, the wise father who brings about the auspicious consummation by his policy—all found their counterparts among the splendid company that watched the performance on that February night.

The argument that the masques, especially the nuptial masque in the third act, are only excrescences if they were not designed to amuse the Royal pair is hardly convincing. Shakespeare was not averse to excrescences; and if we were bound to find a raison d'être for the nuptial masque, it is discoverable in its appropriateness to the betrothal of Ferdinand and Miranda. Why "drag in "Frederick and Elizabeth? But there is a serious objection to Dr. Garnett's theory in the suggested counterpart to the "wise father" (Prospero)—viz., James I. Even if we can bring ourselves to whitewash James I. sufficiently to make him a respectable Prospero—and Dr. Garnett makes an ingenious attempt to do so—would the tactful Shakespeare have put his Sovereign in the disagreeable political position in which we find Prospero at the opening of the play? Imagine a Stuart King seeing himself masquerading as a dethroned and exiled prince! Such a situation would have been humiliating, to say the least of it, to a monarch who had, we believe, some scruples about the divine right of kings.

Calvin.

THE REFORMER OF GENEVA, by Professor Charles Wesstruff Shields, of Princeton University (Putnams), is an historical drama in a blank verse and five acts, more suitable for the study than for the stage, but not particularly suitable for either. "As a mere dramatic figure," the author maintains, "Calvin is as impressive as Becket." We should say that he was even more impressive. But the Professor has not written a play about him that will bear comparison with Tennyson's "Becket"; and his history, to which he professes to attach importance, is far from unimpeachable. Take this passage, for example. Calvin is replying to Farel, who has asked him what is the news. He answers.

> A delicious bit.
> I hear last night at billiards with the Seigneurs
> Our Bonnivard has taken his fourth wife.
> The town is laughing at the dear old priest.
> But we forgive the prisoner of Chillon
> As many years as he had years of durance.

Now Bonnivard was not a priest and never had been one; he did not marry his fourth wife to please himself, but because the Consistory, with Calvin at the head of it, insisted that, as he had compromised her, he must do so, and his years of durance were not four but six. In a note the Professor tells us that, after his release, Bonnivard became "the benefactor of the city." It would be more correct to say that the city became his benefactor, seeing that it pensioned him and paid his debts. He did, it is true, bequeath his library to the city; but the truth is that he had pawned his books and undertook that they should become public property at his death if the city would redeem them and let him have the use of them during his lifetime. The notes dealing with Calvin's motives in getting Servetus burnt omit much that is essential to a true comprehension of the situation; and the note on Clément Marot and his Psalms is inaccurate.

The not very lengthy list of Royal authors has received an

FICTION.

Lady Mabel Howard's New Novel.

Nothing needs criticism in THE FAI (Longmans, 6s.) save the title. It suggests book, and as a suggestion of the main theme it i story itself is an extremely good one. Lady already written one novel, "The Undoing of Her present book is too slight to be called the beginning is a little overburdened with But the circumstances in which Rhoda Wel temptation to enjoy an immense fortune reall friend are very carefully and consistently e denoûment is not the least commonplace yet Lady Mabel Howard has a real insight into for the expression of strong emotions; he description or dialogue is unpretentious and immense "fictional output" of the last month best novels we have had to read.

Peasant Romance.

KITTY FAIRHALL (Hodder and Stoughton, has its faults, but it certainly stands apar novels which line our shelves. It tells on annals of the poor," of the hopes and loves o but the atmosphere is wonderfully felt—the village life set in an English landscape; t ready kindness, no less than the pettiness and the villagers—all this is realized with an intim the pathetic charm of Kitty's love story i thankful to say, not broken by the slightest hi in the rustic sense. It is certainly none the le because it has no touch of coarseness. O are that the insistence on "atmosphere" found by some readers a little prolix, and tha Rectory, meant, no doubt, as a relief, have interest enough to serve the purpose; the Re to be an interesting character not sufficiently wise, as a quiet and sympathetic study of hu cannot praise the book too highly.

Scotch Realism.

THE HOUSE WITH THE GREEN SHUTTERS 6s.), by George Douglas, suggests in its title of the conventional type. But the love in lacking, and we have, instead of passion and m study of the struggles of a strong-minded, fighting with adversity. The scene is a Scott thanks to its proximity to the coalfields, to Isorough. Mr. Douglas does not emulate the tive manner of Mr. Barrie and his disciples older method of Galt, and describes life as it i interprets itself to the fanciful mind of the s have rarely read a story which has so happily humour of the Scots tradesman, his petty jeal provincialism, and his shrewd commonsense are the sketches of student life in Edinburgh tions and its little triumphs. Mr. Douglas is t on an admirable piece of work.

"A Modern Antæus."

The writer of "An Englishwoman's Love

analysis and affectation. Tristram was, among other things, fond of finding sitting hens and taking their eggs. To say this, simply, is not sufficient for an author to whom even love-making is mainly a literary exercise.

> Before long the child became familiar with the queer habits of broody hens, and found zest in tracking these cenotaphs of maternity to their shadowy nesting places. Every day gave chance of discovering lyings-in illicitly conducted; and to pry out some nest richly lined with accumulated deposits was a delight to the boy's marauding instinct.

We fail to find in this sort any advantage, merit, or virtue. But if not the reader, at least the critic, must be patient under the mass of prolixities—the over-weighting literary self-consciousness—which runs through the book, for there is much to be said in its favour. Tristram is not so interesting as the author would have us think, but he is lovable, and his mother and his sister and his friend Lady Petwyn, a lady of much individuality, are well realized. So is Lizzie Haycraft, the poacher's daughter, of whose betrayal at the hands of his friend Tristram bears the dishonour. This is the central incident in Tristram's life, and there is much in the telling of it which shows a fine imagination and a real dramatic and descriptive power. Rigorously pruned and simply and sincerely told, the story would take a high place; there is plenty of sound work in it, but it suffers sadly from the writer's determination to be as clever as Mr. Meredith.

Mr. Bernard Capes.

Mr. Bernard Capes' LOVE LIKE A GIPSY (Constable, 6s.) is, we think, his best novel. We have often criticized his style, but he is discarding many of his most pronounced mannerisms. We have here a powerful plot, a graceful heroine, some of the studies of abnormal humanity in which the author delights, and in Antony St. John a singularly attractive hero. One is a little frightened at starting off with the American War of Independence. But the real centre of interest is a Hampshire mansion at the close of the eighteenth century. The domestic scenes which reproduce the life of the period are wonderfully vivid, and we are introduced to many a "muddy rascal," handled very divertingly. The liberty, however, which the author has taken with the young Earl of Borradaile is unpardonable, and not justified by the requirements of the plot.

Mr. R. S. Hichens.

Readers versed in Mr. Hichens' method will naturally anticipate novelty on opening a fresh volume from his pen, and if novelty be all that is wanted THE PROPHET OF BERKELEY SQUARE (Methuen, 6s.) supplies it in full measure. It will very likely please many people, and it should be read as the latest work of a writer who has achieved well-deserved fame. For ourselves, we confess the book is a disappointment. It is called a tragic extravaganza. Of tragedy there is none, nor of comedy either, though there is extravagance galore. Mr. Hichens once wrote a novel, "The Londoners," which was pure farce, and farce of the best. Nature therein was so skilfully distorted that the extravagance of the characters excited no surprise. In his latest book Mr. Hichens may have designed to "go one better." It is hard to determine the quality of laughter-moving humour; there were people who saw no fun in the "Londoners," and there may likewise be others who will laugh at "The Prophet," but Mr. Hichens' admirers will read this volume with sincere regret. The raison d'être of burlesque or extravaganza is a good laugh. If we are to laugh at the impossible antics of the dramatis personæ we must be able to contrast these antics with the demeanour of their originals in real life. It is because we and they might just as well have turned to the left. no more amusement in reading of the Prophet's perpl the threats and incursions of Mr. Sagittarius and and of Sir Tiglath's fury, than in the announcemen Robinson has gone to Cannes for the winter. Exce not necessarily strength, and, were it not for the mem Hichens' former work, we should be reminded of th treatment affected by advanced members of the Imp school of painting—treatment which, according to so is designed to conceal inefficiency as much as to meaning. Through wearisome chapters of over-strained Mr. Hichens' figures gyrate ineffectually until th begins to wonder why gunpowder does not run out of of their boots. This book will be a disappointment to readers who appreciate Mr. Hichens' brilliant ta have been waiting for another volume as farcically witt Londoners," or as fascinating and delightful as "Fl "Byeways."

In Westmorland.

T'BACCA QUEEN, by Theodora Wilson Wilson (Arn the not very felicitous title for a story of considerable The authoress has not mastered the craft of story-tel tale is loosely put together and too spun out with dia does not help it. But she gives a wonderfully true realized picture of Westmorland life—the rough fa towns, and the local gentry, to both of which classes th Nell Carradus, belongs, to the former by her station in latter by her birth. She is a fine and picturesque fig of the people, with a strong and independent character rest of the Carraduses, both in high and low life, a conceived and combine to furnish a varied picture of we provincial life.

Some Short Stories.

Mr. Howells' book belongs to an agreeably bou (Harpers, 5s. n.) to be called a "Portrait Collection Stories," and is, therefore, graced by an excellent photograph of the author. A PAIR OF PATIENT LO once the title of the book and the name of the first tales here brought together. The external metho Howells is used with excellent effect in these pictures he knows it. It is not a faultless method, but it has

We are glad to welcome one whom we suppose is a into the difficult paths of the short story teller. "Brown of WIDOW WILEY AND SOME OTHER OLD FOLK (Seeley something of the spirit that has informed several lad past—a quiet observation, an unobtrusive sympath delicate humour. Of such was the author of "Cranf Mrs. Horatia Ewing. "Brown Linnet" is, as a quietist among story tellers. These sketches of th adventures of old village people read like artistical transcripts from life, though here and there the sent little overdone, as in "Sarah Ann's Little Girl." Bu this we have the highly-amusing "Social Agonies," an tale, humorous, but sometimes founded upon the silent which underlies the humdrum village life. The author of Wiley" adds twenty photographs, arranged with an to that of the literary sketches themselves.

In Two MOODS OF A MAN (Nimmo, 6s.) the well-kn who writes as "Violet Fane" hints that her stories a are—"mere wind-strewn foam, which though disp spray is churned from depths of the eternal sea." T be no doubt that light and bright as are, say, "A Ro

Unfortunately it has been arranged that some shall weep, and the woman who, at last, understands two moods of a man is an exception. "Violet Fane's" latest book follows "The Edwin and Angelina Papers" very effectively and will be enjoyed by the sensitive and acute.

In the volume entitled TESSA (Fisher Unwin, 2s. 6d.), that story and another called "The Trader's Wife" are given. These both show Mr. Louis Becke in a familiar and welcome manner as the narrator of Pacific romance and, in the second story, as the chronicler of events, to some extent in civilized and less simple surroundings. The author of "Wild Life in Southern Seas" and "By Reef and Palm" always holds our interest. His knowledge of the countries he sketches is only equalled by his insight into the characters and intentions of the men and women he draws. "Tessa" is picturesque and romantic in the best sense of the phrase.

Here are three volumes, bound alike in green with white lettering, priced at three and sixpence apiece, and published by Mr. H. J. Drane. Each of the three contains a collection of short stories. AN OLD WOMAN'S TRAGEDY gives its name to the first of these, by E. S. Thompson. We have no information as to the sex of the writer, but the style has a feminine touch, and some of the stories are pretty. Perhaps "Nero" is the best. PUFFS OF WIND is a collection of a rather different type. Miss Helen Dickens has an inclination towards tragedy, and coquets with spiritualism. Pretty is certainly not the adjective to apply to her stories, which are sometimes rather forcible and not always pleasant. THE SEPARATION OF THE BERESFORDS, by Catherine Adams, completes the trio. This lady's tales, reprinted from several magazines, are undistinguished but rather amusing. She has a gaiety of manner which takes the place of humour. But it cannot be said that any one of these three volumes called aloud for covers and a title. The short story, of mediocre ability, is hardly wanted just now in book form. Still, the books are not expensive; they are pleasantly got up, and readable enough. There is little to choose between them, but we found Miss (or Mrs.) Adams slightly easier reading than the other two.

TOM FLAHERTY'S GHOST (Simpkin, Marshall) is the title of a collection of barrack yarns by Major John Shore. A book of this kind cannot but suffer from unconscious comparison with Mr. Kipling's work in the same field. Major Shore makes no pretensions to literary graces, but he has the enviable knack of telling a good story crisply and well. "Tapson's Thorough-bred," a tale of a practical joke, and "An Unrehearsed Tragedy," the description of amateur theatricals on a troopship with a somewhat melodramatic curtain, are particularly neat and effective.

We have before us the prospectus of a "Literary Club," conducted by Mr. Francis Bourne, at 9, Trafalgar-buildings, W.C. The club is really a literary agency; and, as we have lately been balancing the good and evil of literary agencies, it seems worth while to examine the conditions which this particular agency proposes to its clients. They are as follows:—

1. Every client must pay a subscription of 5s. per annum.

2. With every manuscript sent to the agency twelve penny stamps must be enclosed.

3. All MSS. to be sent to the agency to be typed. Every client wishing to type his own MSS. must pay 5s. per annum to the agency.

4. The commission of the agency is 25 per cent.

5. Every client must further agree to pay the agency its commission, for the next ten years, on all articles or stories which appear in any magazine or paper to which the agency has first introduced his work.

For the guidance of young authors we propose to make a few comments.

1. Agents of proved competence only charge 10 per cent. for doing the work for which this agency charges 25 per cent.

2. No other existing agency charges authors for the privilege of employing their own typewriters or using their own machines.

3. To illustrate [illegible]

Correspondenc

MR. HENDERSON AND THE CASK

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am a little surprised by Mr. He Literature, November 2. He says, "Mr. La suggestions of mine," and that I have "mad use of" his "communication." Might not yo that I named Mr. Henderson? I did not. I known student of the problem of the Casket L Henderson think that he must be recognized known student of the Letters? That never informed him privately, having heard from alter the phrase in my second edition, and ha be recognized. The correction is "a frien problem of the Casket Letters." I have But, alas! not having seen Mr. Henderson' to-day (November 15), my account of the "fri remains unaltered, and it appears to be incor him, as—to the best of my memory—I did priv term "well-known student." I thought it mig of many persons, at home and abroad. Appa son thinks otherwise. My wish was to state o hypothesis. I had already stated those of m I, for one, think "a well-known student."
that Mr. Henderson acquits me of worse tha

As to points in dispute, Moray may have to false tale about a letter of Mary's in August, have written down what Moray said, and repe
September, 1568. It may be so. But, bef
June 11—Lennox was working in the society in his possession at the time the Scots transl Is Wood likely to have let Lennox quote letter which did not exist? So I argue in Mr. Henderson does not allude to this difficu in August, 1567, Moray was in touch with could not "trust heretics") the difficulty ab
I had not remarked, I admit, that Moray vi in 1567, or that she "can never trust here
She was right.

The danger of the Scots Lords, if they
a letter differing from that which they gav did not, as Mr. Henderson thinks, esc
"Conceivably, even if the letters differ differences, though proof of tampering, di Mary's glory" (p. 199). Therefore, it might show up the differences.

As to Robert Melville's rapid ride to impossible," says Mr. Henderson—how lo brother James take over the ride when he birth of James VI.? Mr. Henderson is other Melville was not, as I said, the bearer of the rider was George Douglas. I was misled omission of a "&") in "Bain," II., 336. A told de Silva, who talked to her about the lett it was not true, although Lethington had a matter." Mr. Henderson says that Elizabeth ton had "'acted badly' in joining the oppone
I leave this interpretation to your readers.

Lethington had much more than "hardly with the letters in the Casket. He had June draft will be printed, I doubt not, by Father Pollen. As to my differences from Mr. Henderson (on all these points) my mind is quite open. I only advance provisional hypotheses, professedly "without much confidence," and I am ready to abandon them if disproved. Yours faithfully,

A. LANG.

Littlegreen, Petersfield, Nov. 15.

LIONS IN THE PATH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir, Your Reviewer of my "Anticipations" raises a point so interesting that I am tempted out of a worthy custom of silence to answer his chief objection to my conclusions.

He declares that I am "a scientific student in the narrower sense"—shall I never cease to be "damned" in this way because I took my degree in science?—and that "the political student" will "perceive lions in the path" to the attainment of my New Republic that I have altogether ignored—and he raises up again into a semblance of life two lions that I respectfully submit I have already in my book carefully and effectually shown to be lions of straw.

The first lion he would have to be still alive he calls Convulsion or Cataclysm. The backbone of that resuscitation is his question: "Will soldiers taken from the proletariat, and presently to return to the proletariat, obey orders when commanded to fire on them?" Your readers could hardly imagine from his question that in my chapter on War I have done everything in my power to demonstrate, and I believe I have demonstrated, that the epoch of proletariat armies is drawing to its end, and that in my discussion of the future of Russia, and throughout my chapter on Democracy, I have laid the utmost stress on the passing of power out of the hands of the multitude. And these are not matters of forecast altogether. If the political student will make a comparative revision of the social insurrections of the period 1750-1900 he will find that the maximum insurrectionary power of the proletariat was attained long before 1850, and, indeed, that since 1850 (with the quite exceptional case of the Commune) popular insurrection has been a dying force.

Similar considerations destroy your reviewer's dramatic little fancy in which "China and Islam, an Islam of negroes, simultaneously see their chance, and pour their well-drilled hordes, armed with the latest weapons, into Europe." "Well-drilled hordes" is neither clever nor convincing—it is a contradiction in terms, and the suggestion altogether ignores my most carefully and elaborately constructed proof that unintelligent armies must give way, must inevitably be beaten and abolished by the organized and educated community of the coming time fighting as one organic whole. This second "lion in the path," this Black and Tan version of Pearson's "Yellow Peril," just like that first lion, Cataclysm, I will confess I believed in profoundly, in the days when I wrote "When the Sleeper Wakes"—a book presenting a phase of opinion that I should imagine would fall in with your Reviewer's views very completely. Since then I have gone up to these lions in the path—and like most of the lions in the path of the New Republic they are straw and indigestion! And I submit it is more than a little unfair to the work I have done in this book, that because I have thrust these misconceptions that now loom so largely in the popular mind into their proper place again out of the way, your reviewer—failing to encounter their terrible eyes on his first plunge into what is, you know, quite unavoidably a crowded book, should—evidently without any search for their remains—accuse me of "ignoring

Books to look out for at once.

"The Life of William Ewart Gladstone." By Herbert W. M. Elder. 7s. 6d.
[Enlarged from the biography in the "Dictionary of Biography." Frontispiece portrait.]

"The Foundations of Belief." By A. J. Balfour. Longmans.
[Eighth edition, with a summary and a new introduction. work.]

"Wales." By O. M. Edwards. ("Story of the Nations" series.) and Illustrations. Fisher Unwin. 5s.

"Winifred Vida." By William Canton. Dent.

"Prosperous British India." By William Digby, C.I.E. P. 12s. 6d.
[The author claims that the people of India are not people in the world, but are continually growing poorer.]

"Killarney's Lakes and Falls." Edited by Edmund Downey. mezzotint engravings by F. S. Walker, and legends, descriptions by famous authors. Downey and Co. 5 guineas net, and 2 guineas net.

"Afoot through the Kashmir Valleys." By Marion Doughty. Sands. 7s. 6d.

"The Kiss and its History." By Dr. Christopher Nyrop, Romance Philology at Copenhagen University. Sands.
[See Note p. 183.]

"Gabriele Rossetti." A versified Autobiography. Translated mented by William Michael Rossetti. Containing several and much hitherto unpublished information about the Dante Gabriel Rossetti and Christina Rossetti. Sands.

"Poverty: a Study of Town Life." By B. S. Rowntree. 10s. 6d. net.

"Oxford Studies." By John Richard Green. Macmillan.
[The majority of these papers first appeared in the Ch many years ago, and are now republished under the super Green.]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRI

With notes where required to guide the reader contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subseq

ART.

BRITISH SCULPTURE AND SCULPTORS OF TO-DA Spielmann. 12½×9½, 172 pp. Cassell. 7s. n.
[Critical and descriptive accounts of the work of " living sculptor of repute in Great Britain," with pict work. Paper bound. Also to be had in cloth for 7s. 6d.

THE PAVEMENT MASTERS OF SIENA, 1369-1562. By R. (Handbook of the Great Craftsmen.) 7½×5¼, 155 pp. Be [A detailed description, with admirable illustrations ment of Siena Cathedral, with accounts of the pavement materials, and workmanship.]

LES DÉBUTS DE L'ART. By Prof. E. Grosse. Tra German by E. Dirr. Intro. by Prof. Léon Marillier. 239 pp. Alcan. Fr.6.
[A remarkable and suggestive work of art criticism have rejoiced Taine.]

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

THE CHILDREN'S LONDON. By Charlotte Thorpe Luker, Jnr. 10½×7½, 229 pp. Leadenhall Press. 1s. 6d.
[A handsome book describing the chief sights Copiously and happily illustrated.]

CRUSOES OF THE FROZEN NORTH. By Gordon Stan 112 pp. BEARS AND DACOITS. By G. A. Henty. 7 (1s. each). TOMMY'S TREK. By Bessie Marchant. (9d.) Blackie.
[New volumes of adventure and travel in Messrs. B of graduated story-books for children: the ninepen children of seven and upwards, the shilling books for elev year-olds. Illustrated.]

COSEY CORNER, or, How They Kept a Farm. By L. T. M 282 pp. Chambers. 3s. 6d.
[A story of country life.]

COURAGE AND CONFLICT. By G. A. Henty, G. M. Bullen, and others. 7½×6, 416 pp. Chambers. 5s.
[Historical and adventurous stories for boys.]

A VERY NAUGHTY GIRL. By L. T. Meade. 7½× Chambers. 5s.
[The adventures of a high-spirited, untrained Asc

MORE ANIMAL STORIES. Ed. by Robert Cochrane. 7½×5½, 282 pp. Chambers. 3s. 6d.

[This follows on "Four Hundred Animal Stories" and is mainly reprinted from Chambers's Journal, but contains other stories from various sources, among them "Rab and his Friends." Illustrated.]

OUR LITTLE ONES' OBJECT BOOK. 13½×9½. Warne. 4s.

[Coloured pictures of countless objects. On indestructible boards.]

THE LITTLE FOLKS' BOOK OF BIRDS. BABY'S ANIMAL PICTURE BOOK. By Aunt Louisa. 13×10½. Warne. 2s. 6d. each.

[Fine pictures of birds and animals, with descriptive letterpress.]

"ST. NICHOLAS" BOOK OF PLAYS AND OPERETTAS. 7¾×5½, 291 pp. Warne. 3s. 6d.

[Reprinted from "St. Nicholas," with directions for shadow-pantomimes, acting ballads, &c.]

PATER'S BOOK OF RHYMES. By Jessie Parry. Illus. by A. Rysum. 10×7½, 65 pp. Sherratt and Hughes. 3s. 6d. n.

[Amusing rhymes with funny line pictures.]

THE DOCTOR'S NIECE. By Eliza F. Pollard. 7½×5½, 287 pp. Blackie. 3s. 6d.

[A pleasant story of Brittany at the end of the eighteenth century and a peasants' rebellion. The heroine becomes companion to a girl at a chateau, until she discovers her mother, who proves to be the true owner of the chateau.]

FAITHFUL FRIENDS. 10½×7½. Blackie. 2s.

[Stories and rhymes about animals, with large well-drawn pictures, some coloured.]

TERRIE'S TRAVELS. By Jessie Chatfeild. 7½×5½, 207 pp. Blackie. 2s.

[A pleasant enough story for small boys and girls. Terrie, a little boy, gets lost at the seaside, is taken care of by a curate in London, and has other adventures. Illustrated.]

THE NIDDING NOD OF ONCE-UPON-A-TIME. By H. Escott-Inman. 7½×5½, 209 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.

[A companion volume to the "Patty Pats," which appeared a week or two ago.]

GIRLS OF THE TRUE BLUE. By L. T. Meade. 8×5¾, 406 pp. Chambers. 6s.

[A domestic story for girls.]

MY PRETTY PICTURE-BOOK. 7½×5½. Blackie. 1s. 6d.

[A dim quartet of stories and rhymes with pictures.]

THE WORLD OF ANIMAL LIFE. Edited by Fred Smith. 8½×6½, 414 pp. Blackie. 5s.

[An attractive book well illustrated; by the author of "The Boyhood of a Naturalist."]

AN ANIMAL A-B-C. Drawn by H. B. Neilson. 11½×9. Blackie. 2s. 6d.

[A children's book with rhymes and comic pictures.]

OUR LITTLE DOTS. THE CHILD'S COMPANION. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d. each.

HEY DIDDLE-DIDDLE, COME DANCE TO MY FIDDLE. BABY'S BIRTHDAY A-B-C. BABY'S BOOK OF BIRDS. (1s. each). ONE AND ONE ARE TWO. NURSERY RHYMES. NURSERY NUMBERS. OUR FAVOURITE ANIMAL BOOK. OUR FAVOURITE TALES. OUR FAVOURITE NURSERY RHYMES. OUR FAVOURITE NURSERY TALES. OUR FAVOURITE NURSERY SONGS. OUR FAVOURITE FIRST NURSERY BOOK. 7½×5½. Warne. (6d. each.)

CHILDREN'S TREASURY OF PICTURES AND STORIES. No. II. (1s.). PUSS IN BOOTS. FOR THE FLAG, a painting book of flags. (1s.). LITTLE RED RIDING HOOD. NURSERY JINGLES. PUSSIES AND PETS. A DONKEY RIDE. ROMPS UP TO LONDON TO SEE THE KING. A DAY AT THE ZOO. CHILDREN OF THE EMPIRE. SAND CASTLES. Nelson.

[Large paper picture books. The colouring shows a great improvement on older books.]

HELENE CORIANIS. By Mme. C. Colomb. 10½×6¾, 301 pp. Hachette. 3s. 6d.

[Domestic story for young people. Illustrated.]

BOOKS OF REFERENCE.

THE ENGLISH CATALOGUE. Comprising the London and the British Catalogues, 1898-1900. 10×6¾, 482 pp. Sampson Low. 30s. n.

[We have often praised this unique and invaluable list of publications which, by its arrangements, approaches a Subject Index.]

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN. By R. Harry Davies. 9½×6½, 300 pp. Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d.

[Reviewed on p. 490.]

THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF LEO TOLSTOY. By G. H. Perris. 8½×5½, 272 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

[This is a book of extracts from Tolstoy's writings, autobio-

HENRY DRUMMOND. By J. Y. Simpson. (F 7½×6½, 160 pp. Oliphant. 1s. 6d. n.

[A short biographical and critical skete "Natural Law in the Spiritual World."]

CLASSICAL.

A FEW NOTES ON JULIAN and a Translation of hi E. J. Chinnock. 7½×5, 82 pp. Nutt. 1s. 6d. n.

[With notes on passages in Julian's Oratio page references to Hertlein. Paper bound.]

FICTION.

STORIES IN THE DARK. By Barry Pain. 6 Richards. 1s.

[These are short studies, well written, i supernatural.]

THE FIRST MEN IN THE MOON. By H. G. We Newnes. 6s.

[A story of a journey to the moon. Excellen

FOMA GORDYEEF. By Maxim Gorky. Tra Hapgood. 7¾×5, 448pp. Unwin. 6s.

[On the Volga. A pessimistic story by thi novelist.]

PAPA (LIMITED). By W. Carter Platts. 8×5½, 2

[Stories farcical and humorous.]

AN ISLAND INTERLUDE. By J. Amity. 7½×5½, 2

[The love-story of a politician on his ho chatelaine of the Island where he is staying.]

FORBIDDEN PATHS. By Marcus Reay. 7¾×5½, 1

[A slight story of love entanglements.]

A MODERN ANTÆUS. By The Writer of an Esu Letters. 8×5¾, 518 pp. Murray. 6s.

[See Review, p. 492.]

CAPTAIN BLUTT. A Tale of Old Turley. By Adeler). 7¾×5, 163 pp. Coates (Philadelphia).

[An amusing novel of modern American provi

THE DROPPING OF AN H. By Isa Garvey. 7¾×

[A story of "smart" life and of a " missed marrying the old Duke of Land's End.]

SHROUDED IN MYSTERY. By the Misses Stre Drane. 3s. 6d.

[Four ghost stories.]

THE PROVING OF PRISCILLA. By Louie Be Harpers. 6s.

[A story of husband and wife: the se Cathedral town.]

THE FALL OF LORD PADDOCKSLEA. By Lio 231 pp. Heinemann. 6s.

[A tale of modern political society. L Liberal Premier. "Caps" may be fitted upon o

SONS OF THE SWORD. By Margaret L. W Heinemann.

[A Romance of the Peninsular War.]

THE END OF AN EPOCH. By A. Lincoln G Blackwood. 6s.

[A well-written, rather gruesome, and sombr destruction of the English nation through the a virulent bacillus. The survivors are only the hero and his bride, who find an antidote.]

THE FIREBRAND. By S. R. Crockett. 8×5½. 5

[Spain and the Carlists.]

LORD DUNCHESTER, or, The End of Dr. Theru Edited by Lieut.-General Phelps. 7¾×5, 159 pp.

[" Dr. Therne " was a novel by Mr. Rid support vaccination. This purports to be a se the person of Mr. Rider Haggard's anti-vaccinat vaccination side.]

THE IDEALIST. By Grove Johnson. 8×5½, 216

[The struggle of an artistic young Oxford m a black country town; ends with a tragedy.]

THE NEW MRS. LASCELLES. By L. T. Mea James Clarke. 5s.

[Tells how a young second wife of a London misunderstandings, wins over her stepchildren.]

MATER DOLOROSA. Par L'Auteur de "A Maurice de Walleyre. 6¾×7½, 401 pp. Paris

[A novel of much merit.]

HISTORY.

BRITISH HISTORY MADE INTERESTING. By C. Villiers Hartley. 7½×5, 178 pp. Simpkin, Marshall. 2s.

[An attempt to sketch the history attractively for grown-up people who have forgotten it. It may do something to achieve this object (which Collier tried not without success), but it would be more likely to do so if the print were larger and more open.]

LITERATURE AND BELLES-LETTRES.

THE BEGINNINGS OF POETRY. By F. B. Gummere. 9×6, 473 pp. The Macmillan Co. 12s. 6d. n.

[The author is an American professor.]

BARDELL v. PICKWICK. Ed. by Percy FitzGerald. 9×5¾, 116 pp. Elliot Stock. 6s.

[Giving the trial with full commentary, with true names of the characters introduced, the state of the law at the time, &c., with contemporary illustrations.]

NOTES AND ILLUSTRATIONS TO CRASHAW'S ENGLISH POEMS. By J. R. Tutin. 7½×1¾, 20 pp. (Gratis on application to J. R. Tutin, Gt. Fencote, near Bedale, Yorks.)

[This erudite little paper pamphlet goes into the poems with much detail, alluding, for example, to the similarity between passages in the "Sospetto d'Herode" and lines in Milton, Young, and Shelley, and gives a number of leading critical estimates of Crashaw's poetry. Mr. Tutin's edition of the English poems was reviewed by us last year.]

THE LORE OF CATHAY, or, The Intellect of China. By W. A. P. Martin. 9×6, 472 pp. Oliphant. 10s. 6d.

[A substantial volume by the President of the Chinese Imperial University. Photos.]

SHAKESPEARE AS A DRAMATIC ARTIST. By T. R. Lounsbury. 418 pp. LECTURES ON THE STUDY OF LANGUAGE. By Hanns Oertel. 329 pp., 9×6½. Arnold. 12s. 6d. n. each.

[These are Yale bicentennial publications. The first is one of a series called "Shakespearian wars" dealing with controversies about Shakespeare. The second gives the history of linguistic science in the nineteenth century and fully discusses language-changes and semantic.]

NELLE LETTERATURE STRANIERE (Quarta Serie). Pessimisti, by Andrea Laforte-Randi. 7½×1¾, 338 pp. Alberto Reber.

[Studies of Swift, La Rochefoucault, and Schopenhauer.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE IMPRESSIONS OF A DOCTOR IN KHAKI. By F. E. Fremantle. 8½×5¾, 540 pp. Murray. 10s. 6d. n.

[Mr. Fremantle was Civil Surgeon to the Forces in South Africa. Illustrated.]

OMNIBUSES AND CABS. Their Origin and History. By H. C. Moore. 8½×5½, 282 pp. Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d.

[An attractive volume, printed in large type with a variety of illustrations, tracing in a popular vein the history of omnibuses, from the "Carrosses à Cinq Sous" (Paris, 1662) and of cabs, from the hackney coach (1623).]

WHAT A YOUNG WIFE OUGHT TO KNOW. (Self and Sex Series.) By Emma F. A. Drake, M.D. 6¾×4½, 288 pp. The Vir Publishing Co. 6s. n.

[Written from a medical and ethical point of view.]

MODERN BUSINESS METHODS: THE HOME TRADE, 243 pp., 2s. 6d. MODERN BUSINESS METHODS: IMPORT AND EXPORT TRADE, 268 pp., 3s. 6d. 8½×5½. By F. Hooper and J. Graham. MODERN BOOK-KEEPING AND ACCOUNTS. By W. Adgie. Part I.: Elementary. 7¾×4¾, 102 pp. Macmillan. 1s. 6d.

[These belong to a useful series, edited by Messrs. Hooper and Graham, who are competent authorities. They are not intended for examinations, but as reference books for business men and text-books for commercial students. The first two have proved their value and are in second editions. Mr. Adgie's book, a smaller work, is very well suited both for teachers and for intelligent private students.]

THE TENNYSON RECITER. Ed. by A. H. Miles. 8¾×5½, 224 pp. Hutchinson. 2s.

[Selections. Neatly bound and good type.]

MODERN BILLIARDS. By John Roberts, Jun., and Others. Ed. by F. M. Hotine. 8¾×5½, 316 pp. Pearson. 6s.

[Mr. Roberts' portion of the book—"The Game of Billiards and How to Play It"—occupies with diagrams nearly half the volume. The rest contains a sketch of Roberts' career, accounts of breaks by Mitchell and others, and records of important matches.]

CASSELL'S MAGAZINE, 1901. 10×7, 667 pp. 8s.

THE SUNDAY MAGAZINE. Vol. for 1901. Isbister. 7s. 6d.

GOOD WORDS. Vol. for 1901. Isbister. 7s. 6d.

POETRY.

HAWTHORN AND LAVENDER. With Other Verses. By Ernest Hedley. 8½×5½, 113 pp. Nutt. 6s.

DAIRINE AND OTHER POEMS. By the Hon. Katherine [illegible] 7¾×5½. Jarrold. 10s. 6d.

[Poems founded on Irish history and legend. The fr[illegible] a portrait of the authoress.]

THE WASTE-PAPER BASKET. By H. J. Jennings. 7[illegible] Harrison. 1s.

[A collection of Humorous Poems rather in the style of Gilbert.]

SONGS OF THE MORNING. Lyrics for Music. By E. Tre[illegible] 7¾×5½, 105 pp. Leadenhall Press.

THE THRUSH (1901). Simpkin, Marshall.

[The annual volume of this periodical which exists for [illegible]tion of original verse.]

A PALACE OF DREAMS, and other Verse. By Ada B. Ra[illegible] 256 pp. Blackwood. 5s.

POLITICAL.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE OLD FOREIGN OFFICE. By Edward Hertslet, K.C.B. 9×6, 265 pp. 12s. n. Murray.

[Lewis Hertslet was in the Foreign Office as Sub-L[illegible] Librarian from 1801 to 1857. Sir Edward, his son, succeed[illegible] retired in 1896. Portraits and other illustrations.]

THREE OCTOBERS. By Ronald Howe. 8¾×5½, 95 pp. T[illegible]

[A pamphlet vivaciously criticizing politicians on both [illegible] calling on Lord Rosebery to take the lead.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

CHAUCER'S COMPLETE WORKS. Ed. by the Rev. W. [illegible] (The Oxford Poets.) 7¾×5½, 732 pp. Frowde. 3s. 6d.

[A reprint of Prof. Skeat's "Student Chaucer," publi[illegible] (introduction on Chaucer's life, grammar, metre, &c., an[illegible] with text; as a frontispiece, the portrait of Chaucer drawn [illegible] of the MS. of Occleve's "De Regimine Principum."

ACTS OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL OF ENGLAND. N[illegible] Vol. XXIV., 1592-3. Edited by Lord Roche Da[illegible] 10½×6½, 489 pp. Eyre and Spottiswoode.

[Deals with the Spanish war and difficulties of the En[illegible] in France, the plague in London, Irish troubles, actions ta[illegible] Recusants, Spanish intrigues in Great Britain, and variou[illegible] Admiralty and domestic administration. On May 18, 1593, [illegible] to arrest "Christofer Marlow" on an unstated charge.]

THE CONFERENCE BETWEEN WILLIAM LAUD AND M[illegible] THE JESUIT. Edited by C. H. Simpkinson (The English [illegible] Library). 9×6, 456 pp. Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.

[This library is to contain the principal English Theolo[illegible] Seventeenth and Eighteenth centuries, with Introductions [illegible] Law, Wilson, and Butler have been dealt with. We ha[illegible] report of the famous conference between Laud and the J[illegible] conducted by command of James I. for the special edific[illegible] favourite, Buckingham, with notes and a brief, well-w[illegible] duction by the Editor, and a full Index.]

THE WAY OF PERFECTION. By Saint Teresa. Edite[illegible] Waller. (The Cloister Library). 6½×4½, 225 pp. Dent. [illegible]

["The Perfection," says Mrs. Cunninghame Graham i[illegible] of Teresa," "represents the finished and magnificent fa[illegible] spiritual life." "She is the geographer and hydrogra[illegible] sinful soul," says M. J. K. Huysmans. A valuable addi[illegible] elegant little series. Text, and with very brief notes at th[illegible] translation is Abraham Woodhead's (1671-1675), with spell[illegible] altered.]

RUBÁIYÁT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM. Trans. by Edward F[illegible] Illus. by Blanche McManus. 9×7½, 19 pp. 5s. OMAR [illegible] CALENDAR FOR 1902. 10½×6. 2s. 6d. n. De la More [illegible]

[The Rubáiyát (a slim quarto) is a reprint of Fitzg[illegible] version. The print is large and clear, and the illustrations [illegible] tive designs in black, red, and green; the Calendar a [illegible] quatrains with same illustrations.]

CHRISTMAS BOOKS, MASTER HUMPHREY'S CLOC[illegible] DROOD. By Charles Dickens. (The Oxford India Pap[illegible] 7×4½, 287 pp. Frowde. 2s. 6d. n.

[The ninth of the seventeen volumes of this handy seri[illegible] original illustrations by Leech and others.]

LALLA ROOKH. By Thomas Moore. 8×6, 296 pp. Warne [illegible]

[Well printed on glazed paper with good half-tone [illegible]

THE UNIVERSE, or the Infinitely Great and the Infinitely Little. By F. A. Porretti, Ed. by J. R. A. Davis, 9×6, 326 pp. Blackie. 7s. 6d.

[This is one of the best and best-known popular books on Natural Science, copiously illustrated. It is now brought up to date by the Professor of Geology and Geology at Cirencester College, Aberystwyth.]

HAMMONDS HARD LINES. By S. Kitchend. 7½×5, 326 pp. New Edition. Blackie. 1s. 6d.

[An amusing tale of a schoolboy who got a fairy to grant his wishes.]

THE PIRATE ISLAND. By R. Collingwood. 7½×5, 320 pp. Blackie. 3s.

[A story of the South Pacific.]

SOMERLEY, Scholarship and Undergraduate. By Gilbert Swift. 7½×5, 416 pp. Elliot Stock. 2s. 6d. n.

A HISTORY OF ARCHITECTURE ON THE COMPARATIVE METHOD. By Prof. B. Fletcher and B. F. Fletcher. Fourth Edition. 8½×5, 800 pp. Batsford. 21s. n.

[Much of this book has been rewritten. The largest addition is 70 pages on the "non-historical styles," Indian, Chinese, Japanese, and Saracenic. There is also new matter on pre-historic architecture, medieval religious orders, Gothic architecture in Europe, &c. There are now also 250 plates, partly photographs, partly line drawings. The work is a comprehensive, summarised review of architectural history, useful for reference.]

MIXED METALS or Metallic Alloys. By A. H. Hiorns. 7×4½, 430 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

[Published in 1893 and now revised and enlarged.]

"WAR TO THE KNIFE," or Tangiaf Maori. By Rolf Boldrewood. 7½×5, 420 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

[A story of the Maori war.]

ON THE CURE OF THE MORPHIA HABIT. By Oscar Jennings. Second Edition. 7½×5, 211 pp. Baillière, Tindall. 3s. 6d. n.

[The words "without suffering" are added to the title of this little work, first published ten years ago.]

VERSES. By Elizabeth Fox Howard. 7½×6½, 63 pp. J. W. Phelp, Essex. 1s. 6d.

[A slightly enlarged edition of a book we praised on April 11, 1900.]

THE WONDERFUL CENTURY READER. By Alfred Russel Wallace. 8×5½, 254 pp. Sonnenschein. 2s.

[Abridged form of the same author's "The Wonderful Century," now in its fourth edition. Summarises the nineteenth-century advances in science, art, and invention (with illustrations) in the form of lessons divided into short paragraphs.]

SONNETS. By Elizabeth Barrett Browning. 5×4, 87 pp. Brimley Johnson. 3s.

[A small neatly-bound volume, with one sonnet on each page, and a photogravure of Watts' "Love and Life" as a frontispiece.]

THEOLOGY.

COLLECTED WORKS OF F. MAX MÜLLER, XVIII. LAST ESSAYS. II. Essays on the Science of Religion. 7½×5½, 368 pp. Longmans. 5s.

[Deals with ancient religions, the religions of China, Mohamedanism, Immortality, &c., with some notes and replies by other writers.]

"ONLY A PRAYER-MEETING"? By C. H. Spurgeon. 7½×5, 366 pp. Passmore and Alabaster. 3s. 6d.

[Forty addresses delivered by Mr. Spurgeon at the Metropolitan Tabernacle and other prayer meetings.]

THE SHINING HOUR. By J. R. Miller, D.D. 7½×6, 20 pp. Sunday School Union. Illustrated.

[A paper booklet.]

THE MINISTRY OF COMFORT. By J. R. Miller. 7×4½, 279 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 3s. 6d.

[Dr. Miller's "Silent Times Series."]

STUDIES IN HOLY SCRIPTURE. By A. G. Mortimer. 8×5, 418 pp. Rivington. 5s. n.

[Sermons by the Rector of St. Mark's, Philadelphia.]

BEHOLD A SOWER. 8½×5½, 100 pp. The British and Foreign Bible Society.

[A popular Illustrated Report of the Society.]

HANDBOOK TO THE TEXTUAL CRITICISM OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By Frederick G. Kenyon. 9×6, 312 pp. Macmillan. 10s. n.

[A full account with facsimiles of the MSS. and ancient versions, and of the history and present position of the Textual problem, by the Assistant Keeper of MSS., British Museum.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

DUTCH LIFE IN TOWN AND COUNTRY. By P. M. Heath. 7½×4½, 320 pp. Newnes. 3s. 6d. n.

[Popular sketches of present-day life in the Netherlands with numerous illustrations.]

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House

PROBLEM No. 265, by H. von BERNARD.

BLACK. 10 pieces.

WHITE. 10 pieces.

White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM No. 267, by J. JUCHLY.

BLACK. 6 pieces.

WHITE. 12 pieces.

White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 266, by A. NOBLE.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play and

DIFFICULT P of our correspo of stiff proble set printed three or fo which cannot tricky play Loyd's, 269, champion cate about No. 268 says:—"This ceiving prob numerous w almost do it a up many." the set within falling into a PROBLEM No. 268, by Joseph Ney Babson. (9 pieces)—K at K B 8; Q at Q R 7; roo Q Kt 4; B at K Kt 8; Kt at K 7; pawns Q 6. Black (4 pieces)—K at K R sq; B at K R 5, Q B 7. Three moves.

PROBLEM No. 269, by S. Loyd, U.S.A.— —K at Q Kt 8; Q at Q 8; R at K B sq; B at Q 5 and Q B 8; pawns at K Kt 4, K 5, Q B Black (10 pieces) K at K B 2; rooks at B at K B 7; pawns at K Kt 2, K Kt 3, K Kt Q B 4. Three moves.

TO SOLVERS.—In End-game No. 260, Gold, place White paw and in No. 261, Heywood, place White king at Q Kt 6. We have above correct, as they appeared to be of much interest. We need state. Solvers will greatly assist by writing Chess Editor prompt posed error. No. 255, Marin, is printed correctly from author, but in two. We will allow a few days extra in the case of 260, 261.

GAME No. CXI. Played at Moscow in con

EVANS GAMBIT.

White. Allies.	Black. M. I. Tschigorin.	White. Allies.
1. P–K 4	P–K 4	16. K R–K sq
2. Kt–K B 3	Kt–Q B 3	17. B–K 4
3. B–B 4	B–B 4	18. Kt–R 4
4. P–Q Kt 4	B–P	19. Q–Kt 5
5. P–B 3	B–B 4	20. Kt–B 3
6. P–Q 4	P×P	21. B–B sq
7. Castles	P×P	22. Q–K R 5
8. Q–Kt 3	Q–B 3	23. Kt×Kt
9. P–K 5	Q–Kt 3	24. R×R ch
10. Kt–P	K Kt–K 2	25. B–K 3
11. B–B 3	Castles	26. P–Kt 4
12. Kt–Q 5	Kt–Kt	27. B×B
13. B–Kt	P–Q 3	28. P–K R 4
14. P×P	P–P	29. B–B 5
15. Q R–Q sq	B–B 2	30. R×P

GAME No. CXII. Played in Paris.

White. A. Allin.	Black. B. Rittenfeld.	White. A. Allin.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 215. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 499, 500, 501, 502

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XXX.—Mrs. Humphry Ward. An Appreciation by Laurie Magnus 503

ENGLISH AND GERMAN UNIVERSITIES.—A "Personal View," by the Rev. A. Schwartz 505

A MODERN GREEK ILIAD, by W. H. D. Rouse 506

ACROSS THE BORDER 508

ART NOTES 508

CURRENT LITERATURE—

The Spanish People 509

Glories of Spain 509

Mary Rich, Countess of Warwick 510

Social England 512

The Cambridge Natural History, Vol. VIII.—Zoology—Practical Histology 513, 514

The House of Borgia—Savonarola—The Two First Centuries of Florentine History 514, 515

Frédéric Mistral 515

The Foundations of Belief—Individuality and the Moral Aim in American Education—A Manual of School Hygiene—Book Prices Current 516, 517

The Firebrand—Foma Gordyeef—The Fiery Dawn—The Wealth of Mallerstang—Some Women I have Known—The Ambassador's Adventure—The Pasha—Yestère—A Thousand Pities—The Young Squire's Resolve—Flower and Thorn—The Arbiter—Mr. Elliott—The Magnetism of Sin 517, 518, 519

LIBRARY NOTES 519

CORRESPONDENCE—Mr. Henley and R. L. S. (Mr. J. A. Nicklin)—The Limitation of Dramatic Themes (Mr. H. Hamilton Fyfe)—Mr. Lang and the Casket Letters—The Chinese Spoils at Potsdam—Mr. Andrew Lang (Mr. C. M. Falconer) 519, 520, 521

BOOKS TO LOOK OUT FOR 521

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 521, 522, 523

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Next week we shall issue a fully Illustrated Christmas Supplement dealing with books for boys and girls, illustrated books, &c.; and containing an article on Dickens' "Christmas Carol" and its various illustrators.

* * * *

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be

Mr. STANLEY WEYMAN.

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"The Life of William Ewart Gladstone," by H. W. Paul. Smith, Elder.

"The Life of Sir W. Molesworth," by Mrs. Fawcett. Macmillan.

"Jane Austen: Her Home and Friends." By Constance Hall. Lane.

"London Afternoons," by the Rev. W. J. Loftie. Cassell.

of enlightenment. "Greek students," he says, "do that any one should write as every one talks. They want should write as in reality one never talks, for what is c learned tongue is not at all old Greek . . . but a m Greek, capable of making even an average Hellenist
He doubts, however, whether it was prudent to under translation at the present moment. M. Jean Psichari a Greek who has a right to speak, and has been one of promoters of the movement for what may be ca
"standardization" of the corrupt forms of the modern

* * * *

The two volumes of Bismarck's "Memoirs" ar continued. The German publisher Cotta is to bring new volumes of the ex-Chancellor's letters—the first to the letters from Bismarck to William I.—the second c a series of letters to various Princes and Sovereigns.

* * * *

Seldom have there been so many new departures on the English book trade as at the present moment. M American origin, they are regarded with suspicion leading publishers here, who hold that they are looking dignity of English literature, as well as their own inte standing true to the old traditions. And it is worth no Messrs. Isbister's new manager, as stated in L recently, has returned from America, after many years' ence there, with similar views. Some of the new ideas, are entirely home-made. We understand, for instance, well-known firm of publishers runs a good deal of its on the following lines:—It secures a popular novelist him so much for his next book, and then forms a little s in the City to share the expense. A new book by a author is a considerably safer investment than ma discovered gold mines.

* * * *

This practice of "under-writing," of course, is not precedent. There was a time when publishers made a of sharing the cost of expensive works. This was the c Johnson's "Lives of the Poets," of which we note, by Dr. G. Birkbeck Hill is preparing a new edition, to be re next year. The author of the "Lives," at any rate, w fled with his share in the financial arrangements. "Si Dr. Johnson to a friend, "I have always said the bo were a generous set of men. Nor in the present insta
I reason to complain. The fact is, not that they pai little, but that I have written too much." The Doctor two hundred guineas for his "Lives of the Poets" in instance; then a present of another hundred; and hundred with a new edition.

* * * *

Maxim Gorki (or the Bitter One), whose "Foma Go is reviewed in another column, is the pseudonym of a writer whose real name is Alexey Maximovich Pieshk

a scrambled who lent him books, from which he got his passion for literature. "Till the cask appeared," he has written, "I could not endure books, or indeed any scrap of printed paper." At the age of fifteen he proceeded to the University of Kazan, "kindly imagining that learning was there given gratis to every one who wanted it. This it appeared was not the case, so I entered a biscuit factory at three roubles a month." The work was too hard. He gave it up and sold apples in the streets. His next employment was as watchman on a railway. Then he hawked kvass, and then became secretary to a lawyer, Mr. A. T. Lanin, but left Nijni Novgorod to live a wandering life. He wandered through the Don region, and the Ukraine, and into Bessarabia, and thence along the southern coast of the Crimea to Kaban, and along the Black Sea, ultimately reaching Tiflis. Here his first story was printed in a local paper. Getting back to Nijni he wrote for the local papers there, made the acquaintance of Korolenko, who helped him with his influence and advice, and rapidly rose to the eminent position in Russian literature which he now occupies. His first book was published as recently as 1898. Mr. Heinemann announces two more stories by Gorki in an English version—"The Orloff Couple" and "Malva."

* * * *

The association of Rossetti's name with that of Tennyson would in itself have sufficed to give interest to a little drawing, in pen-and-ink and wash, sold at Christie's on Monday as part of the property of the late Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse. But inasmuch as the sketch represents the late Poet Laureate on that "night of the Gods," as it has been called, September 27, 1855, when, at Mr. and Mrs. Browning's house, 13, Dorset-street, Portman-square, he read "Maud" to a small circle of friends, its attraction from a literary point of view is extraordinary. We have several accounts of that memorable evening. In his journal for the following day, Tennyson made this entry:—"I dined yesterday with the Brownings and had a very pleasant evening. Both of them are admirers of poor little 'Maud.' The two Rossettis came in in the evening." William Allingham, who as well as Miss Arabella Barrett was present, says "he (Tennyson) is quite as glorious in his way as Browning in his, perhaps of the two even more impressive on the whole personality." Finally, in a letter written by Browning from St. Pierre de Chartreuse to Mr. William Sharp about 1883, we have record of the actual sketch, or at any rate of that which served as its basis. "On another of my returns to London he (Rossetti) painted my portrait, not, I fancy, in oils, but water-colours. . . . This must have been in the year when Tennyson published 'Maud,' for I remember Tennyson reading the poem one evening while Rossetti made a rapid pen-and-ink sketch of him, very good, from one obscure corner of vantage, which I still possess and duly value." That same evening Browning read to the little circle his masterly word-picture of "pace tenebrae Lippi," the allusion wherein to Masaccio as a "pounder" who "comes to our convent" was defended by Browning in a most interesting letter published some months ago in these columns. The little sketch at Christie's—showing Tennyson seated sideways in the corner of a sofa, left hand hugging his knee, the face in profile—was bought by Messrs. Agnew for thirty guineas. It is inscribed "Maud, 1855," and at the back of the frame—for it, too, is of glass—is in MS., signed by Rossetti, his sonnet, "Hero's Lamp," from the House of Life series. In line 9, it is interesting to note, the word "shadowy" [illegible]

1807, "Poems on Various Occasions" was dist
S. and J. Ridge, of Newark. It contains "Fugitive Pieces" and twelve hitherto unp this volume, which the author describes as " miraculously chaste," 100 copies only were st to Moore. To-day it stands high among the ra teenth century in the esteem of the book-colle annotated copy in the British Museum; possesses one of the finest known, Mr. McGeo as long ago as 1892 an example, uncut, with th
the original boards, brought £68 at auction.

* * *

The copy which comes up for sale next we similar condition; but this constitutes a attraction. On the title is the inscription, " Coldm. Gds., from the author"; on the fly autograph, three "Stanzas by Ld. B.," th runs:—

Ah! Mem'ry torture me no m
The present's all o'ercast,
My hopes of future bliss are o'
In mercy veil the past!

Edward Noel Long, to whom a poem in ness" is addressed, and who is the "Clo Recollections," was an intimate school fri Harrow, and, going up to Cambridge togethe for feats of swimming and diving. On three at Harrow, July 5, 1801, June 6 and names of Byron and Long appear on the pu Long entered the Guards, served honourably in Copenhagen, but early in the year 1809 wa passage with his regiment to Lisbon, when George ran foul, in the night, of another. T says of him: "His friendship and a violent, and passion, which held me at the same period of the most romantic period of my life. . .
wrote to me to write his son's epitaph. I pr not the heart to complete it." It will presentation copy of "Poems on Various Occa
on Monday, has unique interest.

* * *

On Monday afternoon Hogarth House offered for sale at the Mart. Little remains of the garden, "laid out in good style," of
and we can find no trace of the filbert avenu played ninepins, the tomb of the dog Pompey, the last enjoyed, here Pompey lies," or of tha finch, whose little grave the artist himself dug the overhanging bay window is there; and the braced and girdled by Hogarth, still in good s Curiously enough the bidding, which started exactly the sum, £1,500, named by the commit formed to purchase and preserve the property

* * *

A monument was unveiled on Sunday Cemetery in Paris to Henri Heine. The occasion of an outburst of Anti-Semitic fan prove that Heine, the cosmopolitan Jew, remained there under false pretences, bei authentic political refugee which he claimed t a French citizen. These are the statements made in an apparently seriously documented article on the Paris Liberté, and they are not without interest.

* * * *

In a volume of lithographs devoted to the old Royal Palaces of London—to be published in a limited edition by Mr. Lane early next month—Mr. Thomas R. Way fulfils a promise made in one of his former volumes. The new era in our national history has brought with it great changes in some of the Royal Palaces, and the time is ripe to bring together some slight record of them. The subject, however, as Mr. Way says in his preface, is a very large one, and each building has been treated in at least one important volume. The artist claims to show that in these thirteen palaces or remains of palaces near London the nation possesses a more splendid collection of buildings of the kind than any other country can boast of. Buckingham Palace has not been included, because its use as a Royal Palace dates from a more recent time. The volume, which contains notes by Mr. Frederic Chapman, will be uniform with "Architectural Remains of Old Richmond, Petersham, Twickenham, Mortlake, and Kew," and "Reliques of Old London."

* * * *

During the first three days of this week there came under Messrs. Sotheby's hammer the following interesting books:—"The XII. Bukes of Eneados of the Famose Poete Virgil," London, 1553, and a Thomas Berthelet piece, 1530, £31; "Machasor seu Judaicarum Precum Breviarum," first edition, 1485-86, on vellum, £30; "Missale Glagolitico Romanum," Venice, 1528, in original vellum, £28 10s.; "Petrarch, Incominciа il libro degli Homini Famosi," first edition, 1476, £24, the first and only book printed at Pogliano; "St. Augustine di Civitate Dei," Jensen, Venice, 1475, original binding, £13 5s.; "Shelley, St. Irvyne," first edition, 1822, with a new title, £10. It may be noted that the "Century Dictionary," 1899, 8 vols., in half morocco, brought £7 15s.

* * * *

Among the books to be disposed of at Messrs. Sotheby's sale next week will be some examples from the presses of Caxton, de Worde, and Letton or Pynson. The sale also includes such English rarities as the first editions of Bunyan's "Discourse upon the Pharisee and the Publicane," Baxter's "Saints' Everlasting Rest," Law's "Serious Call," "Gulliver's Travels," and "Waverley." But the great attractions will doubtless be the original proof sheets of Voltaire's "Bataille de Fontenoy" with numerous interesting manuscript corrections by the author, Byron's "Poems on Various Occasions," and Stevenson's "An Object of Pity" and "Father Damien," the latter with manuscript corrections by the author. The Byron is one of the scarcest of modern books, and to it we allude in another paragraph. In February last a copy of Stevenson's "An Object of Pity"—with its reply—sold for £59, while at the same sale the "Father Damien" with only two slight corrections by the author brought as much as £27 5s.

* * * *

MOON AND MIST.

Mounting moon in a trailing mist.
And two in one.
Where the sobbing sea and the sands have kissed
Like those who meet and must soon be gone.

Messrs. F. E. Robinson announce a new series of rest. It will consist of books, some never before prin hardly to be got at, illustrating Stuart times. Each the "Stuart Series" will have a special cover, rep binding of the Stuart times, with a note on the bind Cyril Davenport. The copies of each volume will and numbered. The first volume will be Dr. Bates' motuum imperorum in Anglia, 1649," a hitherto English version of this "History of the late troub land." It will be edited by Mr. E. Almack, who is th editor of the series.

Mr. W. H. Wilkins is to write a full biograph Edward and Queen Alexandra, which will appear in numerous illustrations.

The literary birthdays of next week include those Professor David Masson (December 2, 1822), Dr. Hen of the Dictionary (December 3, 1845), Mr. H. W. Lon ber 5, 1845), Dean Hole (December 5, 1819), and Mr. S (December 5, 1859).

In a convocation held at Oxford on November 26th, of D.Litt. honoris causa was conferred upon Mr. Lesli Honorary Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

The "Tale of Two Cities," published forty-two is the latest of Charles Dickens' works to become non-c

Chancellor Evans, who has been engaged for forty Welsh Dictionary on the same scale as Dr. Murray Dictionary, has received the degree of D.L. from th sity of Wales.

The French Academy has awarded a prize to the of Mr. Kipling's "Jungle Book."

Odes on the forthcoming Coronation are invite Words, which offers a prize of £50 for the best with le to be awarded by a committee of literary men.

The Sunday at Home is to change its form with ning of the new year, and to become something less of and more of a religious review.

Leighton House, Kensington-gardens, is now see community as an art museum by the action of the K Council.

Mr. C. Arthur Pearson has become a part proprie Birmingham Argus.

Mr. Aylmer Maude lectures on Tolstoy as a " Humanitarianism," next Tuesday, at the Essex Hall,

Mr. Hall Caine has promised to preside at a gathe Maccabeans on Sunday next, when Mr. Zangwill paper on "The Return to Palestine."

It is said that Mr. Hall Caine's "Eternal City" next year as a serial in Household Words, now the his son.

One result of the loi sur les congrégations in F been to distribute the library of the Carmelites second-hand bookshops of Paris.

The Comédie Française associates have threatened unless M. Claretie is removed from the position of the theatre.

A Russian paper reports that Tolstoy is at w play, bearing the cheerful title of The Corpse.

The Teatro Costanzi in Rome is producing Gabri nunzio's Francesca da Rimini. Signora Duse and Sign play the leading parts.

Poland has been thrown into agitation by the make Polish children recite the Catechism in the language. Sienkiewicz has protested.

Prince Kropotkin is seriously ill and has had to engagements.

Messrs. Dent will shortly publish "Napoleon's

School, Newcastle-on-Tyne. It will be based upon, and largely illustrated by quotations from, original sources. The first instalment will deal with the lives of the Popes during the Lombard rule (from Gregory I. the Great, 590-604, to Leo III., 795); the second with those of the Popes under the Carlovingian Emperors (from Leo III. to Formosus, 891). Other volumes may, it is hoped, follow.

Another headmaster of a well-known preparatory school—whose present withholds his name—has collected and edited all the scholarship papers set in classics, mathematics, English, and modern languages at some twenty of the greater public schools for a period of about ten years. His idea is to provide a book of papers complete and free from any individual bias, and most teachers will agree that there is room for such a book. It is announced by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co., who are also publishing a new book on "Schools at Home and Abroad," by R. E. Hughes, M.A., of Swansea, dealing with foreign systems of education and with the work of our own schools and teachers—kindergarten, primary and secondary.

The Dean of Ely has written a causerie entitled "In a Minster Garden," in which he discourses on many subjects connected with the old days and the new. The book is fully illustrated with scenes from nooks and corners of Ely Cathedral buildings and the surrounding garden. It will be published immediately by Mr. Elliot Stock.

Mr. Fisher Unwin has a volume in preparation entitled "English Public Opinion after the Restoration," by Mr. G. B. Hertz, scholar of Wadham College and Arnold Essay prizeman. One aim of the author is to show how the roots of British Imperialism lie in the beliefs of that day and how continuous in its history. Incidentally, the social life of the age is discussed, and the story of Charles II.'s Dutch wars.

"In Sicily"—the elaborate work on which Mr. Douglas Sladen has been engaged for five years—will be published by Messrs. Sands directly. It will be in two quarto volumes of 500 pages each, with over 300 illustrations. Messrs. Baedeker have prepared for it a map of Sicily, with both the ancient and modern names inserted.

The first number of a new illustrated monthly penny magazine suitable for girls will appear on December 10—Friendly Hours for Friendly Workers. It is published by Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co., and it is hoped that it may to some extent take the place of the Monthly Packet.

Not long ago a little book of poems entitled "Through Human Eyes," by Miss A. Beckton, was privately printed at the Daniel Press, Oxford. It is already being sought after by collectors, one copy this week being sold for a guinea. The poems are to be reprinted in a threepenny-sixpenny volume, with additions, by Mr. Elkin Mathews. There is an introductory poem by Dr. Robert Bridges.

Among Messrs. Macmillan's announcements in theology are "Addresses on the Acts of the Apostles," by the late Archbishop Benson, with an introduction by Adeline, Duchess of Bedford; "Sermons of Court Sermons," by the Rev. H. C. Beeching; and "The Credibility of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles"—Dr. Chase's Hulsean Lectures for 1900-1.

"The Mystic Rose," to come from the same house, is a study of primitive marriage by Mr. E. A. Crawley. In philosophy they have a course of introductory lectures by the late professor Henry Sidgwick entitled "Philosophy: Its Scope and Method," and a study of "Mind in Evolution," by Mr. L. T. Hobhouse. The latter volume traces the stages in mental development from the more or less successful response to a stimulus among the lowest animal types. It aims at establishing the distinction in kind between animal and human intelligence.

Lady Florence Dixie asks us to state, in reply to the many inquiries about her book "Songs of a Child" (The Leadenhall Press), that the first edition of the book is exhausted. A second edition will be ready in about a fortnight. She would ask her numerous correspondents kindly to accept this as a reply to their letters to her.

Messrs. Dent ask us to say that the price of the Temple edition of the works of the Brontës, recently issued, should have nothing to be said. We are as opposed as our c Nicklin is to the biography which is a catalo

the practice of presenting a personality of unm
instead of a really human and living pictu Balfour's "Life" may conceivably have gone to tion. But if any qualification of it was requi supplied by the right person, and in the rig complaint has, not unjustly, been made that not the right person, and that he has not d way. The same number of the Pall Mall Ma Christmas number) contains a paper by Mr entitled "A Literary Friendship." We d discourse at length on friendship in general handled by essayists enough since the dawn o
—but if we may judge from Mr. Henley's lucu clear that a literary friendship must be r distinct from the ordinary kind. He compel new definition for it. Here are a few of its racteristics, as far as can be gathered from The friendship of literary men is tempered by a justice. It cools, one might say, in direct enthusiasm of others. The epitaphs comp influence are characterized by a degree of worthy of the Roman consul in judgment on hi possible, no doubt, as we have suggested, to fi disinterested desire to arrive at the truth, but w say that this strikes us as the attitude adopte
He wishes to correct the world's idea of St life. R. L. S. was an egotist, "incessantly interested" in himself. "He could not be with a mirror but he must invite its confidence passed it." "No better histrion ever lived"
so on, with hints innumerable of smaller failin did much for Stevenson. That was a merit o does not become more meritorious when he be that what he did has not been sufficiently a portrait presented in Mr. Balfour's "Life" refuses to recognize. We remember that " Shorter Catechist" which concludes Mr. Henl friend, and we learn now that it was an afte old days that something lay in abeyance; late in all its naked self-righteousness, and the sonn
The "Shorter Catechist" itself would seem regulated admiration, or rather to a desire to " admiration. Well, this may all be very true, smallest consequence. Stevenson's character his "Life" and in the later Vailima letters plaster saint, but this really does not concer importance to the final estimate of the man is l revealed in his books, and we may add that l his books that so little, comparatively spea sonality is there visible. Through the artific sedulously imitative style—a cloak no less heav than that of Mr. Henley himself—you may cate glimpses of a very attractive man, and it is that posterity (if posterity concerns itself wit all) will judge of R. L. Stevenson. There are n unreservedly believe in all the exaggerated pr as a novelist which was in fashion some litt matters of this kind right themselves in time, his literary reputation will find its own level, a

Literature Portraits.—XXX.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.

It is not a very far cry to the other side of Queen Victoria's first jubilee. But since then, or more strictly, perhaps, since the Third Reform Act of 1884, the future moralist will trace the decline of earnestness in England. It may be that the breaking down of barriers, and the diffusion of powers and rights over wider and ever wider circles of the community, account partly for the social change. The age has been prodigal of the symbols of emancipation. It has rattled the keys of liberty with a childish joy in their possession, and the sound has been music in its ears. But experience has brought disillusion. Free thought and dissent have not unlocked the doors guarded by St. Peter. The ballot has not opened any gate save the floodgate of talk. The Elementary Education Act has not taught the nation how to learn. Trade unionism leaves unsolved the problem of the freedom of labour. And, temporarily, at least, this multiplication of the symbols, this busy imitation of liberty, has exhausted the energy of thought. The nation, as the catchword goes, has entered on its democratic inheritance, but in taking over its property from the trustees it has converted it into a limited company. The directors have lost their sense of responsibility to the country, and as yet there is but little indication that the shareholders are capable of supplying it.

The fact of this social change—this loss of earnest personal conviction, and the consequent paralysis of the brain-power of the nation—may be approached from several points of view. But from the literary standard, which alone is admissible here, the transition has a direct bearing on the novels of Mrs. Humphry Ward. At the time when she was pondering "Robert Elsmere," the thoughtful few were concerned for the welfare of the uninstructed many. Reform was a kind of religion. To Mr. Gladstone, indeed, in the various phases of his enthusiasm, it assumed the sanction of a crusade. The disintegration of the Liberal party for an idea corresponded in actual politics to the wreckage of happy marriages and betrothals with which Mrs. Ward's fiction is strewn. To reformers of Mrs. Ward's type life is real and earnest in a sense hardly conceivable to-day. We are all reformers nowadays. Save for a handful of pro-Boers, there is not a sound Tory in the land. But the mere diffusion of the spirit has weakened the spirit. The old distinction between "classes" and "masses" has disappeared—it is no longer the voice of enlightenment crying out in a wilderness of ignorance, no longer the reform-crusader armed against the hosts of darkness, no longer the national trustees inspired to help the nation against itself. It is rather a Babel of shareholders shouting at a general meeting. Nothing is done because no one is responsible, and in the mirror of literature, instead of the serious purpose of Mrs. Ward, we see the vapourings of Miss Corelli and Mr. Caine, or Mr. Kipling's verses about our "jolly good lesson," which reflect with such pathetic fidelity the meagre substance of modern reform. The difference is that the reformers of the Home Rule period in our history, however mistaken their wishes may have been, were at least able to formulate them definitely. There were ideas enough to go round, and each idea had its witness, or martyr. To-day the newspapers prate about the great heart of the democracy, and the inviolable sanction of its demands, but meanwhile the ideas grow thin. They flit from chief characters are drawn, were deprived of their

"caste," and abandoned their responsible position invading democracy, the standard of emotion was lower years ago, in October, 1888, the Quarterly review following moral from "Robert Elsmere":—

> It is time English parents should thoroughly > that this is the condition to which the Universitie > brought, and that if they send their sons to a col > Anselm's—to any college which does not practica
> a test for itself, like Keble—they expose them > maturity and excitability of their early manh > their Christian faith deliberately undermined by > intellectual force of a philosophical deist like Mr > hopeless sceptic like Mr. Langham. Mrs. Ward k > well. We have not observed that any protest has > against her representation of a college in the Univ > its vivid portraiture of more than one well-know
> This must be taken as an Oxford picture of Oxfor > in a great college, and we must needs say tha > legislation which has placed such men as Mr. G > Langham in the position of tutors and guides of un > is a scandalous diversion of endowments left f > purposes.

It is not precisely the lesson which Mrs. War convey, but it is an instructive proof of the vital q writing, and of the clear truth that underlies her re cism of life. Thought has become attenuated since individual conscience has been put into commission, for problems of sex, the earnest novelist is out of fact is that the battle of scepticism and belief, wh had to fight out for himself, and which entailed, always entails, acute suffering on innocent non-co now decided by plebiscite, or arbitration, or by the of indifference. The Elsmere throes are out of present generation feels less, because the franchise been universalized. When the law of averages is a is no room for a monopolist like Robert Elsmere.

Take Laura Fountain, again, and the ruin of Al love story. An Edinburgh reviewer of October, that Laura's suicide in "Helbeck of Bannisdale" strike him as "convincingly inevitable, or even pro this, he declares, "is due either to want of natura plot, or want of dramatic power in the autho reviewer may be right, but I am rather inclined to alleged failure in inevitableness to an emotional reader. Certainly, in "Eleanor," whose dramatic be tested by the final proof of dramatization, Mr
Ward has found her way to the hearts of unnumbe
In both novels, "Helbeck" and "Eleanor," sh Roman Catholicism—in the later story with a restra of narration and a fine vividness in presentation the advance of her powers. The subject is one suited to her talents, because the Church of R modern institutions, is the most conspicuous in r disintegrating forces of anarchy and indifference.
cratic in the midst of democracy, and emotional in reason. Mrs. Ward herself, in her one and only pre ninth edition of "David Grieve"), says a word in su point:—"If we, in our zeal to include ideas among of imaginative presentation, make the mistake of su
the ideas are the whole of life, our work will come t disillusion. To-day one inclines to agree with Rachurn's maiden aunt—one of the writer's many successful minor characters—that "Marcella ought to be absorbed in her marriage; that is the natural thing." Yesterday, when a few great women were leading the feminine movement to intermediate goals which they did not foresee, the following scene was touched with real passion and truth. The dramatis personæ are Marcella, her lover, and his grandfather; the topic of discussion is a petition for the convicted murderer of a gamekeeper:—

Marcella did not believe him. Every nerve was beginning to throb anew with that passionate recoil against tyranny and prejudice, which was in itself an agony.

"And you say the same?" she said, turning to Aldous.

"I cannot sign that petition," he said sadly. "Won't you try and believe what it costs me to refuse?"

It was a heavy blow to her. Amply as she had been prepared for it, there had always been at the bottom of her mind a persuasion that in the end she would get her way. She had been used to feel barriers go down before that ultimate power of personality of which she was abundantly conscious. Yet it had had availed her here—not even with the man who loved her.

Lord Maxwell looked at the two—the man's face of suffering, the girl's struggling breath.

"There, there, Aldous!" he said, rising. "I will leave you a minute. Do make Marcella rest—get her, for all our sakes, to forget this a little. Bring her in presently to us for some coffee. Above all, persuade her that we love her and admire her with all our hearts, but that in a matter of this kind she must leave us to do—as before God!—what we think right."

He stood before her an instant, gazing down upon her with dignity—nay, a certain severity. Then he turned away and left the room.

Marcella sprang up.

"Will you order the carriage?" she said in a strangled voice. "I will go upstairs."

"Marcella!" cried Aldous; "can you not be just to me, if it is impossible for you to be generous?"

"Just!" she repeated, with a tone and gesture of repulsion, pushing him back from her. "You can talk of justice!"

He tried to speak, stammered, and failed. That strange paralysis of the will-forces which dogs the man of reflection at the moments when he must either take his world by storm or lose it was upon him now. He had never loved her more passionately—but as he stood there looking at her, something broke within him, the first prescience of the inevitable dawned.

Mrs. Ward, at least, is not afraid of the tremendous word "inevitable," withheld by the Edinburgh reviewer from the effect on her characters of their circumstances.

Lastly, as a study of emotions, take the fifth chapter of "Sir George Tressady," Mrs. Ward's sequel to "Marcella," in which Rachurn has become Lord Maxwell:—

Maxwell's heart (we are told) "was much less concerned with this belief, tenaciously as he held it, than with its relative—the limitation of private possession by the authority of the common conscience. . . . If you could have moved this quiet Englishman to speak, he would have said—child from the fierce claims of capital, in fo after trade the axiom that no man may l wealth upon the exhaustion and degradatio these things stirred in him the far deeper c moral nature. Nay more! Together with al parts which mark the long travail of man's c life, they were among the only "evidences critical mind allowed itself—the most striki thing "greater than we know" working amo ugliness of our common day.

Maxwell's "heart" is italicized by the au ventured thus to draw attention to certain othe extract, because surely such emotions belong period in our history when the philosophers w belong to the dream of reform which was s experiments of reformers, to the fabric whic threw. Lord Maxwell is the sponsor of a Fact London, "touching the grown man for the firs lately prohibiting home-work in certain speci and Mrs. Ward speaks of this situation in "charged with dramatic elements." It is con modern reader, suffering from legislative cunut, to the thrill. But Mrs. Ward, true Arnold as s seeks "our best self," without too much def tunities, and cherishes a passion for "sweet Outside her novels as well she is an ardent so quite recently she has testified in her preface Webb's book on women and the Factory Acts she shares Lord Maxwell's moral enthusiasm. political world of Mrs. Ward's fiction is a reflec of suspense, when the few cherished noble idea the lot of the many, and when the ideas impo unrecognized by statesmen of to-day. The development tend to replace personal respon conditions of modern existence demand an eco Elsmere, Helbeck, Maxwell, Eleanor have surrender.

But Mrs. Humphry Ward is more than novelist. There is a curious likeness betwee most of her books. "It was a brilliant after end of May," or "To-day after the snow a April," or "A damp March afternoon," or "evening," and then follows a description, some elaborate, of the scenery in which the plot is District and the Midlands are her favourite sees them at once with the artist's eye and with instinct for their relation to the human action.

This care for an effective background is gift, and in another respect, too, Mrs. Ward' Her novels, being psychological and introspec sarily long, but neither her enthusiasm for lit of detailed analysis ever betrays her into inep The Edinburgh reviewer, from whom I have qu pares her fiction with that of Zola, and "The Costrell" may be cited in support of his conten have added, however, that though she is as su veying her meaning as the Nestor of realism, finer law of reticence. Or we may take an exam When "The History of David Grieve" was first hostile criticism was directed at the bold de temptations of Paris on the part of a woman wri

Readers who prefer the happy ending in fiction will resent the untimely deaths of Lucy Grieve and George Tressady, but they cannot deny the pathos and skill with which Mrs. Ward has unfolded the tragedy of the two marriages. To both husbands there came too late that revelation of a readjustment of ideals, which would have enabled them to take up their duty, hoping more because expecting less—to David Grieve, when his wife's fatal illness was to be discovered on the morrow, to Tressady on the eve of his fatal accident in the mine.

> His whole heart melted to her. As he held her to his breast, the hour they had just passed through took for both of them a sacred meaning and importance. Youth was going—their talk had not been the talk of youth. Was true love just beginning?—"David Grieve," Bk. IV., ch. vii.
>
> There was a sore, sad spot in each heart, and neither dared to look forward. But to-night there was a sense of belonging to each other in a new and sacred way, of being drawn apart, separated from the world, husband and wife together.—"Sir George Tressady," ch. xxiii.

The writer who can make us feel the truth of these human stories is worth a score of novelists who ring down the curtain on the wedding bells.

LAURIE MAGNUS.

Mrs. Humphry Ward's first literary work was done under the influences of the Bodleian Library. She was admitted to the great library at sixteen—the rules were more elastic then—and she once told an audience of young scholars that she was in the habit of climbing on steps and ladders and poking into all the corners of the rooms in which the most treasured books were kept. Her first literary payment was earned by some months of copying Wyclif's sermons from the Vernon MS. in the Bodleian for her father Mr. Thomas Arnold's edition of Wyclif's select works. Her first published tale was "A Westmoreland Story" which appeared in the Churchman's Magazine, and the first piece of writing that excited any notice was an article on the "Poema del Cid" for Macmillan's Magazine, published in 1872. It was Mark Pattison, we believe, who advised her to specialize her studies, and she took up Spanish history and literature to such good purpose that Dr. Wace asked her for articles on the Spanish kings and bishops for the Dictionary of Christian Biography, which he was editing in conjunction with Sir Wm. Smith. Mrs. Humphry Ward's first book was the simple children's tale entitled "Milly and Olly," illustrated by her friend Mrs. Alma Tadema, and published by Messrs. Macmillan just twenty years ago—the year in which the authoress came to live in London, her husband having accepted work on the staff of The Times. Her literary work for the next year or two consisted mainly of critical essays in Macmillan's Magazine and the Pall Mall Gazette, then under Mr. Morley's editorship. In 1881 came her first novel "Miss Bretherton," which Messrs. Macmillan issued, and in the following year the same publishers brought out her translation of Amiel's "Journal Intime" in two volumes—now in its second edition.

The next two and a-half years were spent by Mrs. Humphry Ward in writing "Robert Elsmere," and the book took the world by storm through Messrs. Smith, Elder in 1888. Its success was remarkable from the first, and it has been selling steadily ever since. In the six-shilling form alone the novel has gone through twenty-seven editions. Messrs. Smith, Elder also issue it in a two-volume cabinet edition and a popular edition at half-a-crown. In addition to these it has been published in a large sixpenny edition by Messrs. Newnes. Something like half a million copies have been sold in America, and it has been translated into German, Dutch, and Danish. "Robert Elsmere" has quite a literature of its own in the [illegible] only published in the two-shilling form. It w[illegible] that Mrs. Humphry Ward delivered her address a[illegible] tion of University-hall, the settlement which has [illegible] into the Passmore Edwards Settlement in Tavis[illegible] copies of the address (Smith, Elder) may still be [illegible] Ward's "Essex Hall Lecture" for 1891 on "Ideal[illegible] Future" was also printed and published (P. Gre[illegible]

"Sir George Tressady" (Smith, Elder) appe[illegible] and is in its third edition; "Helbeck of Bann[illegible] followed two years later, has reached its fifth. The [illegible] "Joubert's Thoughts" (Duckworth), translated b[illegible] Lyttelton, which also appeared in 1898, contained [illegible] Mrs. Humphry Ward, and in the following year [illegible] Brontë began to appear, with Mrs. Ward's introd[illegible] works. This year she has written a preface t[illegible] Webb's "The Case for the Factory Acts." [illegible] "Eleanor," published by Messrs. Smith, Elder [illegible] present in its fourth edition. Even before its pub[illegible] was an immense demand for it in America, where [illegible] Ward's novels are exceedingly popular. A play f[illegible] novel has been prepared by the authoress, which [illegible] to see shortly produced.

ENGLISH AND GERMAN UNIVE[illegible]

A "Personal View."

The ideal University should be the embo[illegible] highest intellectual national life. It was so, to a[illegible] in the Middle Ages, when Aristotle reigned [illegible] civilization did not bear the complex character wh[illegible] in modern days. Taking Oxford and Cambridge [illegible] English Universities, it may safely be said [illegible] of the twelfth century, "the place where t[illegible] England chiefly flourished in clerkly law," an[illegible] where the Dominicans and Franciscans held sway [illegible] representative of the nation as the German [illegible] schools of learning over whose portals was written, [illegible] excluditur, omnis est abiectus; Qui non Aristotel[illegible] tectus." The divorce between the school and th[illegible] from the downfall of scholasticism, and although at e[illegible] of our history our Universities partly regained [illegible] they formerly exercised over the national min[illegible] never recovered the ground they once occupied. [illegible] to democratize our ancient seats of learning in 18[illegible] the introduction of local examinations and the i[illegible] the "University Extension Movement," though [illegible] the most praiseworthy of motives, has not reall[illegible] our Universities. Even less successful would be [illegible] reform of our Universities by the introducti[illegible] foreign features unsuited to our national tempera[illegible] goes without saying that the culture of a peo[illegible] period is largely the outcome of national char[illegible] even idiosyncrasies. A purely academic bod[illegible] inadequately represent the nation. A truly natio[illegible] should ever give expression to the Zeitgeist.

The most striking difference between Germa[illegible] Universities is undoubtedly that, whilst the tw[illegible] German Universities are national institutions, o[illegible] intent and purpose confined to a small section o[illegible] Germany, the Universities at the Reformation [illegible] ecclesiastical yoke and became State establishment[illegible] and Universities are establishments of State, b[illegible]

State control, our Universities have retained in a great measure their mediæval character. The Church which has played so prominent a part in our national life still remains a paramount factor in our Universities. The atmosphere is still largely, from a social point of view, an ecclesiastical one. The collegiate system further strengthens and develops the spirit of caste. The position of unattached students is due to a social distinction, and not only to the fact that they are supposed to be unable to afford the cost of college residence. They represent, in fact, democracy knocking at the door of an exclusive aristocratic oligarchy.

The practical results of the two differing conceptions of the nature of a University may easily be imagined. The number of matriculated students at Oxford, according to the latest statistics, amounted to 3,446; the number at Cambridge is given at 3,016. There are more students at Berlin than at our two Universities. Professor Bryce stated in his introduction to Conrad's work in 1885 that Germany, with a population of 45,000,000, had 24,187 students, whilst England, with 26,000,000, had less than 5,500. The students in Germany are drawn from all classes of society. Business men and the lower middle classes, as in the Scotch institutions, are not satisfied unless their sons have had a college education. Our undergraduates belong almost exclusively to the aristocracy, the upper middle classes, and the higher professional orders.

The course and object of a University training consequently vary considerably in both countries. Our Universities have been reproached for making it their main object to turn out "gentlemen." Oxford and Cambridge, like Thackeray's Pall-Mall Gazette, are conducted by gentlemen for gentlemen. The general education provided in the course of arts, the stress laid on physical development, the cultivation of the social element in life all tend to produce that admirable type, an English gentleman. Que voulez-vous de plus? In Germany, where the object of the State Universities is to turn out capable and useful citizens, the curriculum is shaped accordingly. The Cambridge medical schools, among other things, of course, remind us that something has been done in this direction in England. But whilst with us a comparatively small number of students who become doctors or barristers in later life obtain their special training at the University, the German youths, as a body, receive their professional education at college. Concomitantly with the philosophical course, they attend lectures in the special faculty to which they belong. They cannot enter a public profession or hope to obtain any public office without having passed through the prescribed University course and submitting themselves in the end to a public examination. The moral training on the part of the State consists in allowing the undergraduate an amount of freedom which appears to us to be licence. The German student wears no special dress, is not bound by any regulations, and no proctor dogs his footsteps, as with our boys of larger growth. It is felt, rightly or wrongly, that manliness is best developed in an atmosphere of complete freedom. It serves, at death, a somewhat risky experiment, but it results in the survival of the fittest, and, after all, a compulsory morality is in danger of being no morality at all.

There remains another point to notice. Notwithstanding the intensely practical character of the German people, the German University is the home of scientific research. Science is cultivated for its own sake, and encouraged without any ulterior views. The most illustrious German scientists are

A MODERN GREEK ILIA

The political disturbances which have risen the translation of the Gospels into modern Gr puzzling to the foreigner. They are an incide the great struggle between ancient and mode has lately grown in importance, and which is interest to the student of literary history worth while to examine its bearing somewha

English readers who pick up a modern Gr are usually surprised at the resemblance it bear language. At first this tickles their fancy, a themselves by picking out all the words and p understand; but when it dawns upon them tha grotesque resemblance, they lay the paper down that the modern Greek language is a very poo Few go so far as to test their impressions by rea of traditional poetry; or, if they do, finding understand and less like the ancient in grammar they are quite ready to believe those who tell popular speech is corrupt. When perchance takes them as far as Athens, and they find t fessors or Parliament men whom they meet c style which more resembles the newspapers th and when these also tell them that the languag is corrupt and their own pure, the travellers are

Yet nothing could be more false. The facts The Greek pride of race was kept alive durin oppression by dwelling on past glories. When people succeeded in achieving their independenc in all things possible, to revive the past. A ancient authors were studied, ancient names their children, and the literary men set them whether the ancient language could not be gr modern. Hence, in the very first newspapers w that artificial process was begun whose results to-day. Inflections which had died out were which had changed were altered to their original words were used in place of those which had take Thus, there is no dative in modern Greek, but it newspapers. All over the Greek area the wor water are κρασί and νερό; but the archaists prefer and ὕδωρ, which no peasant could understand at a these things became the marks of the formal offic style; but in familiar intercourse they were n thus it comes about that the wine-seller will put his signboard, but if you go in and ask him for οἶν at you. By a curious inconsistency the would-be p not only words and accidence from ancient Gre from modern French. Thus the Greek language plural in addressing a single person, having its polite address; but the "educated" Greek t if you address him in the singular. Add to misunderstanding of the ancient syntax, and "literary" dialect which has not its like in barbarous and vulgar thing without character, turn suggests servile and ignorant mimicry. And ous jargon has the effrontery to call itself "pure" The corruption has gone far, and is fast sprea of the Government schools; for the teachers a should arise, may be imagined from the influence of Dante upon the Italian language. A Greek Dante would find a language impoverished, it is true, but still rich in possibilities. He would not attempt to oust any word of the popular speech, except, perhaps, some which have been borrowed from foreign languages. If a word has died because the thing meant by it has ceased to be thought about, such words he might fairly revive, but in a form suited to the modern type. Syntax, however, and accidence he must leave alone; those are not things which the reformer can meddle with, save within very narrow limits. In these it is no more possible to go back to ancient Greek than it would be to revive the Latin declensions in Italian, or to adorn the columns of The Times with Anglo-Saxon inflections. But judiciously used the ancient vocabulary would be an inexhaustible mine; and the modern Greek still retains a power of composition almost unlimited. How much might be done with these means may be seen, when we remember that the scientific vocabulary of Europe is Greek; and that words which look in English garb hideous and meaningless would explain themselves to the merest peasant of Greece. Do but speak the word φωτογραφία, for instance, and the peasant knows that you mean a picture made by means of light, although the method of making it may be strange to him.

Not yet has the Greek Dante appeared; but although most modern Greek writers are wallowing in the slough of insincerity, a few there have been who have shown true instinct for the use of language. Valaoritis of Corcyra is the most notable of these. He is not only a true poet, but an artist, and his thoughts are expressed in the language of the peasantry, refined and uplifted. There is grace and melody in his verse, which is rarely marred by anything unnatural in the language. Another such poet, but of less power, is Solomos; and much may be said in praise of many of the modern poets. Prose is less fortunate, as is apt to be the case when there is any tendency to artificiality; we see the same thing in Germany. There are, however, a few writers of tales and stories whose style is the simplest colloquial. If some of them carry their protest rather too far, that is to be expected; but, on the whole, they are singularly lucid and charming. Chief of them are Palamas, Karkavitsa, and Eftaliotis. These have preserved for us not only the pure dialect of the people, and their vivid and dramatic style, but pictures of modern peasant life which are invaluable. Many more could write thus if they chose. Axiotes, for example, and the Cretan Damverges are racy enough where their characters converse, but in their own persons they use a stilted and conventional style. But the historians, scholars, lawyers, and parliamentarians, from the literary standpoint, are a monstrous crew. Some of these have lately united into a Society for the Distribution of Useful Books, which are to be specially written, they claim, in a style neither vulgar nor leaning too much to the affectation of archaism. These books are to be distributed broadcast, with a view to improving the people's minds and of fixing at last a standard of style. The prospectus of this series, addressed to humble folk, proposes to open to them "the colossal pancosmic gate of the infinite"; and in the preface to a little book on astronomy (the translation, by the way, of a second-rate French work), we read that they hope to "give entrance to the mysteries of the Altogether." In English, the separate words of these phrases at least mean something; but to the Greek peasant even the words used are often absolutely unintelligible. The effect of this kind of thing upon simple lads from some place such as Cos or Mytilene is to intoxicate their intellects. I have received from such persons after Iliad,* which deserves more than a passing note, briefly to discuss it.

The national measure of modern Greek verse is the "political," having been invented in Constan "Polis" or capital of the Greek world. This lambic tetrameter catalectic, without rhyme. The been attempted in modern Greek by Antonia in b with disastrous results, and M. Pallis did wisely, as sistently, to take the popular measure instead. It necent, vowels when together being treated in Dante. Although the form of the modern sentence from the ancient, yet owing to the simplicity of M. Pallis keeps surprisingly close to his model words, as I have said, are as easily made new as eve and the stock epithet is a familiar device in Greek makes it all the easier for M. Pallis to translate success. Many of the proper names can be used forth change; Athena and Hera sound quite natural to to-day. Others are changed in accordance with mode Thus Agamemnon becomes Agamémnos, just as Cha Charos in popular ballads. So we have Apéllos and Lyssséas for Ulysses, Achilléas for Achilles; but unchanged. As βασιλεύς has become in modern Gr here Idomeneus changes into Idomenéas. It is re call Chryses and Chryseis Παναχρέσαι and Χρυσο again, some of the compounds need hardly a touch t intelligible: χερνιψάντο becomes χερονίφτηκαν, πολυή πολέτιχνος, ἀργυρότοξος becomes ἀργυροῦ ξυρος. The less skill in hitting upon these so close equival remoulding the whole word, which M. Pallis do conspicuous success. Sandy Pylos is now ἀμμοβόλτη Scaean Gate is Χερσοπόρτι; seven-gated Thebes is ἑπτάπη far-shooting Apollo, μακροβέλεχης Ἀπόλλων. For κε the modern πεντοσούγλα; ἔπεσε ἀμφὶ κίλλον appro καφκί, and ἑκατόμβη as ἑκατοβοδιά. Other happy tra λογαχρονισμένος for μυνυθάδιος, φτερωτὸ ζαρὸ for π βαρυοστεναγμοὺς for βαρὺ στενάχων, θεμοκτιρικαλοῦν κτιρικαλοῦσι for πολλὰ λίσσετο; all these words, be it perfectly intelligible to the unlettered peasant. If space, these might be multiplied manifold. Let us t or two familiar lines, as the "winged words" καὶ τῆς λαλεῖ ἐνὸ φτερωμένα λόγια; or "rosy-fingered dawn ῥοδοδάχτυλη κουρνοθριμένη Ἀβγοῦλα; or "Zeus the cloud- ὁ Δίος ὁ ἀστραπιφτὴς ὁ συγνεφοσυνάχτης. It must be n these are thoroughly idiomatic renderings, and yet the original. M. Pallis is no less effective in his n description. Here is his version of the famous de Ulysses' manner of speech:

> μὰ κι ὄρθιος σὰν τινάζουνταν ὁ γνωστικὸς Λυγάρας, > ἔστεκε χάμου σλέκοντας, μὶ μάτια στηλωμένα > στὴ γῆς, καὶ τὸ βαστεῖ μακρυστὰ γιὰ κίσω ἔν κοντο > μὶν' τὸ βαστοῦσι ἀσάλεφτο σὰν ἄπραχτος κανονιάς > λὶς εἶναν ἄθρωποι ζαβὴ, ξεκουτιασμένοι ἔτσι.
> μὰ τὴ μεγάλη τοῦ φωνὴ σὰν ἔχενε ἀπ' τὰ στήθια, > κι οἱ λόγοι του βγαίναν κυκνοὶ σὰ χιόνια τὸ χειμῶν > θεηρὸ ἔν εἶχε κουβένὰ νὰ φανεῖ τὸν Λυγάρα.

Throughout the work M. Pallis has been quick how best to appeal to the heart of the people, by echo ballads or popular custom. The fair woman, διὰ γυναι as usual in ballads, ἡ λεγερή; the heroes are πολλιάρ vows to enrich Apollo's "fine chapel" Σμύρνα, ἂν is not yet vulgarized, and if books like this could be used in the schools, a wholesome pride in their language might make the Greeks respect themselves more, and ape less the manners of other men.

The literary controversy which I have sketched above has within the last fortnight taken a new turn. The scorn and antagonism aroused by M. Pallis' version of the "Iliad" is as nothing to the effect of his last attempt, a version of the Gospel of St. Matthew in colloquial Greek. The enemies of the new movement saw their chance to enlist religious prejudices on their side. Consequently, the University students, who have spent so many laborious hours in unlearning their mother tongue, and felt it a point of honour, persuaded the theological faculty to make a protest to the Government, and the Patriarch of Constantinople has followed suit. The young Mohocks besieged the offices of the Acropolis newspaper, which had published the Gospel, and were hardly kept from sacking the whole place. Political quidnuncs also have seen their chance; and one M. Levidis, who was in ill odour because of his action in the late war, accused M. Pallis of being at the head of a Russian intrigue. There was talk of lynching M. Pallis for his "Iliad"; they must him to be cursed and excommunicated for his Gospel. The Metropolitan dare not curse him, because the Queen had a translation of the Bible made for the army a few years since, and on he has resigned; the Ministry has changed, and thus, though quiet has been restored for the moment, a literary quarrel has become a matter of high politics.

W. H. D. ROUSE.

ACROSS THE BORDER.

EDINBURGH, NOVEMBER 25, 1901.

An inquiry was made some time ago as to the number of persons still living who remember Sir Walter Scott. It would be almost as interesting to learn how many people remember De Quincey, whose remains lie in an apparently forgotten and uncared-for grave in St. Cuthbert's Churchyard, at the west end of Edinburgh. One who as a little girl had met the Opium Eater passed away the other day in Glasgow. Mrs. Jack, the wife of one of the Glasgow University professors, was a daughter of Professor J. P. Nichol, the well-known astronomer, and a nidus of the late Professor John Nichol. When, in 1841, De Quincey had conceived a strong interest in astronomical researches, he went to Glasgow in order specially to profit by concerns with Professor J. P. Nichol at the Observatory. He was housed with the Professor for three months in the Old College, and wrote some years later of Nichol as "always to me a most interesting man, who and whose wife were at Glasgow most kind to me." The late Mrs. Jack was only five years old at the time of De Quincey's visit, but she remembered him perfectly. She had also many interesting reminiscences of Emerson, Marsan, Kossuth, and other celebrities who had found their way to her father's house. She was herself a devoted student of literature, and wrote three novels, two of which were published in London and one in the columns of the Glasgow Weekly Herald.

Another death which must find a record here is that of Mr. George Johnston, who had been for the last two years London manager for Messrs. T. Nelson and Sons. Mr. Johnston entered the "trade" as an apprentice with the old Edinburgh firm of W. P. Nimmo in 1861. While there his literary tastes found an outlet in the editing of such works as "The Literary Bouquet," a volume of choice selections in prose and verse, and "Cupid's Birthday Book" (the quotations in which were entirely drawn from Shakespeare), and in translating from the French a number whose second-hand book shop in George-street is to the local book hunters of to-day as Mr. James S little further east was to the bibliomaniacs of time. The society has just had a piece of good fort into possession of "A Bibliography of Andrew Saltoun," compiled by Mr. R. A. Scott Macfi merchant, who has given eight years' leisure to the "pompous ass," the Earl of Buchan (the desig Henley's), declared that Fletcher was "the las whose religion was a divine philosophy in the so up Marcus Brutus for his pattern." He survives famous saying that, "if a man were permitted t ballads, he need not care who should make the law —a saying which he would really seem to have be Macfie's bibliography does not show that Fletcher great deal, but the list of his works will doubtless And the mention of ballads reminds us of "Annie its authorship. Most people, if asked who wrote t lyric, would probably reply that the author was a minstrel of old times. The original version was cer long enough ago—one hundred and eighty years the song which everybody sings now was written Scott, who died last year at a ripe old age. It w she had written other verses, but these were sec part only by her friends. They have now been will be published in a volume (with a memoir) und ship of Miss Warrender. Sir George Douglas wr Lady John Scott for the Scotsman, which wil volume of "Countryside Papers" to be publishe is perhaps worth noting that the Maxwelton estat the heroine of the song was born, is still held by a who are curious in the matter should see the Wallace's edition of Chambers' "Burns," Vol. III

The Scottish Universities promise to becom even Oxford and Cambridge. Mr. Carnegie bequest has stimulated the generosity of othe several important additions to the equipment Universities may be expected. One such additi been made in the case of Edinburgh. The w library of German literature has long handicappe in German, Dr. Otto Schlapp, and his student latter, Miss Joanna S. S. Gibson, has give £500 t required collection, and the library was formal week. The room in which the books are bestowed furnished in other respects, and busts of Molière of Goethe and Schiller, are among its adornmen hoped that some one will now do for the French Miss Gibson has done for the German. Anot bequest has fallen to Dundee. This is the superl pamphlets, paintings, engravings, and other works the history of Dundee which belonged to the Lamb. Mr. Lamb was an ardent bibliophile, w first editions, and it was his Kilmarnock "Burns knocked down to an American for the record sum The bequest will now form part of the P Collections.

ART.

With the International Society housed in su mity, it is much to the credit of the New English Art present exhibition—the twenty-seventh which the should show so little falling off in general interest includes so few men whose work sells before it vitality is the more remarkable. It speaks v liberality of the members, moreover, that nearly pictures at present shown are contributed by invi if these do not include the most interesting c they add much to the general interest. D. S. Rothenstein, W. T. Strang, Herbert Goodal attractiveness of the collection without being m is probable that the "Emmaus" is the most disc days. It is a testimony of some value to the breadth of view of the society that this picture should hang so close to figure work of such essentially differing intention as "The Oyster Beds," "The Bathers," and "The Plage (morning)," by Charles Conder. It is not that the treatment is so entirely different in the two cases, for it is no more diverse than the methods of Mr. Steer and of Mr. Orpen, but whereas the inspiring quality in the one is a solemn seriousness which is commendable and desirable, the force which appears to direct the delicate and poetic art of the other is of a most trivial and generally unworthy kind. All is idleness and indulgence, expressed with a charm which, now that Mr. Whistler paints so little and William Stott, of Oldham, has passed away, is but seldom seen, and presents the distressing spectacle of a poet's eye and hand wasting their power over what is worthless and meretricious. Mr. Wilson Steer, on the other hand, takes himself and his art much more seriously, and would do admirably if he had more of Mr. Conder's grace and nebulous quality. His "Mirror," for example, is unusually well painted, and is more artistically real than Albert Moore's or Alma Tadema's treatment of a very similar idea, but it has not the suavity of "A Summer Night," nor the well-arranged composition never absent from the work of Sir Alma Tadema. Mr. Orpen is very personal in both "A Window in London Street," and "The Window Seat," but he is not quite happy—in fact, he appears to be uncommonly sad—with either subject. A lack of luminosity is the chief fault, the greens are bottle-greens, and the windows appear to be open without letting either air or light into the pictures; but the touch is so sure, the draughtsmanship so skilful that Mr. Orpen has only to forget his peculiarities to be able to give us some very noteworthy work. For the rest, Mr. D. S. MacColl's "Belfry and Watch Tower of Calais," the "Knight Errant" of Mr. Arthur Tomson, the "Landscape Study" of Mr. W. Y. Macgregor, the work of Mr. George Thomson and of Mr. Hartrick and Mr. Moffat Lindner help materially towards the creation of a most interesting exhibition.

It would be a task of some pleasure to be able to demonstrate that the Royal Society of British Artists had succeeded, in their present exhibition, in maintaining the improvement shown in the collection which was opened in the spring of the present year. But the society has succumbed to the artless wiles of the picture maker, and its very existence is threatened. The older members paint a little worse than usual and the new men are not seen at all at their best. It is a painter's exhibition, and the artist, the man who has something new to say, is unaccountably absent. Mr. Cayley Robinson has succumbed to the influence. Sir Wyke Bayliss paints with the same old unemotional dexterity, Mr. Graham Robertson is by no means real, Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Macintosh, and even Mr. Giffard Lenfestey are commonplace, and only Mr. Christie appears to have made an effort to rouse himself from the well-tried convention. His "Echo" is vigorous in execution and cunning in conception. It provokes comparison with a host of earlier painters, but on the whole so well carried out is the bold scheme that the picture redeems a very dull collection from the hopelessly commonplace. We wish we could say as much for the exhibits of most of the members.

The successes obtained in years past by painters of religious subjects account for the frequent efforts made to attract their particular public. But a Doré, a Tissot, or a Munkacsy cannot appear every year, and the large "Christ's Prayer after the Last Supper," by M. Eugène Burnand, now at the Dowdeswell Galleries, does not appear to have the elements of a popular success. It is painted too much in the manner of the Primitives to appeal directly to the artistically uneducated, and it is too merely painstaking to attract the art student. It has interest as a scheme of white upon white—the white table, the white wall, and the white draperies—but this is hardly sufficient to arouse the critical interest of the artist.

Mr. Augustine Birrell, in his somewhat new rôle of patron of the fine arts, is to open an exhibition of pictures by Scottish Artists at the Whitechapel Art Gallery on December 12.

an examiner in design under the Board of Edu connexion with the Royal School of Art Needlework publish a quarterly portfolio of designs for the which should fill a gap which has long existed in ar The designs are mainly original, but certain examples of the best historical and contemporar work will be included. The designs will be ac explanatory text. Such a quarterly should be of value, not only to students, but to the enthusiast who are doing so much good work in connexion wi Arts and Industries Association.

"Scottish Architectural Details" (25s. n.) is th interesting collection of sketches and measured good examples of old Scottish work which Mr. Jo has issued through Mr. Aeneas Mackay, of St. Examples are given of both ecclesiastical and do stone, wood, and metal work, and Mr. Small has b pains to omit the obvious subjects generally illustrated in such works. Thus, for example, Holyrood is only drawn upon for part of the nave piers of the Abbey Church and for a few examples of metal work in the Palace, and a very poor monument "in the Adams style" is chosen from Melrose Churchyard. The fine chancel arch from Duddingstone Church well deserves its place in this collection. If a further edition is called for Mr. Small would confer a service by giving some indication of the scale of his drawings.

THE COBBLER, WELLS CAT
(From the Illustrated Edition of "Sco permission of Messrs Cassell. Se

CURRENT LITERATUR

SPAIN.

THE SPANISH PEOPLE: THEIR ORIGIN, GROWTH, AN By MARTIN A. S. HUME. (W. Heinemann, GLORIES OF SPAIN. By CHARLES W. WOOD. (Macmil

Mr. Hume, as the editor of a "Spanish State P the author of "Modern Spain," "Philip II. of Spain its Greatness and Decay," and other works bea Iberian peninsula, brings to bear upon the subjec the new volume of the series of "The Great People ledge as full as it is varied. The chronicler of the Spain, tracing its long chequered career with its m tudes, from prehistoric ages, through the Roman, Moslem periods to its culminating point of gre glory in the sixteenth century, and its subsequent r and fall down to the present day, with the poss future which is full of uncertainty, has, indeed, a mos task before him. For Spain is the land of romanc lence; there is an atmosphere of poetry about it the single exception of Italy, is to be found in no oth country. On the other hand, the story in its telli considerable difficulties to the narrator owing a lens, which at one time commanded the commerce of the world, and that of Castile and the Christian States in the interior, which, absorbed in municipal affairs and the development of their civic life, demurred to the idea of forming relationship with the outer world. Other reasons for the lack of assimilation were racial characteristics and idiosyncracies which continued to assert themselves notwithstanding the attempts made to keep them within bounds. The autochthonous Iberians refused to be suppressed. Roman civilization cast its spell over them, but it was only an evanescent influence; the Gothic sway, based on the recognition of individuality and political freedom, left but few traces behind, except in Northern and Central Spain. Among the invaders, the only one who made a lasting impression on the people of the land appears to have been the Semite. It was not until the accession of the "Catholic Kings," with which the chapter of Modern Spain opens, that the nation was firmly welded together. Prospects of national aggrandisement, opened up by conquests abroad and the discovery of America, as well as the unification promoted by the Inquisition, which became a most powerful political instrument in the hands of the Sovereign, rivetted the bonds which held the nation together. But the most potent factor in the process of transformation was the great Queen whose daring genius effected in a lifetime what long centuries had failed to accomplish.

Mr. Hume throws no fresh light on the question of the origin of the Spanish people. That the Iberians were related to their namesakes in the regions of the Caucasus, as the Phœnicians seemed to have believed, is extremely doubtful. They were probably of African origin. What is certain is that when invaded they were the masters of two-thirds of Spain and that at one time their empire extended over the South of France, Italy, and, probably, parts of Great Britain. The Phœnicians, Greeks, and Celts succeeded in dislodging them from the greater number of the territories held by them, but they maintained themselves in the region designated by the Romans as "Aquitania," and the Celt-Iberian towns (of which Diodorus Siculus gives an interesting account) became possessed of a high degree of civilization at an early period of their history.

A somewhat meagre account is furnished of the Phœnician and Carthaginian settlements. Phœnicia established several colonies in the fifth century before Christ, but commercial relations between them and Iberia dated probably from the fifteenth century before our era. Carthage, likewise, although its sway over the peninsula commenced with the conquest of Cadiz, had at least a century before cast longing eyes on a country which was reported to contain fabulous riches. The Roman occupation was memorable because of its share in the political organization of the country. In return the vanquished people enriched the silver age of Latin literature with several products of literary genius. An additional page or two might well have been devoted to some of their achievements. The Gothic domination, although it left no permanent work on Spanish history, was instrumental in developing the material resources of the land. Mr. Hume offers an ingenious explanation for the non-amalgamation of the two races. The truth is that racial and religious traditions kept them apart and that Recceswinth's attempts at fusion came too late. The account of the history of Orosius is not very lucid: its object was to vindicate Christianity against the charge that it had broken down the Roman Empire. The author has an excellent chapter on Arabic culture. But surely some mention ought to have been made of such men as inevitable decay. Mr. Hume brings out eloquen Philip's religious crusade. But the personal c ruler, his short-sighted internal policy and the tions engendered thereby, led in no small degr which developed later on.

Although we have briefly indicated one or t strike us after a perusal of Mr. Hume's vo susceptible of improvement, we strongly comm
the attention of our readers. It is full of int presented in a very readable form. It is never v particularly eloquent, but it maintains the l mediocrity" from beginning to end. There is a end of each chapter giving a bird's-eye view o period which students will find very useful. Th good deal to desire.

In the "Glories of Spain" Mr. Charles is known to the public as the author of several en of travel, takes us on a tour through that pict
He shows us Barcelona, ancient in years and m Montserrat, with its lofty range of mountains; old-world streets and gateways. We roam wi wide plains of Aragon; see Zaragoza, with towers, and turrets, and domes, and palaces, and by him to romantic little towns far off the extremely beautiful. The best chapters in the b those which describe Tarragona, "the garden Wood is an ideal guide. A keen observer, not practised eye, whilst his highly-cultivated artist tastes revel in the atmosphere of romance and the country is steeped, and his "enthusiasm makes him feel an interest in every human bein is brought into contact, from the Spanish woman plicity of charms and graces he is fully alive, do the boot-cleaner, with his touching idyll of do
There are some delightful talks with all sorts a men and women in the book. The illustrations

MARY RICH.

Mary Rich, Countess of Warwick, 1625-167
and Friends. By Charlotte Fell Smit 18s. n.)

Mary Rich, Countess of Warwick. By Mar
(Dent. 4s. 6d. n.)

The daughter of the great Earl of Cork, the of the famous Lord High Admiral, second Earl o
many other famous women, lays claim to immort strength of a remarkable career, perhaps not ev a remarkable personality, but for the sole and si she perseveringly wrote up a "Journal Intime."
a century ago a few extracts from the diary and well as the whole of an autobiographical man Mary, Countess of Warwick, were given to the were sufficiently interesting to arouse curio author, especially as the extract from the diary public through a "medium unlikely to inspire adequate attention had been paid to its historic ever might have been the case in regard to its re
It was, consequently, with considerable eagerne
Smith some years ago devoted herself to the exam

Miss Fell Smith, who has had the useful experience of editing the Essex Review. The meditations and diary are, perhaps, too "savoury" to appeal to a lay public, and Miss Fell Smith very wisely reinforces them with interesting illustrations of the social life of the period. It seems a pity that Miss Fell Smith's book—announced by the publishers some time back—has not been allowed to keep the field alone. We have no quarrel with Miss Palgrave's brightly-written book, except that it occasionally exhibits a lack of sympathy with un-Puritanical personalities that appear in her heroine's life-story. But Miss Fell Smith, by her article in the "Dictionary of National Biography," had acquired a prior right in the subject, and, moreover, had spent laborious years in amassing her materials.

The father of our heroine was one of the brilliant adventurers of the Elizabethan age, though he carved out his fortunes not by buccaneering expeditions on the Spanish Main, but by the speculative acquisition of encumbered estates in Ireland, which he developed so successfully that he became one of the richest subjects of the Crown. Miss Fell Smith has extracted from his papers very interesting details of his patriarchal life and vast establishment at Lismore. Among his innumerable anxieties not one of the least was the arrangement of matrimonial alliance for his large family. Most of Richard Boyle's children, who grew to maturity, were characterized by a certain distinction. Roger Boyle, of whom, as Earl of Orrery, Miss Fell Smith has a fine portrait, was created Lord Broghill at six years old—for the services he had done King Charles! As a young man he made a gallant defence of Lismore against the Irish rebels. He was won over to the Parliamentary service by the tact of Cromwell, but was raised to an earldom at the Restoration. Not content with the reputation as soldier and man of action which he earned in his command in Ireland and his Presidency of the Council in Scotland, he aspired to literary renown. His romance of "Parthenissa," which is interesting as a forerunner of the English novel, ran into six volumes, though it was never completed. Dorothy Osborne's criticism of it was, "'Tis handsome language," but "the ladies are all so kind, they make no sport." Robert Boyle, Roger's better-known brother, was not fitted for action. His fragile health, which prompted Evelyn to compare him to "a crystal or Venice glass," debarred him from any but a literary career. He does not seem to have derived any remarkable benefit from "the usefullest cordial" which he had met—dried flesh of vipers. He is, of course, best known as the founder of the Royal Society and of the Boyle lectures. The literary virtuoso will be more interested in him as the author of "Seraphic Love," which he composed at our heroine's seat—"Delicious Leez"—to indoctrinate a friend, disappointed in love, "with his own view of the inferiority of earthly passion." The most charming of all the Boyles, Lewis, Lord Kinalmeakie, whose face looks out from the portrait at Marston with something of the fascination that it exercised on his friends, met an untimely but not inglorious death at Liscarrol. "He died as a gallant officer does, riding at the head of his troop, shot through the heart by a musket-shot." In the November issue, by the way, of the Beacon, a good local journal published at Bath, Mr. J. F. Meehan, the editor, gives an account of Richard Boyle, and of the family seat, Marston House.

But we are losing sight of the central figure. Mary Boyle showed a spirit unusual in young ladies of her day by refusing—in spite of the withdrawal of all pocket-money and allowances—the match which her father proposed, and persisting in her resolve to marry a mere younger son. Her own account of the

together with as many promises as any person in th could make of his endeavouring to make up to me the
of his fortune by the kindness he would have still to consented to be his wife; that though I can truly when he knelt down by me I was far from having re own I would have him, yet his discourse so far preva
I contented to give him, as he desired, leave to let h mention it to mine. And I promised him that, let h his father say what he pleased, I would own it.

The ineligible Charles Rich became unexpectedly Warwick, and Mary's life ran on in outward seeming, smoothly at "Delicious Leez." She escaped from the the Civil War, which fell so heavily on the rest of her fa nearest approach of the war-cloud was when Lord O Sir Charles Lucas descended upon Lees in search of ar ill-omened occasion when Sir Charles fell, with his be him, as he rode out of the courtyard on his way to Col
We quote from Miss Fell Smith's brief relation of th close to that siege, because Miss Palgrave has treat unsympathetic manner the gallant and ill-fated cavalier

On August 28, at 2 in the afternoon, sentence wa but time was to be granted to the condemned for minister and partaking of the communion. Shortly be down that night they were brought out by the little po
the southern grassy slope of the castle bailey.
Ireton, Whalley, and Rainsborough had been appointe the sentence carried out and stood there awaiting the leaders. The two soldiers embraced each other, ex a parting word, and then shots were fired on Lu Lisle stooped and kissed his dead comrade's face, then the firing party to come nearer. "I'll warrant, Sir," s
the men, "we'll hit you." "Friends," replied Lisle, been nearer you when you have missed me." But they did not miss.

Mary's devotional life was the result of an appre that whatever misfortune befell her or hers was a Divi ment. She has recorded the occasion of what she reg a change of heart.

At last it pleased God to send a sudden sickness only son, who I then doted upon with a great fondness beyond expression struck at it, not only because of t ness for him, but because my conscience told me it wa backsliding. Upon this conviction, I presently retired and by earnest prayer begged of him to restore my ch did then solemnly promise if he would hear my p would become a new creature. This prayer of mine G so gracious as to grant, and of a sudden began to res child, which made the doctor himself wonder at the amendment he saw in him, and filled me then with thoughts.

This bargain with Providence turned out someth disappointment. The young Lord Rich died shortly a marriage, and Mary was left childless. Nor was he married life very happy. The Earl of Warwick was for invalid racked by the torments of gout, which wrung a good deal of bad language. Mary was in constan thinking of the fate which would be her husband's in life. She was wonderfully submissive to the Puritan divi swarmed about the mansion of Lees, but she was not th and austere person that these divines would have liked her. Miss Fell Smith remarks:

We have seen by some of her writings that she observant, wise, tender, scornful, and even slightly s
She could flame into a passion when her sense of dece right was offended. Once she penitently records being s into saying under her breath "the divel is in you," wh
one was indulging in conversation she thought unfit

"SOCIAL ENGLAND."

Since its first publication eight years ago SOCIAL ENGLAND has become an indispensable adjunct to the study of English history. There is no other book quite like it; no book which presents so comprehensively and with so much erudition that side of the story which is not concerned with individuals and events, with kings and battles and treaties, but with the multitudinous life of the people which lay behind, and which it is so much more difficult to revive. The late Mr. J. R. Green saw the value of such a study, and "Social England" was the outcome of the revived interest in the life of the past which he represented. The book, too, was a singular instance of successful co-operation, and, under the judicious editorship of Mr. Traill, a real unity was achieved by the many contributors. We are glad, then, to have another new edition such as that of which the first volume is now published by Messrs. Cassell (12s. n.).

HOW THE PRE-NORMAN ENGLISH DINED AND SLEPT.

Dinner Party at a Round Table (MS. Tib. C. vi.), Beds with Curtains (MS. Claud. B. iv.).
[From the Illustrated Edition of "Social England," by permission of Messrs. Cassell.]

But the new edition differs from all the former ones and assumes a new and much more valuable character. It is an illustrated edition. The new interest attaching to the volume is much greater than may appear from this simple statement. In our armchair at home, and we have retu or regret to the mediæval method of tea pictures. We feel more and more that themselves sequius irritant. The publ
"Short History" saw that they must yie but we doubt whether any book invited t imperatively as "Social England." There is pictorial information about the early life o not been turned to any comprehensive prac course, not nearly exhausted in the pres editor, Mr. J. S. Mann, claims with some j treasures are here revealed, and a large the first time. The students and workers England had a keen interest in the life arou bound by no forms or conventions. Th realities; they did not understand an a from themselves and the life around them a column for a cathedral and slips and capital a little study of the village c page 509); the monk illuminating his known Luttrell Psalter is the best inst covers his page with little pictures o which he knows. All this and more us. We have photographs of all kin t stores of available MSS.; photogra armour, boats, coins, pottery; facsi documents; abundant views of histo appear to-day, of architectural detai esting ruins; maps, plans, and other features, while over thirty pages a beginning of the volume to notes on the of the illustrations. The whole sel great judgment, and the size of the pictures to be inserted, we think, in a with the letterpress which they illust changes in the new edition are no Jacobs writes a new section on "Th and the sections on the military history Britain, as also those on social life, hav while here and there a slight rearrang tion has been made. The list of auth each period has, we notice, also been rev some later published works. The list be adequate though not exhaustive; such important recent works, for instance, as "The Welsh People" and "The Celtic Church in Wales," which are not mentioned at the end of the first period, can hardly be ignored by the student of Celtic Britain. The present volume goes down to 1273 and has an index to itself. There are to be six volumes in all, and the whole will be a work of great value. If NATURAL SCIENCE.

THE CAMBRIDGE NATURAL HISTORY. Vol. VIII.—AMPHIBIA AND REPTILES. By HANS GADOW, Ph.D., M.A., F.R.S. (Macmillan. 17s. n.)

The appearance of this excellent and beautifully illustrated work is a distinct event in zoological literature. Hitherto books on these animals have been either incomplete in their treatment of the subject or marred by inaccuracy and want of first-hand knowledge. Birds, mammals, and, to a less extent, fish have found their historians, and one can point to several standard works to which the lay and the professional naturalist can refer for information of the life and structure of these animals with the certainty of finding it. With reptiles (using the term in the old sense to include amphibia and reptilia) it is otherwise. The ordinary natural histories deal in a very cursory way with the curiously persistent and widespread accounts of the supposed poisonous nature of these animals; of their living in blocks of stone; of their raining down over the roads and fields of a whole country-side. The intelligent layman who has time to indulge his inclinations in natural history, and to whom the war in South Africa, the state of education, and the agricultural problems are not the boundaries of his thought, must often agree with Gilbert White that our reptiles, "few as they are, I am not so well acquainted with as well as I could wish, with regard to their natural history."

Perhaps the chief merit of Dr. Gadow's book—difficult though it is to particularize where all is good—lies in this, that it converts animals whose names connote all that is most vile and loathsome into creatures of singular beauty, complexity, and attractiveness, and that it invests them with a most unexpected importance. First helped by Miss Durham's admirable drawings and the vivid accounts in the text, we gain a clear idea of the living frog, salamander, or lizard. We learn how they pass the winter or the dry season; how during this period they overcome the difficulties of breathing and of starvation; and how they are prevented from drying up. And then when the spring or wet season comes, we see how the winter sleep and the long fast are broken, and how a new and intensely coloured livery is assumed with the advent of the reproductive period. Of all the quaint devices for protecting the young, we have met with none so grotesque and yet effective as those described by Dr. Gadow. He tells how the males of some frogs swallow the eggs and store them in their vocal sacs; how others carry them on their back or on their belly, or tucked away in pits in the skin. Then the strange differences between the tadpoles and their parents afford ample scope for a writer of Dr. Gadow's stamp. He shows how in the swift mountain streams the tadpoles have big effective suckers to give them a grip of the rocks; how others possess a great funnel into which they draw floating fry of all kinds and presently engulf them; how in all tadpoles the structure of every part of the body is adapted for a fish-like existence; and how the rapid and far-reaching changes which ensue when they turn into frogs or toads, convert the individual into what is practically a new animal.

All this is but a preliminary to Dr. Gadow's more important sections. After familiarizing us with the main facts of reptilian life and anatomy, he proceeds to show how we may picture the present state of these animals to have come about. Between fishes and amphibia in spite of the fish-like habits of tadpoles—there is, according to our present know-interest and importance which attaches to them would justified him in describing them at greater length than done. Many were giants, one of whose footprints would, with water, be large enough for their modern pigmy de to disport in. They flowered out into armoured type covered Europe, America, and South Africa, and then d as unaccountably as many of their descendants, the Di Icthyosaurs, and all that mighty host of reptiles of the Se period. Their origin is lost in obscurity. Probably the from fishes of which the Polypterus of the Nile is al sole survivor, but, however they arose, these primitive a form one of the most interesting groups of animals, sin them, in a way which Dr. Gadow makes as plain as the e will allow, have arisen forms which have branched o extinct reptiles, modern lizards, tortoises, and snakes. F of these extinct groups (probably the Theromorph mammalia have been descended, and to another—at unknown—birds owe their origin.

The study of reptiles viewed in this light assume importance, and, in whatever light Dr. Gadow's w estimated, it will be welcomed as a brilliant exposition present state of our knowledge of two groups of animals history has a direct bearing on the origin of mankin congratulate the author, the editors, and the publishers new volume of the "Cambridge Natural History." It is valuable education in itself, and adds greatly to the imp of a series already distinguished by its attractiveness, ship, and originality.

ZOOLOGY. An Elementary Text-book. By A. E. SHIPLEY and E. W. McBRIDE, M.A., D.Sc. "Cambridge Science Manuals." (University Press. 10s. 6d. n.)

The teacher of zoology is constantly asked by prof and lay students who are beginning his subject, "Wh book of zoology do you recommend?" and as constantly it impossible to recommend a book that shall suggest the and attractiveness of the difficult problems of animal life the same time stimulate the interest and reasoning faculty than temporarily fill the mind with disconnected facts. C animals (certain insects, the crayfish, and birds), it is true are books which deal with the subject in this spirit, bu is no recent attempt, as far as we know, to show, withou than a necessary minimum amount of detailed anato nomenclature, what are the general phenomena of ani what are the problems which these phenomena prese how far they have been solved.

The fact is, the plan upon which text-books of zool written was adopted long ago, and has been steadily adh though its value has now diminished—an example o curious faithfulness to tradition which is such a marked of natural scientists. This plan consists in describi anatomy of each of the chief groups of animals in great with a few words on the habits, life-histories, and distrib each group. The main thing, however, is anatomy, result, even in the best hands, is that the text-book wri these lines becomes a list of detailed specifications of el and delicate machines, built up after a number of patt the most part unrelated to each other, though a specio ness is often suggested (perhaps inadvertently) by th the same names for parts of different machines. If we acc doctrine of descent, it is clear that some connexion b of animals—the Echinoderms—to which star-fishes, sea-urchins, feather-stars, and their allies belong, Messrs. Shipley and McBride conclude:—"Whilst the structure of the adult is utterly unlike that of other Coelomata, the structure of the young is reconcilable with the fundamental structure of Annelida, Mollusca, etc."; or, to translate out of the jargon of zoologists, a star-fish is utterly unlike a worm or a mollusc, but the young star-fish has an organization fundamentally comparable with that of a worm or a whelk. What the fundamental structure of "etc." may be, and how structures are to be "reconciled," the authors leave vaguely to the imagination of their readers.

One would think that such a remarkable conclusion—important and far-reaching if true—would require a little evidence in its support and a little expansion to render it intelligible. But we are vouchsafed none. A very imperfect figure and an incomplete description of the young of one of the least-known divisions of the Echinoderms is all that we are given. We are not told whether it has a nervous system or muscles or sense organs. We are not told how it gives rise to the adult whose structure is so surprisingly different. We are not able to compare it with the young of Annelids or Molluscs, for the authors omit any descriptions or figures of these. We are left with an unintelligible statement at the very point where students find the greatest difficulty and require the most assistance.

The intentions of the authors as set forth in the preface are excellent. Their book does contain a well-arranged account of the facts of adult anatomy and habits which, considered within the limits of any one group, would prove a useful guide to that group. But such treatises exist already; and the present volume, which perpetuates the old mischievous distinction between knowledge of form and of function (as though the one could be studied intelligently without the other); which neglects the phenomena of colour and change of colour; in which the relationships of groups are dealt with without any separate consideration of the principle of homology; which, while telling us at the beginning that nearly all the problems of zoology centre round the origin of species, ends by leaving us without any definite idea of what a species or a variety may be; such a work cannot be said to carry out the intentions of the authors or to satisfy the pressing requirements of teachers or students.

PRACTICAL HISTOLOGY, by Professor J. N. Langley (Macmillan, 6s.), is a summary of the best methods of demonstrating the microscopical structure of the tissues of vertebrate animals, and is largely based on the personal experience of the author. Such a book, the outcome of twenty years' teaching, cannot fail to be of great assistance to medical students and their teachers. In two directions its usefulness might be increased. It deals perhaps too exclusively with the organs of vertebrates. Certain of these—the liver and the retina of the eye, for example—offer great difficulties to the beginner, whereas the corresponding structures of certain invertebrates have a far simpler structure and are composed of fewer and larger elements. The other suggestion refers to the absence of any directions for ascertaining the acid-reaction of the stomach and generally the acid, basic, or neutral properties of tissues. It is because the same serious omission occurs in other text-books of histology and even of chemical physiology that we venture to suggest that directions on this subject may be inserted in a future edition such as a standard work of this kind cannot fail to reach.

ITALIAN HISTORY.

The book unfolds the life-history of two l and Alexander VI.; of the remarkable famil which he made such ample provision; of a Ge (subsequently canonized), and of an eighteen who was both virtuous and a virtuoso. One of the work is the author's weakness for al personages with all the formality of a Mas a task which becomes increasingly difficult, descendant of the "family-Pope" died under the weight of forty-seven surnames marriage in the course of centuries) and of orders and peerages—all given at full length

In spite of this defect (from the reader' book is anything but a dry pedigree of ar The story of this "famous-infamous" Hous the author, "of the healing of the Grea Renascence of letters and the arts; of the in of the Muslim invasion of Europe; of the Pontifical sovereignty, which endured till 18 of a World; of the discovery, by man, of M pretty large claim, but Baron Corvo is not on a later page he adds to these high matter nation in the Tridentine decrees, which " owes to the House of Borgia." Indirectly, for the judgment of most historians (but has credited "the Lord Alexander P.P. things to such a pass that some reform Hardly a charge has ever been levelled a utterly unscrupulous pontiff which the Bar either to discredit or to palliate. In his he tells us that his object is not simply House of Borgia, because he holds that "all words to tell." With a fine contempt for th history, he asks why "good hours of sunlight the judgment-seat by those who will present turn in the dock." Certainly he wastes n Borgia is in question; his own position i naive, and occasionally maladroit, counsel fo said, for instance, that Alexander secured acally by promising gifts and benefices to return for their support. To this Baron C Conclave being secret (he describes it minut no proof that these gifts were the price of reminds us that simony was only legally p Julius II., who was the disappointed can Conclave! Again it is alleged that Alexan spiritual power to build up temporalities counsel retorts that to avoid this would hav "it was the imperious necessity of the situ ing of all, perhaps, is the process by which this Pope to have been "a very faithful Pas his eleven years' pontificate (which are co to the Epistles of St. Peter) were more than how then, asks the author triumphantly, c had the time to accomplish the turpitudes been charged? A simple computation will him twelve hours' work in the day (Su would have had just three minutes for eac clear proof that his own share in their small!

We cannot say seriously that this wo upon an exceedingly dark period. In spite faculty. And yet though occasionally inaccurate and always hopelessly injudicial, Baron Corvo writes in a vigorous, picturesque fashion, with some of that "flippant heartless versatility" which belonged to the era that he has chosen to illustrate.

Savonarola.

It is singular that two such excellent lives of the great Florentine preacher as THE LIFE OF SAVONAROLA, by E. L. S. Horsburgh (Little Biographies) (Methuen, 3s. 6d.), and SAVONAROLA, by the Rev. G. McHardy, D.D. (the World's Epoch-makers), (T'lark, 3s.), should appear almost simultaneously. Both bear evident traces of patient study and sympathetic interpretation; and the point of view which the authors take is nearly the same. Each makes it plain that Savonarola was no charlatan, but a prophet of righteousness, and that his failure and death were due to his unfortunate, but perhaps inevitable, combination of the rôles of preacher and politician. Dr. McHardy, with more space at his disposal, contrives to be fuller and more graphic, while Mr. Horsburgh is more judicious and discriminating; but both books are written in a style of distinction, and show a firm grasp of the subject and its bearing upon the history of the time. It was once the fashion to label Savonarola as "a fanatic"; but such a description does not advance us one step towards the comprehension of his large and lofty nature. In claiming for him a place among the World's Epoch-makers Dr. McHardy is perhaps inclined to exaggerate his true position. We think rather, with Mr. Horsburgh, "that he was neither much behind his age nor much in advance of it," and that little would have been known to-day of his revivalist successes if he had not mixed in politics and paid for his interference with his life. Still he has the merit of having demonstrated in a small but prominent arena how short-lived a reformation of morals must have been, while the abuses of the mediæval Papacy, from a political and constitutional standpoint, remained unchallenged. It has been well said that his independent reform of his own convent was a first step towards a national church; and his attitude towards the Pope, however illogical, was, like that of Grosseteste in earlier times, an anticipation of "an ampler day." Circumstances made him, as a moral reformer, the champion also of the liberties of Florence; but his zeal for freedom did not pass beyond the bounds of the city; as Mr. Horsburgh points out, he hated Pisa like a genuine Florentine. And he did not always rise superior to party passion; his refusal to insist on the right of appeal when claimed by his enemies, though he had himself boasted of having secured it for Florence, will remain (in spite of Villari's defence which Dr. McHardy echoes) a serious blot upon his character. Mr. Horsburgh discusses with great judgment the nature of his prophetic claims, and finds them to have been entirely sincere; yet the danger of so narrow a platform for his influence over a fickle populace is illustrated by his tragic end. Both these books would perhaps have been more complete if space could have been found for a critical estimate of Savonarola's sermons with some extracts. We must not forget, however, to give our meed of praise to the dainty binding and excellent photographs which adorn Mr. Horsburgh's work.

Professor Villari's admirable work, THE TWO FIRST CENTURIES OF FLORENTINE HISTORY, translated by Linda Villari, has lately appeared in a new edition (Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d.). The book ends with the death of the Emperor Henry VII.; and it is much to be wished that the learned author would undertake the continuation of it, on the second, or decadent, period of the Republic, at which he hints in his preface to the English version. The present edition is well illustrated, chiefly from views of Etruscan and Roman antiquities discovered in different parts of Florence. It is not clear, however, why the two bas-reliefs by Rovezzano in the Bargello, which are promised in the list of illustrations, do not appear in the text.

---

noticeable that, in this new efflorescence of the old lang the Troubadours, those who began the movement did not a any more complex motive than a kindly desire to giv country-folk a simple and homely literature in the langua they spoke and understood. Provençal has never ceass spoken on its native soil; it had never quite died o written language; but very few of those who employ various dialects of Southern France were men of any p talent. Before Joseph Roumanille, the father of the p movement, the name of Jasmin (some of whose works Lon has rendered familiar to us in translation) stands nearly and Jasmin's dialect was different from that of the Fé It was Roumanille's idea to raise his native patois of Saint out of the mire into which it had sunk; he preached assid the gospel of his home speech; and one day he discovere —"l'enfant sublime" who has since carried his dre realization. The boy was Frédéric Mistral. Under his the Saint-Rémy patois has been developed and expanded beautiful literary language, and a new intellectual li been awakened in the valley of the Rhône. He was once the founder of the Félibrige, and the inventor name—a name which has puzzled not a little those wh tried to explain its origin and etymology. Accord Professor Downer. Mistral came upon it in an old hymn, the expression is used that the Virgin met Jesus in the among "the seven Félibres of the law." Seven poe present at the first meeting, on May 21, 1854, when the was formed, and the number seven seems to have almost a meaning in the eyes of a Félibre, who will speak of the chief churches of Avignon, its seven gates, seven colleges hospitals, seven Popes who were there for seventy years, forth.

Frédéric Mistral was born on September 8, 1830, at Ma a small village near Saint-Rémy, situated in the centr broad plain at the foot of the Alpilles. The poet live still, and with the exception of one or two visits to Pa lived there almost uninterruptedly. He was the only chil father's second marriage, and his father's first meeting w mother was, like that of Boaz with Ruth, among the glea his harvest. Mistral's education was for the most pa boarding-school in Avignon, where he is stated t attempted a translation, in Provençal, of the first ecl Virgil. Here he first met with Roumanille, who had c take up a post as teacher. "It is not too much to say," Mr. Downer, "that the revival of the Provençal languag out of that meeting." Master and pupil became firm f Through Roumanille he came to know Aubanel, Crousti several other enthusiasts, afterwards to assist in the fo of the Félibrige.

At seventeen Mistral was sent to Aix to study law, 1851, on his returning home a licencié en droit, his fath him choose his own career. The poet tells us how "he his lawyer's gown to the winds and gave himself up contemplation of what he so loved—the splendour of his Provence." He set to work almost immediately upon "M which is now generally acknowledged to be his greatest It was completed in 1859, and Lamartine devoted to it article in his Cours familier de littérature, in which he s the writer as a great epic poet, "a true Homeric poet own time." Lamartine's good opinion did much to h young poet forward. He went to Paris for a short vis became the lion of the literary world. The Academy c his epic, and Gounod composed an opera, called Mireille adaptation of the poem. Perhaps none of Mistral's late has quite repeated the success of "Mirèio." "Cal his second epic, was completed after another seven years' in 1866; "Lis Iselo d'Or" (The Golden Islands), a coll shorter poems, was published in 1875; a third poem, "N was again crowned by the Academy nine years later. appeared his only dramatic work, "La Rèino Jano" Joanna), and his last long poem, another epic, appeare years ago. At present he is engaged upon his "Memoirs

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Mr. Balfour's Philosophy.

The position which Mr. Balfour occupies in philosophy is something analogous to that of the late Mr. Gladstone in classical scholarship. He is an amateur, and shows an amateur's limitations. All the same, he has deserved right well of philosophy. He leads to a great study, which is not as popular as it should be, the prestige of an honoured name; he has put many truths in a fresh and vigorous way; and, best of all, he is on the right side. He is conservative, but always with the higher conservatism which is only anxious that the moral and religious heritage of our forefathers should descend unimpaired to our children. A statesman's leisure could not be better spent than in writing a book like the FOUNDATIONS OF BELIEF; and we are heartily glad that it still enjoys a popularity which enables it to be republished at a popular price.

The eighth edition (Longmans, 6s. n.) is rendered noteworthy by a preface in which Mr. Balfour seeks to clear away some of the misunderstandings by which the work has so far been beset. The chief of them is certainly one under which a good many of his readers laboured. It seemed as though Mr. Balfour, to use his own words, "endeavoured to find in doubt the foundation of belief." It seemed as though he argued that, since naturalism and transcendental idealism are equally untenable when criticized, we must fall back on accepting the moral and theological dogmas delivered to us by constituted authority. Mr. Balfour admits that there are features in the construction of his book which made this misinterpretation excusable, and it is well that he has taken steps to obviate it in the future. He points out that the emphasis should rather have been laid upon a very different point, which is that "science, ethics, and (in its degree) æsthetics are severally and collectively more intelligible, better fitted to form parts of a rational and coherent whole when they are framed in a theological setting, than when they are framed in one which is purely naturalistic." The main argument adduced to prove this is that we cannot account for the value in which we hold virtue, truth, and beauty if we adopt the theory that they spring from a merely natural source which is neither good nor true nor beautiful. In a word, the concept of intrinsic value is the key to the theological view of the world.

Viewed under this new light Mr. Balfour's book gains greatly in philosophic significance, and is cleared from a charge of obscurantism to which his frequent depreciation of reason and insistence on authority have somewhat laid him open. The concept of value is undoubtedly the most important one in philosophy just now. There are some experiences which are useful as tending to self-preservation or race-prolongation and may be called externally or extrinsically valuable. There are other experiences, moral experiences more especially, which are valuable in quite a different way. They may be useful or they may not; they are certainly felt to be intrinsically valuable; valuable in themselves and not for the material advantage they bring. The sense of intrinsic value cannot be plausibly accounted for by any naturalistic process of evolution; it points directly to a theological interpretation of the world. This is a mere outline of a doctrine of value which it would need more than one volume to fill in adequately. Mr. Balfour has done good service not only in clearing away much baseless prejudice in favour of naturalism, but also in pointing out the true direction in which the deeper and more comprehensive researches of fortable feeling that we are very far behin and the United States in the matter

This feeling will be in no way diminished INDIVIDUALITY AND THE MORAL AIM IN (Longmans, 6s.), being the Gilchrist Repo
the Victoria University by Mr. H. Thise on Method at Owens College. Of this m the pages which deal with classification, se child-study appeal rather to the professed the account of the theories and methods wh education as a whole will be found equally think with the old Western farmer that thing." It is, indeed, the belief that educati thing but the great thing which explains th between the English and American systems in the words of one of our chief authorities, nations of the world seem to regard educ Americans believe in it as they believe i them it is a national interest, pervading a munity. The American mother is not con child to school. She does her utmost to help it learn. She receives weekly reports on self attends classes to qualify herself to for The closest relationship between home and and the teacher ranks not less highly th public esteem. The reason why we in Eng to imagine this widespread educational ent us, the Americans have before them a perfe of the object of education. Their national stances call for the creation of a certain ty to make a "good American," they aim co development of the individual, the encou initiative and energy, the production of a man.* With their methods, often astonishi
Mr. Thiselton Mark deals at length. In r in the case of so many others, a certain al for the infectiousness of enthusiasm. Th accustomed to our haphazard methods, is a away by the sight of the scientific orga States. We must never forget that, exc differ from the Americans in almost eve differ especially in this, that while they want, see that they get it, we do not ev not know what we want. Until we have this point, we may imitate their methods, b their results.

Although A MANUAL OF SCHOOL HYG
versity Press, 3s. 6d.) is far from bein composition, it reflects great credit upon of Dr. Edward W. Hope and of Mr. Edg happen to know that its teaching about th already affected the rules of more than says much about the need of ventilatio planations of what ventilation with pure ai disagree with the authors in what we gath about the relative importance to a chil warmth in a schoolroom. Has Dr. Hop specialists have to say on cold as a bra injury to the nervous system of a highl
the result of its worrying itself with sm
"about 56deg. to 60deg. Fahr." We h columns before that 60deg. Fahr. is a dang recommend, because only really good trusted to register quickly a change fr

A child should gain from his schooldays not only an immensely improved capacity for interpreting and estimating what he sees, but a greater power of seeing. A badly-lighted private school—and there are too many such—is a source of incalculable mischief. "The excessive power of accommodation" possessed by the eyes of children must be understood, our authors rightly say, to be "a source of danger, as it enables improper work to be undertaken." On many other points the rules of Dr. Hope and Mr. Browne are worthy of their reputation. That all forms of tracing, and of drawing by means of squares or dots, should be prohibited is unknown to many teachers; and we are heartily with the authors in their shrewd verdict that short lessons "at bad desks" (? badly-constructed desks) are likely to be less injurious than long spells of application at well-designed desks. Evidently Mr. Browne is a kind of guardian angel where Liverpool children's eyes are concerned; he returns to the charge in the chapter upon school furniture, and deals a severe blow to the teachers who ignore such troubles as those caused by flickering gas. Mr. Browne points out that "too bright a light" is a delusive phrase; when properly shaded the brighter the light is the better. We like the chapter upon "site and soil," though we could wish that even more might have been written against a clay soil. To say that "clays and alluvial soils are frequently wet and damp" is too mild a statement for what is chiefly valuable as a "fighting book." No teacher should neglect "A Manual of School Hygiene." The profession of schoolmastering is so wearing and wearying a one that too often the very headmasters, who ought to spend hours over such a book as this, remain ignorant of its existence. The specialist in all English occupations, indeed, suffers from a disbelief in the importance of practical bibliography.

Book Prices.

The new volume of Book Prices Current (Elliot Stock, £1 7s. 6d. n.) is no whit less valuable than its fourteen predecessors. Indeed, as annually it grows in bulk—the number of pages respectively for 1892, 1899, and the current year are 529, 745, and 788—so does it increase in utility. Mr. Slater's introduction is brief. We learn from it, however, that the 38,377 lots sold by auction between October, 1900, and July, 1901, yielded a total of £130,275 9s., or an average of £3 7s. 10d. per lot. This is the highest average on record, one which, save in the case of 1900, when the relapse was attributable to general stagnation, has been steadily increased since 1893, when £1 6s. 7d. was the corresponding figure. The conclusion is irresistible; printed books, notably, of course, monuments of the early presses and important works like the First Folio Shakespeare, are increasing in money-value year by year. Only after a volume such as this has been consulted many times is it possible to discover, one by one, errors or omissions, if such there be—in the case of the recently issued ten years' index, for example, there are several mistakes and numerous omissions under "Kelmscott Press Publications." But attention may be directed to one or two points of interest. On December 5 probably the first uncut copy to occur at auction in this country of Robert Browning's "Pauline," first edition, 1833, fetched £120. Mr. Slater makes no mention of the fact that a small hole and a tear, robbing the text of several letters, was discovered on pp. 21-22, although thereby bidding was doubtless influenced considerably. A letter from Mr. R. Barrett Browning, giving reasons for the rarity of this booklet, appeared in Literature, April 6, 1901. Again, apropos of the Hamilton Bruce set of Waverley novels in first edition, uncut save at the top, which fetched £205, it might have been pointed out that the late owner paid all but that sum for the elaborate morocco bindings; whereas, in pristine condition, "Waverley" and "Guy Mannering" have by themselves realized £220. In the exhaustive index there are entries under "Kelmscott Press" and "Vale Press," but we look in vain for the Essex House and the Doves, both of sufficient importance to include. Owing to its fluctuations in market value, we might reasonably expect to find record at least of the limits between which the Kipling edition de luxe has moved during the twelve months.

FICTION.

Carlist and Cristino.

Scouring Europe in search of local colour, Mr. Cro[illegible] decided upon Spain for the scene of his latest novel. Spain Carlist war; and in these unfamiliar surroundings figure Blair, of Castle Blair, in the good shire of Fife" (we had a character of Mr. Crockett's creation would have kingdom), and John Mortimer, a chancesuet English m of Chorley in Lancashire (a somewhat shadowy gentlem the usual crowd of Carlists, Cristinos, monks, pretty girl forth. The Fugitives (Macmillan, 6s.) is a bustlin for Mr. Crockett writes with an exuberance of spirits and careless joviality of phrase warranted to keep things It would seem that he cared little for the meaning of a so long as it were forcible and had a good ring. Ramon the outlaw, waits in his cave "till the mist was at its rising in hissing spume-clouds out of the deeps." W believe that those spume-clouds would hiss even in Sp reading this book we are impressed chiefly with the gallan made by Mr. Crockett to get his effects. Local colour (ca muleteers, and the rest) is shovelled in with reckless pr every situation is, so to speak, italicized; and the struggles nobly to make us laugh with his patches of com The construction of the novel is ingenious, and there is fighting. But as for character—well! we can only assu Mr. Crockett has given up attempting to draw his ch They are, to take the chief of them, a swashbuckling vivacious French gentleman turned monk (tempor mercantile Englishman, and an outlawed Spaniard. Cardono has more claim to our esteem than most of the an ingeniously constructed marionette with an interesti Cabrera and the Queen-Regent, and her entourage, fail us. But Mr. Crockett writes with a will, and as th believed in himself—sometimes really eloquently; and so is always happening in his books—generally something and unexpected. Not many writers can spin the web o better.

Gorki.

Maxim Gorki, whose Foma Gordyeff (Unwin, been translated by Isabel F. Hapgood, comes before the public with a Russian reputation second only to that of No doubt he is important as a sign of the times; novelist he is more puzzling than pleasing. He has no of telling a story. Strictly speaking he has no story He is long winded and he is coarse. As a rule, when say all these things about a book, it is not worth while more about it. But, though it is impossible to read without being frequently disgusted and continuously there is power in it. It leaves an impression, definite disagreeable, of the purposelessness and futility of lif lingers like the recollection of a nightmare. It takes th quite a time to restore himself to optimism with the that pessimism at Nijni Novgorod need not interfe optimism in more civilized places. A writer who c impress those whom he bores obviously has some of the of genius, even if he is not a great novelist. Gorki, m strikes us as the most characteristically Russian of Russian novelists whose works we know. All of them ideas and emotions which the Western European cannot stand without a special effort. The ideas and emotions int contempt for the prosperous merchants. The pessimism transcends any pessimism that we have ever met in any novel. It is violent, aggressive, unredeemed by any sense of humour. As cheerfulness gradually returned to us after the gloom which it had caused, the vision which emerged from the nightmare was a vision of Maxim Gorki leading an army of star philosophers against the West, and offering Gaul and Teuton and Anglo-Saxon the grim alternative of pessimism or the sword.

"The Fiery Dawn."

"I wonder," remarks the hero on page 87 of THE FIERY DAWN (Arnold, 6s.), "I wonder who I am and what I am doing." The reader of Miss M. E. Coleridge's tale of the Duchesse de Berry and the rising in La Vendée on behalf of her son Henri V. will frequently find himself in a state of almost equal perplexity. The truth is that, in her desire to suggest the confusion and mystery belonging to this romantic episode, Miss Coleridge has lost sight of the necessity for an intelligible plot. The judicious reader will not attempt to form a clear idea of what it is all about. He will abandon himself rather to the enjoyment of a series of stirring incidents, described with admirable power and abundant imagination. Such, for example, are the heroic defence of La Pénissière and the "smoking-out" of the Duchesse and her friends from their hiding-place. Throughout the book, indeed, the Regent's spirited adventures in boy's attire are so brightly told that we almost overlook her amazing folly and selfishness. On the other hand, such chapters as that headed "Maison Botherel," professedly borrowed from Lamartine, Feydeau, and Théophile Gautier, seem to us unnecessary as well as tedious.

"Wealth of Mallerstang."

Something of the austerity of the country in which he has laid his scene seems to have laid its grip upon Mr. Algernon Gissing in THE WEALTH OF MALLERSTANG (Chatto and Windus, 6s.). He tells his story with a stern leisureliness that is interesting in itself, and only once does it break out into an intensity of passion, all the more striking because unexpected. Humphrey Garrett is a man who weaves a tragedy around himself by mistaking violence for manhood, and tries to establish a kingdom of freedom and brotherhood by fire and sword, until he is redeemed by a woman's love. The book is not one for the many, but the smaller public whose applause is worth winning will appreciate it. Its merit lies in the nature pictures, which are singularly well done, and in the subordination of the details to the central interest. It is a story well imagined and well wrought, and enhances the reputation Mr. Algernon Gissing has already made with "A Secret of the North Sea."

Studies of Women.

Mr. Maarten Maartens is a pleasant writer, and his style has just that touch of the foreign that gives piquancy. SOME WOMEN I HAVE KNOWN (Heinemann, 6s.) contains a dozen short stories, of which all are readable and some few very good indeed. There is something of De Maupassant about Mr. Maartens' handling of the conte: some of these tales, as "Madame de Lissecourt" and "Diane de Bragade," might almost have been written by the master. Perhaps "John" is the best of these stories from our point of view; it is simple, and Dutch, and eminently business-like, and it has nothing whatever to do with illicit love. In a collection of stories entirely about women it is something to come across a few that fail to introduce the jealous husband. "Annette de Viroflay" is another story of this kind, pretty, simple, and sufficiently ingenious. Altogether a good collection.

Lord Salisbury after an interview not calcu agreeable to the President of the Frenc attention attracted by a mysterious strange he follows to the hall of an old City Guild.
accepts the stranger's invitation to enter. I himself in the company of twelve gentlemen European Thrones of which they have all bee are banded together to take a divine reveng subjects who have discarded them in a vain
by freeing them from a terror from which th deliver themselves. It is, in short, nothing les of discrowned Kings pledged to a war of e Anarchists. Of the particular adventure w the present novel we give no details, mend the story in its entirety to the reader of the persons of the drama with perso moment is managed with propriety and actuality enough to give a distinct topic from its merits as an interesting excursu historical fantastics, Mr. Upward's latest and well-written novel.

The Unspeakable Turk.

THE PASHA, by Daisy Hugh Price (Geo
a new and engaging view of the unspeakabl to be on occasion a polished and kindly gen husband, even for an English girl whose Ahmed Ilderim Pasha has a prejudice English wife to mix, unveiled, with her kin civilization itself, monogamous and defe knows something of Turkish life from the in Hânem," a tale of a Cairo harem, was cl will not discredit it. She is entirely withe
the subject of Armenia and its atrocities.

YESTÈRE: THE ROMANCE OF A LIFE, by Unwin, 6s.), is a profoundly depressing ta massacres by a writer who evidently takes to heart. The ghastly tragedy of the en whole book. There are very vivid pictures customs. With a less serious purpose in v give us most readable fiction. As it is, she as sombre as she could make it. Her objec to people who say, as she quotes in her pre yes, didn't something happen there severa
she will certainly succeed.

Alcohol.

A THOUSAND PITIES (T. Fisher Unwi
Taylor, is thin and amateurish. It has, h brevity, and occasional touches suggest t neyed theme than hereditary dipsomania M better.

THE YOUNG SQUIRE'S RESOLVE, by W
Unwin, 6s.), has a good deal of the Temper Misfortune after misfortune happens to all allow themselves to look upon the wine wh last the "young squire" takes the lau turning his brewery into a factory of non

FLOWER AND THORN, by Beatrice Blackett, 6s.), is the best work its autho
"The Awakening of Mary Fenwick." Valerie, is very charming, and her foil, most sympathetic character. Many of the talk between the two women which clears n ing, are full of humanity.

In spite of its improbable plot an characters, THE ARBITER (Arnold, 6s.) novel. We doubt whether many girls a Rachel Rendel of realizing that a wi

"I have little fascination for the morbid," says a character in THE MAGNETISM OF SIN (Greening, 3s. 6d.), by "Æsculapius." The context shows that he means he has little taste for the morbid. Such trifling mistakes occur on almost every page. We cannot forbear giving a taste of the style of "Æsculapius":—

> At night, under the genial sway of the cheering cup, when tinsel and glamour, crimson and gilt, seemed what they were not; when the soothing power of one of Telson's heavily drugged cigars lulled to inactivity his higher brain centres, switching off his true reasoning faculties, paralysing inhibition, and leaving the lower passions predominant; when his only capable interests were centred on a card, a die, the turn of a disc, how optimistic he was.

Telson, we may add, is one of the most nonsensical and dullest villains fiction has ever produced.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The proceedings of the International Congress of Librarians, held last year in Paris, have been published. The secretary, M. Henry Martin, pleaded for a library for periodical publications in every town, and a resolution in support of the proposal was passed. Mr. Andreas Steenberg dealt with the efforts made in Denmark to provide libraries among small communities. The Danes admire English institutions and strive to model their own upon the same lines.

Hitherto poverty and apathy have proved too strong in Ireland for progressive ideas. The promotion of the Public Libraries Acts should meet with general approval. Dublin takes the lead in establishing a system of libraries in its suburbs, and a branch is to be erected on the south side of the city, adjoining the technical schools. The Irish newspapers support the movement, one journal containing this admirable sentence:—"A free library situated as this one will be is a veritable oasis—a Persian (sic) Spring."

In a former note upon the increasing congestion of space in public libraries, we instanced Bournemouth, where work was practically at a standstill for want of room. A new building has now been opened; the reference department is to profit by a full proportion of the library income, and books "necessary to the student" will be provided. Perhaps this decision is partly traceable to the papers upon reference libraries read at the Library Association. At any rate we congratulate the Bournemouth authorities.

Nowhere has the Public Library question been more keenly contested than in Wales. The smaller towns have, some of them, fought for years over the matter. Once the Acts are adopted both sides usually rally in support of the library. But at Festiniog two of the branch libraries have been closed owing to lack of funds. Three branches were established—to be maintained upon an income of £50—an effort which outside assistance might have made possible. On the other hand, in the same county of Merioneth, the public support given to the little library at Bala has led a local landowner to present the town with a site and a building.

The best article in the Library for October, now completing the second volume, is by Mr. H. R. Plomer, who describes the King's Printing House under the Stuarts. The story is largely bound up with the lives of the Barkers. Robert Barker printed the "authorized version" of the Bible at his own expense, and probably ruined himself in doing so. Another good paper, entitled "A Famous Printer: Samuel Richardson," by W. B. Thorne, deals with the author of "Pamela" upon a side little known to the world at large.

Mr. Frederick J. Crowest, who has recently undertaken the management of Mr. Walter Scott's publishing business at London and Newcastle, is a man who has spent his whole life among books. Mr. Crowest comes from a family connected for some two hundred years with ministerial and educational work in Essex. He began life in Messrs. Cassell's

Correspondence.

MR. HENLEY AND R.L.S.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I should be grateful for your indulgence to a few ideas which seem to have a bearing on the unfo controversy now raging round the names of Henl Stevenson. The controversy is sustained, on the one h those who believe that Mr. Henley has been guilty of a almost sacrilegious disrespect to the dead; on the oth critics who say, "Stevenson has been so ridiculously over we don't wonder that Henley should try to put him proper place." Now, to a lover of Stevenson, who is admirer of Mr. Henley, the article in the Pall Mall M certainly gave a rude shock. But I do not th should be quite so ready to deem the worst of pa triste humeurté as those critics have shown the who accuse Mr. Henley of having sacrificed the of his friend on the altar of an insatiate vanit who is conscious of no guilt is not over-scrupulous t against suspicious appearance. Mr. Henley did not that he would be suspected of advertising his own imp and of charging Stevenson with ingratitude, when he p credentials to show that his own masculine and m representation of Stevenson was truer to life than the tional, emasculate substitute for a portrait offered by inj friends. It is not difficult to imagine the scandal Boswell would have offered to fanatical Johnsonians if found his life-like portraiture displaced by the colour flattering adumbration of, say, Sir John Hawkins. Mr. has wisely refused to defend himself to the officious inter His real and effectual defence will be the life-like port which he can and must give us, of the "Lewis" whom and loved.

The only serious injury which has been done to Stev memory is the work of those who have exaggerated the of his style until they have produced the impression was a mere academic practician of style on indifferent The high-water mark of this enthusiam for "word words" was reached in the paradoxical essay of a brillian writer, who exhausted all the resources of preciosity, and stock of ideas involved in the confusion of a medium end-in-itself, to produce a highly artificial discours "style." Immediately a reaction set in against sty stylists. The stylist can have no interest for a livin unless his style is merely the medium to give express view of life. Stevenson had a definite and precis of life. Just as Mr. Henley gives adequate exp for the first time, to the comparatively inarticulate of a Walt Whitman, Stevenson found the right m utterance for the inarticulate emotions of the artists of B Mr. Henley, taking a wider and more masculine view o naturally inclined to grant little sympathy to Stev outlook. But he is in error to think that Stevenson's w not live. Stevenson has given the most perfect expressio artist's temperament, which sees things only from the but sees them with the freshness and the vividness of t greatest. The perfect expression of a view of life, limited, is bound to be immortal.

Yours faithfully,

to the same kind of criticism. When Velasquez turned aside from making the portraits of stiff Castilians and painted a ragged man with a glass bowl, or a cook preparing an omelette, his aristocratic sitters turned their noses up. We admire Velasquez in one mood as much as in the other. The whole book of life is open to the artist's choice, whether his art be expressed in forms and colours or in words and sounds. To set up fences and landmarks which he may not overstep is futile.

The painter and the novelist have proved the futility of such attempts by refusing to be limited in their choice of subject. The dramatist has still to show his mettle. Abroad he is vindicating his independence day by day; celebrating his escape from the trammels of convention; floating the puny efforts of prejudice to crib, cabin, and confine his soaring spirit. In France we may take M. Brieux as an example of this pioneer determination. In Germany Hauptmann has broken with tradition; Sudermann, to some extent, as well, and several followers in Hauptmann's steps. Norway was in the van with the plays of Ibsen and Björnson. Even here in England we see spasmodic struggles to get away from the trivial round of hackneyed dramatic permutations, and to attract intelligent persons to the theatre by intelligent means.

But we have still in our way a solid mass of unintelligence, which finds expression in parrot-cries and outworn shibboleths bearing upon the questions, What are and what are not fit subjects for plays? If we are to wear down these cries, it must be by the united effort of all who wish our English theatre well as a channel for the communication of ideas, as a medium for the discussion of those things which interest active minds and for the stimulating of emotion and of thought. It is disheartening to find a critic of Mr. A. B. Walkley's acumen calmly writing down the subject of Beyond Human Power as a subject "unsuitable for dramatic treatment." If he had said that Bjernson had not made the most of it, or that the treatment was unconvincing, or that he personally preferred a lighter-hearted form of drama, no one could object. He sets his name to his opinions; there they are, to agree with or to dissent from, as you please. But to pronounce ex cathedra and without support of argument that the problem of miracles is "unsuitable for dramatic treatment" seems to me to be without the province of a critic.

Suppose you, Sir, had invited Mr. Walkley to give you his opinion upon M. Zola's "Lourdes," and suppose that Mr. Walkley had laid it down that the matter of the book was unsuitable for treatment in a novel, I think, Sir, you would have exercised your own judgment and used your blue pencil. And why, if M. Zola may write a novel about the supposed miracles of Lourdes, may not Mr. Björnson write a play about the marvellous cures of Pastor Sang? To me, and, as I know, to a great many people, Björnson's play was excessingly interesting and suggestive. The almost universal belief in the possibility of superhuman interference in human affairs is specially worthy of attention in these days when few of us are without friends who pin their faith in Catholic doctrine to reports of marvellous occurrences, or who have embraced Christian science, or who in some way look to agencies beyond human power. The effects that are produced upon different minds by stories of the miraculous give the dramatist ample scope for study of character and dramatic contrast. I do not know whether Mr. Walkley has ever visited Lourdes. If he has, I am sure his keen analytical mind must have sought to penetrate the emotions and the intellectual processes which lead to the Grotto by the Gave thousands and

THE CASKET LETTE

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—No. I do not think I must "b only well-known student of the Letters. T to me," no more than to Mr. Lang; bu kindly flattering as to state that the last wo this country has been said by me (some ten besides he thinks it necessary—not always, flattering terms to refer throughout his statements of mine, while in strict connex problem he makes no mention of any other living writer in this country, it almost necess veil of anonymity formed by the words "well-k ceases to serve Mr. Lang's charitable purp his readers capable of putting two and two to no doubt as to the person alluded to; and, know one reader, other than myself, who at missing name. Mr. Lang's private communi me till after I had sent my letter to Literatu

In regard to more important matters admits that the Lennox précis may have Moray or De Silva, but now asks was "W 1568) to have let Lennox quote at some le did not exist?" My view, of course, is merely a somewhat erroneous summary of exist; but until the publication of the L opinion regarding the character of Wood Lennox may be reserved, although there is no
as yet, that Wood was empowered to show to the English commissioners. But suppo been entrusted with a letter, suddenly supp
afterwards, and that he showed the Lette likely that Lennox, in summarizing the ca Letters, would by mere chance construct resembling the meagre one of Moray?

(2) As to the danger of the Scots L Letters, my point was their conception of the however, directs attention to a statement
"Even if the Letters differed, the differen tampering, did not redound to Mary's g
"proof of tampering" would discredit th
the Letters, and redound not merely to Mar complete discomfiture of her accusers.

(3) Mr. Lang is apparently still persu ride," though he has now discovered the r Sir Robert Melville but George Douglas. "
"did Melville's brother James take over the took four and a-half days, whereas Mr. La Robert as taking only two or two and three and a-half (though facts known to M debarred him from the latter alternative Lang thinks that Sir James took three careful consideration of his statement—show that he took four and a-half, and borated by De Silva. He set out at noo reached London late on the night of the 23rd
Mr. Lang's latest "rapid rider," took six time! Mr. Lang's quotation of De Silva in refe opinion of Maitland is hardly full enough properly to interpret the meaning. As matter even state or imply that the Letters were story is in itself of little account, and is of absolutely no account in regard to the fixing of dates. Moreover, Mr. Lang must know that there are other equally credible stories about that particular coffer. But since Mr. Lang says his mind is open in regard to Maitland's connexion with the forgery, may I suggest to him a more thorough consideration of the available evidence in regard to Maitland's attitude towards the Queen? How one who had read Sir James Melville's Diary or perused Sir Robert Melville's correspondence could ever have imagined that Sir Robert "split" to Elizabeth on Maitland ce donne, &c. Both of the Melvilles were absolutely convinced that Maitland was a secret favourer of Mary.

(4) The fact that the draft of Crawford's Declaration is among the Lennox papers seems to indicate that it was corrected at the instance of Lennox, with the aid of the English version of Letter II.; and this was plainly Mr. Lang's unsophisticated opinion, until attention was directed to the consequences of holding it. But there may be, as Mr. Lang suggests, more conclusive evidence in the Lennox papers, the publication of which by Father Pollen is now (it appears) happily decided on.

Your obedient servant,

T. F. HENDERSON.

THE CHINESE SPOILS AT POTSDAM.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The antique astronomical instruments of which the Chinese were so proud have now been definitively set up at Potsdam, and the German general concerned has defended their acquisition. What a far more famous Prussian leader would have thought of such a thing may be gathered from the following account, written at Paris in 1815 by Sir Walter Scott ("Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk," no. XIII.):—

> The museum, when I first arrived in Paris, was still entire, but Blucher, who was not, it seems, to be foiled a second time, has since made several visits, attended by a German artist, for the purpose of ascertaining and removing the pictures which belong to Prussia, or the German States now united with her. The French guardians of the museum also attended, no longer to decide upon the point of view in which the spoils of nations should be disposed, but to plead, occasionally and timidly, that such a picture formed no part of the Cabinet of Potsdam, but had been stolen from some other collection. These demurrers were generally silenced by a "Tais-toi" or "Halt Maul" from the veteran of Laon and Waterloo, who is no friend to prolonged discussions.

Now, Sir, if the "Yellow Peril" should ever unhappily become imminent, will not the Mongolian generals cast about for precedents justifying a reclamation of their lost instruments? And will not the foregoing extract serve?

Yours obediently,

E. CANT-WALL.

MR. ANDREW LANG.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—As you have done me the honour of referring to and using my catalogue of Mr. Lang's books, will you permit me to correct and supplement your bibliography in one or two cases. This in the interest of your bibliography, which will probably be used by collectors and others.

Poetry. The entries—"1886. Selections in 'Sonnets of the Century' (Scott)" and "1893. Selections in Scottish Contemporary Verse (Scott)" comprise only reprints of some of Mr. Lang's verse and are hardly entitled to a place in the list. Critical. The "Politics of Aristotle" appeared first in 1877, a separate reprint in 1886. "Essays in Little," though now published by Longmans, was first published by Henry and Co. History.—The date of "Oxford: Brief Historical and Descriptive America. The American edition reprints some verse Except as general editor of "Bibliothèque de Caralan" in which they appear, Mr. Lang did not edit "Æsop's but he contributed verses to the work.

I append a list of works edited or "introduced" Lang, but even this does not exhaust his work in th ment:—

1881.—E. A. Poe's Poetical Works (Kegan Paul).
1884.—Molière's Les Précieuses Ridicules (C Press).
1887.—Cupid and Psyche (Nutt).
1887.—Johnny Nutt (free translation) (Longmans).
1887.—Beauty and the Beast (Tuer).
1888.—Perrault's Popular Tales (Clarendon Press).
1888.—Ballads of Books (Longmans).
1888.—Euterpe (Nutt).
1890.—Adventures of Ulysses (Arnold).
1890.—Longinus on the Sublime (Macmillan).
1890.—Hypnerotomachia (Nutt).
1891.—Elizabethan Songs (Osgood)?
1893.—Kirk's Secret Commonwealth (Nutt).
1894.—Border Ballads (Lawrence and Bullen).
1894.—Little Johannes (Heinemann).
1895.—Hogg's Death Wake (Lane).
1896.—Poems and Songs of Burns (Methuen).
1896.—Compleat Angler (Dent).
1897.—Animal Land (Duckworth)?
1897.—Lady of the Lake (Longmans).
1898.—Holmes' Autocrat (Ward).
1899.—Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare (Freemantle

There are also a book of "Nursery Rhymes," "Malory," and a host of other books too numerous to Since issuing my catalogue (1897) I have entered ov items, some of which are omissions.

C. M. FALC

Dundee, Nov. 25.

 We are much obliged to Mr. Falconer for his this voluminous bibliography. We did not attempt a record of Mr. Lang's work as editor. But the list give Falconer will no doubt be acceptable.

Books to look out for at once.

"The Autobiography of Lt.-General Sir Harry Smith, Bart., G.C.B." Murray.
"The Victorian Anthology." By Sir M. E. Grant Duff. Sc 7s. 6d.
"Later Poems." By Mrs. Meynell. John Lane. 2s. 6d. net.
"With Rimington." By L. March Phillipps, lately Captain in R Guides. Arnold. 7s. 6d.
"In Sicily." By Douglas Sladen. Sands. 63s. net. 2 vols.
"Great Religions of the World." Harper. 7s. 6d.
[A Volume of Articles on the Religions and Belie Universe. By well-known writers, including Sir A. C. Lyel Professor Rhys Davids, Cardinal Gibbons, and Mr. Frederic
"The Confessions of a Caricaturist." By Harry Furniss. Unw 32s.
"Japan: a Record in Colour." By Mortimer Menpes. A. and 20s. net.
"The Life of Napoleon I." By John H. Rose, M.A. 2 vols. [Largely compiled from new materials taken from t official records. Illustrated.]
"Cecil Rhodes: a Study of a Career." By H. Hensman.
"The Velvet Glove." By Henry Seton Merriman. Smith, El
"The Portion of Labour." By Miss Mary Wilkins. Harper.
"The House Divided." By H. B. Marriott Watson. Harper.
"The Mission of Margaret." By Adeline Sergeant. John Lon

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRIN

With notes where required to guide the reader as contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent

A MASQUE OF DAYS. From the Last Essays of Elia. Newly Dressed and Decorated by WALTER CRANE. 11½×8½. Cassell. 6s.

[Illustrating, in fine coloured designs and round large hand written type, Lamb's fancy of a feast given to all the days of the year by the New Year. A pretty book.]

STORIES OF THE TUSCAN ARTISTS. By ALBESIA WHERRY. 8½×6½. 186 pp. Dent. 10s. 6d.

[A finely printed and bound volume telling the story of the Tuscan artists in a popular manner for those who have not been to Italy, with excellent reproductions of sculpture and pictures.]

THE ART JOURNAL (1901). Virtue.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE. By H. W. PAUL. 8½×5½, 320 pp. Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d.

[Expansion of Mr. Paul's article in "The Dictionary of National Biography." "An unadorned narrative of facts," laying no claim "to be a formal life."]

LIFE OF THE RIGHT HON. SIR W. MOLESWORTH, Bt., M.P., F.R.S. By MRS. FAWCETT, LL.D. 8½×5½, 352 pp. Macmillan. 8s. 6d. n.

[An elaborate life showing what we owe to Molesworth (1810-1855) as an early adherent of colonial self government.]

ROBESPIERRE. A Study. By HILAIRE BELLOC. 9×5½, 380 pp. Nisbet. 16s.

[An extensive study (by the author of "Danton") explaining Robespierre's career, disclaiming any addition to known facts.]

JANE AUSTEN: HER HOME AND FRIENDS. By CONSTANCE HILL. 9×6, 366 pp. Lane. 21s. n.

[Follows Jane Austen to all her different places of abode, with topographical illustrations in line and portraits, and information from MS. sources.]

ALEXANDRE DUMAS PÈRE. By HIPPOLYTE PARIGOT. (Les Grands Ecrivains Français.) 6½×7½, 185 pp. Hachette. Paris. Fr.2.50.

[The latest addition to this famous series edited by M. Jusserand.]

SOUVENIRS DE M. DELAUNAY DE LA COMÉDIE FRANÇAISE. Recueillis par LE COMTE FLEURY. Preface de M. Jules Claretie. 7½×4½, 287 pp. Calmann Lévy. Fr.3.50.

[Delightful anecdotal memoirs of the great epoch of the Comédie Française.]

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

CLEAN PETER AND THE CHILDREN OF GRUBBYLEA. By OTTILIA ADELBORG. Trans. by Ada Wallas. 11×8, 24 pp. Longmans. 3s. 6d. n.

[An impressive little German story translated into English rhyme, with excellent water-colour illustrations.]

FLOWER LEGENDS FOR CHILDREN. By HILDA MURRAY. 11½×8½, 64 pp. Longmans. 6s.

[Stories of flowers and trees, told in prose. Admirably illustrated in colour.]

THE BOGEY BOOK. By E. S. Pictured by H. J. S. 15×10. Eyre and Spottiswoode.

[Large, fantastic, coloured illustrations of bogeys, with rhymes.]

THE WONDERFUL STORY OF DUNDER VAN HALDEN AND HIS SEVEN LITTLE DAUGHTERS. By E. CHESTERTON. 10×7½. Finely Johnson. 2s. 6d. n.

[A quaint story in rhyme, with fantastic illustrations in line.]

ROUND THE WAINSCOT. By CICELY FULCHER. 8½×5½, 160 pp. Treherne. 2s. 6d.

[A little girl, afraid of the dark, a cruel nurse, and a sympathetic [illegible] Good Illustrations.]

DICK VAUGHAN'S FIRST TERM. By R. W. K. EDWARDS. 7½×5½, 256 pp. Wells Gardner. 2s. 6d.

PRIVATE BOBS AND THE NEW RECRUIT. By MABEL C. BIRCHMORE. Illus. by H. M. Brock. 7½×5½, 246 pp. Dent. 3s. 6d. n.

[A story of children and soldiers, bringing in the Diamond Jubilee procession.]

LILY POLLIE. By H. HICKMAN. 7½×5, 226 pp. Jarrold. 3s. 6d.

[The story of a dog, published at the suggestion of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.]

GOLDEN SUNBEAMS. Vol. for 1901. 9½×6½, 192 pp. S.P.C.K. 1s. 4d.

EDUCATIONAL.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS AND PUBLIC NEEDS. By G. G. COULTON. 7½×5, 175 pp. Simpkin, Marshall.

[Suggestions on the teaching of English and modern languages.]

ANSON'S VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD. Ed. by H. W. HOUSEHOLD. (English Classics for Schools. Grade II.) 6½×4½, 164 pp. 10d. n.

[Reduced text, with introduction, notes, and glossary.]

THE DESIRED HAVEN. 7½×5, 223 pp. J. Long

[A quiet study of the life in England, G delicate girl who leaves a hard-hearted step-m father to act for herself, and finds the "desired captain. The story is well told, but the comm high flown.]

THE CHILDREN OF THE SPHINX. By G. C. W Bristol: The Cosmopolitan Publishing Company

[An historical novel of adventure in Egypt hero is a son of Rameses, King of Egypt.]

TWINT DOG AND WOLF. By C. F. KEARY. 7 Johnson. 3s. 6d.

[Short stories of a romantic and mystic char

THE CASE OF A MAN WITH HIS WIFE. B 171 pp. Treherne. 3s. 6d.

[Story of a matrimonial complication in clergyman both marry the same lady. Eighteen

THE PRINCESS CYNTHIA. By MARGUERITE B Cassell. 6s.

[Social and political romance in a mythical period, in the "Buritanian" style.]

CALUMET K. By MERWYN-WEBSTER. 7×5, 3 Co. 6s.

[American. Calumet K is a two million round the construction of which the story centr

PETER THE PARASITE. By E. MARIA ALBANESI.

[A story of modern society.]

LES AMIES DE NOËL TRÉMONT. By AND 305 pp. Paris: Ollendorff. Fr.3.50.

[The latest novel of this charming writer, wh

HISTORY.

WALES. By O. M. EDWARDS. (The Story of 404 pp. Unwin. 5s.

[The first continuous popular history—by a is the 56th volume of this series.]

THE GREAT PERSIAN WAR. By G. B. G Murray. 21s. n.

[The author, the Oxford University Geography, has visited the fields of the great b causes of the war, he studies closely. Maps, pho

LA JEUNESSE DE LA GRANDE MADEMOISE ARVÈDE BARINE. 7½×4½, 326 pp. Hachette.

[A brilliant portrait, by the lady to wh has just awarded a prize of 8,000f. of Anne- Duchess of Montpensier,

LITERARY.

MILTON'S PROSODY, by ROBERT BRIDGES, and IN ENGLISH VERSE, by W. J. STONE. 8× Press. 5s. n.

[Mr. Bridges now adds an analysis of stress on the English hexameter. Mr. Stone's part, introduction of classical metres (privately print before his death recast as a history and gram the present book.]

THE DEFENDANT. By G. K. CHESTERTON. 7 Johnson. 5s. n.

[Clever essays defending many things usual the Speaker.]

ARTHURIAN ROMANCES. IV. THE ROM Rendered into English prose from the Mediev WESTON. 5½×4½, 152 pp. Nutt. 2s. n.

[The fourth in Messrs. Nutt's series of Ar presented in Malory.]

MARIE DE FRANCE. Seven of Her Lays done i RICKERT. 5½×4½, 199 pp. Nutt. 3s. n.

[These "lais" of a popular writer of shor century are translated into English for the first on Marie's life. Uniform with "Arthurian R

GOD THE BEAUTIFUL. An Artist's Creed. By Wellby. 1s. 6d. n.

[Letters (so the preface states) on the be written on his death-bed by a young Dani culture whom E. P. B. found dying in a Leith

WALT WHITMAN'S POETRY. A Study and a S HOLMES. 8×6½, 132 pp. Lane. 3s. 6d.]

POETRY.

THE SONGS OF A CHILD AND OTHER POEMS. By "Darling" (Lady Florence Douglas, now Lady Florence Dixie.) 7½×4½, 312 pp. Leadenhall Press. 2s. 6d.

[These were all written between the age of 10 and 17 years and are left untouched.]

KING STEPHEN AND OTHER POEMS. By Anna J. T. Salter. 7¾×5½, 180 pp. Routledge. 5s.

THE MOON OF LEAVES, and other Poems. By Aristo. 8×5½, 292 pp. Watts. 5s.

[The title poem is an idyll of the prairie, and some of the others are mostly based on North American legends.]

PASITELES THE ELDER and other Poems. By Cosmo Monkhouse. With a Prefatory Note by Austin Dobson. 7½×5½, 92 pp. Brimley Johnson. 5s. n.

[A melancholy interest attaches to these poems owing to the recent death of the author. "Pasiteles the Elder," the story of a Grecian sculptor, written in Chaucer's seven-line stanza, and "Christ Upon the Hill" (printed in a limited edition, 1895), a legendary tale in ballad metre, are finished examples of suggestive narrative verse.]

POLITICAL.

"PROSPEROUS" BRITISH INDIA. By W. Digby, C.I.E. 9×6, 613 pp. Unwin. 12s. 6d.

[A substantial work to prove that "the country is in a bad way, and the people in a worse way."]

THE IRISH LAND PROBLEM AND HOW TO SOLVE IT. By D. S. A. Cosby. 7½×5, 117 pp. Brimley Johnson. 1s. 6d. n.

[A pamphlet reprinted from the Westminster Review, and in defence of the landlords.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF BELIEF. By the Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour. 8×5½, 399 pp. Longmans. 6s. n.

[See Review, p. 516]

SOCIAL ENGLAND. Ed. by H. D. Traill and J. S. Mann. 10½×7¾, 602 pp. Cassell. 12s. n.

[See review, p. 512]

THE ESSAYS OF ELIA. By Charles Lamb. Illus. by Garth Jones. 9×6, 310 pp. Methuen. 10s. 6d.

[The illustrations are most interesting, and Mr. E. V. Lucas contributes a good introduction.]

CHAMBERS'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. New Ed. by D. Patrick, LL.D. Vol. I. 11×7½, 832 pp. Chambers. 10s. 6d. n.

THE LATIN QUARTER. ("Scènes de la Vie de Bohème.") By Henry Murger. Translated by Ellen Marriage and J. Selwyn. (French Novels of the Nineteenth Century.) 7¼×5½, 402 pp. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

[The second in this interesting new series.]

THE COMPLEAT ANGLER. By Izaak Walton. (The Little Library.) Ed. by J. Buchan. 6×4, 310 pp. Methuen. 1s. 6d.

[A reprint of the fifth edition—the last which Walton corrected with modernized spelling, notes, and a bibliographical and critical introduction.]

MILTON'S POEMS. 6¾×4½, 526 pp. Newnes. 3s. n.

[A handy reprint clearly printed on thin paper, and bound in a limp cover of brown and gold; with portrait.]

CHRISTMAS AT THE MERMAID. By Theodore Watts-Dunton. (Flowers of Parnassus XI.) 5¾×4½, 65 pp. Lane. 1s.

[A little quarto with good illustrations by Herbert Cole.]

THE WARDEN. By Anthony Trollope. Ed. by A. Thorold. 6×3¾, 360 pp. Lane. 1s. 6d.

["The Pocket Library." A brief prefatory note by the editor.]

THE ENGLISH POEMS OF RICHARD CRASHAW. (The Little Library.) Ed. by E. Hutton. 6×4, 218 pp. Methuen. 1s. 6d. n.

[We are glad to see a reprint of this rather neglected poet. Mr. Hutton writes a critical and biographical preface.]

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. THE HOLY WAR. GRACE ABOUNDING. (Thin paper Ed.) 6½×4½, 128 pp. Nelson. 2s. 6d. n.

[A handy pocket edition in the New Century Library.]

THE PURGATORIO OF DANTE ALIGHIERI. (The Temple Classics.) 6×4, 442 pp. Dent. 1s. 6d.

[With notes and a prefatory [illegible]]

THE BATH COMEDY. By Agnes and Egerton Castle. 7½×[illegible] Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

[A third edition of this capital novel of Bath in the 18th[illegible]]

LA FRANCE AU MILIEU DU XVIIe. SIÈCLE (1649-1661) Correspondance de Gui Patin. Extraits publiés avec Notice biographique par Armand Brette et précédés d'une Introduction par Edme Champion. 7½×4¾, 69 pp. Paris: Colin. Fr. 4.

[These invaluable letters of this distinguished physician [illegible] parcel of his long medical digressions. The complete [illegible] hardly obtainable. This contains all that is essential.]

SCIENCE.

THE EARTH'S BEGINNING. By Sir R. S. Ball. 7½×[illegible] Cassell. 7s. 6d.

[Based on Royal Institution lectures to a "juvenile [illegible] on the origin of the sun and planets, &c. Illustrations, some [illegible]]

OFFICIAL YEAR-BOOK OF THE SCIENTIFIC AND [illegible] SOCIETIES OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND. [illegible] issue. 8¾×5½, 347 pp. Griffin. 7s. 6d.

AN ELEMENTARY TREATISE ON THE CALCULUS. Gibson. 7½×5, 459 pp. Macmillan. 7s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

THE CHURCH AND THE NATION. By Mandell Creighton [illegible] Louise Creighton. 7¾×5½, 336 pp. Longmans. 5s. n.

[These papers have all appeared in pamphlet form or [illegible] But they present a valuable conspectus of Dr. Creighton's [illegible] Church History and present problems.]

ORDINATION ADDRESSES. By the Right Rev. William [illegible] D.D. Ed. by E. E. Holmes. 8½×5½, 367 pp. Longmans. [illegible]

[Among MSS. entrusted to the editor shortly before th[illegible] death. To be followed shortly by "Visitation Charges."]

THE LIFE OF THE MASTER. By John Watson, D.D. 11½×[illegible] Hodder and Stoughton. 25s. n.

[A sumptuous work with exceedingly beautiful colours [illegible] by Mr. Corwin Knapp Linsom.]

THE AGAPÈ AND THE EUCHARIST IN THE EARLY CHU[illegible] J. F. Keating, D.D. 7¾×5½, 207 pp. Methuen. 3s. 6d.

[An attempt to elucidate the history of the early Chr[illegible] feasts by putting together the references to them in be[illegible] Jewish literature.]

A HISTORIC VIEW OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By P. [illegible] 8½×5½, 274 pp. A. and C. Black. 6s.

[The Jowett Lectures; by the author of "[illegible] Evangelica," (1890).]

"A BASKET OF SUMMER FRUIT." With In "Memoriam." of Sighs." By Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon. 7×3½, 132 pp. Pass[illegible] Alabaster. 1s. 6d.

[A little book of devotional thoughts.]

COMFORT FOR ALL. By F. Marshall. 7½×5½. 183 pp. 2s. 6d. n.

[Scripture passages for every form of trouble.]

THE MORNING WATCH FOR SOLDIERS OF THE KING. by Rev. G. Coates. 7¾×5½, 397 pp. Stockwell. 5s.

[Devotional extracts for every morning of the year, in [illegible] poetry, from many writers.]

NOTES INTRODUCTORY TO THE STUDY OF THE CLEM[illegible] RECOGNITIONS. By F. J. A. Hort, D.D. 7¾×5½, 143. M[illegible] 4s. 6d.

[Notes made by the late Dr. Hort for his lectures as Hu[illegible] fessor at Cambridge on the origin and history of the C[illegible] literature.]

A VINDICATION OF THE PULPIT. An Address by Dea[illegible] 7×5, 19 pp.

[A pamphlet giving practical advice to young clergy.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

THE TOWER OF LONDON. By Lord Ronald Sutherland [illegible] Vol. I. 9½×6¾, 231 pp. Bell. 21s. n.

[An elaborately illustrated and sumptuous work.]

LONDON AFTERNOONS. Chapters on the Social Life, Arc[illegible] and Records of the Great City and Its Neighbourhood. W. J. Loftie. 8½×5½, 292 pp. Cassell. 10s. 6d. n.

[A popular book, with interesting illustrations of Lo[illegible] and present.]

A PEEP INTO THE IMPERIAL DIADEM. By H. S. Foster. 87 pp. Simpkin Marshall. 1s.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. 272, by H. JOANNIN, Geneva.

BLACK. 7 pieces.

WHITE. 11 pieces.

White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM No. 273, by Jan Smutny, Vienna.

BLACK. 7 pieces.

WHITE. 7 pieces.

White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 272, by Jan Smutny, Bohemia.—White (8 pieces)—K at K R sq; Q at Q Kt sq; B at K Kt 8; Kt at K B 3; pawns at K Kt 5, K 4, Q Kt 2, Q R 5. Black (4 pieces)—K at K R sq; pawns at K R 6, K B 3, Q 2. Three moves.

PROBLEM No. 273, by Jan Smutny.—White (6 pieces)—K at Q Kt sq; Q at K R sq; R at K 5; Kts at K B 4 and K Kt 5; pawn at K R 4. Black (9 pieces)—K at Q 5; bishops at K B 7 and K Kt 5; pawns at K B 3, K B 4, K 6, Q B 4, Q B 5, Q Kt 6. Three moves.

SOLUTIONS.—Problem No. 251, Gold (2), K–B 2. No. 252, Gold (3), Q–Kt 2. If Kt–Q; 2. R–Q 6 ch, or if B–Q; 2. Kt–B 7 ch, &c. No. 253, Ending by Troitzky:—1. P–B 6 ch, K–P; 2. Kt–B 4, B–K 7; 3. B–R 4 ch and wins. Variations. No. 254, Shinkman (2), Q–R 2. No. 255, Marin (2), P–Q 3. No. 256, Fricder (3), 1. P–Kt 8–R, K–R 7; 2. R–Kt 3, B–Kt sq; 3. P–Kt 4 mate. No. 257, Brennander (2), R–B 4. No. 258, Kohtz (3), key Q–B 4. Then if Kt–Q; 2. Kt–Kt 8, &c., or if Q–Q; 2. Kt–K 8, &c. No. 25[illegible] Q–B 2, P–Q; 2. R (Kt 2)–K 2, &c. ("Such in a three-mover is rare."—A. C. W.) No. [illegible] Kt–B 8. No. 263, Schrufer (3), key R–K 8. 264. End-games will be given later.

Correct Solutions received as follows:—(Biarritz), 254, 257; A. C. H. (Reform Cl[illegible] Sellman (Uxbridge), 247, 257; W. P. B. (W[illegible] Stanley J. Gibbons (Sidcup), 247, 251, 257; A[illegible] field), 245, 251 to 256; J. D. Tucker (Ilkle[illegible] 258; Otto Würzburg (Grand Rapids), 250 to 250 to 252; G. H. E. Russell, 254, 257.

PROBLEM TOURNAMENTS. The British Che[illegible] nounces a new tournament, towards which Sir [illegible] has given £10 10s. for prizes, of which there [illegible] The German Chess Association also announce [illegible] connexion with the meeting next year at Han[illegible] Windmühlenstrasse 21B, Hanover, by 20th [illegible] Stratégie (Paris) has finished, in the current is[illegible] tion of its entries for the mammoth tournam[illegible] positions were sent in. Dr. Tolosa y Carrer[illegible] chief judges. The award will be awaited with [illegible]

GAME No. CXIII.—One of the Russian [illegible] games in which the champion was engaged:—

RUY LOPEZ.

White. J. Sybin.	Black. M. I. Tschigorin.	White. J. Sybin.
1. P–K 4	P–K 4	21. B–Q 2
2. Kt–K R 3	Kt–Q B 3	22. R–K 3
3. B–Kt 5	Kt–B 3	23. B–B 3
4. Castles	P–Q 3	24. Kt–K sq
5. P–Q 4	Kt–Q 2	25. P–R 3
6. Kt–B 3	B–K 2	26. Q–Q 2
7. B×Kt	P×B	27. R–Q 3
8. P×P	P×P	28. R–K 3
9. Kt–K 2	Castles	29. Q–Q B 2
10. Kt–Kt 3	B–Q 3	30. Q×P
11. B–Kt 5	P–B 3	31. Q–Kt 2
12. B–K 3	Kt–Kt 3	32. Kt–B 2
13. P–Kt 3	Q–K 2	33. R×R
14. Kt–R 4	P–Kt 3	34. R×R
15. Q–Q 2	B–R 3	35. Q×R
16. P–Q B 4	B–Kt 5	36. Q–Kt 3
17. Q–R 2	B–B 6	37. Kt–K 3
18. K R–Q sq	P–Q B 4	38. Kt (Kt 3)–B sq
19. Kt–B 3	R–Kt 2	39. Kt–Q 5
20. B–B 6	K R–K sq	40. Kt (B sq)–K 3
21. B–Q 3	Kt–B sq	41. P×P
		42. K–R sq

THE COMMITTEE of a CLUB in ST. JAMES'S QUARTER are prepared to elect some ADDITIONAL MEMBERS.

Applications for partnerships are invited from Professional Men, Government Officials, and others of social and Commercial standing.

Address (by letter only) Club, 16, Cockspur-street, Charing-cross, S.W.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29, West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for [illegible] on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS.—Catalogues sent on application.

NOW READY, bound in Art Paper Boards. Price 2s. nett. Large Paper Edition limited to 30 copies, 5s. nett.

POEMS. BY JOHN CLARE.

Selected and Introduced by NORMAN GALE (Author of "A Country Muse," &c.). With a Bibliography. By C. ERNEST SMITH.

RUGBY: GEORGE E. OVER, 1901.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London; and 7, Broad Street, Oxford. CATALOGUES ON APPLICATION.

NOW READY.

Louis Wain's Annual

Containing nearly 100 original Illustrations by LOUIS WAIN, the famous Cat Artist, and contributions from many literary celebrities, including:

T. P. O'CONNOR, M.P. HERMAN MERIVALE

BLACKWOOD'S M[illegible]

No. 1034—DECEMBER, [illegible]

DAY. By "LINESMAN." C[illegible] WINNIPEG. By C. HANBURY-[illegible] MARRIED.—HER SISTER. By [illegible] JONES OF PANNMAEN. BYRO[illegible] STREET.—THE WESTCOTES. [illegible] COUCH. CHAPS. VII.-IX. REC[illegible] STATE OF INDIA. THE CONQU[illegible] CHAP. XIII.—LI HUNG-CHANG [illegible] MICHIE. MUSINGS WITHOU[illegible] YEARS OF EMOTION.—GREAT D[illegible] PAGEANTRY. THE RETURN OF THE [illegible] COLONIAL EMPIRE.—THE COST [illegible] OLD RADICAL AND THE NEW.—AN [illegible] HIS POLITICAL PREJUDICES.—HIS [illegible] LETTERS.—WILLIAM HAZLITT AND [illegible] THE MINISTRY AND THE WA[illegible]

WILLIAM BLACKWO[illegible] EDINBURGH AND L[illegible]

THE NINETEENTH [illegible] AND AFTE[illegible]

No. 298. DECEMB[illegible]

A MESSAGE FROM AMERICA [illegible] By Charles Copland Perry.
OUR UNDISCIPLINED BRAIN[illegible]
MARRIAGE AND MODERN [illegible] W. S. Lilly.
A NEW LIGHT ON THE BA[illegible] CYPHER. By W. H. Mallock.
THE FIELD OF THE PRINT[illegible] Frederick Wedmore.
HOW TO PUT AN END TO PRO[illegible] By Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B.
A PLEA FOR THE CIRCUIT S[illegible] Mr. Justice Grantham.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 216. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 525, 526

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XXXI.—Mr. Stanley J. Weyman. An Appreciation by E. H. Lacon Watson... 527

A REVIEW OF REVIEWING.—A "Personal View," by Harry Quilter 528

THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 530

REMAINDERS 531

CURRENT LITERATURE—

Imperium et Libertas 532

The Life and Letters of Lady Sarah Lennox 533

The Life of the Master—The Life and Work of the Redeemer—The Man Christ Jesus 534

The Life of William Ewart Gladstone 535

The County of Worcester—County and Town in England—Some English Shires—English Villages—Betteswerth Book 535, 536

A History of the Police in England—The Old Foreign Office—Diaries of the Emperor Frederick—A General History of Europe—The Print Collector's Handbook—Alcoholism—George Washington and Other American Addresses—Omnibuses and Cabs—Before I Forget—Lord Kitchener—Notable Masters of Men—The Cape and its Story—With the Flag at Sea—Public Health and Housing 536, 537, 538, 539

The Winds of Cathrigg—Cynthia's Way 539

CORRESPONDENCE—Elizabeth's Treatment of her Seamen (Dr. Goldwin Smith)—The Gospel Riots at Athens (Mr. D. G. Hogarth and "W. M.")—Gyda the Goth—Weltgeschichte 540, 541

BOOKS TO LOOK OUT FOR 542

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 542, 543, 544

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be

MR. ISRAEL ZANGWILL.

* * * *

Books to read just published :—

"Caroline the Illustrious, Queen Consort of George II." By W. H. Wilkins. Longmans.

"Oxford Studies." By J. R. Green. Macmillan.

"New Tales of Old Rome." By R. Lanciani. Macmillan.

"More Letters of Edward FitzGerald." Ed. by W. Aldis Wright. Macmillan.

"The Usurper." By W. J. Locke. Lane.

"The Man from Glengarry." By R. Connor. Hodder, Stoughton.

"The Portion of Labour." By Mary E. Wilkins. Harper.

* * * *

The publishing year is all but over. The bitter cry of the over-stocked bookseller—always heard at this season of the year—grows louder every day, and many books are being held back by the publishers until next year. This will help the booksellers to ease their groaning shelves, and perhaps make up for what, speaking generally, seems to have been anything but a prosperous season for the trade.

* * * *

which, as stated in last week's Literature, is to be wr Mr. W. H. Wilkins. The publishers, Messrs. Hut have obtained permission to reproduce two recently-portraits of the King and Queen, which will appear as c plates with the first part. The biography, having run its as a serial, will be published in volume form. Anoth Illustrated work which Messrs. Hutchinson are prepa publication in parts early in the coming year is a histor British Parliament.

* * * *

Far the most noteworthy volume in its kind to com
Messrs. Sotheby's hammer during the first three day week was the copy of Byron's "Poems on Various Occa 1807, alluded to at some length in the last number of Lit
Although, as it turned out, the 8vo., in original green lacks its backs, and as a consequence the paper label, it not only a record sum for this particular piece, but tens of pounds than, before, has any example of Byronia at in this country. The pages measured about 7¾ in.
Bidding started at £50, and at £84 the volume won gone into an English collection. Messrs. Denham, the A agents, were the buyers, however, at £120. Th
"Stanzas by Ld. B." are not deemed to be in th autograph, but no doubt whatever is cast on the inscri
"Edwd. Noel Long, Coldm. Gds., from the author."
years ago an example, with the original label on the bac £68 under the hammer; and for a higher price than must turn to the first edition of "The Waltz," which in w has sold for £86. As to the "Chronicle of St. Albans," no copy is known, the defective Ashburnham having mad and one with 51l. in facsimile, 22 wanting, was priced ago at £300. The first edition of the Polychronicon in is not among the very rarest productions of Caxton's but as long ago as 1873 the perfect Perkins example—from library, 1827, 100gns.—made £365; while in the Museum is the White Knight's copy, valued in 1819 at The Charlemont example, wanting 2ll., fetched £477 10s.

"The Polychronicon." Caxton, c. 1482. 1st edt. in English. Wanting many folios. Sold with all faults ... ... £ Byron. "Poems on Various Occasions," 1807. Original green boards, uncut. Presentation copy 1
"Chronicle of St. Albans." 1483-4. 1981l. of the rare 1st edt. 7
Barclay. "Stultifera Navis," 1570. Original sheepskin binding. Inscription... 6
Aiken. "National Sports of Great Britain," 1825. Large paper 3
"Heures a Lusaige de Contances." By Simon Vostre ... 3 Boccaccio. "Amorous Fiametta," 1587. Englished by Bartholomew Young, of the Middle Temple. The Roxburghe copy 3
"Heures a Lusaige de Romme." Printed on vellum, by Gilles Hardouyn. Two leaves slightly mended ... 3 Bergomensis. "De Plurimis Claris Scelestisque Mulieribus." Ferrara, 1497 2
"The Sixtine Bible, Rome," 1590 2
W. Baldwin. "The Canticles, or Balades of Salomon," 1549. With the Baldwin imprint, and the autograph, "Tho. Hearne." (In 1892 this copy brought £19 5s.) ... 2
"Biblia Sacra Polyglotta," 1517 2
John Hardyng. "Chronicle," 1543. 1st edt., printed by Grafton 1
George Rickham. "The Musical Entertainer," 1737-38 ... 1
MS. relating to the Washington Family, America, and documents connected with the Principio iron mines in Maryland and Virginia 1

"Cat. of Birds in the British Museum," 1874-95. 27 vols. Cold. Plates	29 0
Smith, R. T. "Rough Notes on Birds," 1881-7. 3 vols. Cold. Plates	26 0
"The Canterbury Tales," Pynson, 1526. Defective ...	19 15
Smith, J. Chalmer. "British Mezzotint Portraits," 1879-83. 125 Portraits. A few years ago this work was valued at about £5.	19 10
Perse, John. "The Bloom of Gentrie," 1586	17 0
Davenant, Sir W. "Entertainment at Rutland House," 1657, first edition	10 15

The 752 lots sold during the three days show a total of £3,312 15s. 6d.

Mr. Sidney Lee publishes a letter he has received from the King complimenting him on the completion of the "Dictionary of National Biography."

Ex-Queen Isabella of Spain is engaged in writing her reminiscences.

M. Loubet has founded a £20 prize for the "Société des Gens de Lettres," to be called Le Prix du Président de la République.

Men of letters who celebrate their birthdays next week are Björnstjerne Björnson and Mr. G. A. Henty (Dec. 8, 1832), Prince Kropotkin (Dec. 9, 1842), Mr. Joel Chandler Harris, the American humourist (Dec. 9, 1848), and Sir Frederick Pollock (Dec. 10, 1845).

To-day Mr. Maurice Hewlett will lecture at the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society's house, 20, Hanover-square, on "History as Saga and Small Things in History."

Gerhart Hauptmann, Gorky, and Kipling are to be invited to attend as representatives respectively of German, Russian, and English literature at the centenary of Victor Hugo's birth.

A copy of the famous Psalterum, printed by Fust and Schoeffer in 1459, has been sold to Mr. Pierpont Morgan for £5,250 by the son of the late Mr. Bernard Quaritch.

The French Academy has awarded a prize to M. Jacques Bardoux for a study of "John Ruskin and the Idealist and Social Movement in the Nineteenth Century." M. Bardoux was for some time an undergraduate at Balliol.

Professor Albrecht Weber died last Saturday in Berlin. "Indian Studies" and an edition of the "White Yagurveda" were among his most important works.

M. Marcel Prévost is writing a novel on the seamy side of Viennese life.

Some interesting reprints are about to be issued by several publishers, as may be seen from our list of "Books to look out for at once." In addition to these Messrs. Chatto and Windus are bringing out immediately an édition de luxe of Charles Reade's "Cloister and the Hearth"—with photogravures and other illustrations by Matt. B. Hewerdine—and a pocket edition of Mr. Hall Caine's "The Deemster" in their "St. Martin's Library"; while Messrs. Dent have two new volumes almost ready of the Temple Bible—"Matthew and Mark," edited by Dean Stubbs, and "Leviticus," by Professor Paterson.

The bookbinding discussion at the Society of Arts the other day seemed to point to the conclusion that the decay in the leather of modern bindings was largely due to the speed at which people nowadays live. With the increased output of books, the manufacturers, as one speaker pointed out, were forced to face the problem of how to supply a cheap leather binding. "Men bought a book for a few shillings, read it, put it on the shelf, and thought no more about it." The huge presses of modern times, with pressures amounting to two or three tons, robbed the skins of the very nourishment they required. The trade, it was said, had two classes to consider, one represented by the British Museum and large libraries which were willing to pay for a satisfactory article, and the other by the British public, which apparently loved to be deceived. Sheep skin could be made to masquerade in almost any leather disguise, from crocodile skin to levant morocco, and it was often difficult

Messrs. Greening and Co. ask us to st of "Back to Lilac Land" is not, as has be Clement Scott.

We live in an age of pessimists and pro
all the civilized countries in the world reasons of their own for "

Books, Newspapers, the Country, and the Dogs.

An American professor la the United States was de most intellectual of the cit selves to inventing new me instead of philosophizing things. In a recent issue read that France is progressing in the same to the ever-increasing number of divorce c moral and religious principles." In Ru novelists are philosophers and all the philoso the pious Tolstoy and the iconoclastic G remarking a similar retrograde tendency. I indeed, if England were not also dans le m
George Macaulay Trevelyan in an article Century comes to prove that the charac books and newspapers constitutes a "Whit lead to our undoing. We are perfectly aw great deal of rubbish printed; we regret it, to defend it for a moment. But prophets of e all the facts before delivering their prop that Mr. George Macaulay Trevelyan has investigation. There are two propositions w to his attention. The first is that the cond Press at any given moment is the reflection of the condition of popular tastes. Were i the society paragraphs and futile serials p penny dailies were sending the country to t be able to console ourselves with the cheer the publication and wide distribution of a s articles like his own might be relied back again. If we have no particular remedy, it is because we doubt wheth
the disease have been rightly diagnosed.
tion is that a comparison of the newspaper with the newspapers of the days of our f wholly warrant a pessimistic view, which founded on a comparison of the worst present with the best journalism of the past.
scurrilities of contemporary newspapers from; the futilities and scurrilities of the hidden away in places like the newspaper Museum. Any one who will take the trou there will soon discover that the allegel d of the old journalism is largely a figment
He will find that the old comic papers, like T printed jokes of a vulgarity and coarseness w has long ceased to tolerate. He will fin paragraphs are in far worse taste than the w —not in our days would a society journalist things that the old journalists said when it Coutts, the banker, was to marry Harriet
If he confine his attention to the great that there, too, the improvement has been s and continuous. The great dailies are be

Literature Portraits.—XXXI.

MR. STANLEY J. WEYMAN.

The writer of historical romance has one or two advantages on his side in the friendly struggle with his brother, the novelist of modern life. For one thing, he has a more picturesque period to deal with; he can give his descriptive talent fuller play; and he can also enlist our attention by the simple device of introducing, now and again, real historical characters with whom his readers are not sorry to renew a slight acquaintance, dating from the happy days of their youth. A more important point in his favour is, perhaps, the natural craving for easily-acquired information common to most of us. We want an excuse for novel-reading, and we can silence the reproaches of conscience by the comfortable reflection that in sitting down to works like those of Mr. Stanley Weyman we are not wholly wasting our time; that in reading "Sophia" we may inform ourselves of English manners and customs in the middle of the eighteenth century; in "My Lady Rotha," of the state of Germany during the Thirty Years' War; and in quite a group of spirited tales, of the condition of France in the days of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew and of Henry of Navarre.

Still, there is something to be said on the other side, and something which concerns Mr. Weyman rather closely. The writer of historical novels finds it difficult to import much humanity into his work. Unless he chance to be a Thackeray—and there are not many Thackerays to be found in the world of fiction—he seldom brings his characters home to us. Even Scott himself made, at all events of his principal personages, little more than lay figures—glorified puppets if you will, but inanimate, for all their fine clothes and noble sentiments. It was Carlyle, I believe, who first pointed out the vital difference in this respect between a Scott and a Shakespeare, between the man who draws his characters from the clothes inwards and that other who fashions them from the heart outwards. It is not easy to create a living characters in a story of modern life; it is very difficult indeed when the period is one as remote as that of Mary I. of England or of the Thirty Years' War. The men are obscured by their trappings, and there is the temptation, to the conscientious worker, of paying too much attention to the clothes they wore, the language they affected, and the manners and customs of the time. For these things insist on being recognized. The habits of what we conveniently call the Middle Ages were most emphatically not as the habits of the present day; the whole thought of the time was totally different from our own, and it would be absurd to pass over these differences lightly, as though they were of small importance. But it is also important to remember that the men and women of those days were equally human with the men and women of to-day. The gentlemen who ruffled it in the train of M. de Rosny, the heroines who had, to be rescued or abducted from the enemy's castle, all had characters of their own no less worthy of elaboration than those of the modern curate or the young American girl. But the historians seldom have time to attend to these matters. They are commonly too much occupied with their tavern brawls, with their endless succession of incident, with their commendable anxiety to preserve a due archæological effect. These things have also their value, but they are not everything.

Initial chapters) contain some of the most excellent wor yet done. The book is slight enough, and it is no d unwise in an author, experimenting for the first time in manner, to err on this side rather than on the other.
also that the lady is kept very much in the background,
because the writer rather mistrusted his powers of deali
the capricious sex. But in other respects the book fore pretty clearly the sort of work that Mr. Weyman has be ever since. The time selected is his favourite period, t his favourite district of his favourite country; the Vi Bezers is the prototype of half-a-dozen other ruffians, r
by immense valour and a suspicion of gentlemanly
I hasten to give all credit to Mr. Weyman for having m early the important discovery that there are general good points even in the most thorough-paced villains.
wrote his first book this subtlety of psychological truth fully appreciated by writers of fiction. It does not seem matter of general knowledge even now.

Mr. Weyman is good in the handling of crowds, eve crowds have something more than a family likeness. Wh collected together, in the Middle Ages or later, the brawls; and it is in brawls that the hero of historical fic plays his mettle. "The House of the Wolf" begins wit de Caylus spitting a brawler; it goes on to a spirited des of the Paris mob on the night of the massacre. "M Rotha" contains an excellent fight with the good p Heritzburg; "The Red Cockade" is filled with des of revolutionary crowds, at first half-cowed and sullen, aft uproarious and triumphant. They are generally quite w they inspire the proper thrill of apprehension, and they hero plenty to do whenever they appear upon the s confess, too, that I have a weakness for the tavern braw has ever been one of the most useful weapons in the arm
the romantic writer. Mr. Weyman has some excellen of sword-play in this kind—notably, I think, that one Gentleman of France" where Crillon intervenes. It wa thought, too, introducing Turenne at that same crisis.

In fiction of this sort style is of no very great conse
It is the fighting that sells your historic novel, when all is we do not want our fighting spoiled by the tricks of the c
Mr. Weyman's manner in writing is not unpleasing. It and straightforward, with a touch of carefulness (as using a language not wholly familiar to him) which s enough with the times of which he treats. There are o when he rises to a grim sort of eloquence. But he is no of neat phrases. Action is his strong point—action ingenious contriving of adventure that shall lead on t ture and keep the reader always neatly balanced betwe and fear for the hero's safety and good name. I have critics abuse him for repeating his incidents, and it is true that we find characters escaping out of a window on one si street into a similar casement on the other more than several of his books, while many of the personal conflicts singular resemblance to each other. But these critics, to me, have not sufficiently considered the difficulties game. After all, in the days when men carried long sw fight must have been very like another, and there are not many different ways of getting out of a window. Let us that Mr. Weyman is not a Dumas, but he exhibits a cre variety of incident, and it is always well and briskly de
He is not one of our most bloodthirsty writers, but he voice is like the grating of steel on steel. "'Tis a cock of a fine hackle" cry a round dozen of tavern ruffiers on different occasions. The dull roar of the crowd is likened to that of breakers falling on the beach. "A slow blush, gradually deepening, crept over her face, as dawn creeps over a grey sky." It is only necessary to look through any one of his novels to find a hundred such battered expressions, which the irreverent call cliches. They are not without their use. They give, indeed, a picturesque air to the whole, and a touch of the archaic, but in time they begin to arouse the critic's impatience.

It is very much the same with Mr. Weyman's men and women, for the most part. They too, are reproduced from old moulds, sometimes from a mould of Mr. Weyman's own manufacture, occasionally from one bearing the signature of another author. He has not many types of character at his disposal, and so it need not surprise us to find him using them with a certain economy. Gil de Berault, the Vidame de Bezers, Count Hannibal—these three, to name no others, are all examples of the same type—one that the author may claim, perhaps, to have struck for himself. The other mould he employs for his protagonists is less individual, though it is only just to note as an exception Mr. Richard Price, in "Shrewsbury." His ladies also run much alike the same pattern—high-couraged, noble damsels, with more than a sesquiche of the shrew in their composition. Sometimes the shrew is very prominent, as in Mademoiselle de la Vire; sometimes it is barely visible, as in Rotha, Countess of Heritzburg; occasionally—let the heroine of "The Red Cockade" stand for my example—it remains an undeveloped possibility. His tales, to tell the honest truth, are not particularly fascinating. The reader never falls in love with them: he is sometimes inclined to wonder at the warmth with which they are regarded by their inadequately rapid suitors.

In these days an author can very seldom write what he will. There are two strong forces at work upon him, tending to restrain any original departure, any step in a direction that he has not previously trodden and found remunerative. The first is that timorousness, that fear of "letting oneself go," which, according to Mr. Frederic Harrison, is at the bottom of our decline in fiction-writing. The author of to-day is critic-ridden: he writes with the fear of the reviewer before him, and the result is a cramped and pitiful self-consciousness. I do not lay so very much stress upon this point, although undoubtedly it goes for something. The agent, or the publisher, is really at the root of the matter. Let a man make a success in one particular sort of fiction, and he is still beset with entreaties to repeat himself: to do another and yet another work in the same kind. Does some unhappy writer make a hit with a tale of China or Japan, it must be China or Japan with him until he can rouse himself to find solution—which is not always so easy a matter as it sounds. And it is so, in all appearance, with Mr. Stanley Weyman. He has put into a groove from which he will in all probability never extricate himself: he has his period and his scenery, and his short characters, and with these useful properties he can turn out quite creditable work, safe for the sale of a certain number of copies, remunerative and pleasing to all parties concerned. Only once, to my knowledge (if we except one or two short stories), has he made a serious attempt to emancipate himself, and that was some little time ago, before the wheels of his imagination had worn so deep a rut as they now contentedly travel in. It was in 1891, I believe, that he published "The New Rector," and it was not exactly a success. The book is rather dull, it is true, but it contains more humanity than most any fighting to be done—a not uncommon occa is a considerable talent. His novels are in constructed. They may not live for any gr but they make entertaining and not unprofit best of them are as good as any work of the turned out on either side of the Atlantic. Th creditable books, but they lack something. Po may some day cut himself loose from his t swashbucklers and their Wardour-street furn and produce a great novel. I doubt whether not certain that it is an impossibility.

E. H. LA

Mr. Stanley Weyman took to writing in o insufficent income at the Bar. His career as a in writing an account, which was not printed, Prince Leopold for the St. James's Gazette. So short stories, and, after repeated failures, wrot Sweet Clive," which made James Payn urg novel. The result was a novel of mode Weyman called "The New Rector" and af though the title was used again. But the tide a paper on "Oliver Cromwell's Kinsfolk" Review, and Mr. Frederic Harrison asked h with a paper on the actual descendants o chance study, at his club, of Professor Baird' Huguenots" set him thinking that he might s
the stir of arms in an historical period, and he t of "The House of the Wolf." It appeared so successful that a few years later the p Longmans) sent the author a complimentary
"The Story of Francis Cludde" appear Leisure Hour, and Messrs. Cassell subseq book form in 1891. In four years it brought £700 and £800. "A Gentleman of France," I Weyman's first great success. It first appea form in 1893 and in one volume in 1894 thro mans. "My Lady Rotha," which Messrs.
1894, appeared in a paper-cover edition limit —priced at ten guineas each. This was purposes in America. "Count Hannibal" reprinted, although published only a few chronological list of Mr. Weyman's books is
"The House of the Wolf," Longmans; 189
Francis Cludde," Cassell; 1891.—"The Ne
Elder; 1893.—"A Gentleman of France," I
"Under the Red Robe," Methuen; 1894.—" Innes, now Ward, Lock; 1894.—"The Man 1895.—"From the Memoirs of a Minister of 1895.—"The Red Cockade," Longmans; Cause" [With four other tales "King
Clive," "The Deanery Ball," "The Harpy," and "Archdeacon Holden's Tri and Co., Chicago; 1898.—"Shrewsbury: mans; 1898.—"The Castle Inn," Smith, Elder Longmans; 1901.—"Count Hannibal," Smi

A REVIEW OF REVIEW

A "Personal View

By HARRY QUILTER

Appreciation, Depreciation, Notice, C
the four strings of the critical fiddle, an i play too many Paganinis, each working his si la lyre. Popularity of such articles, at least by the number inserted, varies in inverse ra desirable that this last should not disappear from contemporary journalism, and the present writer would attempt to define a few of its obligations and limits, or rather to suggest concerning them the personal view of one who for six and twenty years has been working in this department of journalism. During this period reviewing has considerably altered in character, not entirely for the better; the signed review, for instance, has relieved the editor of much responsibility and permitted the expression of personal opinion to an extent formerly impossible. No doubt this has its advantages, also its drawbacks, not the least of the latter being that the critic is no longer conditioned by the importance of his periodical, by the necessity of not committing it to partial or indefensible statements. The unity of the paper, too, suffers; its columns become to some extent budgets of opinion; the verdict is not ex cathedra. This was not so when I first went on the staff of the——at the beginning of 1876. Said the editor to me, "Remember, we do not allow any articles to appear which are inconsistent with our personal views. We wish the paper to possess a definite unity," and it did. With the increased demand for lightness, interest, news, compression, and sensation that nowadays distinguishes journalism, editorial responsibility is chiefly limited to the literary-plus-journalistic value of the contribution, and save in special departments the personality of the journal is allowed to disappear. Hence divergent views are infinitely more common; and the responsibility for inadequate treatment is removed from the newspaper to the shoulders of the critic. These shoulders bear it lightly, for several reasons, of which the chief is, that the writer commonly declines to attempt serious criticism; he starts, as often as not, by declaring, in set or implied terms, his intention of giving a personal view only of the portion of the work under review which interests him. Or, if he be less candid, he adopts a thesis concerning his author, either optimistic or pessimistic, and selects bits here and there to prove his contention. Or, in the last case, he avoids the expression of opinion altogether, by the repetition, in more or less accurate phrase, of the author's own views and opinions. This last is achieved by copious quotation, joined up with insignificant and colourless commonplace. None of these things is criticism; are they desirable substitutes?

Is it impossible to render journalistically interesting a paper of the truly critical kind? And, in that case, are not the public and the authors very great losers by the omission of such reviews? Now I maintain, with all deference to my contemporaries, that there is not the least reason why a true criticism should be dull. There is the very strongest proof that this is not the case from the existence of a large body of work which proves the opposite. How about Hazlitt, Swift, Coleridge, and Byron's criticism? How about Taine, Sainte-Beuve, the Goncourts, and, coming down to our own day, Ruskin, Matthew Arnold, Stevenson, Morley, and Frederic Harrison? It were easy to multiply instances, but the fact is hardly to be denied, even by the most uninstructed reader. We may fancy, however, the argument would run thus:—"The times have changed, leisure and patience are to seek, and in the press of more vital interests critical considerations have little place. Besides which, books are here to-day and gone to-morrow; and it is better for the author that a glimpse of the character and contents of his work should be given than that he should be assigned an accurate place in the very ephemeral roll of fame." To which answer may be made that there is no reason why criticism should not be brief, trenchant, and to the point, in as great a degree as before an incompetent or partial judge. Moreover, in t general form of eulogium now dubbed "Appreciation," may be a pleasure to an author that some popular writ express his personal admiration, it should be nothing to th unless that writer shows his admiration to be found adequate knowledge of good work of similar character is competent and daring enough to assign a definite val new performance, to place it in the proper rank, and g cient reasons for so doing. That this can only be done by a certain acquirement and experience, joined (in all pro to a certain natural capacity, is undoubtedly true, always limit the number of real critics. But that all up critical writing may work in this manner, and tow end, is quite certain; if they do not do so, it is no the proceeding is impossible, but because the person is or incompetent. Journalistically speaking, a single pl frequently supply the comparative criticism most ne most illuminating; or swift suggestion thereof may be an epigram, or hinted in an adjective. When the master college remarked of a brilliantly clever, good-looking, lazy young Don, that the "small amount of time he co from the adornment of his person he devoted to the r his duties," he gave an instance of such criticism none vital for its sarcasm and unpleasantness. When a certa on art suggested that the painter under consideration wo in inverse ratio to the value of the substance he was r ing, and consequently, worst of all when he was dealing human face, he may have been mistaken, but he was ce genuine critic. When a lesser writer, who shall be name of an equally nameless author that he went delicately, li amongst adjectives and adverbs, he gave an impressi writer's style equivalent to a page of description—a No, there is no reason why criticism should be dull. As of fact, the better the criticism the less dull it will pro For good criticism is the acute perception of differe the expression of them in terse and vigorous form.

There is another chief consideration relating to cri periodicals, though one upon which I do not wish t which is that, in the absence of criticism, notice can h to become interested and partial—once depart from critical method, and there is no guarantee against the sentation of an author's purpose, or the value of his We see that in departments of thought and action, where rules and canons of reasoning and conduct are accept is no place and no pity for those dealing with such mat show themselves ignorant of the prescribed course, o potent to carry out its obligations and prescriptions. B the "Go-as-you-please" system is the ruling one, t scarcely be a limit to latitude, or any punishment for e is necessary that those who produce from their brain safeguarded to as great an extent as those who produce hands, or those who sell what others have so produce safeguards cannot be afforded them by law; they should the more certainly be given them by literary custom. It no more allowable to depreciate unduly the quality of than that of a pound of tea, and to that end criticism sh only exist, but be governed by accepted canons, against which should receive at least an equal cond with that bestowed upon any other incompetent writer.

This question of competence can only be dealt discussing the difficulties inseparable from any worthy of the name, which may rightly be divi productions which are or are not at the moment in special favour. It will be observed that I have left out of consideration any hindrance arising from insufficient training in literary expression, any ignorance of critical method, any incompetence to reason soundly, and draw logical conclusions from a given premise. I have assumed the critic to be a capable writer.

Now with regard to (1) it is to be noted that the books which present most obstacle to a competent reviewer are not those, as might have been expected, which deal with a technical subject. And for this reason. On such subjects, special information—i.e., that of specialists—is always to be obtained by those who know where to look for it. And, as part of any literary man's training is to be able to suck the heart out of a book at short notice, such an one has but little difficulty in finding out what has been said, or what is known on the given subject, and dealing with the new book thereon in the comparative method. Given an ordinary amount of brains, a British Museum reading-ticket, a fair share of industry, and two or three days' notice, a reviewer should be able to write not only a readable but an informing criticism of any subject which is in the least likely to be given him to deal with. But all subjects are not those of specialists, and cannot be approached in this manner. Large classes, for instance, are connected with "affairs," others with abstruse departments of thought, in which the estimation of argumentative value is a necessary part of the reviewer's criticism; and others deal with literary or æsthetic topics, and can only be criticized by those who have trained their perceptions in such manner as to distinguish minute differences of style, technique, and comparative achievement. The appreciation, for instance, of an absolutely right adjective cannot be taught in any school; the sense of what is superlative in colour or form is the result of natural capacity plus long and arduous training. If we think, again, of such classes of work as biography and travel we find the critic presented with another set of difficulties equally dangerous; for here he requires to weigh comparatively excellences and defects which are often of an opposing character. He has to determine, for instance, between the accuracy of Freeman and the picturesqueness of Froude, he must weigh the personal equation of "Eothen" against the careful thought and detailed information of Professor Bryce's "America," or Mr. Wallace's "Russia." Nor is this all. For in such subjects he will require a tolerably wide knowledge of "affairs"; not only of what has been written and done previously, but of the pressing problems with which the near future is likely to be concerned. Such a work, for instance, as Lord Curzon's "Problems of the Far East" was, when it was written, more important from the practical connexion of its author with future administration than would have been the case if it had been written by almost any academic writer. All such considerations, personal, political, and literary, have to be given their due weight, in addition to the appreciation of the author's accuracy in detail, the novelty of his information, and the freshness of the manner in which it is presented. It would not be sufficient in such books to give an abbreviated summary of contents or a few interesting extracts.

THE DRAMA.

THE LIMITATION OF DRAMATIC THEMES.

It comes as a shock to me to find that I have disheartened my friend Mr. Hamilton Fyfe by some recent observations of upbraiding the cause of his grief. "We have he cries, "a solid mass of unintelligence, whi in parrot-cries and outworn shibboleths questions, What are and what are not fit su Shall I remind him that "liberty" and "uni parrot-cries and outworn shibboleths just as o

"limitation"? Shall I hint that the you the theatre (of which he is a distinguished orn cant just as the old stick-in-the-muds (whom to represent on this occasion) have theirs?
shall profit neither ourselves nor our subjec that fashion. It will be better to consider positions—for he advances two, one particula
—and accordingly I propose to take them in o

Mr. Fyfe's particular proposition is that suitable for dramatic treatment. He complai the direct negative, I talked "ex cathedra a of argument" and so went beyond "the pro
And then he proceeds to do exactly the s
For in support of his assertion he merely off and (2) a fact. The dogma is that "The e duced upon different minds by stories of the dramatist ample scope for study of chara contrast." But that is the point at issue. is the proof? Name the dramatists. Pre must answer (for I know of no other play o any rate, he mentions none other), the autho Power. But that, obviously, would be to be now is the time for Mr. Fyfe to serve up his to him and "to a great many people, Björnson ingly interesting and suggestive." Well, wh Betsy? Not I, for one; on the contrary, I en
it. I said that "The ideas of which the pseud medium—the beauty of faith, the difficulty miracles, and the curious pathological con faith-cures—are so interesting in themselves, by Björnson with so much poetic feeling an and at the same time scientific reserve, that indifferent to their unsuitability for dramati that I, too, like Mr. Fyfe and his friend exceedingly interesting and suggestive. The us is that I did not conclude, as he does chosen a theme suitable for drama. I cont contend, that "one act of monologue on a sick another of pulpit oratory from a Church become a drama by the interpolation of two '
If so great a dramatist as Björnson, while ge of ideas out of his theme, could get only a mittent interest of drama, it was a reasonable theme was essentially undramatic. The pr is in the eating. Mr. Fyfe says he argument; but there it is staring him in the his heart-trouble has impaired his sight.

And it has also predisposed him to reason
"Suppose you, Sir," he says to the Editor of Invited Mr. Walkley to give you his op 'Lourdes,' and suppose that Mr. Walkley had the matter of the book was unsuitable for tre
I think, Sir, you would have exercised y and used your blue pencil." (Let me say, pa
these airy hypotheses put the unhappy Editor
If he took the trouble to invite my opinion, w of the genus literature. As though the gradual method of description and analysis had a field of subjects conterminous with that of the now-or-never method of action and synthesis! As though this were not the very reason why, as a general rule, there is only one more unsatisfactory hybrid than a dramatized novel, and that is a novel manufactured out of a play! As though the subject of L'Éducation Sentimentale or of The Portrait of a Lady could by any possibility be made dramatic! And as though the subject of The Comedy of Errors or of Le Chapeau de Paille d'Italie could ever serve for a readable novel! As though we did not know, what M. Brunetière has been dinning into our ears for so long, that the essence of play-people is that they agissent, while the essence of novel-people is that they sont agis! So that when Mr. Fyfe asks, "Why, if M. Zola may write a novel about the supposed miracles of Lourdes, may not Mr. Björnson write a play about the marvellous cures of Pastor Sang"? he might just as sensibly ask, "Why, if jam is good to eat, is it not a good pomatum for the hair?"

The truth, of course, is that in arguing from the novel to the drama Mr. Fyfe has overlooked the simple fact that every art has its own range of appropriate subjects, conditioned by the medium in which the art works. And this same oversight has betrayed him into that general proposition of his to which I referred at the outset—the astounding proposition that there are no limitations of subject in any art. "The whole book of life is open to the artist's choice, whether his art be expressed in forms and colours or in words and sounds. To set up fences and landmarks which he may not overstep is futile." I really feel inclined to apologize for taking this statement solemnly; but I put a few questions. May a serious epic poet choose a medical subject—such a theme, for instance, as that for which Coleridge suggested the opening, "Inoculation! Heavenly Maid!"? May a musical composer choose Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding as the subject for a sonata or a symphony? Or can a painter make a picture or a sculptor a statue out of that subject? Or does the good painter ever take an "anecdote" for a subject? We know that the bad painter does; hence some of the most inartistic eyesores of the Royal Academy. Could you make a novel out of Kant's Critique of Pure Reason, or Whitaker's Almanack, or the Army and Navy Stores catalogue? As to the dramatist, he is, and always will be, hemmed in on all sides by "fences and landmarks." The most tragic of tragedians, for instance, may not go beyond subjects of pity and terror to subjects of sheer horror and disgust. (Has Mr. Fyfe forgotten the famous passage in the Poetics—οὐ γὰρ φοβερὸν οὐδὲ ἐλεεινὸν τοῦτο ἀλλὰ μιαρὸν ἐστιν?) And that is why the subject of Titus Andronicus, for instance, is "unsuitable for dramatic treatment." The most comic of comedy-writers dare not go beyond the marriage of his young lovers to the period when they "live happy ever afterwards." And that is because the essence of drama is conflict of wills. To speak as the mathematicians, subjects showing force in action are "dramatic," subjects showing nothing but forces in equilibrium are absolutely "unsuitable for dramatic treatment." And in like manner many characters—e.g., philosophers, scientific investigators, pure contemplators of life—are excluded from drama because the qualities which make them what they are cannot be shown by the methods of the stage. The stage can only show the philosopher in love or in a rage, the investigator buried in despair or shouting with triumph, and so on—i.e., can only show the qualities which do not make these characters what they are. This is already a fair abound, as we poor mortals all know too well, on every pag

"book of life"; and there art is compelled to leave the I know, after all, that I shall not have convinced Mr. F his fellow-theorists whose cry is, "No subjects barred to I lack the ability and the authority for that. I will usual weakling's refuge, then, in a "big brother." L read a little treatise, written a century and a half object of which was to show that there are general limitations for all art and particular subject-limitations art. It is called Laocoon.

A. B. WALK

"REMAINDERS."

The Remainder Trade.

There is something pathetic about a "remainder logue. It is the last refuge of the failures; the grav books that have had their days of success and died; t for works of reference that are growing out of date. Pe is cruel to speak of the bogey of the book trade when th of author and publisher alike should be at their highest,
we have a shrewd suspicion that more than one publisher remainder man in his mind as well as the ordinary publi he sent some of his new books to press. Suppose he ca to sell 4,000 copies of a work; an extra thousand copies, not a great deal more to produce, would make what he wo
a "good remainder." Of course there is always the po that the whole edition might be taken up in the first pl
the feeling is spreading among booksellers that the re market is developing far too rapidly for the good of the t a whole. "Half the business seems to be in remainder days," grumbled one old bookseller to us not long ago;
clung to the opinion that remainders were not only a the character of the publishing trade, but a fraud on the No reasonable man will agree with him, however. The re market is indispensable, but there is a danger that its may mean a proportionately larger output of rubbish, es in fiction. There was a time when all publishers looked as the remainder man, and made bonfires of unsaleable book than let them go his way. Now every publisher bows custom so systematically that in most cases he sells his rem through his own travellers.

We believe it was James Lackington who first reali possibilities of a remainder trade, and he retired with fortune from his "Temple of the Muses"—as he called his b at the corner of Finsbury-square—over a hundred years a he had a hard fight to live down the trade prejudices of h
"I was very much surprised," he wrote in his curious "M and Confessions," "to learn that it was common for purchased remainders to destroy or burn one-half o fourths of such books, and to charge the full price, o that, for such as they kept in hand." Lackington chan this, but it was some time before he forced the trade t And he made many enemies in this way, "some of whom by a variety of pitiful insinuations and dark innuendos every nerve to injure the reputation I had already acqui
the public, determined to effect my ruin, which indeed th prognosticated, with a demon-like spirit, must inevital speedily follow." Perhaps it was the recollection of this tion which made poor Lackington so boastful in his triumph. He built a chariot, on the doors of which he motto inscribed:—"Small profits do great things," and chariot, attended by his servants, he drove round the in state.

The Vicissitudes of Books.

The romantic side of the remainder trade would m interesting chapter in literary history. Some of th of "Murray's Family Library" in 1834—100,000 volumes at a shilling each, which he cleared out at a profit of more than a hundred per cent. But his most famous haul was in connexion with "Valpy's Delphin Classics" in 162 large octavo volumes, the whole stock of which, amounting to nearly 50,000 copies, he sold off in about two years. Similar things happen nowadays, though generally on a smaller scale. Lord Avebury's "Seedlings," if we remember aright, was at one time sold as a remainder at six shillings for the set, but you cannot buy it in the auction room in the same form now under fifteen shillings. Even "Omar" has been among the remainders, the first edition of FitzGerald's translation being sold off at any figure. The Illustrated edition of Challoner Smith's invaluable work on "British Mezzotinto Portraits Described" was originally published at eight guineas a copy, but ten years ago the remainder was offered at £5 each. Last year one of these examples realized twenty-three guineas. Remainders, indeed, have proved to be the mak'ng of many a good book. Only the other day we heard of such a work which, after being abandoned by its publisher as a failure a few years ago, was sold under the hammer to the trade, and becoming known simply through being distributed broadcast among publishers, has had a steady sale ever since. As it turned out, the remainder market was the cheapest form of advertisement the book could have had. Another case was that of an excellent volume of Greek history, sold off after a time as a comparative failure; yet a few weeks later it was adopted as a text-book at Cambridge and the publisher had to re-set it. There must be hundreds of similar instances. Sometimes the author himself is responsible for a remainder—especially with a book that has a regular sale. Something has happened to put his work a little out of date; he insists on a new edition; and the old stock has to go by the board. It is usually worth while making inquiries before buying a remainder of this description; the new edition may make it dear at almost any price.

Some Modern Remainders.

We have just been looking through a new list issued by the well-known Holborn firm which makes a speciality of this class of books—130 closely printed pages. One of the surprises is to find Madame Sarah Grand's "Beth Book" among the six-shilling remainder novels—offered at 2s. 6d.—while a little lower down in the list is Miss Corelli's "Cameos," offered at the same price. "The Daughters of Babylon," by Wilson Barrett and Robert Hichens has dropped to eighteenpence, while the price of Miss Dickens' "Cross Currents" has fallen as low as a shilling. Even Bret Harte does not escape, "In a Hollow of the Hills," originally published at 3s. 6d., being offered at 9d. The books that have the strangest vicissitudes, however, are found in the general list, a selection from which we give below:—

Titles and Authors	Original Price £	s.	d.	Offered at £	s.	d.
"Cruise of H.M.S. Bacchante, 1879-1882." From the Diaries of Prince Albert Victor and Prince George of Wales. With additions by Canon Dalton. Two vols.	2	12	6	0	6	6
"The Study of English Literature." By J. Churton Collins	0	4	6	0	1	9
"The Pamirs." By the Earl of Dunmore. Two vols.	1	4	0	0	10	0
"Words of Truth and Wisdom." By Dean Farrar ...	0	5	0	0	1	6
"Life of the Right Hon. W. E. Forster." By Sir T. Wemyss Reid	0	10	6	0	2	6
"Edmond and Jules de Goncourt, with Letters and Leaves from their Journals." Translated by M. A. Bettany and M. Shedlock. Two vols.	1	12	0	0	3	9
"Life of General Sir Edward Bruce Hamley." By Alexander James Shand. Two vols....	1	1	0	0	3	0
"Gaiety Chronicles." By John Hollingshead... ...	1	1	0	0	5	0
"The Early Diary of Frances Burney (Madame d'Arblay)." Edited by Annie Raine Ellis. Two vols.	1	12	0	0	6	0
"Life of Sir Robert Christison." Edited by his Sons. Two vols.	1	12	0	0	4	0
"The Queen of Naples and Lord Nelson." By John Cordy Jeaffreson. Two vols....	1	1	0	0	2	0
"History of the County Palatine of Cheshire." By G. Ormerod. Large paper edition, three vols. ...	30	0	0	4	4	0
"Memoirs of the Empress Marie Louise." By Imbert

Books of travel seem to find their way market as soon as anything—largely becau subject than most books to the external influ Public interest shifts rapidly from one qua another, and a book of travel, brought out sudden emergency, soon finds itself stranded nate candidate for the remainder man's catal

CURRENT LITERA

IMPERIAL POLICY.

Imperium et Libertas: A Study in Hi By Bernard Holland. (Edward Arnold. 12s. 6d.

Mr. Bernard Holland has chosen an adm has, on the whole, worthily treated it. "Impe is not only a study of the past, a review of colonial policy since the American Revol examination of the forces at present in opera or foreshadowing of the future. It condense floating loosely in the air. It will reveal to are his convictions as to matters of vital drawn towards Liberal Imperialism, but i difficulties surrounding it, the book will reason for it. To the solution of the comple which Mr. Holland discusses he brings one or is fairminded; he does not dogmatize; he changed his mind as to some matters; he personalities. To speak of the book as p either in style or reflections, or to say that it reader, would be nonsensical; parts of it are scrappy; but it is an honest and useful discussion of a question which must be solved subsist. The argument is always straightfo it is a striking testimony to the earnestnes argument that it leaves the reader with a for action is fast slipping away.

It is not a reproach to Mr. Holland that not very precise. He does not see his w scheme under which the colonies would h in the Parliament of the United Kingdom; a if not for ever, a Federal Parliament for the remain impossible. Mr. Holland's favourit Imperial Council, not empowered to legislat consult, advise, and recommend. He likens this supposed Federal Council to the Bund distinct legislative powers and other attribu those with which Mr. Holland would invest h Unfortunately the proposal is left in the a realized—how obvious difficulties which do no growth of colonial self-government are to are not told; we are even left unconvinced gradually opening. More promising and Holland's suggestions growing out of the rem be, and visibly is, a rise in importance of the T is the real bond of unity; and, if its po become fainter, its influence has gained in

We miss in the volume a sense of proportion. About one hundred and sixty pages are occupied with the American Revolution, and about sixty with the Union of 1801 and Home Rule; and then comes the summing up. We learn nothing as to local government in other colonies than Canada, or much as to the latest theses of the political life of the Dominion. We find no appreciation of the difficulties which must arise when several federated States all belong to the Empire. The conciliation of "Imperium" with "libertas" is more and more difficult, as their number increases, and Mr. Holland does not aid us as much as he might in finding the way out of these difficulties. One part of the book is distinctly impressive. When Mr. Holland speaks of the decleusion of the House of Commons he is interesting, when he dilates on the political paralysis in the United Kingdom and the vigorous local life discernible elsewhere he is eloquent:—

> If in the United Kingdom we are sensible of a certain political malady, and compare our constitution with that of other countries, we find that the federal system in various forms prevails in the most flourishing and advancing States of the present and the future. The United States of America are so constituted, and so is the German Empire, and Canada, and now Australia. The rise and advance in every direction of the German Empire has been the most striking phenomenon of the second half of the nineteenth century. This Empire is far less centralized than is the United Kingdom, and life, strong at the heart, is strong also in every member. There is no dull monotony of system; the German Empire, though ballasted by the great Kingdom of Prussia, much larger than any other, includes every kind of minor State flying its own flag beneath the Imperial eagles; small republics like Hamburg or Bremen, good-sized constitutional monarchies like Bavaria or Saxony. If the Dutch liked to enter the Empire, the Kingdom of Holland could come in without any change in its domestic constitution. There are States dominantly Protestant and States dominantly Catholic; industrial States and agricultural; each with its own government and varying constitution, and each stimulated by a beneficial rivalry in good works with its neighbours. Every State has the power itself to make itself healthy, prosperous, and beautiful. In cities like Munich or Dresden the traveller feels that mysterious something, wider and higher and nobler than the life even of a large and wealthy provincial town, which marks the existence of a real State capital, the heart of a country living a life of its own. His thoughts may turn with melancholy to those fine old streets and squares and public buildings which in Dublin are now but memorials of a political life which did, though imperfect, exist.

Mr. Holland does not write in a sanguine spirit. He is satisfied neither with the men nor the measures of our day. "I am not at all sure but that the time is approaching when foresight will be a positive disqualification in statesmen." Affairs are drifting, and he is able to point to no uninterrupted course of policy leading to the end which he believes the best for England and the colonies. He thinks that we are entering upon a new phase of development in which both will be members of a real partnership. "Nothing in progression can rest on its original plan," said Burke; and in the spirit of that maxim Mr. Holland bids us advance; bids us try to solve the question, "yet unsolved, whether it would not be possible to form a distinct federal Legislature and Administration above the heads of the local Legislatures, both British and colonial, to deal with a specified class of affairs common to the whole Empire, such as foreign and commercial policy, naval and military affairs, and Imperial finance." He does not, we repeat, write hopefully as to the possibility of this being realized. In the controversies which

LADY SARAH LENNOX.

The Life and Letters of Lady Sarah Lennox, 17
Edited by the Countess of Ilchester and Lord Stav
2 vols. (Murray. 32s.)

The letters of Lady Sarah Lennox have for some t looked for with no little expectation by the increasing n readers who are interested in the eighteenth century. The will be somewhat disappointed, for though we can apprecia perusal of her correspondence the causes of her charm, singularly little in this life-long correspondence of ne personal interest. Nearly 100 pages of the first volume a with a memoir kept by the first Lord Holland during three years of the reign of George III. which has no h importance, and would have been better published in separate volume.

By far the best part of the book consists of the early of Lady Sarah up to the end of the year 1768. The se from her husband in the following year caused her le some time to be too personal for preservation, and a marriage with Captain Napier, in 1781, she cared nothin for society or politics, and except for a pleasant since mellowness of view by which they are characterized, her would have no more than family interest. George II Lady Sarah famous; she was a mere child on his ac
having been born on February 14, 1745, the fourth dau Charles, second Duke of Richmond; she was very pre and very attractive, and the young King fell completely with her; that his suit was encouraged, probably for p reasons, by Lord Holland is now obvious, and it was dis to Lord Bute, to whom nothing could have been m welcome than that Lord Holland's sister-in-law should be
It is quite clear—and it could not be otherwise—that Lady Sarah was pleased by the King's preference for h piqued when his engagement to a German princes announced, she had no love for him, and was more distu
the death of her pet squirrel than by the news of the engagement. But the affair was the talk of the Court every drawing-room in London, and it gave this charmin kind of reputation that made her from that moment personage. Young as she was, she regarded the certainty early marriage with amusing sang froid, and carried expectations by marrying Mr. Charles Bunbury in 176 became a typical sporting young lady, and seemed at have really liked her husband, though, as we know from Selwyn's letters, she and Lord Carlisle had some kind of tion which made the prudent Selwyn send his young friend to get Lady Sarah out of his head. All through her life frank, brave, and rather heedless, and this recklessness her to elope with her cousin, Lord William Gordon, i though her friends presently induced her to separate from him. The seclusion in which she lived for some ti subsequent happy marriage to Captain Napier, and her the mother of the Napiers—a life of some anxiety an poverty, but one of contentment and good-humoured a cence with fortune—sum up her remaining years.

It may very well be asked where in all this rather o existence is the attraction of Lady Sarah. It lies in p qualities which cannot be depicted by mere extracts correspondence nearly a century old, though they are fe as a whole. It is easy to understand through it the inde to both at a time. I told him he was too young for such schemes and would fail in both, but he trusted to the ladies' characters and I believe he may succeed.

Sir and Charles are, of course, Stephen and Charles James Fox. Twenty years later, when Charles Fox was in office as the colleague of Lord North, and when he might very well have helped Captain Napier, Lady Sarah could write of his neglect of her interests with perfect serenity :—

> I had a great mind to be in a rage, but I have overcome my anger upon the reflection that Charles has good qualities enough to attone for a thousand faults, and I have no right to expect from him an attention which no relation of his ever yet acquired. I am determined not to grow unreasonable and think him ungratefull because he is partiall ; the first is a crime, the latter is only a weakness. So much for Mr. Charles.

In the tone of her letters are revealed those attractive qualities which made her liked throughout her long life. To watch the growth of a personality such as this through a series of years by means of a correspondence written to a single friend—for nearly all these letters were addressed to Lady Susan O'Brien—is a pleasant study which is not always to be obtained.

There is yet another thing to be said of these letters, they give us another picture of the social life of the eighteenth century. Lady Sarah was one of quite a different set to Fanny Burney, but, just as the diary and correspondence of that lively young lady enable us to understand the feelings and the mode of life of the girl of the upper middle class with literary leanings, so do these letters of Lady Sarah regenerate for us the girl who was one of the aristocratic Court set in the first years of the reign of George III. We know what the men were like from Walpole and Selwyn, and we know a good deal about the ways of the older women from Lady Mary Coke and other diarists. But we have never yet had quite the same thing as we find in Lady Sarah's letters—the sincere and unaffected tale of a girl of eighteen in the Holland House set. There is another word to be said, it is much to be regretted that the possessors of old-world letters and diaries do not take example from Lady Rchester and publish them in the same delightful form—they are an admirable kind of family memorial.

LIVES OF CHRIST.

THE LIFE OF THE MASTER. By JOHN WATSON, D.D. (Ian Maclaren). (Hodder and Stoughton. 25s.)

THE MAN CHRIST JESUS. By W. J. DAWSON. (Grant Richards. 10s. 6d.)

THE LIFE AND WORK OF THE REDEEMER. By Various Writers. (Cassell. 6s.)

These three volumes, taken together, are a noteworthy and encouraging sign of the times. Dr. Fairbairn, than whom no writer could speak on such a subject with greater authority, has said that "the most distinctive element in modern theology is a new feeling for Christ. . . . We feel Him more in our theology because we know Him better in history. His historical reality and significance have broken upon us with something of the surprise of a discovery." Whatever significance is to be attached to the phrase "the recovery of the historical Christ," there has certainly been of late years a wholesome tendency to lay stress upon the personality of the Redeemer rather than upon his mediatorial office. The aim of modern "Lives" of Christ has been to bring this personality into direct contact with the needs of men. Hence has arisen a juster estimate of the difficulties of the Gospel records. When the last word of

The most striking in every respect of th of Christ" is the magnificently got-up wo Watson (Ian Maclaren). "The Life of the Ma that this book deserves a very high plac literature to which it belongs. Ian Maclare wisely to a careful study of certain aspects disclaims any attempt to discuss chronologica points. "We do not," he says, "dare to p
he (the reader) has read the last page . . .
a site or a date, but we dare to hope that he vision of the august Figure who invites the man's conscience, who lays His hand on each style of the book is worthy of the subject. It i poetical and yet unstrained ; Ian Macla as a stylist are obvious enough in his other p here they are modified to a great extent by theme. For instance, the tendency to ove kept in due restraint ; on the other hand, e a deep and genuine feeling, which produces i on the mind. The beautiful illustrations, for the work by Mr. Linson, heighten the and tender beauty produced by the book itse
the Master" will deservedly crown Ian M reputation ; but beyond this we believe tha render a signal service to the cause of religio

Of the three volumes now published Mr. D Christ Jesus" is in some ways the most least satisfactory. It has undeniable merits ;
an accurate sense both of the impossibili biography of Jesus, and of the inevitable critical faculty in dealing with the Gospel faults of the book are obvious. In spite of descriptive passages, the style is much too are signs of undue haste in the production of it was only in the spring of 1901 that "the took that outline, and its general principles the main defect of Mr. Dawson's treatm familiarity of tone, a want of reserve, and oc good taste, in describing the character, aims Christ and His forerunner. Mr. Dawson ver Baptist that "his mind is commonplace" ;
"Ecce Agnus Dei" as "an immortal encom the retirement of Christ into the wilderness
"Jesus saw in John a truly great man, wh been bred in the school of austerity, and He make a trial of asceticism, &c." ; he tells us well of Sychar Jesus drafted the working pla
In one passage he even says that Christ "s two thousand years," when He taught t womanhood, and the principles of justice in t sexes. Further, in some passages where rest duty, Mr. Dawson gives a loose rein to hi unfortunate results. The few photogravure book (reproduced from certain pictures by o us singularly unsuited to a life of Christ whi frankly realistic.

Of a very different type is "The L Redeemer," to which many well known denominations have contributed. There is chronological or critical sketch of Christ's li present "a spiritual portrait" of the Rede and devotional use, and its value may be re

GLADSTONE.

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE. By H. W. PAUL. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d.)

This biography is the original draft of the life written for the "Dictionary of National Biography," which was afterwards reduced to fulfil the conditions of that complete but concise work of reference. Even the unabbreviated version (three times the length, we are told, of the other) reads somewhat like a "blue pencilled" composition, owing to the number and variety of the subjects which it was necessary to touch if not to treat. Indeed, we are not satisfied that the chronological method was, except for the special purposes of the dictionary, the best that could have been adopted for the biography of so great a man written on so small a scale. Separate chapters relating his achievements in separate spheres of activity—in foreign politics, in finance, in theology, in classical criticism, &c.—would probably have produced a more definite as well as a more picturesque impression upon the reader's mind; while a chronological table might have furnished the connecting link between them. As it is, though we gladly acknowledge that Mr. Paul has done his work as well as anybody could reasonably be expected to do it, and has been singularly successful in avoiding the danger of dulness, he necessarily bewilders us by the rapidity of his transitions from Budgets to points of scholarship, and from speeches about jam to pamphlets about Church government. Occasionally, too, probably as the result of the strict chronological method, we find an episode of some importance inadequately presented. The reasons, for example, of the retrocession after the Majuba defeat are only imperfectly stated. The apprehensions of attack from the Orange Free State, which are nowadays generally believed to have been the determining motive, are not referred to.

It is, of course, with Gladstone as a public man, not as a private person, that Mr. Paul concerns himself. For Gladstone intime we must wait until Mr. Morley's life appears, though it is not absolutely certain that he will be revealed to us even then. But there are some personal touches, though they are few and far between. As a bachelor, it appears, he "went a good deal into society, especially to musical parties, where he often sang." Of his social accomplishments, in the days when Mr. Paul knew him, we read that "the defect of his conversation was that he could not help being earnest on all subjects, and failed to see that his views on the making of violins were less interesting than his experience of government by Cabinet." Also that "with all his love of poetry he had a literal mind, and was too apt to assume that people meant exactly what they said."

The conditions under which Mr. Paul wrote presumably debarred him from actively taking a side in the multitudinous controversies which the contemplation of the great statesman's career suggests. It matters the less, perhaps, because Gladstone himself, at some period of his life, argued on every imaginable side of every imaginable question not immediately bearing upon the truth of the doctrines taught by the Church in its Creeds and Articles. He was a Theocrat before he was an Erastian, and he seldom carried a measure which he had not previously represented as detrimental to the best interests of the country. To decide which of his many selves was his best self is not so interesting or important as to discover the underlying principle which accounts at once for his inconsistences and for his belief that he was never inconsistent. This is Mr. Paul's contribution to the inquiry:—

Free Trade was the schoolmaster that brought Peel to Liberalism. With Gladstone it was rather the failure of his

TOPOGRAPHICAL BOOKS.

A HISTORY OF THE COUNTY OF WORCESTER. Edited [illegible] WILLIS-BUND, F.S.A., and H. ARTHUR DOUBLEDAY [illegible] (Constable. £6 6s., four vols.)

It is a pleasure to welcome the first volume of [illegible] the Victoria County History scheme, and to find that it [illegible] fully the praise that has been lavished on its two fo[illegible] The high level of the part devoted to natural history [illegible] sustained by men of national repute such as Mr. H. [illegible] ward in geology and Mr. Lydekker in palæontology; [illegible] John Amphlett on flowering plants and Mr. R. F. [illegible] birds prove that Worcestershire can produce [illegible] naturalists within her own borders.

No traces of the palæolithic period have as [illegible] detected in the county; but man of the three other div[illegible] historic times begin, has left fairly frequent and obvi[illegible] of his presence. Professor Windle and Mr. Willis-[illegible] interesting accounts of the successive incursions o[illegible] Goidelic, and Brythonic man into this part of the [illegible] England. The Iberians of the neolithic age have left [illegible] of their weapons and implements on the highland [illegible] Malvern Hills and those of Lickey and Bredon. The [illegible] who dispossessed the neolithic men in the bronze age, are [illegible] responsible for the great row of forts or earthwo[illegible] western boundaries of Worcestershire. The Goidels [illegible] turn were displaced and driven over the Severn by a n[illegible] invaders, the Brythons of the Iron Age. Of their co[illegible] which lasted till the days of the Roman invasion, the t[illegible] fairly abundant. They have left behind them not only [illegible] of weapons and implements, but also of personal o[illegible] This treatise on early man is made all the more rea[illegible] intelligible by a variety of sketch maps of the county [illegible] the successive deposits of these three distinct races re[illegible] Romano-British Worcestershire is treated exhaust[illegible] cautiously by Mr. Haverfield, whilst the small and comp[illegible] unimportant traces of Anglo-Saxon settlement are des[illegible] Mr. Reginald Smith.

The leading feature, however, of this volume, whic[illegible] fail to be much appreciated by all historical students, [illegible] rendering of the Domesday survey with annotatio[illegible] introductory essay by Mr. J. H. Round. His a[illegible] Worcestershire, at the time of the survey, marks a dis[illegible] in advance of anything hitherto attained by student[illegible] period. Professor Freeman, many years ago, found t[illegible] of Worcestershire so exceptionally full, and so richly [illegible] by contemporary church charters, that he devoted to it [illegible] appendix in the fourth volume of his "Norman C[illegible] Quite recently Professor Maitland, in his "Domesday [illegible] Beyond," has equally insisted upon the exceptional va[illegible] Worcestershire survey. It has been left for Mr. Round [illegible] out its leading features in a striking and convinc[illegible] Problems of assessment, jurisdiction, and tenure of land [illegible] with all that illustrates the conditions of rural life from [illegible] thegn to the humblest serf are here discussed, whilst [illegible] touches that occur here and again amongst the re[illegible] vividness to the drier details. The respective privile[illegible] Bishop and the King's Sheriff; the military service [illegible] King, not only by land but by sea, for the question [illegible] money" is far older than the days of Hampden; the e[illegible] jurisdiction of the several hundreds; the extraordina[illegible] of the county under Church jurisdiction; the pe[illegible] extensive features of the salt industry; the dominant p[illegible] of Urse, the terrible Sheriff, and the burning disputes [illegible] the convents of Worcester and of Evesham are here e[illegible] with a clearness and accuracy never before attained.

The bitterness of the feeling between the ch[illegible] Worcester and Evesham is shown by the story told by [illegible] of Worcester and preserved in Heming's cartulary:—

> According to them the saintly Wulfstan, on the [illegible] the despoiler of their house, Æthelwig, abbot of Eve[illegible] rash enough, in his infinite compassion, to offer s[illegible]

Droitwich pervades the survey of the shire. The actual ownership of Droitwich was divided in a unique manner between about a dozen tenants-in-chief, each of whom had fractional holdings. In addition to this the tenants of many scattered manors possessed their salt pans, or rights to a supply of salt. There are various other entries in the survey, pertaining to this industry, such as the carthends of wood for consumption at the salt works, of which the single vill of Bromsgrove sent three hundred a year.

The Domesday map, prepared by Mr. Round, gives at a glance much valuable information. The King's manors have a red line under the name; a blue line is under the manors of the church of Worcester; whilst a green line denotes those held by Sheriff Urse as a tenant-in-chief. The maps of the different periods, as well as those that illustrate the geological and botanical features of the shire, are among the most helpful and distinctive characteristics of these Victoria History volumes. The only quarrel that we have with any one of them is that the blue and green underlinings of the Domesday map are indistinguishable by artificial light.

COUNTY AND TOWN IN ENGLAND. By GRANT ALLEN. With an Introduction by Professor F. York Powell. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

This attractive book consists in the main of reprints from the Pall Mall Gazette of 1881-82. Mr. Grant Allen had frequently been asked to reproduce them in book form, and such had been his oft-deferred intention. It has been left to his friend Professor York Powell to see them through the press, to offer a useful "predatory note," and to make a few changes, all of which, however, are noted by brackets. In these chapters Mr. Grant Allen deals with groups of counties, and with towns representing the various districts. It is difficult to exaggerate the amount of information contained in these pages; every paragraph gives evidence of historical study and of close local observation. It is just the kind of book to take from the shelves when any particular district is to be visited on a summer holiday. It can scarcely fail to awaken a healthy inquisitiveness, for it not only imparts substantial information, but awakens a habit of observation.

> England [as Mr. Grant Allen observes] is an endless and delightful puzzle: she offers us a riddle to solve, a queer custom to account for, a name or a relic to explain at every turn. Why is Maidstone the county town of Kent, and Chelmsford that of Essex? Why does Oxfordshire lie so one-sidedly to its capital, and Leicester stand so centrally to its shire? Why may we say Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, but not Sussexshire, Cornwallshire, or Cumberlandshire? Why is Old Sarum now desolate, while Shaftesbury still caps its waterless hill? Why is there a Winchester on the site of Venta Belgarum, while Venta Icenorum has dwindled down to a mere provincial Caister, and Venta Silurum to a forgotten Caer Went?

In hardly any one book yet published have riddles such as these received such satisfactory and intelligent solutions. The brief introductory section, "What is a County?" is a wonderfully concise answer to a question that would puzzle many a fairly capable historian. Mr. Grant Allen naturally pours scorn on the fable that assigns to Alfred the division of England into counties. The truth is that the shires have grown, that no two have grown after precisely the same fashion, and that it is their natural growth and its diversity that makes their history so interesting.

The last fifty pages of this book are occupied with "The Annals of Churnside," an original attempt to set forth a typical specimen of the development of an English countryside from prehistoric days down to the Victorian era. Professor York Powell styles it "a piece of popular scientific exposition." The reader will probably find it stimulating, and it may set him thinking: but we are not sure that it was wise to republish it. The giving fancy names to a part of Dorsetshire, which it is easy to identify, is all very well for a novelist like Mr. Thomas Hardy, but it is somewhat childish to blend after this fashion the functions of a tale teller and an historian.

---

completed his account of one more county Cambridge, with which this edition closes. I mind that could manage to write so vivid a p and present of such a county as Cambridge h
There is not a superfluous phrase, each para with information, and the whole is well balance intellectual powers were of exceptional width bridgeshire was charming, not only for the ma of its University, or the rare beauty of its Ca Ely, but even the fens, so monotonous and de minds, were full of attraction. Witness the graph of his essay on the shire:

> The Fenland has a charm of its own to o > story of its gradual reclamation, and can enjo > of arable land visible from the dykes which > the drainage-cuttings. He can see the village > around them, which mark the islets where > man to live. He will find in almost all of > some architectural interest, built at a time > could easily be conveyed by water; and he > imagination, think himself back into th > melancholy life which human skill has banis

Mr. P. H. Ditchfield has produced (Methuen, 6s.), an olla podrida upon every pos archæology and ecclesiology of our English days of palæolithic man down to the lingerin the present day. Those who desire to have h fairly accurate little essays on such subjects Dwellings, Anglo-Saxon Villages, Norman Churches, Church Plate, and many other sub have this pleasant-looking volume; but it w
the antiquary or fairly well-read student. M no claim to originality of treatment on any points upon which he touches, and acknowledge to Sir John Evans, Mr. St. John Hope, Dr. nevertheless he does not show much power i of the materials that he has gathered from a w area. The illustrations are numerous and attractiveness of the volume, but a consider been frequently used in former like works.
rather deceptive; for instance, the imagin Norman Castle, on p. 138, would lead the unin that embattled parapets were used by the Nor

Mr. George Bourne's BETTESWORTH BOOK 5s.) is a series of "talks with a Surrey p share of the conversation falling to Betteswo
Mr. Bourne draws him out and makes him tel that, by the end of the book, we seem to kn
He is worth knowing if the author is righ
as typical and not exceptional. "The tru Bourne, "he belongs to a strong breed. Th his equals in serviceable doing. All that he h is being done no less well to-day by his s village and town throughout the country.
matter of every day occurrence, that we take do not notice the tough breed of men at their if their work were to cease, England would bec before a week was out." We may recommen one who wishes to know more than is genera unpretending but important labourers. M well, and is strictly moderate in his use of dia

OTHER NEW BOO

Police.

Almost every subject relating to Engl has found an historian, and it was time t vogue at various periods for maintaining law be brought together to receive historical treat of police is full of interest. On its serio

complete narrative. What he attempts is an outline, and in criticising the book this self-imposed limitation must in fairness be kept in view. As an outline the book seems to us to suffer somewhat from a want of proportion. The author does not always estimate accurately the value of material. He gives us ten pages on the forest police of Norman and Plantagenet times, but not more than a few lines on the important writs issued by Henry III. in 1252 and 1253—the first precise and comprehensive enactments that we know of respecting watch and ward. Cromwell's "Major-Generals" are fully dealt with, but there is not a word on the dramatic passages between Charles I. and the Court of Common Council relating to the police of the city. The lengthy account of the Gordon riots, again, might well have been summed up in a sentence or two, nor, in a book of this kind, do the many pages devoted to the subject of crime and penology seem to be required. Some twenty pages are allotted to the suppression of riots, but there is no allusion to the progress made in the improvement of police stations since the days of Sir Robert Peel, a subject intimately connected with the efficiency of the force. Regarded as an outline history, then, the book is by no means without defects. The two chapters on police reform in boroughs and in counties are in favourable contrast with the rest of the book, for here the subject-matter is cleverly epitomized. With some of Captain Lee's statements we cannot agree. There is little doubt that the Court-Leet for view of frank-pledge, which he regards as a Norman institution, really dated back to Saxon times. The institution of "Conservators of the Peace" is attributed to Richard I. It is true that the "form of oath" issued by Archbishop Hubert in 1195, for the repression of crime and disorder, contains the germ of the new departure, but such officers were not actually appointed until many years later. These are not the only instances which show that our author has not always been thorough in his reading of learned authorities or of original documents. He has, however, done some good service in his endeavour to discover political and social reasons for the periods of stagnation or of progress in the history of police, though these disquisitions carry him somewhat away from the main object of the volume. He may be congratulated on having addressed himself to a subject which is certainly one of those still requiring careful historical treatment; but we think he would have been better advised not to publish the result of his researches in its present form, which is not wholly satisfactory as an outline and does not attempt to give a full view of this very important and interesting subject.

The "F. O."

No one living is better fitted to write RECOLLECTIONS OF THE OLD FOREIGN OFFICE (Murray, 12s. n.) than Sir Edward Hertslet. His father's service in the office lasted from 1801 to 1857, and he himself succeeded his father as Librarian, only retiring from his post in 1896. His own recollection, therefore, extends some way back before the erection of the present Foreign Office building in 1868, and his father's life was passed in the old office in Downing-street. Sir Edward writes in a pleasant and discreet style, and gives a careful record of the history of the office and of its chief officials during the past century. No one need expect from him any abundance of "racy" personal anecdotes, or matter of any great political importance; but there are some reminiscences of Palmerston and of Disraeli which are interesting, and some curious stories as to the history of important documents. This is certainly one of the oddest:—A labouring man one morning brought to the Foreign Office an original numbered despatch from one of H.M. Ministers abroad written in the eighteenth century. He had seen it drop from the coat pocket of one of the outside passengers on a City omnibus in the Clapham-road. This particular despatch was found missing in a bound volume of despatches at the Public Record Office, and the gap was now filled up, but nothing was ever discovered as to its history and travels.

The Franco-German War.

DIARIES OF THE EMPEROR FREDERICK, edited by Margaret von Poschinger, and translated by Frances A. Welby (Chapman and Hall, 12s. n.), is more in the nature of a document than a

the importance which always attaches to information fr quarters. We find, for instance, that Jules Favre w prepared to cede Alsace at the very time when he was his famous phrase, Pas une pouce de notre territoire, pierre de nos forteresses; and there is an authoritativ
ment concerning the double-faced behaviour of Napoleon

> Napoleon is quietly trying to approach us; mode > the conditions of peace, in return for promises of a com > against England.

This at a time when the starving population of P just been fed by English charity. One wonders Victoria knew the story when she cultivated the frie the Empress Eugénie. The Emperor Frederick tells it comment. Another interesting entry throws light on Bi attitude towards the Roman Catholics.

> Bismarck holds that the evacuation of Rome wo > enormous error on the part of Pio Nono, but bl > Germany might be productive of good results because > of the Roman priesthood would cure the Germans.

The pages, however, which will arouse the widest are no doubt those which deal with the negotiation establishment of the German Empire. They are ser omit so much that the story cannot properly be follo them. One sees in them, however, the beginnings animosity between the Emperor Frederick and his Cha and one also finds it made tolerably clear what w Emperor Frederick's cardinal articles of faith. He be the Empire; he believed in friendship for England believed most profoundly of all in himself. Many indeed, might be quoted to show that his faith in the Em really faith in himself as Emperor.

> I question the sincerity of the liberal constructi > Empire, and believe that only a new era, which will > reckon with me, will see this. Experiences, such > accumulated during the last ten years, cannot have b > in vain. In the now united nation I shall find a strong > for my ideas, more especially as I shall be the first pr > comes before his people honestly attached to const > measures, without reservation.

It is the utterance of a true Hohenzollern—Hohenzollern with a difference; and it is as a Hohe with a difference that the Emperor Frederick impress through the diary. He had not the extravagant and e piety of some other members of the family. We are n sure that he was as able as his son, or would have nerve, like his son, to "drop the pilot." But he ha reasonableness in a more notable degree than any other of his house who has been prominently before the world

A History of Europe.

A GENERAL HISTORY OF EUROPE (350-1900), by Thatcher, Ph.D., and Ferdinand Schwill, Ph.D., edi adapted for use in British Universities and schools by Hassall, M.A. (Murray, 7s. 6d.), is a good book to learn less though an uncommonly dull book to read. Our principal to it is that it might have been made a good deal bette breviating the beginning, expanding the middle, and les the end. For students who are not "specializing," the the Dark Ages can be sufficiently summarized in a short propositions for the honourable purpose of gaining spac adequate treatment of the more momentous period succeeded; while the events subsequent to 1815 are so so complicated, and so well-known that they ought to with in a separate volume on a larger scale. In this scale is kept more or less uniform throughout, with th that the later chapters are far too sketchy to be of muc any one. Nothing would be easier than to make important occurrences to which there is no reference—th Terror, the war between Holland and Belgium, the Swi War, the Spanish Marriages, &c.; and though it easy enough to assign reasons for crowding them out, to us that it would have been better to have rese become a self-governing community by throwing off the yoke of Savoy, but did not become a part of Switzerland until long afterwards. Now is it exact that, when Calvin first came to Geneva, he was on his way to France. His destination, as a matter of fact, was Basel. These, however, are very small matters after all. On the whole we can applaud the book. The facts are well put together. It has some good genealogical tables, an excellent collection of historical maps printed in colours, and a useful bibliography at the head of every chapter. The bibliography might perhaps have been improved by referring the student to such contemporary authorities as Froissart, de Commines, de Thou, Matthew Paris, &c., instead of being confined to the works of modern historians; but the lists, subject to this reservation, are in every way satisfactory.

Print Collecting.

THE PRINT COLLECTOR'S HANDBOOK, by S. Whitman (George Bell and Sons), is the latest assistance to the print-collector in his task. The enthusiasm of authors and the diligence of students have provided many volumes on this subject, and there is not much that is fresh to be found in Mr. Whitman's book. It contains too little letter press and far too many illustrations, executed often inadequately; conveying, that is to say, only the subject, and not the technique, of the original prints. Even if the illustrations had been altogether what one would have wished, they cannot go far in promoting the value of a handbook on Prints. Originals themselves require to be seen by the score, though the purse of the collector may allow only a few of them to be bought; and his real guidance, so far as a handbook can give it, is to be sought in the expression of authoritative opinion and the record of innumerable facts. The use that Mr. Whitman has made of the best critical authorities has been scanty, and he has not been lavish in the expression of his own views. They are sensible when we can get at them, but they seem to lack any very strong raison d'être. The faith that is in him—for it is in him, no doubt—wants a little more "justifying." Then, as to facts, his volume does not find room for enough of them. In speaking of some of the greatest masters, he is so brief that he can convey very little. The hungry sheep look up and are not fed. System, Mr. Whitman, we are glad to say, is by no means without. He has planned his work carefully. The skeleton is there, the bony structure well accounted for; what it wants is clothing. If Mr. Whitman was determined to treat a really vast subject on so small a scale, he might have been more interesting by being less systematic. He has been like a train, halting a minute or two at wayside stations, with all the little people concerned in the art of engraving, whereas he might have shot past these, and paused up longer at the great places, with the great artists. This was the course followed by Mr. Wedmore, in "Fine Prints." Dr. Willshire wrote at great length and did not need to follow that course; but then he only carried the story to the point at which "ancient prints" end and modern prints begin. Moberly, again—who was certainly brief enough—belongs to an earlier generation, when the field of print collecting was smaller. We could wish that Mr. Whitman—if he chose to treat the minor people at all, and the "false gods, mis-begot" especially—had been less timid, and had warned beginners, and foolish rich people, against traps laid for them, and fads which do not represent the taste of the connoisseur. The prices given, at the present time, for feeble colour-prints are altogether excessive. They can hardly be looked upon with tolerance by eyes accustomed to Dürer, to Rembrandt, and to the elegance of the great Frenchmen. We do not say for a moment that Mr. Whitman encourages the most recent folly, but he might have spoken out more clearly. When he is writing about lithographs, we can discern, between the lines—now that and his reticence—that he thinks it is easy to give too much for the modern ones. And we agree with him, as to the minor men. But his studies in the best modern Lithography do not appear to have gone far, for we trace no mention of Fantin-Latour's beautiful, almost invaluable, drawings on the stone.

by measles and other recently imported diser
in fact, is conditioned by the selective action which in England is believed to be the direc
of 120,000 deaths a year, is a most potent Races such as the Jews and Southern have had unlimited opportunities of indul craving for alcohol, have tended to become l sive drunkenness. "A drunken Jew is a phenomenon at the present time." In other is sober strictly in proportion to its past in races so with individuals. The "better-clas to-day, whose ancestors seldom went to bed s than they were, not because he has more self-in the course of evolution, he has inherited a is less inclined to drink. Left to herself, out her own temperance reform. It may alm
the course of centuries, England free will bec
But the human reformer in all ages has with infinitesimal success. While Nature promote nating the drunkard, man has tried eithe drunkard or to eliminate the drink. All su predestined to failure, or worse. Can we impotently by and watch the cruel and natural selection? Dr. Reid, greatly dari speedier way. Artificial selection must com
To this remedy—he admits that it is an un is no alternative. Alas! "Not in our time," be followed"; and there is every reason right. Quite apart from alcoholism, the admir tion of the two great rival theories of evolu book opens is well worth reading for its own students there is a copious Appendix, with resting report "on the conditions under w inebriety is transmitted from parent to offs work is a valuable contribution to the dise
most important questions of our time.

Mr. Frederic Harrison's Addresses.

GEORGE WASHINGTON AND OTHER AMERI
Frederic Harrison (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. n.). collection of speeches merely reproduces,
well-known opinions of Mr. Frederic Harr ourselves from discussing it. The philosophy comes up for examination once a year at the his annual encyclical; there is no need, in reports. We may note, however, an his statement that the Dutch Republic is "the modern Europe of the establishment of a fre
The Swiss Confederation was much earlier, a Geneva was somewhat earlier, the Geneve the Duke of Savoy more than a generation b rid of the King of Spain. For the rest we ladies of the Women's College, Bryn Mawr, told Mr. Harrison they would rather he celebrities he had met than "listen to a set general or historical subject." The lect anecdotal reminiscences of John Bright, Huxley, Tennyson, Browning, Ruskin, George Garibaldi, Mazzini, Victor Hugo, and A recollection of Victor Hugo confirms in an the presentation of that great man of letters our own Hugo number:—

> He was treated with a deference tha > private to princes of the blood; when > whispers, to a political friend the whole re > maintain strict silence. "Il parle," > though none of us except Naquet, > permitted to hear the words. A fervent a > up, present, almost, on his knees, a copy > Terrible, and beg the favour of the aut > cannot honestly say that, in the course of t > one word that was interesting or characte > lips on which France and Europe would ha

the youths dragged his carriage through the streets, after his lecture at the University—"a lecture," he said humbly, "that was strictly confined to Russian literature, without one word of politics."

OMNIBUSES AND CABS, by H. C. Moore (Chapman and Hall, (7s. 6d.), is an excellent book of its kind. Mr. Moore has been fortunate in finding a subject of a popular kind which has not been dealt with in a similar way before; he has been diligent in collecting information, and he puts it together in a clear and sensible style. The history of omnibuses he traces from the famous Shillibeer—and even still more remotely from the first conception of an omnibus in the brain of Blaise Pascal—to the latest struggle between the blue and orange omnibuses running from Kilburn to Fulham. Of the history of the companies and the development of the motor he gives an excellent account, though he is a little hard we think on the "Pirates." The development of the cab is illustrated by some capital pictures, and he has much to say that will interest every Londoner on cab fares, cab strikes, and cab accidents. The book is well worth reading.

A capital volume of reminiscences is Mr. Albert Chevalier's BEFORE I FORGET (Unwin, 16s. n.). An autobiographical record of stage experiences is not an easy thing to do well. It always has an attraction for certain readers, because it brings them into a kind of personal contact with well-known men; but it is apt to become very wearisome. It all depends on the use made of what Mr. Chevalier speaks of as that "constantly recurring personal pronoun," which has a tendency to lead the writer away from the path of good sense. Mr. Chevalier uses it judiciously; and he never deviates from good taste. As every one knows, his career has been a unique one; and his worst enemy could not accuse him of a lack of humour. The result is a very readable book. The best part of it contains Mr. Chevalier's shrewd remarks on, and amusing experiences in, America. We have the typical Yankee journalist in the man who called upon Mr. Chevalier between four and five in the morning to get a new song out of him there and then. He was full of apologies, but said he, "it is quite unavoidable, as we want to publish a song specially written by you for next Sunday's issue." We need hardly add that he got the song; and not only the song, but a tune for it out of Mr. Chevalier's colleague, Mr. West.

Mr. Horace G. Groser's life of LORD KITCHENER (Pearson, 2s. 6d.) is less perfunctory than most biographical work of this sort. The author has evidently been at some pains to put himself in communication with those who have known Lord Kitchener from his boyhood upwards. He is able to contradict or confirm most of the floating legends of the great general's youth, and he has given particular attention to his work in connexion with the Palestine Exploration Fund. A sound and careful, though hardly a well-written book.

NOTABLE MASTERS OF MEN, by Edwin A. Pratt (Melrose, 3s. 6d.), is dedicated to "youths who aspire," and is a good popular account, with portraits, of such men as Mr. Carnegie, Sir Josiah Mason, Sir Henry Bessemer, Mr. Edison, Sir Henry Parkes, and a good many others, who in one way or another have become famous. Mr. Pratt does not make wealth his criterion of success. He tells many stories of victory ultimately won by brains, industry, and integrity; and he makes it clear that the secret of success is always the same, both in steel-works and sheep-farming. The account of Mr. Tinworth is one of the best; but Mr. Tinworth is not exactly a "master of men"; nor are the labour members of Parliament, whose position in the world Mr. Pratt is rather disposed to magnify.

THE CAPE AND ITS STORY (Nelson, 2s. 6d.) is ostensibly a book for boys, and has three gaudy coloured pictures. It mainly differs from some of the other summaries of South African history that have lately passed through our hands in that the rights and wrongs of a good many subjects of controversy are not explained with much precision. This may have been due, however, to the writer's earnest desire that his work should not be mistaken for a lesson-book. On the title page there is a [illegible] portrait of Sir George White in scarlet.

the defeat of the Armada, and the last fight of the Re[illegible] if there is here and there a little writing for writing's [illegible] In the escape of the Calliope from Apia during the [illegible] among the Navigator Islands, it can easily be forgi[illegible] account of the fresh material in the book, such as the [illegible] convincing narrative of the Victory's log during the [illegible] Trafalgar. In the story of the sea there can be so little [illegible] is not more or less known to Englishmen that every [illegible] worth knowing.

Dr. J. F. G. Sykes' PUBLIC HEALTH AND HOUSING (P. [illegible] and Son, 5s.) deals with the difficulties arising from the [illegible] tendency to the concentration of population. Perhaps t[illegible] urgent of these problems are associated with the effect of t[illegible] conditions upon public health. Even the rich live an a[illegible] life in "mansions"; the middle-class has its fl[illegible] boarding-houses and residential clubs; the poor hav[illegible] common lodging-houses and their model dwellings. A[illegible] means an immense pressure of population upon squa[illegible] cubic space, and Dr. Sykes has set himself the task of in[illegible] exactly how and to what extent restriction of space [illegible] health, and how the evils may be reduced to a minimum [illegible] volume, which originally appeared in the form of the [illegible] lectures delivered before the Royal College of Physicians [illegible] of lucidly presented statistics and plans and deserves [illegible] study, particularly by those who are interested [illegible] housing of the working classes.

FICTION.

The Yorkshire Moors.

Miss Christabel Coleridge has taught us to exp[illegible] her capable and conscientious work. THE WINTS OF CA[illegible] (Isbister, 6s.) justifies her reputation. The scene is laid [illegible] Yorkshire fells and one soon begins to share the enthusi[illegible] the author for the windy freshness of the northern [illegible] Character rather than sensation or plot is the book [illegible] interest. The hero, Caradoc Crosby, within an ace of b[illegible] a ne'er-do-well, but retrieved by a good woman's love, is [illegible] with true perception. So are Sir Caradoc, the violent [illegible] Lady Crosby, the malleable and negligible step-mother, [illegible] true daughter of the fells, and William Quince, the self-sac[illegible] one, who disgraced himself to save his brother. We [illegible] forbear from quoting a passage concerning the gentle tas[illegible] reviewer:—

> Edward Mason was sitting in his rooms in the T[illegible] with six uncut volumes, three volumes of poetry by new [illegible] two biographies in two volumes each, and a book o[illegible] "Transcendental Ethics" on the table. . . . He [illegible] like casual novels, nor consider that he understood [illegible] cendental Ethics, or even feel quite certain as to wh[illegible] might be. One of the biographies required a minute kno[illegible] of the duties demanded by a bishop towards his clerg[illegible] other was full of military technicalities; but the pa[illegible] which Edward wrote was not in a position to comm[illegible] services of experts, and the reviewer was, of course, su[illegible] to be omniscient. Edward was conscious of some g[illegible] his knowledge, but he took pains and was on his guard.

This is a slapdash description of a certain kind of re[illegible] and contains perhaps just enough truth to sting. Was it [illegible] wise of the author to tempt "the reviewer's revenge"?—[illegible] title, by the way, for a literary melodrama.

"Cynthia's Way."

Too rarely does one meet with a story so agreeably w[illegible] Mrs. Sidgwick's CYNTHIA'S WAY (Edward Arnold, 6s.). [illegible] full of the spirit of comic opera, with its topsy-turvydom [illegible] gay humour hovering on the edge of sentiment, and ag[illegible] sentimental shading off into the ludicrous. The idea of [illegible] young woman masquerading as a poor governess is not o[illegible] but it is here remarkably well done; we cannot indeed c[illegible]

Correspondence.

ELIZABETH'S TREATMENT OF HER SEAMEN.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the November number of the Nineteenth Century there is an article by Vice-Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge on Elizabeth's treatment of her seamen at the time of the Armada, attacking a passage in my "United Empire" on that subject. Sir Cyprian is not exhaustibly calm or courteous. He charges me, Froude, Green, and several other writers on history with having "had it as our object to surpass the originator of the calumnies against Elizabeth." It seems not to have occurred to him that our object, if we had any beyond the proper duty of historians, might be to do justice to the English seamen who, under the greatest difficulties and discouragements, had saved the country. He does not, so far as I can see, traverse any material statement of fact; but he tenders apologetic explanations derived from his nautical knowledge. Writers of history could, of course, only state the facts as they unquestionably appear and as they evidently impressed the Lord High Admiral at the time.

Sir Cyprian Bridge may now undertake to explain the starving of the English Army in the Netherlands, the harrowing details of which he will find in Motley. "The English soldiers," says Motley, "who had fought so well in every Flemish battle-field of freedom, had become—such as were left of them—mere lawless half-naked vagabonds and marauders. Brave soldiers had been charged by their Sovereign into brigands, and now the universal odium which suddenly attached itself to the English name converted them into outcasts. Forlorn and crippled creatures swarmed about the Provinces, but were forbidden to come through the towns, and so wandered about, robbing henroosts, and pillaging the peasantry. Many deserted to the enemy. Many begged their way to England, and even to the very gates of the palace, and exhibited their wounds and their misery before the eyes of that good Queen Bess who claimed to be the mother of her subjects—and begged for bread in vain." *

Sir Cyprian will, I think, also find proof enough that in the opinion of those most concerned the Queen's "sparing humour" was the cause.

Yours faithfully,

Toronto, November 19. GOLDWIN SMITH.

THE GOSPEL RIOTS AT ATHENS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Like many others among your readers, I read with great interest and some profit Mr. Rouse's long letter in your last issue. The writer spoke as an expert in Romaic ballad literature, and said much that was true about linguistic "reform" in Greece since the Liberation. But, as he said that and more with unnecessary severity towards a section of Greeks whose aims are of the highest and purest, whatever their wisdom, and in apparent ignorance of what is just in their plea, and further gave a very partial explanation of the recent ferment in Athens, I venture to make a demand on your space.

Experts in Romaic literature always seem to blink the fact that there is not and never was a Romaic dialect common to all Greeks. Indeed, the differences are now so great that in certain parts of the Greek world the popular ballads of other parts are practically unintelligible. The Anatolian Greeks, for instance, would make little or nothing of a Cretan song; and the peasants of the Maeander valley do not understand the peasants of the

been in continuous use among exiled Gree Venice and Vienna, a literary language, descended from that used by educated B written in this were read and understood b all over the world before the Liberation; a the Romaic people was once more in a posi pleased on its own soil, for the benefit of all more sensible than that it should ado tongue this common written speech, th was not unfamiliar to any one who attendes Church?

That this should gradually make its way also was inevitable among a people with whom widely spread and eagerly sought. It has m I gather, Mr. Rouse is aware. There is n distinction between the newspapers and the the Athenian street as he seems to think. Cer common to all the spoken dialects have re influence—e.g., the analytic formations; but some extent yielding. And if there has been crusade against these, a great deal of conscio Greek purists, and too much anxiety to fit th antiquity on the shrunken limbs of the a similar tendency always in evidence in mo have seen in our own day an Anglo-Saxon mo style and personal nomenclature. And in Edward on our King, have not we, too,
history?

To ask the Greek men of letters to wr language would be to ask a lettered lowland dialect to his wife, to write for others in th songs; and to translate the Gospels into rea much such an outrage as has lately bee America, where the Bible has been render tongue of Wall-street. Those papers whic in Athens have about the standing of our sec Educated Greeks talk in the vulgar tongue, but drop it as we do when speaking to th ceremony must be used. It has neither universality which fit it for a national langu Rouse, has it the literature. Klephtic ballads stuff at their best.

The Gospels have not, however, been Palli into true Romaic, but into the m which occasionally appears in the better is like "modernizing" our own Autho writing it for example in the style of a p than one such translation, however, has b Athens, and the publication of another woul tithe of the feeling shown in Athens la circumstances made it a symptom of a r which the majority of Greek patriots re dangerous disease in their body politic.

For some years a party has been g
Greece which despairs of the "Great Hellenism at first grew and conquered, accept things in their present state as a Believing that the race has lived too lo to resume the place it had even in the this party would at most only claim as Turkish isles and Epirus. Some clear he so much. And all would gladly see another

Bulgaria should further increase her influence there. The Cretan policy of the King inspired, it was supposed, by Russia, very nearly wrecked the Dynasty in 1897.

Since the disastrous issue of the Macedonian attempt the opponents of the "Great Idea" have been reinforced. They are still necessarily very unpopular, as unpopular as those in England to-day who hold that the term of our Imperial expansion has been reached; and they proceed with caution. Meetings and Hyde Park demonstrations are not feasible in Athens, but a good deal can be done in a quiet literary way, by methods similar to those in vogue with the Opposition to the Roman Empire in the second century. But the majority, including and led by the hot-heads of the University, watches jealously for signs of this peaceful propaganda; and when anything which seems to make for stereotyping the existing state of things, and denying the possibility of a greater Greece, is detected, action is taken. This last translation of the New Testament, which would fix religious conceptions in the language of what is regarded as an incomplete stage of Hellenic evolution, and also put dissension between the Greeks of the Hellenic kingdom and their brethren, who live under the Phanariote Patriarch, seemed an acute symptom of reaction. It followed closely on the Queen's effort in the same direction; it appeared in one of the two leading Athenian newspapers and was approved by the other; and it was not condemned by the head of the Church, thanks, it was said, to Royal influence.

Rightly or wrongly, the New Party is supposed to have Russia at its back. The Old Party in Greece, which aspires to protect and absorb all Orthodox Christians in the Levant, finds Russia, on the other hand, claiming to protect what the Porte conceded to her at Kainarji. She is supposed to be waiting to help the Cretan Church out of the dilemma in which the latter's continued submission to the Phanariote Patriarch places the patriots. Her expansion also is supposed to be the least superable impediment to Greater Greece. The Russian birth of the Queen, therefore, and, without that, the necessary identification, as has been said above, of the powers that be with a diplomatic rather than an extreme national policy, makes them always the objects of attack, whenever popular indignation is aroused by what is considered a symptom of national despair. This lively fear of reaction and not merely a purist sentiment about language (great as is the power of sentiment among Greeks) made this student riot grow to such dangerous proportions—proportions sufficient to call for the most strenuous disavowal of Royal sympathy with the New Party: for the arbitrary displacement of the head of the national Church; and for the summary replacement of a comparatively strong Minister, with whom is the vast majority of the Chamber, by a weak man, with whom stand scarce a score of deputies.

I wish to pronounce no opinion on the truth or falsehood of the popular view about this translation, but merely to state it. Nor again do I say anything about the immediate circumstances of the riot. No longer living in Athens, I do not know them at first hand; but they hang on to much of which I have had personal experience. Nor, lastly, do I here plead for or against either Party, or express any belief as to the future fate of their respective policies.

D. G. HOGARTH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The letter which Mr. Rouse has published in your columns on this subject seems to contain several misapprehen-

Greece. For my own part, the sole advantage which gained from an otherwise absolutely useless education at is the capacity to read those Greek journals which Mr. unlike Sir Edgar Vincent, the late Mr. Dickson, and so a scholar as Dr. Dawes of Corfu, considers to be so ridic written.

Again, the political aspects of this question ignored in Mr. Rouse's account of the matter. This purely literary affair, a question, as it were, of the rival of Ciceronian or Tacitean prose. There is no conceal unpleasant fact, that Queen Olga, to whom the inspira this movement for the translation of the Scriptures is is regarded in Greece as an advocate of that hatefu influence which runs counter to the "great Greek ide the Queen's unpopularity at Athens I have had persona rience, nor need it surprise one that the hand of "holy" is seen behind the scenes; Russia, which from 1770 encouraged and then betrayed the Greeks, just as she Rumania in 1812 and 1878, Bulgaria in 1879, Servia at the of Bucharest, and Montenegro when, at her suggestio Bocche di Cattaro were abandoned in 1814. The Gre well aware that whether they are really the descendant ancient Hellenes, or no the more they can maintain a link with classical times, the more they will differentiat selves from the other Balkan States. It was because of that the Philhellenes supported Greece in 1821; enthusiasm was aroused by Kara George or Milosh in nor were the old Bulgarian Tsars names to conjure Western Europe in 1877. Knowing these things, the wish to purge their language of Turkish and Italian and to imitate as far as possible, not, as Mr. Rouse thi language of Leonidas (for he, being a Spartan, pro talked Doric, and Greek newspapers are not written dialect), but that of classical writers. Nor is this desire elimination of foreign words peculiar to Greece. In R where the old Roman colonization exercises the same fas over the modern Rumanians as do the ancient Hellenes modern Greeks, the same process is going on; and in German Fahrkarte has taken the place of Billet and R has been suggested as a purer equivalent for Cigarre.

I am, your obedient servant,

W

GYDA THE GOTH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir, Re your notice of "Gyda the Goth Literature on 9th inst., you refuse to accept a Ireland in the eleventh century named Makartee. McCarthy was King of Cork and Desmond in 1172 A. perhaps your reviewer knows that no ancestor of his some hundred years earlier. But as to the last remark think it consistent with your claim to be just in your crit for an Irish thrall might well have been given the old name of Biarne (or Biarney as it was probably spoke captors; and, besides, why "a thousand years ago" w such date is included in the story?

Thanking you, nevertheless, for the rest of the notic

I am, yours faithfully,

E. E. McBRI

11, Oakhill-road, Putney, S.W. (alias Ernest We

Mr. W. Lapworth sends us another translation of the

Books to look out for at once.

The Library Edition of Hazlitt. Edited by A. R. Waller and Arnold Glover. Vol. I. Dent. 7s. 6d. net. Contains, in addition to an introduction by Mr. W. E. Henley, "The Round Table," "Characters of Shakespeare's Plays," and "A Letter to William Gifford, Esq."

"The Old Court Suburb." By Leigh Hunt. Edited by Austin Dobson. 2 vols. Freemantle. £3 3s. net.
[With 120 photogravures and other illustrations. By Hubert Railton, E. J. Sullivan, and C. A. Shepperton.]

"Poems." By Alfred Lord Tennyson. Preface by Joseph Pennell and introduction by W. Holman Hunt. Freemantle. £1 1s. net.
[With the original illustrations by Millais, Rossetti, and W. Holman Hunt.]

"Ancient Royal Palaces in and Near London." Lithographs by T. R. Way, with notes by Frederic Chapman. John Lane. 21s. net.

"Studies in History and Jurisprudence." By James Bryce. 2 vols. Oxford University Press. 25s. net.
[Based on Oxford Lectures, 1876-1889.]

"The English Church in the Sixteenth Century, from the Accession of Henry VIII. to the Death of Mary." By James Gairdner. Macmillan. 7s. 6d.
[Vol. IV. of the "New History of the English Church," edited by Dean Stephens and the Rev. Wm. Hunt.]

"Types of Naval Officers: With some remarks on the Development of Naval Warfare during the Eighteenth Century." By Captain Mahan. S. Low. 10s. 6d. net.
[Memoirs of six British Admirals—Lord Hawke, Earl Howe, Lord Rodney, Earl St. Vincent, Lord De Saumarez, and Lord Exmouth.]

We sometimes complain that the English Government does nothing for art, and we are glad to note that the Royal Commission for the art section of the Paris Exhibition of 1900 has issued a sumptuous volume prepared by Mr. Isidore Spielmann, containing Illustrations of the British Pavilion in the Rue des Nations, with reproductions of the pictures and details about the painters and their works; a most interesting volume, well turned out. It is not for sale, but we hope the Royal Commission will present a copy to the more important of our public libraries.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS,

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

ART AND ARCHÆOLOGY.

CHRISTIAN ART AND ARCHÆOLOGY. By W. Lowrie. (Handbooks of Archæology and Antiquities.) 8×5½, 452 pp. Macmillan. 10s. 6d.
[An American book designed to be an introduction to the study of early Christian monuments, architecture, and art. Illustrated.]

THE ARTISTS' LIBRARY: CONSTABLE. By C. J. Holmes. 8¾×6¾. Unicorn Press. 2s. 6d. n.
[This series of slim quarto volumes on artists are well done. Mr. Laurence Binyon is the editor. There are 24 plates.]

CATALOGUE OF PICTURES AT LOCKO PARK. By Dr. Jean Paul Richter. 11¾×9, 107 pp. Bemrose. 12s. 6d.
[The collection was made by the late Mr. Drury-Lowe, who died in 1877, mostly in Italy, between 1840 and 1865.]

THE SAINTS IN CHRISTIAN ART. By Mrs. A. Bell. 9×6½, 281 pp. Bell. 14s. n.
[Study of the legends and history of the saints, their treatment in art, the symbols connected with them, &c. Sumptuously bound in white and gold, with reproductions of Italian pictures.]

BIOGRAPHY.

CAROLINE THE ILLUSTRIOUS, QUEEN-CONSORT OF GEORGE II. By W. H. Wilkins. 2 vols. 9×5½, 368+325 pp. Longmans. 36s.
[An extensive study, not before attempted, of this Princess, who for many years was, with Walpole, the real governor of England. By the author of "The Love of An Uncrowned Queen."]

MEMORIALS OF DEAN LAKE, 1869-1891. Ed. by Katharine Lake. 9×5½, 342 pp. Arnold. 16s.
[These memorials, edited by his widow, of the Dean of Durham (1869-1891) are autobiographical so far as life at Arnold's Rugby, the Oxford Movement, and Lake's life at Oxford, to 1855 are concerned.]

BOOKS FOR THE YOUN

SAINTS OF ITALY. Legends Retold by Ella N Noyes. 7½×8, 161 pp. Dent. 4s. 6d. n.
[This is a moderate-sized quarto, printed some stories of the Saints for children so as t works of the Italian masters. The stories are w are copied in line "after" well-known master lose a good deal in the process. But the book purpose.]

THE CASTAWAYS OF MEADOW BANK. By Tr Blue Books for Children.) 5¾×4½, 191 pp. Met
[A pleasant story of three boys and a gir house in flood time.]

LIGHTS OF CHILD-LAND. By Maud B. Boo Putnam. 6s.
[Fanciful child-studies—"Firelight," "Gas &c. Illustrations and coloured binding.]

"ALL ABOUT ALL OF US." By M. C. E. W. 2s. 6d.
[The country life of a family of small c them. A pretty little book in light blue binding

THE GOLD-STEALERS. By E. Dyson. 7¾×5½, 3
[An Australian story.]

THE FORBIDDEN ROOM. By Phœbe Allen. Gardner. 2s.
[Boy and girl life in the country. Illustrate

THE GOLDEN RULE. Vol. for 1901. Sunday Sc

THE BOYS' AND GIRLS' COMPANION. Volu of England S.S.I. 2s.

DRAMA.

SISTER BEATRICE. ARDIANE AND BARBE BI M. Maeterlinck. Trans. by B. Miall. 7 3s. 6d. n.
[Sister Beatrice ("A Miracle Play") and A (the legend of Bluebeard) are librettos in F andrines for which music is being written by M tions are mostly in blank verse with some variat

EDUCATIONAL.

THE TRAINING OF TEACHERS AND METHODS By S. S. Laurie. 7½×5, 295 pp. Cambridge U

MACBETH. (Pitt Press Shakespeare for Schools Verity. 6¾×4¾, 288 pp. Cambridge Universit

ALGEBRAICAL EXAMPLES. With Answers. B 172 pp. Macmillan. 2s.

FICTION.

THE USURPER. By W. J. Locke. 7¾×5½, 356 p
[The story of a strong and sympathetic c fortune to which he knows he is not entitled.]

THE MAN FROM GLENGARRY. By R. Connor. and Stoughton. 6s.
[A tale of Western Canada.]

ARDNARIGH. By Melville Gray. 7¾×5½, 332
[An Irish story of rather religious tone.]

THE PORTION OF LABOUR. By Mary E. Wil Harper. 6s.
[A long novel for Miss Wilkins—of fac giving the story of Ellen Brewster from childho

THE HOUSE DIVIDED. By Marriott Wat Harper. 6s.
[Aristocratic society in the eighteenth c mainly laid at a small harbour town on the Chan

A STUMBLE BY THE WAY. By L. T. Meade. and Windus. 6s.
[One of Mrs. Meade's pleasantly-told tales. pleasant and well done, all save the lady who m end, and is far from good enough for him.]

SPORT AND SPANGLES. By B. Webber. 7¾× Windus. 2s.
[The racecourse, the stage, &c.]

GÉLTA. By Nadage Dorée. 7¾×5½, 234 pp. Si [Deals with the treatment of Jews in Ru espouses their cause, is an American Jewess, singer.]

BY THE HIGHER LAW. By Julia H. Twel Philadelphia: Coates.
[A modern society novel of life in America.

OUR LADY OF THE ICE. By Constance Sut Greening. 6s.

A WOMAN OF THE WORLD'S ADVICE. By F. C. Phillips. 7¾×5, 266 pp. Macqueen.

[Short stories of modern society.]

JOE WILSON AND HIS MATES. By H. Lawson. 7¾×5¼, 334 pp. Blackwood. 6s.

[More of Mr. Lawson's characteristic stories of the Australian bush.]

KING MIDAS. By N. Sinclair. 7½×5, 388 pp. Funk and Wagnall. 6s.

[An American story of a girl who is urged to marry for money. A quiet and pleasant tale enough.]

LADY JOAN'S COMPANION. By Florence Warden. 7¾×5¼, 321 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

[A tale of high society and mystery after Miss Warden's heart, and a pleasant example of her manner. The plot turns, of course, on the identity of the "companion."]

THE COUNTESS OF MAYBURY; BETWEEN YOU AND I. By W. B. Maxwell. 7½×5¾, 312 pp. Downey.

[Lady Maybury discourses on a great variety of subjects, and is not so ungrammatical as the sub-title might suggest.]

THE VELVET GLOVE. By H. S. Merriman. 7¾×5¼, 345 pp. Smith, Elder. 6s.

[Modern Spain.]

THE FIELDS OF DULDITCH. By Mary E. Mann. 7¾×5¼, 320 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

[Quiet stories of a remote country village.]

FLEUR DE CIVILISATION. By Marguerite Van de Wiele. 7¼×4¾, 287 pp. Paris: Ollendorff. Fr.3.50.

[A strong anti-feminist novel.]

HISTORY.

ENGLISH CORONATION RECORDS. Ed. by L. G. Wickham Legg. 11¼×7¾, 413 pp. Constable. 31s. 6d. n.

[Documents collected so as to form a consecutive history of the coronation from the earliest times. A sumptuous volume bound in red and grey with large illustrations.]

SCENES AND CHARACTERS OF THE MIDDLE AGES. By the Rev. E. L. Cutts. 8×5½, 552 pp. Virtue. 7s. 6d.

[A posthumous work by this well-known ecclesiastical historian, treating of Monks, Minstrels, Knights; with pictures in the text.]

SELECT DOCUMENTS OF ENGLISH CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY. Ed. by G. B. Adams and H. Morse Stephens. 8×5½, 555 pp. The Macmillan Company. 10s.

[This, unlike previous similar books, embraces all the history from the Conquest. It is for use in classes, and is clearly and well arranged. Many of the documents, especially the later ones, are abridged, and all are translated. An excellent "source book."]

OXFORD STUDIES. By J. R. Green. Ed. by Mrs. J. R. Green and Miss K. Norgate. 7¼×5, 302 pp. Macmillan. 5s.

[These collected papers are the outcome of Green's favourite idea of a history of Oxford. The bulk of them are a series of papers on Oxford in the 18th century which appeared in the Oxford Chronicle.]

LE DERNIER BIENFAIT DE LA MONARCHIE. By the Duc de Broglie. 9×5¾, 331 pp. Paris: Calmann Levy. Fr.7.50.

[A posthumous work on the efforts of the French Royalty to secure the neutrality of Belgium.]

ÉTUDES ET LEÇONS SUR LA RÉVOLUTION FRANÇAISE. By Alphonse Aulard. Troisième Série. 7¼×4¾, 313 pp. Paris: Alcan. Fr.3.50.

[Prof. Auland discusses the diplomacy of the Committee of Public Safety in 1793, the legend of Bonaparte menaced by the poniards of the Cinq-Cents, individual liberty under Napoleon I., the history of tutoiement during the Revolution, &c.]

NEW TALES OF OLD ROME. By R. Lanciani. 9¼×6¼, 336 pp. Macmillan. 21s. n.

[This gives an account, by the best known authority on the subject, of the recent discoveries in the Roman Forum. Copiously illustrated by photographs.]

LITERARY.

LETTERS OF LADY HESKETH CONCERNING WILLIAM COWPER. Edited by Catharine B. Johnson. 8¾×7, 128 pp. Jarrold. 5s.

[These are hitherto unpublished letters to the Rev. John Johnson and others, with portraits.]

HORAE LATINAE. Studies in Synonyms and Syntax. By the late R. Ogilvie. Ed. by A. Souter. 9×5¾, 339 pp. Longmans. 12s. 6d. n.

[An exhaustive explanation (for writers of Latin prose) of how to render in Latin 500 English expressions. Authorities copiously given. By the late Chief Inspector of Schools for Scotland, with a memoir by Joseph Ogilvie.]

MORE LETTERS OF EDWARD FITZGERALD. Ed. by W. Aldis

AN ANTHOLOGY OF HUMOROUS VERSE. (Turner House C Ed. by T. A. Cook. 6¾×4¼, 343 pp. Virtue. 2s. n.

[From Chaucer to Owen Seaman. A handy little book, bound in black and white, well printed, with headpieces. Intr by the Editor.]

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SOUTHPORT LITERARY AND SOPHICAL SOCIETY—SESSION 1900-1901.

[This society is well justified in printing its proceedings first time. It seems to be doing excellent work, and the literary, philological, archæological, &c.—show a wide and in culture.]

MILITARY.

WITH RIMINGTON. By L. March Phillipps. 9×5¾, 219 pp. 7s. 6d.

[Based on letters and notes by the author, a captain in Rim Guides, from Magersfontein, Paardeberg, Pretoria, &c.]

UNOFFICIAL DISPATCHES. By E. Wallace. 7½×5, 327 pp. son. 6s.

[By the Daily Mail correspondent, and written from Cape Johannesburg, &c., between December, 1900, and August last.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE COCKTAIL BOOK. A Sideboard Manual for Gentlemen. 66 pp. Macqueen.

[The humorous origin of the cocktail; recipes for 62 and many other drinks (10 non-alcoholic); and useful hint serving and choice of wines. Neatly bound in red.]

THE SPINSTER BOOK. By Myrtle Reed. 8×5¼, 222 pp. Put [Light essays with humorous illustrations on love, courtsh

THE INTERNATIONAL ANNUAL OF ANTHONY'S PHOTOG BULLETIN. 8¾×5¾, 351 pp. New York: Anthony. Hiffe. 2s. n.

[An American annual for the practical photographer, fully

COMMERCIAL CORRESPONDENCE. By E. H. Coumbe. 2nd 7¼×5, 195 pp. E. Wilson. 2s. 6d. n.

[Specimens of terse, business-like letters for junior cl foreigners who are learning English.]

MOTHERS IN COUNCIL. Vol. for 1901. Wells Gardner. 3s.

FRIENDLY LEAVES. Vol. for 1901. Wells Gardner. 2s.

NATURAL HISTORY.

BIRDS AND MAN. By W. H. Hudson. 8¼×5¼, 317 pp. Longmans

[Various papers about bird life, partly reprinted from ma by the author of so many agreeable books on the same subject

BEAUTIFUL BIRDS. By E. Selous. 7¾×5¼, 221 pp. Dent.

[An instructive and well-written book for children, on Paradise, Humming Birds, &c., by a thoroughly good natural first chapter is called "Why beautiful birds are killed."]

A TEXT-BOOK OF ZOOLOGY. By G. P. Mudge. 7¼×5. Arnold. 7s. 6d.

[By the Lecturer on Biology at the London School of for Women, &c. Illustrated.]

PHILOSOPHY.

LA PHILOSOPHIE RUSSE CONTEMPORAINE. By Ossip 9×5¾, 276 pp. Paris: Alcan. Fr.5.

[The first complete survey ever made of Russian philos whole considered as a mirror of the soul of the Slav.]

POETRY.

POEMS OF THE PAST AND THE PRESENT. By Thomas 8×5¼, 260 pp. Harpers. 6s.

SOMETIME—SOMEWHERE. By A. Clegg. 6×4¼, 48 pp. H. Marsh

[A story of modern life of a religious type told in s prosaic blank verse" after "Tennyson.]

SAINT COLUMBA. By R. M. Benson. 8¾×6¾, 53 pp. Edinbu Giles' Printing Co.: London: Stock.

[The unembellished narrative of St. Columba's Life Spenserian stanzas of some vigour and accomplishment.]

THE CHRISTMAS ROSE AND OTHER THOUGHTS IN VERS Hugh Macmillan. 7¾×5¼, 46 pp. Macmillan. 2s. n.

[Reflective, well-expressed verses of a religious cast.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

STANLEY'S LIFE OF THOMAS ARNOLD, D.D. (Teacher's Ed.) 9¼×5¼, 779 pp. Murray. 6s.

[This book is now prescribed for the teacher's certificate. The edition is a well-printed one, with portraits and views, and a preface by Sir Joshua Fitch.]

ELEMENTS OF BOTANY. By W. J. Brownz. Fifth Ed. 7½×5, 272 pp. Heywood. 2s. 6d.

[A useful little book for serious students and for examinations. It is brought up to date and enlarged.]

IN OLE VIRGINIA. By T. N. Page. (The Dollar Library.) 7½×5, 312 pp. Hodgson. 4s.

[First published 1887.]

POEMS BY JOHN CLARE. Ed. by Norman Gale. 7¾×5¼, 158 pp. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner. 3s. 6d. n.

[A nicely get up edition of the unfortunate peasant genius of Helpston, near Peterborough (1793-1864), who died in a lunatic asylum—"a gleaner of the rainbow, a sower of the flowers," as Mr. Norman Gale calls him in an interesting biographical introduction.]

POEMS FROM VICTOR HUGO. By Sir G. Young. 7¾×5¼, 389 pp. Macmillan. 6s. 6d. n.

[With an introduction. More than half of the poems selected and translated with "love and there a touch not fully authorized by the text" have not, the translator believes, appeared in English before. Sir G. Young published a similar translation of Sophocles in 1889.]

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH. By Charles Reade. 8¼×6¼, 603 pp. Chatto and Windus. 10s. 6d. n.

[A substantial quarto, well bound and printed, profusely and admirably illustrated by Matt. B. Hewerdine.]

THE WORKS OF S. WEIR MITCHELL. 10 vols. 7¾×5¼. Macmillan. £3 3s. n.

[Here we have a well-printed uniform edition, bound in red, of all the prose works of this popular American writer.]

EADIE'S BIBLICAL CYCLOPÆDIA. New Edition. Revised. 9¼×6¼, 187 pp. Griffin. 10s. 6d.

[This well known Cyclopædia has been revised by Professor W. M. Ramsay and others, and has an Introduction by Professor Sayce, who is one of the contributors. It is designed for "the plain man" who wants finished facts, and is not concerned with "the higher criticism."]

A NARRATIVE OF THE MUTINY ON BOARD HIS MAJESTY'S SHIP BOUNTY. By Lieut. W. Bligh. 7½×5, 140 pp. Unicorn Press. 2s. 6d. n.

[The text by itself of this narrative, with the charts, &c., as published 1790.]

CINNAMON AND ROSES AND OTHER STORIES. By Mary E. Wilkins. (Red Leather Ed.) 6¼×4¼, 405 pp. Holder and Stoughton. 2s. 6d. n.

[In this new series of small books, pleasant to hold and to read, and bound in red leather, "In Memoriam" and "Isopel Berners" are also announced.]

THE LIFE AND WORKS OF CHARLES DARWIN. The Descent of Man. 8×5¼, 1,001 pp. Murray. 2s. 6d. n.

[A well-printed edition, uniform with "The Origin of Species" and "A Naturalist's Voyage" as released by Mr. Murray.]

THOUGHTS FROM THE LETTERS OF PETRARCH. Selected and translated by J. Lewis. 6¼×4¼, 147 pp. Dent. 2s. 6d.

[A little book of translated selections with index and introductory note.]

CHAPTERS ON ENGLISH METRE. By J. B. Mayor. 2nd Ed. 9×5¾, 208 pp. Cambridge University Press. 7s. 6d. n.

[To the first edition are now added a discussion of the Dr. Skeat's and Mr. Robert Bridges' metrical systems; a chapter on Shelley's Metre; and a very interesting chapter on the English hexameter, concluding (as we have always held) that Kingsley's "Andromeda" "may be suggested as the most perfect example of it."]

ON THE LOVE OF GOD. By St. Francis de Sales. Ed. by Canon Knox Little. 303 pp. THOUGHTS OF PASCAL. Ed. by C. S. Jerram. (The Library of Devotion.) 6×4, 216 pp. Methuen. 2s. each.

[As in the other volumes of this little series, both books have good introductions by the editors. The translations are new. The Pascal is a selection, mostly non-controversial, and Mme. Perier's (Gilberte Pascal) life of her brother is included.]

DARWIN'S ORIGIN OF SPECIES. Popular Impression. 8×5¼, 432 pp. Murray. 1s. n.

[Small print and bound in green paper.]

SOCIOLOGY.

INDUCTIVE SOCIOLOGY. By F. H. Giddings. 9×6, 302 pp. The Macmillan Co. 4s. 6d. n.

SPORT.

THE BOOK OF THE RIFLE. By T. F. Fremas Longmans. 12s. 6d. n.

[An elaborate volume, historical and up to Illustrations and tables.]

THEOLOGY.

WHY I AM A CHURCHMAN. By Canon J. Hamm Mowbray.

[The author was a Nonconformist forty y reasons for conforming are here rewritten from th

LETTERS TO A GODSON. By M. C. Bickers Mowbray.

[Attempt to teach a boy lessons from the sistently with the higher criticism.]

CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS AND CO Books IV. and V. By A. F. Kirkpatrick, D.D University Press. 2s. n.

[This series, edited by Bishop Perowne, patrick, is now approaching completion.]

THE CHURCHMAN'S INTRODUCTION TO THE By A. M. Mackay. 7¾×5, 305 pp. Methuen.

[A volume of the "Churchman's Library" i intelligent layman the real meaning of the res criticism."]

THE SCEPTRE WITHOUT A SWORD. By G. Mat J. Clarke. 1s.

[A little decorative book on the human Christmas.]

A GIFT BOOK FOR THE HOME. By the Ma (Duke of Argyll). 11×7½, 142 pp. Holder and

[A large well-printed book—with drawing page photographs of views or well-known religious verses of a simple kind.]

THE CORN OF HEAVEN. By H. Macmil Macmillan. 6s.

[Addresses preached to young people by pleasant writer.]

ST. PAUL AND THE ROMAN LAW. By W. E. 218 pp. T. and T. Clark. 4s. 6d.

[Studies of the intellectual environment o writers and fathers.]

OUR MODERN CHRISTIAN LIFE. By J. P. 211 pp. Wells Gardner. 3s. 6d. n.

[Addresses delivered by the late Vicar of court, on Thursdays in Advent and Lent (1896 the request of parishioners.]

THE CHILD AND THE PRAYER-BOOK. By J 261 pp. Church of Eng. S.S.I. 1s. 6d.

[Lessons to enable children to take an intell services. Each lesson is preceded by a short useful book for the Sunday School.]

BIBLE SCENES AND PICTURES. By the Rev. R 216 pp. Church of Eng. S.S.I. 2s.

[Takes each Sunday in the year chronologic tively (with illustrations) with the lands mentio lessons for the day.]

THE CHURCH-WORKER. Vol. for 1901. Church

GREAT THOUGHTS. Vol. for 1901. 10½×8¼, 435 Company.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAV

CONSTANTINOPLE AND ITS PROBLEMS. By 5¼. 298 pp. Oliphant. 6s.

[An American study of Constantinople, Mah question, Turkish education, the Eastern Church

READING ABBEY. By J. B. Hurry. 10×7½, 21

[A largish quarto, well got up, giving a (now a ruin) from its foundation in 1121, with MSS., &c., a plan, and a list of the abbots.]

THE NORWICH ROAD: An East Anglian Harper. 9×5¼, 324 pp. Chapman and Hall.

[A popular book intended to steer between county history, with illustrations, by the auth Road," &c.]

EWENNY PRIORY. Monastery and Fortress. Tubervill. 9½×6¼, 101 pp. Stock. 7s. 6d.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 217. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 545, 546, 547, 548

"LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.—XXXII. Mr. Israel Zangwill. An Appreciation by Lucien Wolf 549

A REVIEW OF REVIEWING.—II. A "Personal View," by Harry Quilter 551

THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 552

CURRENT LITERATURE—

The Care of Books 553

Chambers' Cyclopædia of English Literature 555

Caroline the Illustrious 556

Life of Sir William Wilson Hunter 556

The Confessions of a Caricaturist 557

The Wessex of Thomas Hardy 557

A New History of the Book of Common Prayer—The Prayer-book Explained—The English Church from the Norman Conquest to Edward I.—Thomas Wolsey 558, 559

Unofficial Dispatches—Words by an Eyewitness—With Rimington—A Doctor in Khaki—With Paget's Horse to the Front—French's Cavalry Campaign—The Great Boer War—Book-binding—Wanderings in Three Continents—The Marquis D'Argenson and Richard II.—In an Unknown Prison Land—The Life of Henry Schomberg Kerr—The Bride's Book—The Forest Schoolmaster—The Mighty Deep—The Confederate States of America 559, 560, 561

In Spite of All—A Fight to a Finish—Angel—The Romance of a Hill Station—The Hero—Four Leaved Clover—Master of Men—Only a Nigger—For Love or Crown—Forest Folk—The Golden Spur—Our Lady of Deliverance—The Goddess of Gray's Inn—A Blind Marriage—Cynthia's Damages—The Lover's Progress—Joseph Khassao, Half-Caste—Three Men of Mark—No Vindication—Women Must Weep—A Stolen Opera—Stephen Kyrle—The Real Christian—The Fortune of Christina M'Nab—Fortune's Darling—Miss Pauncefort's Peril—The Work of his Hands—The Early Stars—Moowa and Others of the Boundaries .. 561, 562, 563

BOOKS AT AUCTION 564

CORRESPONDENCE—The Limitation of Dramatic Themes (Mr. H. Hamilton Fyfe)—The Gospel Riots at Athens (Mr. W. H. D. Rouse)—"Shamela"—Australian Verse (Mr. A. W. Jose) 564, 565, 566

BOOKS TO LOOK OUT FOR 566

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 566, 567, 568

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Our next week's issue will be a special Dickens number, containing portraits of Dickens never before seen by the public, and numerous illustrations of an unfamiliar and interesting character bearing on Dickens' life and work.

The "Personal View" will be written by Mr. George Gissing, under the title of "Dickens in Memory."

* * * *

Books to read just published:

"Studies in History and Jurisprudence." By the Right Hon. J. Bryce, M.P. Clarendon Press.

"James Russell Lowell." By H. E. Scudder. Macmillan.

"In Sicily." By Douglas Sladen. Sands.

"Japan." By Mortimer Menpes. A. and C. Black.

* * * *

A fresh development of the American invasion is expected early in the New Year. [illegible]

On this point, however, experts disagree, for on[illegible] most influential members of the trade assures us [illegible] experience is that the booksellers benefit by the [illegible] "Where free libraries have been established in Lon[illegible] said, "the local booksellers have told me that it was [illegible] the best thing that could have happened." There is [illegible] a book as soon as it gets talked about. The number of [illegible] each library is limited, and some members will soon tire of [illegible] and make for the nearest bookseller's shop. This statem[illegible] ever, was qualified by a well-known publisher, to w[illegible] subject was broached. While true so far as fiction [illegible] popular books of the day were concerned, it did not [illegible] apply to more serious literature, especially to text-b[illegible] works of reference. "It would pay me," he added, [illegible] the round of the free libraries and buy up all my pub[illegible] for I should probably sell at least half-a-dozen copies [illegible] one that finds its way into these institutions." Yet h[illegible] that the libraries did a good work in getting the people [illegible] as anything done to promote popular education must e[illegible] be in the interests of the trade as a whole.

* * * *

The Nobel prize for literary merit has been awarde[illegible] Mistral as was expected, but to M. Sully-Prudhom[illegible] Sully-Prudhomme is a poet, a contemporary of Co[illegible] Catulle Mendès, and one of the so-called "Parnassia[illegible] in 1839, and an Academician since 1881. La Justice (187[illegible] Bonheur (1888) are the titles of his principal works. [illegible] philosophic, meditative writer, expressing in verse the [illegible] ideas and subtleties of metaphysics. The value of [illegible] awarded to him is about £8,000.

* * * *

The British connoisseur, whether of books or of pict[illegible] at last awakened to a fact which for long has been obvi[illegible] large, perhaps dangerously large, proportion of art a[illegible] graphical treasure purchased directly by or on behalf of [illegible] collectors. Mr. Pierpont Morgan is putting to one o[illegible] uses possible what to him are relatively small sums, [illegible] to the ordinary man represent a capital far beyond the [illegible] of his horizon. The series of decorative paintings exe[illegible] Fragonard for Madame du Barry, bought by an English [illegible] is said, for £50,000; Gainsborough's "Lady Bett[illegible] and Children," sold at Christie's in 1894 for 11,000 [illegible] the "Stolen Duchess," now valued at perhaps twice as m[illegible] 1876, when the picture fetched 10,100 guineas; [illegible] Dorchester-house Hobbema, in connexion with which t[illegible] £25,000 is named—these are a few of Mr. Pierpont [illegible] noteworthy purchases in the domain of pictures. Mr. [illegible] again, is believed to have paid £15,000 for Turner's "[illegible] and Blue Lights," 1840, which at the Goldsmid s[illegible] fetched but 3,700 guineas.

* * * *

But we would direct special attention to a few [illegible] important book purchases during the past fe[illegible]

4. La Mer des Histoires. Paris, 1488 . . . . . £205
(From Heber coll., 1836, £16 16s.)
5. Geneva Bible, 1588. Signature, "John Milton, 8-6-24 1631" 225
6. Byron. Poems on Various Occasions, 1807. Free copy to "Edwd. Noel Long, Coldm. Cols., from the Author" 129
7. Keats. Poems, 1817. "To my friends the Miss Reynoldses. J. K." 125
8. Shakespeare. Pericles, Prince of Tyre, 1619. 4to. 109
9. Stevenson. An Object of Pity, and Objects of Pity, 1892 59
10. Keats. Endymion, 1818. "Mrs. Reynolds from her friend J. K.," perhaps in the poet's autograph 41

* * * *

The above list is by no means exhaustive; indeed, several of the items have been taken more or less at random from dozens which might with equal reason be included. Only within the last week or two have definite tidings reached this country of Mr. Pierpont Morgan's purchase of No. 1; but, as a matter of fact, the arrangement for transferring the monumental work from the Piccadilly firm to him was arrived at many months ago. Unlike most book collectors this wealthy American is also a student. At the University of Gottingen, so high were his mathematical attainments that the authorities are said to have offered him a lectureship. Yet we do not part with the Psalter without regret—for part with it, and with other treasures bought by Mr. Morgan, we must in due time, when questions of duty have been arranged. Neither before nor since has an equally high sum been paid at auction for a printed book; moreover, not only is it of great rarity, but it has seldom if ever been surpassed as a piece of typography.

* * * *

As to No. 2, which was published at 1s. 6d., it is by no means impossible that a second copy with the frontispiece hitherto regarded as belonging to the third edition—and there are those who think that the engraving in the £1,475 copy is an interpolation—may be discovered. In 1851 Macaulay said "not a single copy of the first edition is known to be in existence." Nos. 3 and 8 on our table relate to quartos, published at 6d. each, which early in the nineteenth century were procurable at about £1. They cross the Atlantic to join, in one library or another, many good copies of the first folio recently sold in England. The £125 paid for No. 7 marks Keats' record in the auction rooms: a non-presentation copy, in morocco instead of original boards, fetched £18 15s. in June, 1890. Of the ten entries, connoisseurs in this country are in no way concerned about that which appears last but one; £59 was a ridiculously high sum, surely, for the trifle "An Object of Pity," written by Stevenson and some of his friends at Samoa, with "The Man Haggard's" reply, "Objects of Pity." The two booklets occurred again for sale on July 1, when they made £24 5s.; while on November 27 they changed hands publicly for a third time, bringing £27 10s. The almost inevitable conclusion is that when an American collector desires a particular picture or book he is prepared to out-bid all rivals.

* * * *

Philosophers in all ages have differed in their definitions of the causes of laughter; and possibly, "Mind," a publication which purports to emanate from an Oxford college hitherto considered respectable, is intended to illustrate the latest conceptions of τὸ γελοῖον. It appears to be an elaborate burlesque of its learned namesake. This kind of thing, if it is to be done at all, ought to be very well done indeed; it is permitted to no one to be only moderately amusing at great length, and when the

Iranier und Gottloser, wollte von der se dienstmässigen Priester-Kribbel-Krabbelkei wissen. Als er den Schein nicht lesen kon und sprach zu seinen Jüngern: "Schein u
Was soll mir diese "Hindeutung auf Sein"

And so forth. A little more ν would the character of the banquet. As it is, excep flashes, the philosopher as humourist is u distinguished success. He is often ingenious; to know when to stop. Thus a good "Limerick and then is a pleasant thing, and adds to the But 101 solid, consecutive Limericks, none fu rhyme and scansion, and many wantonly and hundred and one of them! It is "a thing i at." Truly, Oxford philosophers must need a not to feel that this form of advertisement n life. Why these rhymes should have been why, being made, they should have been pri
—that is a new riddle of the Sphinx.

* * *

Nine persons out of every ten have but a meaning of "folio," "quarto," "octavo," therefore reproduce, by permission of Mr. Jo lisher, from Mr. Douglas Cockerell's new volu Artistic Craft Series of Technical Handbooks in another column)—four cuts which expla

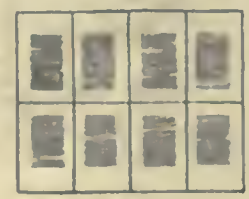
Folio



8vo

[From "Bookbinding" (by permission of Mr. Jo

A folio book is the largest, an octavo the sm most people would say. But, strictly spe indicate that a given sheet has been folded a times. Prior to the middle of the eighteenth marks on papers at once showed the size smallest sheet, marked with a jug, was know next had a cap and bells, hence our "foolscap horn," "post," a crown, and so on. To-day the &c., are sometimes loosely used to indicate th irrespective of the number of times the sheets
The sketches reproduced give the key to thei folio—whether of imperial size, 30in. by 22 19½in. by 15½in.—is a book wherein the sheet once only; in a quarto they are twice folded;
times; in a 16mo. four times. Thus we know employed for the purpose reports that he found a large number of bacilli, representing nearly a hundred different poisons and disease germs. Fifty books, selected at random, were examined, and all were declared more or less infected. Dry sterilization of the books has been recommended. Bacteriological investigations, like statistics, seem able to prove anything. Last year an authoritative medical opinion was given at the meeting of the Library Association to the effect that the danger of infection from books was infinitesimal. The microbe question reminds us that we have not yet learned the result of the competition for the two prizes for the best treatises on the insect enemies of books, founded by the late Mlle. Marie Pellechet, whose attention was drawn to these destructive parasites during the International Congress of Librarians in Paris last year. Other insects attack books as well as the "bookworm," and as an instance of their ravages it is recorded that in a public library, but little frequented, one insect perforated twenty-seven folio volumes in a straight line, in such a manner that, on passing a cord through the perfectly round hole made by it, the twenty-seven volumes could be raised at once. Hitherto, apparently, no one had studied the subject with the object of checking the development of the insects, but it was hoped that the legacy left by Mlle. Pellechet would produce good results. The prizes were for 1,000 francs and 500 francs respectively. Mlle. Pellechet's example was followed by another book-lover who offered a further 1,000 francs for the best paper on the study of worms and insects which more particularly attack the bindings of books.

* * * *

An Oxford correspondent sends us the following on Undergraduate Journalism. :

A writer in Literature recently treated of the subject of Oxford's many magazines and journals from the serious point of view which befits a graduate ; this article is an endeavour to throw some light upon the more frivolous magazines edited by undergraduates. The Pipe and the Quad, both small ephemeral productions were fully discussed in the article just mentioned ; what is perhaps worthy of notice here is that the Pipe obtained contributions from several of the senior members of the University, and, although it was edited by undergraduates, it was not strictly speaking an undergraduate paper. The first number of the Pipe (there were alas ! but four) contained some verses by the Rev. H. C. Beeching, which afterwards—with a slight addition—formed an introduction to that author's admirable "Conferences on Books and Men." Amongst other articles there have been several by the author of "The Arcadians," a man who has frequently charmed readers of the Oxford Magazine by his pleasant articles. Of the new and frivolous class of paper which has lately been the fashion in Oxford, the X was the forerunner. It appeared first some three years ago as a threepenny weekly, and, passing through many vicissitudes, it lingered on for two years, when from lack of contributors and advertisements it died. In its palmiest days—with its loud and curious cover—it was decidedly a success, and for a short time was very ably edited. The X, however, went the way of all undergraduate papers and fell into the hands of a clique, who endeavoured to prime their readers with washy aestheticism. A curious phenomenon this, and one hard to explain, but it was very noticeable in the case of the Quad, and of the Spirit Lamp—the product of an earlier generation. The great feature of the X was the college notes, scraps of personal news from decked out like a publisher's art catalogue. The first (Hinz No. I as it was called) appeared on the first da Eights, but owing to rain its sale in the streets was a and so the May Bee perished after a butterfly exi one day. It was originally intended to publish this the May Bee, every day in Eights Week, and had its been readable—which they certainly were not—it mi been a financial success.

Another paper of the class appeared last Janu Illustrated weekly under the ambitious title of the This turned out—though rather feeble at first—very to its predecessors, even to those of considerable age standing. The usual plan of the paper seemed to pages of literary matter—sometimes of considerabl followed by items of 'Varsity news and accounts and of the various athletic teams, not to mention "colleg as in the X. The illustrations consist in head pieces and in a full-page cartoon every week ; occa however, when anything important—such as the amat at the theatre—is happening, the paper is reple drawings. Sporting matters are invariably dealt length by "blues," and all 'Varsity matches are, reported at length. In the summer an interesting articles was introduced, which was intended to give fo ideas of Oxford ; amongst others the Crown Princ contributed an excellent article. University discus as a rule ignored by this class of paper, the editors full well that the undergraduate does not care about the acts of Convocation. Let the Proctor infri the undergraduates' rights, however, and the 'Varsit its opinion with a delightful frankness that must be of many an editor of Society papers elsewhere. Week a special number of the 'Varsity appeared ent Bump, an astonishing collection of matter which wil be "the despair of posterity." The most remarkal in the Bump was a general paper "to be set to lad on the first wet morning in Eights Week." It is fu most obscure Oxford slang, with numerous allusions celebrities. The 'Varsity cannot, however, claim originated the Bump, for it had appeared on two occasions during Eights Week. Another of these sp ductions—which by the way command a large sale wh is full of visitors—was the Barge, which closely rese other Eights Week papers.

All these would-be literary productions have an u use, for in a way they influence opinion among th graduates who are always susceptible to new opini ridiculing unmanly habits and in providing an openi budding author's contributions they certainly carry ou ficial idea. In this habit of ridiculing anything obje the Oxford undergraduate papers may in time come to opinion in much the same way as Aristophanes did a or as Gilbert and Sullivan's comic operas have done i times. Up to the present time it represents th graduates' paper as opposed to the sober Oxford which is essentially the Dons' paper.

Mr. E. J. W. Gibb, who passed away last week, was, death of Sir James Redhouse, the most eminent Turkish of Great Britain. His volume published last year on poetry, following on a selection from the poetry the early works of Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, Mr. Eden Phillpotts, and other young men who have since made a noise in the world. Later on, when the Idler was started, Mr. Robinson became himself one of Mr. Jerome's contributors.

The late Mr. John Barrow Allen, well-known for his series of elementary books for Latin students, left "An elementary Greek Grammar" which the Oxford Press has in preparation. The new number of Mr. Frowde's "Periodical," states that at the time of Mr. Allen's death about 180,000 copies of his "Elementary Latin Grammar" and 112,000 copies of the "First Latin Exercise Book" had been sold; and the total sales of his books published by the Clarendon Press exceeded 340,000 at that date.

Next week's literary birthdays include those of Mr. C. L. Graves (December 15, 1856), Mr. A. B. Walkley (December 17, 1855), Mr. Stanley Lane Poole (December 18, 1854), and Mr. H. B. Marriott Watson (December 20, 1863).

Mr. M. H. Spielmann has been requested by the family of the late Miss Kate Greenaway to write a memorial volume dealing with her work, containing, besides her memoir and correspondence, chapters from her autobiography, some poems left in manuscript, and many reproductions of drawings and designs hitherto unpublished. Among her friends and correspondents were Lord Tennyson, Mr. Ruskin, Mr. Frederick Locker-Lampson, Mr. Randolph Caldecott, and H.I.M. the Empress Frederick.

A copy of the first edition of Dr. Watts' "Hymns and Spiritual Songs" was sold the other day for £140.

Mr. Zangwill has been elected to represent the East-end at the next Zionist congress.

Madame Yvette Guilbert has written and is about to publish a novel dealing with French music-hall life and entitled La Vedette.

M. Rostand has written a poem on the alleged sufferings of the Boer children in the concentration camps.

D'Annunzio's new play, Francesca da Rimini, was produced at Rome on Monday.

Maxim Gorki's new play will be first produced at the Berlin theatre.

"W. A. B." writes to us to say that Mr. Stanley Weyman's "The House of the Wolf" appeared not in Longman's Magazine but the English Illustrated Magazine (October 1888—March 1889). He adds that "King Pepin and Sweet Clive," July, 1883; "The Deanery Ball," November, 1883; "The Professor and the Harpy," February, 1884; and "Archdeacon Holden's Tribulation," August, 1884, were first published in the Cornhill Magazine.

An interesting departure is being made by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein to meet the increasing demand for cheaper literature. They are starting several series of penny illustrated notebooks, tiny in size, but uncommonly artistic. One series—"Notes on the Cathedrals"—has already begun, and is intended for the use of students when larger volumes are out of reach, and for hasty visitors to the cathedrals described. The illustrations are particularly good. Another series is called "Biographical notes," and includes a booklet on "Alfred Lord Tennyson" written by Mr. F. E. Johnson, of Oxford, and a little life of King Edward—both charmingly illustrated. Other penny biographical volumes to follow are lives of Queen Alexandra, Lord Salisbury, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Napoleon, Lord Kitchener, and Sir Alfred Milner.

Some interesting announcements are made in the new list issued by the Cambridge University Press. Dr. Sandys writes a "History of Classical Scholarship"; Mr. W. H. D. Rouse an essay on the history of Greek religion entitled "Greek Votive Offerings"; the Rev. Edmond Nolan, of Trinity College, Cambridge, edits for the first time "Two Greek Grammars of the Thirteenth Century"; Mr. F. W. Payn contributes a volume on "Cromwell on Foreign Affairs," together with four essays on international matters; and Mr. J. E. G. Montmorency "An

James, Director of the Fitzwilliam Museum; an of Turlogh," edited, with translation, glossary
by Standish Hayes O'Grady, in two volumes.

A rigid supervision and control of men of been the recognized Russian equivalent of the the prophets. Erudition is Staning the Prophets. Government of the Tsars; but imagination has hardly ever fail sessors into trouble. Pushkin was place in the remote country. Shevchenko was s as a private soldier on the Asiatic frontier. T seek safety in flight. Dostoieffski was exiles knouted. Korolenko was condemned to spend frozen Yakut village. Tolstoy was but lately And now there is the case of Gorki, turned out kept out of Moscow, and only allowed to winter condition that he does not visit Yalta, to be A book, rather than a note, would be requi rights and wrongs of all these cases; but perh rights and wrongs are less interesting than cause the Russian police to watch poets and excessive a caution. The reason is that imag is the only medium in Russia for making fa comments on matters of public interest. The has little power to do anything of the kind. S always, he may criticize English statesmen policy; sometimes, but not always, he may cri of his village council in some matter of local in cussion, except with permission and in accorda tions, of any matter of real interest to his rea to lead to suppression of his paper, or to its b receive advertisements for a month or two, gravity of the offence. A good many Russi naturally cultivate obscurity in the hope of elu
but the censor generally sees what they are dri such disciplinary measures as seem good to hi who write a whole book to convey an idea whi could crystallize into a paragraph have obvious of running the gauntlet. They do not, of cou with purposes after the style of the late Charl that would be to give themselves over, boun into the enemy's hands. It is enough for them to supply premises, leaving readers to draw censor is puzzled, there is nothing for him to l
he does not wish to pose as the implacable ene
So the novelist is allowed to sow the seed, but when the crop comes to maturity. This, if we a mistaken, is what has happened in the case of have read a good many of his stories withou they were anything more than very gloomy w we have looked at some of them again in the light and an aphorism has occurred to us, based upo for rule of three sums. As philosophy: poli discontent. Evidently, therefore, the books of "
are so many bitter cries into which political and are being read. And bitter cries cannot autocracy. They imply unfavourable crit be preliminary to violent deeds. An autocracy make people contented by the same stern meth Keate undertook to make the Eton boys pure of put under restraint all the people who feel mis can restrain the ringleaders. So the Russian Literature Portraits.—XXXII.

MR. ISRAEL ZANGWILL.

To compare Mr. Israel Zangwill with other English authors is to note identities, deviations, and contrasts of character and method without explaining them. He is an immigrant alien in the field of English letters, the most striking manifestation of Jewish genius in British garb that has appeared among us since Disraeli. And what renders him the more striking is the fact that he reproduces all the most distinctive features of the Jewish mind as they revealed themselves to the world at the first emergence of the Jew from his long Ghetto seclusion. To say that all Jews are more or less Zangwills is not quite true. The amazing assimilativeness of the race has in the great majority of cases instinctively schooled and restrained their native daring in its literary expression. Ludwig Boerne and Berthold Auerbach, outside the Jewry, and Franzos and Kompert within, were, for example, far more German than Jewish. Where the distinctive features come out most strongly is in the cases of men like Heine, Saphir, Lassalle, and Disraeli. Here we find, more or less modified by environment and especially by a varying remoteness from the Ghetto, that chutspa—to use an untranslatable Jewish expression best represented perhaps by the slang word "cheek"—which nearly every Jewish boy illustrates unpleasantly, and which is the parent of the daring wit, the epigrammatic cynicism, the fantastic imagination which the higher Jewish mind unites with an infinite tenderness and an encyclopedic cleverness. It was, I think, Georg Brandes who first noted this in his thoughtful monograph on Lord Beaconsfield.

What renders Mr. Zangwill peculiarly interesting, however, is that this essentially Jewish psychology has received in him an entirely new treatment. Disraeli, who had never known the Ghetto, and whose mild and mediocre father was only one further illustration of that instinctive Jewish mimicry which can don the jack-boots of John Bull and the pig-tail of John Chinaman with like facility and success, was an astonishing freak of atavism. Heine, Saphir, and Lassalle stood also outside the Ghetto, but they were in touch with it, and they began their lives as Jewish revoltés. Mr. Zangwill too, is, a revolté, but he comes from the heart of Jewry and in a large measure he has remained there. Heine in his early years brought to the gates of the Ghetto the culture he had acquired at Bonn and Göttingen and for a brief moment dreamt of opening a new epoch in Hebrew history; but he found no response and he turned away. Mr. Zangwill has been more fortunate. He is the product of another period when Gentile culture has become available in the Ghetto itself with not over-pleasing results. The Jewish schools, while endeavouring to combine the progressive Occident with the unchanging East, have only thrown the eternal Jewish problem into more tragic relief. They have subordinated the Ghetto to a middle class which has made the unquestioning faith of the old days a fetish and the culture of the new a showy Philistinism. Born and reared in this environment Mr. Zangwill has faced the problem as Heine faced it eighty years ago, but, unlike Heine, he has confronted it with knowledge and enthusiasm, and he has found encouragement to persevere in a large volume of rebellious sympathy. In a word, while Heine, Lassalle, and even Disraeli, with the same strange type of intellect as we find in Mr. Zangwill, were revoltés against his great gifts would have come to him much more slowly ploughed a more conventional furrow. His destiny wa ever, not obvious to him from the first. I imagine tha in a rebellious moment he shook the dust of the Jew School from his feet he had little thought of becom Dickens of the Ghetto, still less of aspiring to reincarn Akiba. His first book, "The Premier and the Painter," in collaboration with a brother ex-usher and rebel, Mr Cowen, was a bold bid for the ear of the great world It has no Jewish interest except that in its bewilder tantalizing cleverness, its keen satire, its wildly f episodes, and its flashy superficiality it reminds one of " Grey." If it is far less refined than "Vivian Grey," th enables us to measure how the accident of milieu had in its author the Disraelian mental type. But the yea in which "The Premier and the Painter" saw the light, another and more serious direction a stirring one for Zangwill. It was the year in which "Robert Elsmer published. The spiritual unrest of which that book was a s had also invaded Jewry and was made manifest by the of Mr. Claude Montefiore's Jewish Quarterly Review. Revel the air. Amy Levy's "Reuben Sachs" illustrated at intensity and its dangers. Mr. Zangwill found himself of sympathetic interest to which his pen not unreadily res Among other things he wrote for the Jewish Quart exceedingly clever analysis of the growing spiritual an the Jewish community, which showed that he was a sch well as a wit, and for an obscure Jewish Calendar a story, Mekatrig"—afterwards published in "Ghetto Tragedie republished in "They that Walk in Darkness"—which, conventional enough in its central idea, revealed a wi grasp of Ghetto life and character, and the budding of a p sympathy with its "tragi-comedy of sordid and shifty pov

A few months later Mr. Zangwill was asked to wri Jewish novel for the newly-started Jewish Publication of America. I believe I was in a measure responsible proposal. The founders of the society wrote to me th wanted "a Jewish Robert Elsmere," and asked me somebody to do it. At the time I did not know Mr. Z but I replied at once that there was only one man in who was capable of the work, and that was the author of Mekatrig" and of the article in the Jewish Quarte was not easy, however, to prevail on Mr. Zangwill to ac commission. He was then editing a comic paper, Ari considerable success, and he felt the big world tugging In Ariel he wrote "The Bachelors' Club" and " Maids' Club," two of the wittiest books published fo many years. Their chief fault is, perhaps, that ther much drollery in them. But they are not all fooling. T a great deal of excellent satire in both, and even the jo has the charm of originality, for it is impossible to say th borrowed from any familiar school. I remember one reviewers congratulating Mr. Zangwill on his independ American models. If that reviewer had read Moritz Humoristische Erzählungen or the sparkling buffoo Hector Crémieux and Albert Milhaud he would have his view of Mr. Zangwill's originality, though I doubt "The Bachelors' Club" owed anything to these models by way of unconscious Hebrew atavism.

But these were trifles by the side of the work coming. Mr. Zangwill accepted the American proposal, result was a really great book, "The Children of the G

Mr. Zangwill's Jewry was a terra incognita. Some people knew the "Halb-Asien" of Franzos and Kompert and Miss Gerard, but this was a "Halb-Asien" in an entirely new setting—the setting of the strenuous and storm-tossed life of London with social contrasts almost unknown in Galicia and the Bukovina, and soul-wrestlings touching the deepest notes of tragedy. But the book not only revealed Jewry, it also revealed Zangwill. The calotin of Ariel threw off his motley and made his bow as a constructive artist, a master of human emotion, pursuing a high intellectual and ethical purpose. The book was not without grave faults. Artistic perspective often suffered through the wealth of subsidiary incident and a lop-sided shamefacedness of realism. The excursions into the Jewish Philistia of the West-end were crude and unconvincing. The ethical aim was obscured by the pity excited by its own pathos. But the palpitating life, the marvellous local colour, the wonderful panorama of new types of character, the strange world to which it introduced us with so clear an insight and such dazzling alternations of tears and laughter, remained and compensated for every other defect. The book was, in short, a great book and at once placed Mr. Zangwill—then in his twenty-eighth year—in the front rank of English novelists.

"The Children of the Ghetto" is so typical of Mr. Zangwill's Jewish work that it is scarcely necessary to examine very closely his other efforts in the same direction. In the following year (1893) he published "Ghetto Tragedies," chips from the workshop in which the larger work had been fashioned. Although several of these stories are early efforts their merits are exceedingly high. Essentially poetic in treatment, and more monographic in scope, their artistic presentation is more perfect than in "The Children of the Ghetto." These stories were republished, together with a further collection under the title "They that Walk in Darkness," six years later. The chief interest of this volume lies in the comparisons it enables the reader to make between the author's earliest efforts and his work a decade later. The material and the old qualities are the same, but the material is handled with greater delicacy, and the old qualities bear distinct traces of a maturer judgment and settling convictions.

Meanwhile, two other volumes of Jewish tales had issued from Mr. Zangwill's pen, the material in both cases being chiefly sought in the Ghettos of the past. "The King of Schnorrers" is a study of the typical Jewish beggar in an eighteenth-century setting. It is a droll piece of work with a conscientiously constructed historical background. In it Mr. Zangwill's Jewish humour finds its legitimate milieu, for it is the "schnorrer" who is the peculiar embodiment of that Jewish quality of chutzpa of which his own genius is in one direction the refined offspring. The other volume, "Dreamers of the Ghetto," is in some respects the most remarkable of all Mr. Zangwill's work. It is a book with a purpose, the presentation of that tragic problem of Judaism which had struggled feebly and ineffectively through the crowded and picturesque sociology of "The Children of the Ghetto." In the interval of the two works Mr. Zangwill had become a Zionist, and his views of the destinies of Judaism had shaped themselves with a strong pessimistic bias. He had convinced himself that "the time had come for a new religious expression, a new language for the old everlasting emotions, in terms of the modern cosmos," and that the only safe alternative was a return to nationalism. The idea would have been a striking one, however presented, but the dramatic form chosen by Mr. Zangwill was unconventional, even daring. He transferred the Jewish problem from the field of spirited and palpitating activities to sufficiently objective. It starts with a parti analyzing character it synthetises it to a the Zangwillian image. None the less it is a portraiture and a fine presentation of the p in terms of moving romance.

Besides these Jewish books Mr. Zangwi ambitious novels of Gentile life, a volume and a large number of poems which will sho a collected form. The two non-Jewish nov and "The Mantle of Elijah," are of unc Master" was evidently intended to be a many of Mr. Zangwill's admirers regard it fame. There can be no question that it po of an exceptional novel, but these elements pose and subtle studies of character—n developed than in the Jewish books. All th work deals with second-hand material, and t from obvious over-elaboration. Still it is exceptionally gifted man could have written. which few could have achieved with so pro problems of conduct and human destiny, and of more successful work in the same directio not been fulfilled—and perhaps was not inter Mantle of Elijah." That work is a politica of counterblast against modern Jingoism, lig "The Master," but less convincing as a characters are very carefully studied and satires, but on the whole the book has a fla As a work of a Jewish writer of Mr. Zangwi comparison with Disraeli's "Sybil." So fessed that, with all his wider intellectual is only a parvenu Disraeli. He has, howeve gone so far in ten years that he may be reli parallel more exact.

For my part I should prefer that h "Dreamer of the Ghetto." This is his mo knows his people as few know them, and h no one else can. The Ghetto appeals to and his soundest knowledge. But he is t restless and omnivorous an intellect—to re single aspect of human life, however ric Perhaps he is right. Literature will c loser, for even as a minor poet he has yet Here are some verses, "A Winter Morning' from a magazine long since dead which will his abundant metrical gift, the while they picture of his own mental struggle at the pa

Heart-sick I step from out the dusky
God! What a burst of brightne
Blue, frosty sky, still streets grown Beneath the sacred splendour of

Strange music swells, dear faces flash
God's face resurges in the lumin
God's love a moment seems no hopel
Nor immortality an old wives' st

I have written of Zangwill the nove something to be said of Zangwill the ph twenty years hence will be time enough to his literary portrait, for the lesson he has the world is still only limned in uncert however, must be said: Richly endowed t artist, he is essentially a moral teacher paper), and an anonymous Jewish novelette, which he published as a penny booklet, sharing the expense of production with a friend. The booklet sold well, especially among the East-end Jews, and one portion of it—the description of market-day in Jewry—was transferred bodily to "The Children of the Ghetto." Flushed with success, the two partners published a long comic ballad which Mr. Zangwill had written after the style of "Hab," and prepared elaborate posters to advertise it all over London. How the action of his colleague temporarily put a stop to his labours Mr. Zangwill has described in "My First Book":—

> It transpired that Y. had suddenly been taken with a further happy thought. Contemplation of those gorgeous tri-coloured posters had turned his brain, and, armed with an amateur paste-pot and a ladder, he had sallied forth at mid-night to stick them about the silent streets, so as to cut down the publishing expenses. A policeman, observing him at work, had told him to come down, and Y., being legal-minded, had argued it out with the policeman de haut en bas from the top of his ladder. The outraged majesty of the law thereupon haled Y. off to the cells.

The partners were fellow pupil-teachers, and the committee of their school required Mr. Zangwill to publish nothing which had not passed the censorship of the committee. "This," he writes, "was a blessing in disguise; for, as I have never been able to endure the slightest arbitrary interference with my work, I simply abstained from publishing. Thus, although I still wrote—mainly sentimental verses—my nocturnal studies were less interrupted. Not till I had graduated, and was of age, did I return to my inky vomit. Then came my first book—a real one at last." This was "The Premier and the Painter," written in collaboration with another fellow-teacher, Mr. Louis Cowen, and published under the name of "J. Freeman Bell." It was brought out by Mr. Spencer Blackett in 1888. It was well received by the critics, but it took six years to work its way into a third edition. It is now published by Mr. Heinemann in a fourth edition, uniform with the majority of Mr. Zangwill's later works. The "first book" of which Mr. Zangwill can claim the sole authorship is "The Bachelors' Club," published by Messrs. Henry and Co. in 1891, and now—after running through at least six editions in separate form—bound up with "The Old Maids' Club" in the volume published by Mr. Heinemann in 1898 under the title of "The Celibates' Club."

Chronologically arranged, Mr. Zangwill's bibliography is as follows:—

Fiction.

1888.—"The Premier and the Painter" (with L. Cowen). (Spencer Blackett, now published by Heinemann, fourth edition.)
1891.—"The Bachelors' Club." (Henry and Co., now published by Heinemann in "The Celibates' Club.")
1892.—"The Big Bow Mystery." (Henry and Co., out of print.)
,, "The Old Maids' Club." (Heinemann, now published in "The Celibates' Club.")
,, "The Children of the Ghetto." (Heinemann, eighth edition.)
1893.—"Merely Mary Ann." (Tuck and Sons.)
,, "Ghetto Tragedies." (McClure and Co., now published with additions under the title of "They that Walk in Darkness," Heinemann.)
1894.—"The King of Schnorrers." (Heinemann, second edition.)
1895.—"The Master." (Heinemann, third edition.)
1898.—"The Dreamers of the Ghetto." (Heinemann.)
1899.—"They that Walk in Darkness": "Ghetto Tragedies," with additions. (Heinemann.)
1900.—"The Mantle of Elijah." (Heinemann, second edition.)

Essays.

1896.—"Without Prejudice." Reprinted from the Pall Mall Magazine. (Fisher Unwin.)

Plays.

1893.—Six Persons. Comedietta—Haymarket.
1899.—Children of the Ghetto. Four-act drama—Adelphi.
1900.—The Moment of Death. One-act tragedy—Wallack's.

A REVIEW OF REVIEWING.—II.

A "Personal View"

By HARRY QUILTER.

We come to the second of our divisions—the requi[illegible] of the public and the restrictions imposed by the [illegible]ance of the review in a periodical. These are more n[illegible] than might be supposed. Space, par exemple, is [illegible] wanting; for, from an editor's point of view, criti[illegible] the comparatively unimportant thing, and the Proc[illegible] method is frequently applied thereto. Nor will the [illegible] bear—I am trying them hard at the present mo[illegible] long and connected argument, under ordinary circum[illegible] You cannot presume for readers either sufficient inter[illegible] thing itself or in the reviewer's endeavour to render hi[illegible] accurately. And this difficulty is obviously increased [illegible] remember that in proportion to the importance of the r[illegible] matter is the reluctance of the general reader to spend [illegible] its consideration. Where ten people will read a column [illegible] about Miss — of the Gaiety Theatre's conversation, b[illegible] pirouettes, there is scarcely one who will get through [illegible] space on a famine in India, a strike in the iron-trade, [illegible] departure in religion or metaphysic. And since newspap[illegible] written for the many and not for the few, the many co[illegible] the action of the editor. This is the reason why the inte[illegible] of all the Universities in England is crammed into twen[illegible] in a corner, while there are perhaps a dozen columns de[illegible] personalities, sport, and the drama. Such may be con[illegible] the general periodical restriction; to which has to b[illegible] that of the special journal. This, again, depends upon con[illegible]tions of its clientèle, plus the personal views of the pro[illegible] which have to be, to some extent, taken into account. S[illegible] in one organ, your review must not be too frivolous, [illegible] another, too staid; in this, your common sense must be [illegible] to the *n*th power of purple journalese; in that it m[illegible] lowered to absolute commercial precision of epithet: in [illegible] it need only hint at the author's meaning; and in a[illegible] drive that meaning home, with stolid repetition, to a dull [illegible] class of readers. The power to bear all these obligat[illegible] mind, whilst the criticism is being written, comes, to [illegible] extent, with practice, but by no means to everybody in th[illegible] degree. Personally, though I have had as much exp[illegible] as most, I could never acquire properly this portion of a j[illegible]ist's business. There are many men in London who posse[illegible] is to me an almost incredible knack of striking exactly th[illegible] note with regard to their public, their paper, and its adm[illegible]tors. Such are quick to discern the signs of the tim[illegible] adapt their work in consequence; they seem to smell a [illegible] topic, and abandon a played-out one, while others a[illegible] ignorant of approach or dissolution. Lastly, there are [illegible] subjects, methods of treatment, and turns of thought wh[illegible] taboo to the periodical critic; not for any essental obj[illegible]ableness, but simply because of a Dr. Fell-like determinat[illegible] the part of the public, that they shall not be introduced [illegible] critic must learn to distinguish these and keep them ou[illegible] "memorial." He must learn, since space is so brief, to str[illegible] a quick, pleasant road to the comprehension of his su[illegible] to limit himself to the two or three most important po[illegible] connexion therewith; to leave something unsaid, for his [illegible] to track out for themselves; and having delivered h[illegible]

out of place that I should state plainly what my own practice has been, and the alternatives which, as it appears to me, are placed before any young critic who wishes to do his duty.

My own practice has invariably been to regard all artistic or literary work, whether done by friend, enemy, or stranger, entirely apart from the personality of the doer. In saying this, I do not mean that I have regarded it apart from the conditions in which it has been done, when such conditions have been brought to my notice. Nor have I, as is generally the case nowadays, refused to admit, as a factor in my judgment, the object of the work. To fully explain, much less defend, such method would be quite out of place here. I adopted it only because of necessity; it appeared to me the only manner in which it was possible to do the work at all. Taking the work in such isolation, my next attempt was to find a class to which it rightly belonged; and I estimated the value of that class by such general principles as were recognized, or as I had discovered and adopted for myself, from experience of nature and by comparison of books or pictures, one with another. I am quite aware that this is a very elementary and rough-and-ready proceeding; but it does appear to me to afford some secure foothold for critical judgment. You may rank your classes wrongly, you may make an error in the placing of the work therein; but you at least avoid being led away by emotional impulse; you are forced to give yourself chapter and verse for the verdict given; and, if your opinion is challenged, you can at least show the ground on which it has been formed. More than this, I think, neither the public, nor the author of any work of art or literature, has a right to demand. And for the rest, the value of the opinions must be judged partly by the reasons given, their adequacy of proof and intrinsic probability, and partly by the verdict of subsequent years. The last only can prove or disprove them. The alternative which lies before the periodical critic is to judge, not by the underlying and eternal principle, but by the superficial and ephemeral taste of the moment. At any given time, certain methods of thought and opinion are "up," and others "down"; certain artists and authors can do no right, others no wrong; in fact, the world provides a variety of labels for lazy judges to stick on person, picture, or book. Any fool can say that Mr. S. is a great writer if he is sure that ninety-nine fools out of a hundred will echo his opinion. He need give no reason for the faith that is in him; it may controvert alike common-sense, tradition, and probability. And criticism of this kind runs no risk of being unpopular at the moment; it is only refuted on the day after to-morrow! By that time the critic has turned round, accompanied by his ninety-eight of like kidney, and is shouting wildly that Mr. S. is a detestable author, and that salvation is only to be found in X., Y., or Z. Whatever may be doubtful, this one thing is absolutely certain, that when a large number of diverse individuals unite without qualification or distinction in cracking up or running down any single author, artist, or person whatsoever, the main reason for approbation or condemnation is not to be found in the excellence or demerit of the work produced, or the person who has produced it, but in the sheep-like fashion of the moment—in other words, is founded upon no objective excellence in the work present. I have promised by all the gods to whom I pay reverence to name no names in this connexion. Let readers look around for themselves; they will find many examples of unthoughtful consensus of judgment amongst recent criticisms.

So far of the reviewer's duty to his journal and the public; let us not forget those he owes to his author. Owing to limits of space these can only be indicated here with utmost brevity.

forgotten by the old—moreover, it is an practically beyond redress. The only practic in the classification of reviews, a subject too upon here, but one upon which an extremel might well be written. Again, a primary con criticism should be to judge the work from the author's aim, not to blame it for being evidently sought that it should be—nor vice or woman succeeded in the proposed endeavour precisle the consideration—Was the endeav How rarely is this done! The avoidance of fl offensive criticism is by no means difficult if himself to dispassionately consider the produc the author's idea. A book should be praised it is—not for what it is not, and has had no in

And readers would do well to remember t easy—degradingly easy—for a reviewer to m expense of his author. A few words from th removed from their context and perhaps s others similarly treated from some other this would make a fool of Shakespeare, a sco whenever I see a review so pieced together an critic's occasional comment, I think, not (n think) that the author is an ass, but that fraud! Certainly he is avoiding a clear d is substituting for that duty a proceeding es Another method strongly to be deprecated one of constructing a bogey personality for th ing the review to the Aunt Sally-ing (if the pardoned) of this scare-crow in lieu of es "Who," cry such critics, "is Mr. So-and-so th Mr. Blank or differ from Mr. Dash when cy Blank and Dash are the vilest or noblest What egotism, what vanity, what audacity!" indignant shrillness many a reviewer who ha or Dash at the "common or garden" valua as not will to-morrow reverse his order of hear the truth? Good criticism is difficult as and, like many difficult and dangerous thin doing and the having, and but rarely don writers are indolent, many ignorant, and timid—fearful of "putting their foot into it," accepted opinion, of leading the way. That least resistance" is so often taken. Tha popular criticisms echo one another—are but tions of a common theme. Still, if he will set a great duty lies beneath the hand of the real c discharged, is of incalculable service to the honestly attacked will certainly render his and value. I believe that he will discharge learns that the public will stand no shirking. say to his heart Populus vult decipi he wi Editors can do little, the gist of the matter majority—they ought to appreciate and fix th

THE DRAMA.

"THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING E

To analyse a farce is to commit the naiv ing a joke. Yet the reader would justly hol it I dismissed The Importance of Being Ea

Fourberies de Scapin, say, and y (quality b°) for The Importance of Being Earnest. But pending the invention of that useful laughter-gauge, I am compelled, willy-nilly, to use the vague language of the ordinary dictionary in the attempt to account for the pleasure afforded by Oscar Wilde's farce. (I mention the author's name—studiously ignored in the playbill—because it is high time that literature resumed recognition of his existence, especially as the latest volume of the "Dictionary of National Biography" devotes several columns to his career.) The first element, then, of this delightful farce is the element of what may be called Palace-of-Truthfulness. It is a childlike and bland frankness, which Mr. Gilbert was the first to import into the theatre from the nursery. Everybody in the piece is purely selfish—but pleasantly, because undisguisedly, selfish. Thus a servant, being asked why he drinks his master's champagne, attributes it "to the superior quality of the wine." Algernon casually assumes that he is going to dine with his friend Jack:—

> Jack.—I haven't asked you to dine with me anywhere to-night.
>
> Algernon.—I know. You are absurdly careless about sending out invitations. It is very foolish of you. Nothing annoys people so much as not receiving invitations.

Jack is stammering out a confession of love to Gwendolen, who replies:—"Yes, I am quite aware of the fact. And I often wish that in public, at any rate, you had been more demonstrative. For me you have always had an irresistible fascination. Even before I met you I was far from indifferent to you." This element is derivative; it was originally, as I have said, Gilbertian. The next element is original, a true Wildism, but unfortunately the easiest thing in the world to imitate, with the consequence that its minor appropriators made London drawing-rooms in the later nineties unbearable. I refer to the element of inverted commonplace, the substitution of black for white in simple statements. Examples:—Divorces are made in Heaven. The truth is not quite the sort of thing one tells to a nice, sweet, refined girl. Algy, you always adopt a strictly immoral attitude towards life; you are not quite old enough to do that. A girl with a simple, unspoiled nature, like Gwendolen, could hardly be expected to reside in the country. I hear her hair has turned quite gold from grief. In married life three is company and two is none. It looks so bad for a woman to flirt with her own husband; it is simply washing one's clean linen in public, &c., &c., &c. A third element of delight in this farce is its inconsequence, its illogic. Thus:—

> Algernon (to Jack).—Please don't touch the cucumber sandwiches. They are ordered specially for Aunt Augusta.
>
> [Takes one and eats it.]
>
> Jack.—Well, you have been eating them all the time.
>
> Algernon.—That is quite a different matter. She is my aunt.

Cecily pouts at her German lesson. "It isn't at all a becoming language. I know perfectly well that I look quite plain after my German lesson." Cecily's governess directs her to read Political Economy. "The chapter on the Fall of the Rupee you may omit. It is somewhat too sensational. Even these metallic problems have their melodramatic side." A common black bag, lost for a quarter of a century, is unexpectedly restored to its owner, who says, "It has been a great inconvenience being without it all these years."

But all this, it may be said, is only witty talk, and witty talk does not make a play. [illegible] when his friend Algernon has brought Ernest to life, by f[illegible] in that character himself. Altogether, this is an exqui[illegible] of fooling. Mr. Alexander resumed his old part o[illegible] Worthing, Mr. Graham Browne was particularly good a[illegible] Moncrieffe, and the ladies concerned—Miss Margaret [illegible] Miss Lilian Braithwaite, and Miss Talbot—contrived [illegible] fantastically droll, without ceasing to be ladies.

A. B. WALK[illegible]

CURRENT LITERATURE.

THE CARE OF BOOKS.

THE CARE OF BOOKS: An Essay on the Development of Li[illegible] and their Fittings, from the Earliest Times to the [illegible] the Eighteenth Century. By JOHN WILLIS CLARK. [illegible] bridge University Press. 18s. n.)

This book represents research extending over fifteen [illegible] and it is not too much to say that the result is fully wo[illegible] the labour devoted to it. Mr. Clark, when delivering th[illegible] and Sandars lectures at Cambridge, dealt mainly with the [illegible] of monastic libraries, and traced back their close relation[illegible] the presses and pigeon-holes of Greece and Rome. [illegible] gives us a complete history of library economics, exten[illegible] the one hand to the record-rooms of Assyria, and on th[illegible] to the end of the eighteenth century. He stops at th[illegible] when the old order in library fittings was giving place [illegible] and when most of the appliances used in mediæval librar[illegible] been abandoned. He has gleaned a vast amount of inform[illegible] his subject, as he says, is entirely new; and its prese[illegible] is interesting both by reason of its novelty and its cr[illegible] whilst its value is much heightened by the number of ad[illegible] illustrations which accompany it.

The earliest known arrangement of documents occur[illegible] library of Assur-bani-pal. The tablets were in the ca[illegible] special custodian and grouped according to subjects. [illegible] were probably kept on shelves; this was certainly the [illegible] those discovered at Derr, where slate slabs were use[illegible] Clark has collected all the allusions by classical writers [illegible] libraries of early Greece. Yet when all is done we hav[illegible] but surmise to guide us as to the existence of any consi[illegible] collection of books. Definite knowledge begins wi[illegible] libraries of Alexandria and Pergamon, and in the latter [illegible] that the books were probably stored upon shelves with [illegible] desks below them on which they might be read. It [illegible] when Mr. Clark comes to the libraries of Rome that he [illegible] to begin a continuous story. We know something of the [illegible] of the Augustine libraries, where new books as soon [illegible] were issued were displayed to the public, and where th[illegible] seem to have been used as a kind of literary rendezvo[illegible] Rome, too, we find the earliest use of the "armaria" [illegible] presses, which, with but little modification, served as rece[illegible] for both books and rolls (volumina). One woodcut gi[illegible] Mr. Clark of the desk used to retain a roll in a con[illegible] position for reading shows that there was no need f[illegible] supports as were necessary with the Jewish "megillah. [illegible] Vatican collection, the type of an old Roman libr[illegible] which Mr. Clark gives an excellent account—makes e[illegible] transition from Roman to monastic times. A photog[illegible] given of an armarium which differs but little from those [illegible] stored wherever room could be found for them, as at the monastery of Citeaux, where 740 volumes were scattered over the house, in no less than a dozen different places. The need for a special library was now recognised, and it became imperative to render the room habitable. Hitherto the book-room had served only as a place to take books from; with the advent of the book-desk the library was accepted as the place to read books in. The early adjuncts to bibliology in the shape of library fittings and furniture are well pictured by Mr. Clark, who was fortunate in having at hand libraries which, in respect to fittings, are probably identical with those of the fifteenth-century monastic libraries. So much detailed information is supplied us about the collegiate libraries of Oxford and Cambridge that it hardly needs plates to reconstruct mentally the fashion of the rooms described. And Mr. Clark brings before us a most interesting and unique survival of what he entitles the lectern system of fittings—e.g., that in the church of SS. Peter and Walburga at Zutphen, in Holland. The collection dates from 1563, and the books are chained to a double desk or bookshelf somewhat resembling the modern newspaper stand. Between each desk runs a seat, so that the reader has a row of books behind as well as before him. The illustration we give of a bookcase in the Medicean library, Florence, shows a later modification of this. From the lectern system we pass to the stall system, when the sides of the lectern were separated and the gap filled by shelves which rose above the desk. The result was a bookcase proper, with desk attached, whence was developed the bookcase of modern type.

COPY, SLIGHTLY REDUCED, OF A SKETCH BY MICHELANGELO FOR ONE OF THE BOOKCASES IN THE MEDICEAN LIBRARY, FLORENCE.

[From "The Care of Books," by permission of the Cambridge University Press.]

Of chained libraries Mr. Clark gives us much information, especially in connexion with the great Continental libraries, such as that at Cesena, the Mediceau library at Florence, and the Vatican library. Bibliography, he tells us, has no part in his subject.

century. In England the suppression of t France the persecution of the Huguenots, factors in the destruction of much that would value. John Bale, "that bitter Protestant," w man who bought two noble libraries for f shame it is to be spoken"—and used the p wrapping paper. Yet as London sprang up a Fire, so the libraries recovered when the a were consumed, and the old desks and chai less. The new bookcase was practically know, and it was filled with specimens of Moved by the dearth of books, benevolent per libraries in central situations, and thus the into being. The custom of chaining books sur longer, and not until the eighteenth cen fall into desuetude.

In his concluding chapters Mr. Clark with the variations which library fittings Continent during the seventeen centuries, and also with the meth in private libraries. The initi in 1563 was due to Philip the Se several illustrations of the libr
the Mazarin library, and the Rheims give examples of this study of many illuminated ma brought to light one illustrati library. Of bookmen at work amples, all of them from manusc types of the small book desk Throughout all these illustratio dominant note—the respect wit regarded. In not one of the pi there apparent any signs of diso solemn, and severe, befitting the t
In modern times much advance h steel press enables us to save spa room for a larger number of book the reader is studied as never b attention is paid to questions of ventilation. But it was impossi without some sacrifice, and we n wish that the public library was architecturally, to the public hal
We miss as we enter it the atmosp tradition which so many of the even yet retain. We are too regard books as mere tools t aside—the mediæval idea recog element in them, treated and cared fo
But the books of old time were, of beauty to an extent rarely even aimed volume, and for much that sees the ligh fitting lot can be imagined than the obl
The one fault we have to find with Mr. Cla tical and external one. All who are interes books" will at once notice the doubtful q which makes a heavy volume, necessitates gu desk or stand imperative for the reader.

Barely a year has elapsed since Messrs.
and Emery Walker started the Doves Pre and already their publications are at a pre

AN ENGLISH ANTHOLOGY.

CHAMBERS' CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. New Edition by DAVID PATRICK, LL.D. Vol. I. (W. and R. Chambers. 10s. 6d. n.)

It is with great pleasure that we welcome the appearance of a new edition of Chambers' well-known "Cyclopædia of English Literature." From what we have seen of this first volume—there are to be three in all—we believe that the new work will deserve to be placed on the same shelf with "Chambers' Encyclopædia"—and one can hardly give higher praise to a work of ready reference. The task of preparing this new edition has been entrusted to Dr. Patrick, who edited the last edition of the larger Encyclopædia, and who again displays the same qualities of accuracy and proportion which made such a triumph of that work. He has enlisted a number of his old contributors under the same banner, with very good results. We need only mention the names of Dr. Stopford Brooke, Mr. Sidney Lee, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. A. H. Bullen, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Dr. S. R. Gardiner, and Professors Saintsbury and Hume Brown to show that the best specialists of our day have been called in to aid in a work which, sixty years ago, was entrusted to the taste and reading of a couple of men. We have no intention of disparaging the work of Robert Chambers and Robert Carruthers; it has been of the greatest service to several generations of students—Robert Louis Stevenson notable among them—and, although its historical part is largely superseded by the work of the last half-century, its critical remarks are still instructive, and its extracts were so well chosen that they still form the backbone of the new work—for to call Dr. Patrick's book merely a new edition is to under-estimate his labours. We are not at all sure that every one will allow the new edition, indeed, to drive the old one out of his library, though one is always reluctant to waste space on duplicates. There is a considerable value in a contemporary estimate of great authors, when it is due to men so sensible as Chambers and Carruthers. One may learn a good deal from such a pronouncement as that (in 1843) "among our secondary living poets there is no one of whom higher expectations may be found than Mr. Tennyson. . . . He reminds us at times of Leigh Hunt, but his spirit is more searching as well as expansive." It is wholesome to remember that a critic who could foresee Tennyson's greatness was yet capable of comparing him to Leigh Hunt. And there is a great deal in the first edition of the Cyclopædia that must of necessity be devoted to the gods of shipwreck to ensure the success of the new one, yet which is worth retaining when one has shelf-room to spare.

Nowadays we are so accustomed to anthologies that it is difficult to recall the destitution of our literature in that respect sixty years ago. In the preface to the first edition, which is dated 1843, Robert Chambers reminds us that the only serious attempt at a comprehensive anthology of our literature up to that time was a work whose title has long been a by-word for amiable inanity.

> The "Elegant Extracts" of Dr. Knox, after long enjoying popularity as a selection of polite literature for youths between school and college, has of late years sunk out of notice, in consequence of a change in public taste. It was almost exclusively devoted to the rhetorical literature, elegant but artificial, which flourished during the earlier half of the eighteenth century, overlooking even the great names of Chaucer and Spenser, as well as nearly the whole range of rich, though not faultless, production extending between the

these, which he called "The Library of English Litt Both works deserve to be honourably remembered, neither of them is much used at present. The truth is "time has fled for ever" at which a single man, o couple, could be an adequate guide to the whole fi literature. The modern anthology must like Mr.
excellent "English Poets" be the work of co-operatio personal preferences of the most conscientious of must lead him to allot a disproportionate space to les authors. By dividing the work, and having a superv with the omniscience and impartiality of Dr. Patrick,

> Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,
> A hero perish or a sparrow fall,

it becomes possible to attain a reasonable proportio space allotted to various authors. We have only praise way in which this difficult task has been managed in volume, and if the same success attends the second a volumes we shall be prepared to commend this antholo best thing of its kind that has yet been achieved in our l
As for the general scale of the work, it is enough to the present volume, containing 832 double-columns brings us down to the Restoration, and ends with the gr of Dryden. In the first edition the same period—as nea can allow for the different arrangement—occupied 5
One great improvement the editor has made; he has al
the old plan of grouping together the poets, dr essayists, &c., of each period, which led the work of su as Dryden to be entered under three or four different he severed Milton's verse by many pages from his prose.
with which all quotations have been verified, the excellent portraits, and the trustworthy, though ne concise, bibliographies also demand a word of praise.

So far we have spoken of this volume in special re Robert Chambers' first edition. Perhaps it will be add a few words for the benefit of those who do not k earlier work. The book is a combination of an a of English literature and a biographical history of might call it, again, a literary history working by exam extract from the preface will best show its scope.

> It is not, and is not meant to be, an antholog > perfect models of our prose and verse, a christo > purple patches, a collection of elegant extract > acknowledged gem should be there, if the man > known by some one noble passage, one sonnet, one > aphorism, or sententious saying; but something the > be, as a rule, to illustrate his average achieven > standard by which he may be fairly judged. Nor does > profess to be a marrow of our literature, or to give th > and quintessence of the several authors; still less do > to render its readers independent of the authors the > or relieve them from the duty and pleasure of stu > original works. In no case will one rise from article > flattering himself that now he knows his author > consider that subject settled. What we give him > more than a catalogue raisonné, an illustrated consp > finger-post to the best books, a guide to that of which > search, to what he needs, to what will interest him, > he can read with pleasure and profit. The very short > fewness of the excerpts is a security that they shall > taken as samples; they are meant to whet the ap > stimulate curiosity, to be stepping-stones to the > books.

CAROLINE OF ANSBACH.

CAROLINE THE ILLUSTRIOUS. By W. H. WILKINS. (Longmans. 36s.)

The principal factor which accounted for the great popularity of Mr. Wilkins' "Love of an Uncrowned Queen" is missing, through no fault of the author's, from his biography of the second of the Hanoverian Queens. Sophia Dorothea of Celle was what the dramatic critics call a "sympathetic heroine." Her life was a tragic love-story, separable from the general political history of the period. Her biographer was able to tell it from a bundle of remarkable love-letters, never previously published, which he had discovered, after a long and sportsman-like chase, at the Swedish University of Lund. Caroline of Ansbach, though in many ways a remarkable woman, was not in the least sympathetic. She never had a love affair, but merely made the best of a very unsatisfactory husband. At no period of her career, except upon her death-bed, can she be said to have been the dominating figure or the real centre of interest in the scenes in which she played her part. Consequently there was no material for a long two-volume life of her, other than the ordinary material available for the ordinary historian of the reign. Such and such things happened, such and such manners and customs prevailed at the Court and in the country, and Caroline of Ansbach was Queen of England at the time. That was all, so far as the greater portion of her life was concerned, that it was possible for any biographer to say. In a shorter study she might have been made to stand out conspicuously and clearly, and there is plenty of evidence to show that Mr. Wilkins could have written such a study as well as any one. He has preferred to present a more elaborate picture of Queen Caroline "and her time." He has studied the time so carefully, and made so many entertaining quotations from the diarists, letter-writers, pamphleteers, and journalists, that we are not disposed to emphasize the fact that he has had such competent predecessors in the field as Thackeray, Sir George Trevelyan, and Mr. Justin McCarthy, and that these predecessors have already familiarized us with some of his best stories. But we do feel that his characterization of Queen Caroline suffers from the excessive elaboration of her environment.

By far the best things in the book are at the beginning. Researches at the State Paper Office and in German Archives have enabled Mr. Wilkins to throw fresh light upon certain episodes of Caroline of Ansbach's early life. He goes delicately among old despatch books, and quotes nothing from them that is not interesting. His description of the Court of Queen Sophie Charlotte is particularly graphic; and there is a most romantic chapter on "the wooing of the Princess." Prince George Augustus visited her in disguise, "so that he might find out if he could love her, if she were likely to love him, and whether she was really so beautiful and charming as rumour had described." Poley's despatches are the unpublished authorities drawn upon for this narrative. The book is well written, and Mr. Wilkins has the art, though he does not practise it so sedulously as he might, of sketching a character in a few graphic sentences. We may quote his estimate of George I.:—

> The Elector George was ungraceful in person and gesture, reserved and uncouth in speech, and coarse and unrefined in taste. He was profligate, and penurious even in his profligacy. Unlike his mother, he had no learning, and, unlike his father, he had no manners. On the other hand, he was straightforward; he never told a lie, at least not an unnecessary one; he had a horror of intrigue and double-

SIR WILLIAM HUNTE

Mr. F. H. Skrine's LIFE OF SIR WILLIAM (Longmans, 16s.) follows the death of that dist no very long interval, and is a copious and of his career. Much as this country owes t Servants, it must own itself peculiarly indebte Hunter. He spent a large portion of his life to remove from Englishmen that ignorance of they are often justly reproached. He will be as a great administrator, nor as one who save province in some moment of peril, but as a writ facts, a historian, and a teacher. He was only died, leaving, as his epitaph says, his work Mr. Skrine doubts whether he ever had a whole health, and thinks that his energy and persev overwork himself. The long bibliography at the shows a degree of industry, over and above labours, which would have taxed the health a stronger man; and Sir W. Hunter had to cop health, private sorrows, and professional jeal jealousy and hostility of rivals, we cannot sp knowledge, but we hope that Mr. Skrine e He mentions them repeatedly throughout his b to index, and gives no very pleasing impr official life. "Plots," "conspiracies," "maleve malice, and all uncharitableness," and the words hurled broadcast at men who were, a colleagues and fellow servants. We trust th as the following do not truly reflect the te Service in India:—

> Now Hunter had committed the initial every competitor in the examination which to the Civil Service. He had added to his g a European reputation and by bringing a tas culty to a brilliantly successful issue. He ambitions, and his gifts marked him out for What wonder then that his enemies should hav of the prolonged absence in Europe to p humiliation for him?

We must hasten to add, however, that thi grievance is not apparent from Hunter's own cor instance, when he finally left India in 1887, ju the K.C.S.I., he writes most genially to La numerous friends, and of their expressions of good conferred upon him was only a fit reward of his forty-seven years old. He had held high office, General of Statistics, and as President of th mission of 1881, he had achieved a marked succe was not his least important work, he had wr Rural Bengal" and a "Life of the Earl of May the great "Statistical Account of Bengal," an and supervised, with rare tact and knowledge and completion of the fourteen volumes of Gazetteer of India." This last work was a organization and machinery, and he had many whom became his friends. Mr. Skrine asks, live?" He points out truly enough that, wh the "literature of knowledge," must necessaril in time by later research, but he holds tha cherish the 'Annals of Rural Bengal,' the L

the other to the union of the old and new companies in 1708. Five volumes were projected, the author's intention being to relate the rise, as distinguished from the maintenance in recent times, of the British dominion. Just as Gibbon has said the last word on the Roman Empire, so Hunter would say the last word on the rise of British India. The idea had been in his mind for a long time, discouraged and thrown back by the loss of a quantity of original documents in the wreck of the Nepal in 1830, but carried out as far as the first two volumes were concerned just before the end of his life. He died when his greatest and best work was less than half completed. And even this history, minute and extraordinarily careful as it is, was not his only occupation. For some years he was a regular contributor to The Times, and at the very last was making arrangements for a revised edition of his Gazetteer, and was looking forward to tours in Baluchistan and in Upper Burmah for that purpose. In such a life as this there is some justification for Mr. Skrine's opinion that he was overworked. We can only add that, with the help of Lady Hunter and some of Sir William's friends, Mr. Skrine has been able to perform, and to perform well, the whole duty of a biographer.

MR. FURNISS' REMINISCENCES.

Mr. Harry Furniss—who gives us in two fairly substantial volumes, at a substantial price, THE CONFESSIONS OF A CARICATURIST (Fisher Unwin, 32s.), with a promise of still more to follow—certainly possesses one prime qualification proper to the caricaturist, or indeed to the artist whether of the pen or the pencil. He sees the interesting and amusing side of things where it might have escaped other people. He makes the most of his matter, and, though he gives us a good many reminiscences which are of much more importance to Mr. Harry Furniss than to the public, he has certainly produced two very entertaining volumes. His limitations as a draughtsman are well known to all who take an interest in draughtsmanship; but no one can deny his wonderful resourcefulness and vitality, to which almost every page of his book bears witness. The innumerable drawings he reproduces are as varied as they are vivacious, and they make a lively running commentary on the story of his career in Ireland, on the staff of Punch, and on lecturing tours in England, America, and Australia. A man, who contrived to slip, by a mere accident, into the presence of a Cabinet meeting at Downing-street at a moment when Mr. Gladstone was addressing his colleagues, and was seized by an alarmed official "just as the Duke of Devonshire (then Lord Hartington) pushed by me into the room," is not likely to be a man of lost opportunities. This agreeable self-assertiveness is what makes the book readable, even if it goes to unnecessary lengths. We really do not much care nowadays who was right or who was wrong in the quarrel between Mr. Sala and Mr. Furniss, nor are we moved to great excitement over the history of Lika-joko. We prefer to hear Mr. Furniss tell his own jokes, such as the consolation which he offered to the Irish artist who painted a picture of Milton in his garden at Chalfont. The critics complained that the flowers were all modern and were not known in the country at the time of the poet.

> "Oh don't bother about the critics," I said; "they know nothing. Milton was blind, don't you know; so how could he tell whether the flowers were correct or not?"
>
> "Begorra, Furniss, you're right. Oi never thought of that. It's just like those ignorant critics to expect a fellow platform, on board ship, and in a hundred other Even his relatives contribute to the fun, and he capital story of his brother-in-law, "an inveterate racconteur," who let off his imaginary travelling adver a fellow passenger on the Brighton line, assuring him other things that in dealing with big game such as t was a mistake to watch their eyes. You should w foil. "It mesmerizes the animal and you have him mercy." At the hotel he found his companion's name visitors' book. It was Richard Burton. Burton, would listen to no apologies. "I was more entertaine can tell you," he said. "You really might have tra you lie so well." For Mr. Furniss, life is a series of ex ing incidents in which he himself plays no inconsider and his record of it will certainly add to the gaiety Christmas season.

WESSEX.

thorough acquaintance at once with Wessex itself, its people, and its customs, and with the works of its chief historian. It is not easy to realize how entirely the revival of the old name of Wessex is due to Mr. Hardy's genius. Mr. Windle quotes a passage from the introduction to the last edition of "Far from the Madding Crowd," which, by the way, was the first of his novels in which he made use of the ancient name. "Finding," he wrote, "that the area of a single county did not afford a canvas large enough for my purpose, and that there were objections to an invented name, I disinterred the old one. The Press and the public were kind enough to welcome the fossilized plan, and willingly joined me in the anachronism of imagining a Wessex population living under Queen Victoria—a modern Wessex of railways, the penny post, mowing and reaping machines, union workhouses, ploughmen who could read and write, and National School children." But, until the novel in question was first published in 1874, it is probable that the term "Wessex" would never have been taken to refer to anything later than the Norman Conquest. Mr. Hardy's dream-country has, by degrees, solidified "into a real district, and the names by which he has chosen to christen the towns and villages of his kingdom are scarcely less well known than the real names. Mr. Windle's work is thorough and conscientious, and gives as much information as any one can desire about the various localities. The book is profusely illustrated, and some of the drawings by Mr. E. H. New are very happy, especially in the treatment of architectural subjects. The plate we have chosen for reproduction represents the Abbey Gateway at Cerne Abbas—the "Abbot's Cernel" of the novels.

ECCLESIASTICAL BOOKS.

The Prayer-book.

Fifty years ago Mr. Procter wrote a history of the Prayer-book which at once became the standard work upon the subject. "Procter" passed through four editions in the fifties, four more in the sixties, six in the succeeding decade, and so on through the century. Its author is still alive, but with a modesty that is not always found among successful authors he has stepped aside and given his name and work into the hands of a younger man. Churchmen, who have long been grateful to Mr. Procter for a book that has done so much to make their services intelligible to them, owe him now a double debt for the publication of A New History of the Book of Common Prayer: with a Rationale of its Offices, by Francis Procter and Walter Howard Frere (Macmillan, 12s. 6d.). "Procter and Frere" bids fair to be to them what Coke upon Littleton is to lawyers. The last half of the nineteenth century has revolutionized most sciences, and that which is called liturgical has not escaped. A crowd of diligent students and a multitude of historical discoveries have altered many accepted ideas about the worship of the Church of England, and a new standard history of the Prayer-book has come to be badly wanted. Such a book is this, "on the basis" as the title-page tells us, "of the former work" but "revised and rewritten" by Mr. Frere. It is in fact a new book, and as such deserves a special notice. Nor is it merely a history of the various Prayer-books and a description of the older rites and uses from which they were developed; it is also an analysis of all the services in the present book, an explanation of their meaning, a description of their ceremonial, even of their music, for Mr. Frere, liturgiologist and historian, is also an authority on Church music. Any one who wishes to know about any point in the Prayer-book will find it in "Procter and Frere," correctly set forth with clearness and fairmindedness, fortified with abundant quotations and with references that place every source of information at the reader's disposal.

on page 151 that he regards the one service as Now, the authorities tell us that the Litany is Holy Communion; and we find the direction Litany in Canon 18, and not in Morning Praye orders a pulpit to be kept in every church for Mr. Jackson need not have wondered that no the pulpit. In another edition Mr. Jack necessary to modify his now unqualified remark points as the position of the minister for the exact meaning of the Ornaments Rubric.

Church History.

The English Church from the Norman C
Accession of Edward I. (1066-1272). By V
B.D. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d.)

This is the second volume of the History England edited by the Dean of Winchester an appears later than the third, which we revi
It is the work of the Dean himself, and excelle author, as we know from the books he has alre trained historical student, and we know too fr biography of Mr. Freeman that he is a followe of the Norman Conquest, as also—so his expresses—the friend and disciple of the tw whom Oxford has recently lost. Thus we sho the book to show, as it does, a thorough acqua original authorities for the whole period wit
The Dean has closely studied, for exampl Lanfranc, the theology of Anselm (which strangely neglected), as well as the chronicle Malmesbury to the historians of Canterbury, edited with such mastery of knowledge. He abreast with modern knowledge, as is shown of Mr. Round's view of the dispute betw Becket at Woodstock and of Professor Maitla of the Constitutions of Clarendon. In judg causes the Dean is remarkably impartial.
true historic insight the characters and Anselm, Becket, Grosseteste. His article on S us for the admirable lucidity with which he through the tangles of the Saint's disput
Henry I., as well as for the clear summary of t Proslogion, and the Cur Deus Homo. In his t he is equally good. He seems to us thoron the man and his times. Among his reference subject we should have wished to see one t singularly able article in the "Dictionary of Na
It may be observed too that the Dean in rank as below the justiciar and the treasurer differ authorities, who without exception speak of B
the office, as "secundus post regem in quatu

The book, we have implied, is in no nothing extenuates, though certainly it set malice. If we may differ as to the treat subjects, it is never without feeling that the for his own view. To our mind, for i Winchester plays too slight a part in the mentioned that he was a Cistercian; and, in monasticism during Stephen's reign is hardly t at least in connexion with the reign itself.
of the years 1160 to 1171 would gain by a more position of Roger of Pont l'Eveque, Archbis
most of the writers of the time, notably Ga Maxence, regard as almost the most impor dispute between Henry II. and Becket. So might be said of John of Oxford, the " Becket's friends; and no reference is ma consequences of the synod at Würzburg.
might be said of the importance of the rel English Church and the Churches abroad in t when English priests held office in Sicily an as in many French States, and when the s Canterbury came to be known in distant here and there a misspelling, as of the name of Dr. Jessopp. There are several mentions of Ireland and Irish Bishops in the book, but practically none of Scotland and Wales. Do we rightly infer that the Dean regards the Welsh Church as separate from the English in the twelfth century, and disregards the work of Archbishop Baldwin? We miss, by the way, a full account of the delightful Giraldus Cambrensis. The Dean will remember that when Adam Bishop of S. Asaph continued to dwell at Abingdon, where he was Abbot, and declined to visit his diocese, Henry II. gave him the choice of surrendering either the See or the Abbey. He chose to keep the latter, says Benedictus Abbas, "for fear of the Welsh." Does the same reason explain the Dean's omission?

Wolsey.

THOMAS WOLSEY, LEGATE AND REFORMER. By ETHELRED L. TAUNTON. (Lane. 16s. n.)

We have learnt to look for books from the hand of Mr. Taunton with a pleasant anticipation of unconventional treatment of themes in which Romanists are specially concerned. His present work is to some extent a disappointment. Probably he intends it for no more than a "drawing-room book": it has a number of well-drawn and interesting illustrations, and it is produced with the taste for which Mr. John Lane is renowned. The illustrations—new drawings from old sources—are a valuable help to the realization of the scenes and the men among whom Wolsey moved. But the book itself, though it claims to be "a slight addition to the study of the causes which led up to the Reformation," adds nothing to our knowledge of that subject or of the life of the great Cardinal. It is derived almost entirely from Mr. Brewer's masterly calendars of State papers, with necessary references to Bergenroth, Fiddes, and such well-known books. It is a pity that Mr. Taunton did not make further investigation—at Rome, for example. The facts with which we have been long acquainted are quite insufficient as a basis for a new reading of the Cardinal's character as an ecclesiastic. What Mr. Taunton tells of his work as a statesman and of his energy as a Church reformer we have long known, though the significance of his reforms has doubtless been under-estimated—and indeed a stronger case might have been made out had Mr. Taunton traced the connexion between Wolsey, Colet, More, and Erasmus in more detail. We may even go so far, perhaps, as Mr. Taunton when he says that had Wolsey "been spared to complete his great foundations at Oxford and Ipswich they might in the event have proved of profit to religion, as least as much as those great works of Julius II. on St. Peter's and the Vatican that were destined to be paid for at so fatal a cost to the Christian world." We may agree with our author, too, in his description of the relations between Wolsey and the Observants, and think that "he would have had but little sympathy with those who try to exalt the Papacy at the expense of the Episcopacy." We notice, too, with interest the view that "The Benedictine element in the English Church is the key to Wolsey's plan of reorganization." With regard to the Lutherans and Wolsey's action in the Legatine Court, Mr. Taunton should have gone deeper into the matter, which can be illustrated fully from the writings of More. With the severe criticisms of the sixteenth-century Papacy, of the Roman greed for gold, and of the Italian policy towards the Universal Church we cordially agree, and we should not be inclined to minimize the significance of the following statement:—

> Since Wolsey's days only Italians have sat in Peter's chair and the government of the Universal Church has been practically in the hands of that nation. Although the principle of nationality is vehemently decried as being opposed to the Catholicity of the Church, it can hardly be denied that never has a more striking example of that principle been shown to the world than at Rome for the last three hundred years or more.

But when Mr. Taunton comes to glorify Wolsey as a great Churchman, great in character and "head and shoulders above all his ecclesiastical contemporaries," we must part company with him. His letters as here quoted are sufficient to prove his

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

War Books.

Most of Mr. Edgar Wallace's UNOFFICIAL [illegible] (Hutchinson, 6s.) appeared in the Daily Mail. The prose style is that of an imitator of Mr. Kipling who not imitate very successfully; but there is neverth air about his criticism which conveys the impression, well or ill founded, that there is something in these. our observation has gone, he is the first war corresp raise an indictment against what he calls "Lord Ki hopeless incapacity" to deal with Afrikander sedit indictment is spirited; but the facts before us hardly us in either supporting or opposing it. On the oth Mr. Wallace's complaints of the severity of the Press do seem to be substantially justified. His book is be the average of war books, though not to be ranked with best of them.

WORDS BY AN EYEWITNESS, by "Linesman" (Blackw is a reprint of certain papers on the Transvaal War to w have frequently drawn attention when reviewing Blac Magazine. It is one of the best books that the war has forth—we are not sure that it should not be hailed as but, of course, it is not quite fair to compare narra impressionism. This is impressionism, and it ranks impressionism in Steevens' "London to Ladysmith." T impressions of big battles, and little battles, of night at of boredom on the lines of communication—all a graphic. Personalities as a rule are avoided; but the sketch of General Buller strikes us as brilliant:—

> Huge, heavy, solid, and reliable to look upon, he to the imagination something of the comfort derivable sight of a big gun or a strong intrenchment. . . . man could do anything with soldiers if he could be anything to do. . . . A man who could by a short gible address send his defeated and diminished arm and confident back to camp as he did on that Monday (after Spion Kop) is an anomaly of no small military v

Brilliant, too, is the description of the demeanour of under fire:—

> Is it credible that rough jokes, loud inquiries a welfare of friends next door, or rather next heap, could sounding from anthill to anthill from jolly red faces against them behind? It may not be credible, but i Then the pom-pom heard for the first time—it was a li on that keen-eyed watch-dog of a gun that its awaso ing should be imitated to the very life by its intendes themselves. But alas! British soldiers have no dignity; they are never dignified themselves aforethought, and if that busy piece had listened have heard "pom-pom-pom-pom" from many throat cast steel. These are but skimmings, mere drops f ocean of incidents, but, as Mr. Pecksniff said, "they

We should like to quote more if our space allowed. nothing but praise for the book.

WITH RIMINGTON, by L. March Phillips (Arnold, deals mainly with Methuen's advance to Kimberley operations against Cronje and Prinsloo. The style is but vigorous. The word "bag," considered so repre when Lord Kitchener employed it, is quite good enoug author when the surrender of Boers has to be record does not use it derisively, but, as we gather, because expression that seems most natural to him. His metap often graphic, as when he writes that our mobile "have about as much chance of catching Boers on the a Lord Mayor's procession would have of catching a hig on Hounslow Heath." His pessimism—for he comes to p in the end—is that of a level-headed man; and he indignantly against the ideas that "any measures are ju so long as they are likely to end the war." The B maintains, have on the whole played the game fairly bullet wounds and wonderful operations, and there is even a new story about a sentry and his password.

The adjutant has forgotten to give round the pass-word for the evening, and we are challenged by the first post.

"It's all right," is our reply. "I'm the adjutant; do you know what the password is?"

"No, sorr," says the Irishman, "but I've made one up for meself."

About the hospital arrangements Mr. Fremantle speaks quite frankly. He takes the view that things were pretty bad, though not quite so bad as Mr. Burdett-Coutts represented; and that the Hospitals Commission was biased. "Two of the Commissioners at least seemed to be badgering, and to have taken up the definite line that the R.A.M.C. officers are an aggrieved body." His own conclusion, after a careful statement of the pros and cons is: "Mr. Burdett-Coutts exaggerates; the system is rotten; the men did their best." Suggestions for the amendment of the system follow. They seem to us well thought out. The main contention is that civilian doctors should be more extensively employed for military duties even in times of peace, because they are better men, harder workers, and more up-to-date in their knowledge of their profession. The book will repay attention, and will be found readable as well as instructive. There are some good photographs, and some pen and ink drawings of bullet wounds made from sklagrams.

With Pagty's Horse to the Front, by Cosmo Rose Innes (Macqueen, 3s. 6d.), seems to have been written to prove that the members of the troop in question were regular "devils of fellows," as fervent worshippers of Bacchus and Venus as of Mars. A good many of the pages, indeed, relate the exploits of the troop not in Africa, but in London, where the troopers pelted each other with poached eggs at the breakfast table, and were passed into the music halls at night, and yielded to various temptations. Even when we get to Africa there is more about general rowdyism than about fighting. The book may come as a relief to readers who are tired of the tactics and strategy and pomp and circumstance of war; but the boisterous humour is of the sort that we soon tire of.

French's Cavalry Campaign, by J. G. Maydon (Pearson, 3s. 6d.), is one of the less important war-books, but not one of the least meritorious. The author was at the Modder and Magersfontein and took part in the Colesberg operations, the relief of Kimberley, and the march to Bloemfontein. His main purpose, as his preface explains, is to emphasize the importance of cavalry, and this he successfully does. When he strays from this theme it is generally in order to blacken the Boer character. As a Natalian he has perhaps some claim to be heard in the matter. But he should not write about "Van" Tromp. Tromp, without the particle, was the name of the admiral in question.

A second edition of Dr. Conan Doyle's book, The Great Boer War (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d.), carries the narrative as far as the second anniversary of the issue of the ultimatum. The style, as before, is flamboyant, and the metaphors are often those of the prize-ring. Such a force was "badly mauled"; such another force "took its punishment gamely." It is not a style that we particularly admire, though there is precedent for it in the despatches of distinguished generals—Lord Kitchener's "bag," and the Duke of Wellington's "We gave the enemy a handsome dressing." Still the narrative is spirited and lucid. Owing to the stringency of the censorship the latter chapters are necessarily based upon rather inadequate information, and the higher wisdom would perhaps have suggested a further postponement of publication. But the book is a popular one which will be welcome at the moment.

Book-binding.

The appearance of Mr. Douglas Cockerell's little volume on Book-binding (No. 1, Artistic Crafts Series of Technical Handbooks, John Hogg, Paternoster-row, 6s. n.) is peculiarly opportune. First, it supplements Mr. John Willis Clark's valuable work reviewed in another column; secondly, interest has lately been aroused by the report of the Society of Arts' Committee on leathers used, or rather mis-used, for book-binding; exasperating even if it be original—as a b[illegible] certainly a stylist; moreover, he is well ve[illegible] of his subject, and can make apposite allusion[illegible] methods of workmanship and to fine old desig[illegible] eminently a handbook for those who would g[illegible] book-binding, not of the "scamped" commer[illegible] that which would be practised if each volume [illegible] own library. Save a couple of chapters at th[illegible] book is devoted to consideration and explanati[illegible] processes involved, from the time that the sh[illegible] binder's hands to the moment when, perhaps [illegible] the volume is ready to be used or admired. [illegible] illustrations of Mr. Noel Rooke serve to make [illegible] You see the tools, the way in which to use [illegible] aided, a person of ordinary intelligence, [illegible] accustomed faithfully to perform the command[illegible] should be able to execute a serviceable bindi[illegible] usefully explained by Mr. Cockerell we r[illegible] columns. If future books in the series are as [illegible] It is justified alike from the theoretical and th[illegible] of view.

Sir Richard Burton.

Wanderings in Three Continents, by th[illegible] Burton (Hutchinson, 16s. n.), is a kind of [illegible] though it may interest those who desire to [illegible] the celebrated traveller, can hardly commend [illegible] students. It includes the essays and lect[illegible] described his journeys to Mecca, El Medi[illegible] Dahomé, but leaves out all the notes which ve[illegible] his reading and experience. There is, it has [illegible] very little literary flavour to most of Burton's [illegible] his adventures, and the only way for Mr [illegible] edited this volume, to have given it any spe[illegible] have been to supply, in the place of Burton's n[illegible] of the later additions to knowledge made by [illegible] lers. As it is there is nothing to show those w[illegible] been ignorant of Burton's achievements—and [illegible] this volume has confessedly been compiled—[illegible] Harrar have been visited since his time. Bu[illegible] Lake City was in any case hardly worth re[illegible] little or nothing in his account of the hom[illegible] Saints of any value; his entire misjudgme[illegible] and the outcome of the conflict between [illegible] followers and the Government of the Unite[illegible] little, to say the least of it, from the reader [illegible] opinion on less-known regions of the world. Th[illegible] limit to bookmaking even out of the literar[illegible] tinguished a traveller as Sir Richard Burton.

Two Historical Essays.

The versatile author of "A Subaltern's L[illegible] and translator of the Nibelungen Ring, Mr. [illegible] has, in The Marquis d'Argenson and Ricl[illegible] 10s. 6d.), now given us two historical studies, [illegible] one volume. A comparison of Mr. Rankine's [illegible] title-page with the subject of his essays enab[illegible] in their original form these sketches were [illegible] tion for the Lord Stanhope's Essay Prize [illegible] neither of them was successful in obtaining [illegible] have conspicuous merits. They are the resul[illegible] tion, they are original, bright, and attractive [illegible] that on the Marquis d'Argenson, naturally [illegible] with Mr. Arthur Ogle's book on the same sul[illegible] Mr. T. Fisher Unwin in 1893. It must b[illegible] comparison is not in favour of Mr. Rankine, [illegible] less complete and penetrating. In places it [illegible] acquaintance with the historical surroun[illegible] subject, as in the reference to "the rela[illegible] Jansenists and the Molinists," to "the [illegible] Queen, her henpecked husband Philip V., [illegible] Minister Campo-Florida," and to Jansen as [illegible] engraft the doctrine of grace upon the [illegible] religion." But it is a clever piece of char[illegible]

French Convict Settlements.

At the present day when every one goes somewhere and promptly makes a book out of what he has seen, it is useless to complain that even those books which have a distinct value are far too long. The chapters, for instance, on the United States and Australia in Mr. George Griffiths' work IN AN UNKNOWN PRISON LAND (Hutchinson, 12s.) are not badly written, but they have no real connexion with the main theme, which is that of the French convict settlements and prisons in New Caledonia and the neighbouring islands. How Mr. Griffiths got there and how he came away are, properly speaking, entirely irrelevant. Yet much may be forgiven him for his account of the French prison system, which makes one almost regret that there is now no English system of transportation. Had the French occupied Australia, it is quite possible that they, too, would have made the mistake of using it as a "prison-land." Owing to the fact that they did not occupy it they were compelled to adopt the right course, that of employing islands of limited area to dispose of their incorrigibles. A system such as exists in France by which habitual criminals and men of the souteneur class could be condemned to relégation may be a boon to a civilized country. The system, as it is explained by Mr. Griffiths, shows that New Caledonia cannot be classed with Norfolk Island or Macquarie Harbour, the historic infamies of which are a blot on the English flag. Except for those criminals who are entirely hopeless, there is a good chance of regeneration; the discipline, though severe, is not, it would seem, cruel, and by now the rigours of the pitiless cachot noir have been greatly mitigated. Nevertheless, the book, though intensely interesting where it deals with its subject, is anything but cheerful reading. It will prove useful to criminologists, and to those who know the dry bones of the French convict system overseas.

THE LIFE OF HENRY SCHOMBERG KERR, SAILOR AND JESUIT (Longman, 6s. 6d. n.), has been written by the Hon. Mrs. Maxwell-Scott. He was the second son of the Rev. Lord Henry Kerr, rector of Dittisham, who joined the Church of Rome in 1852; and three years later, being then a midshipman on board H.M.S. Vengeance, he followed his parents in their change of religion. He rose to the rank of commander, after service in the Crimea, and quitted the Navy in 1867, to become a novice at the Jesuits' establishment at Roehampton. In due time he received priest's orders, and was sent first to India, and then to South Africa, where he died in charge of a Jesuit mission in Northern Rhodesia in 1895. He was an exceptional man, both for the manliness of his character and for his influence over others. It is well that there should be a record of his unselfish life. Perhaps the detailed account of Schomberg Kerr's training at Roehampton is the most interesting part of the book; but the memoir is all worth reading, though it abounds in pious expressions which, if Father Kerr had been an Evangelical, would be regarded, in these days, as of doubtful taste.

THE BRIDE'S BOOK, by Mrs. E. T. Cook (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), need not be taken very seriously. Externally, with its limp vellum cover and silk ribbons, it resembles the love letters of the unhappy Englishwoman who somehow did not become a bride. Internally it is less impressive. These short papers on proposals, engagements, honeymoons, homes, calls, servants, and so forth are in fact very slight, though sometimes entertaining.

THE FOREST SCHOOLMASTER (Putnams, 6s.), by Peter Rosegger, is essentially a book for a quiet hour or two. The reader may be interested, but cannot be much excited, by the imaginary autobiography, mixed perhaps with some of the author's own experiences, of a humble schoolmaster in the forests and valleys of the Austrian Tyrol. It affords pleasant reading of a somewhat original kind, and has been well translated by Miss Frances E. Skinner.

Miss Agnes Giberne, who is not unknown as a writer of books on the light side of science, in her last volume, THE MIGHTY DEEP (C. Arthur Pearson, 3s. 6d.), treats of oceanography in a pleasant and popular manner. The subject is one which gives ample opportunity for the exercise of interesting

The book is not about the war or the constitutional qu which the war involved, but about the condition of the during its continuance. It tells us how the sinews of w procured, how much paper money was floated, to extent it depreciated, and to what prices various com rose or fell in consequence of the Northern blocka the last month a paper dollar was only worth five-eight penny, and coffee cost, in currency, about £40 p while the 100 dollar eight per cent. bonds fetched shade over two dollars each. Many other out of the interesting items of information are brought to light. are strange stories of large bands of deserters congr in North Carolina, and defying all attempts to impress trade being carried on between North and South in the hostilities, because the Northerners wanted cotton as the Southerners wanted bacon, and of moral decadence di inflated currency. Nobody believed in the currency, so ev tried to invest his paper dollars in property that w depreciate, with appalling effects upon prices. The mo ling statements made are fully substantiated by refer authorities, and the book is a really valuable, as we exceedingly interesting, contribution to economic histor

FICTION.

A Virtuous Puritan.

Miss Edna Lyall's new novel, IN SPITE OF ALL (Hi Blackett, 6s.), is a pleasant story, though not very dra convincing, and in the same way it is obtrusively caref historical research, but not a living interpretation of th Her tone is one of studied moderation, which hamp presentation of that age of superb and hazardous extreme the same time, though she is laboriously just to in Royalists, she is cheerfully and consistently for the Par The framework of the story is simple: Gabriel Har Hilary Unett, child-playmates, are parted by the war, holding to the King, while the impeccable Gabriel enlist the "Roundheads." It requires nearly 400 pages to them, and much happens in the interval. Some of the s Gabriel's many sufferings are given with great force, that of his terrible ordeal in Marlborough church; whil of the lighter episodes are gracefully conceived. T battles, recounted with great composure, and there is p old-world dialogue, with an invincibly modern accent. book, one may gladly admit, is full of ideals of high i and earnest purpose.

Miss Florence Warden.

Given a man of parts who indulges in magnetic spiritualism of the Peckham Rye variety, undue influ hypnotic suggestion, murder committed alternatively poker and with beef tea flavoured with colchicum, wh takes a flying leap through the window of a railway carri (alighting on his head) cheats the gallows of its prey also an artificial bust attached to a beautiful sui woman whose wig is either gold or black (for here Miss leaves us in doubt); let these variegated miscreants be in juxtaposition with a maiden lady who possesses a large and two nephews—and you will get as you get in A F A FINISH, by Florence Warden (Chatto and Windus, wonderful run for your money. It is due to Miss W say that she does exactly what she undertakes to d labels her prize-fighters in chapter one and they fight to the finish in the twenty-fourth, and last, chapter, and a the betting is 100 to 1 on the nephews all through, the sturdy lot of rounds. The book is confessedly melodra Miss Warden knows her limitations, and by keeping with has turned out another breezily thrilling, if wholly imp story.

Anglo-Indian.

Mrs. Croker has written in ANGEL (Methuen, 6s.) a disappointed. It is after marriage that the trouble comes, but, fortunately, the trouble is never very serious, and Mrs. Croker sends her readers off contented with a happy ending. She has provided a handsome gallery of Anglo-Indian men and women, and she knows the terminology of the district. The last scene is not badly contrived, and the undesirable characters are disposed of with a completeness that leaves little to be desired.

THE ROMANCE OF A HILL STATION (T. Fisher Unwin, 2s. 6d.), by Mrs. H. S. Laverton, is a creditable first attempt. There is nothing fresh or striking in the little sketches of Anglo-Indian life, but they are at least harmless, and the illustrations by F. M. Mims are decidedly good.

Mr. W. S. Maugham.

Like all the other work of Mr. William Somerset Maugham his latest novel, THE HERO (Hutchinson 6s.), will give the reader food for thought as well as entertainment. Colonel Parsons, the father of the hero, has closed his career of honour by a blameworthy action. The son has reinstated the good fame of the family by gaining the Victoria Cross and other victories, moral and military. He returns to his old-fashioned, narrow parents, to the village of his boyhood and to the love, Mary Childorn, of five years ago. He has been through change and stress and here, at home, every one is expecting him to follow out engagements almost forgotten in the heat of battle and the glories that have been. Here is the making of a vivid novel. Colonel Parsons has to face the situation fairly. What he does and why he does it is the chief interest of a powerful story. The result may not delight those who turn to the novel merely as an anodyne for life, but those who can approach the subject from a purely intellectual point of view will find in this book a handsome reward for careful attention, and an exceptional display of vigour, talent, and narrative power.

Maxwell Gray.

Maxwell Gray (Miss M. G. Tuttiett) calls her last book FOUR-LEAVED CLOVER (Heinemann, 6s.) an every-day romance, and, if one allows that romance can be commonplace, it is certainly that and little more. The commonplace character is shown in every chapter, the people are well-enough drawn, the diction is clear, the situations thought out—but all on an every-day plane. There is a little comedy, a good bit of melodrama, and "quivering nostrils," plenty of old-fashioned intrigue neatly arranged for every-day people. "Four-Leaved Clover" will be popular, no doubt, among Maxwell Gray's admirers, but we feel that we are entitled to ask something more genuine, something more observed and truer from this gifted lady than anything her latest book has to offer.

The Miracle Crane.

The strong, solitary man has been a favourite character in fiction for some time. It is the fashion now to make him an inventive mechanic, and it is almost essential that he should fall in love with a lady of title. This is what happens with Enoch Strone, the hero of Mr. Phillips Oppenheim's novel MASTER OF MEN (Methuen, 6s.), who invents the miracle crane, is taken into partnership with his employer, and rises afterwards to even more giddy heights than these. Mr. Strone is an interesting study, and the book has several strong scenes, notably that in which Lady Malingcourt rescues the inventor and his model from a cowardly attack by some of his fellow workmen. And Mr. Oppenheim has nobly resisted the temptation to marry off the ex-mechanic and the lady—a match that could never have been a success, even on paper. Nor is there so much crude Socialism as is customary in books of this kind; while at the end there is an excellent little touch of sympathetic feeling. Altogether a novel considerably above the average.

Detectives.

Each new story by Mr. Edmund Mitchell helps to justify the great expectations based upon "The Lone Star Rush" and "Plotters of Paris." His latest, ONLY A WOMAN (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), is an unhalting story of detective work which recalls Du Boisgobey at his best. Not the least original touch is that the reader's interest is chiefly with the pursued and not other is to draw a hero who is easily duped of the enemy may not require much imaginat In FOR LOVE OR CROWN (Hutchinson, 6s.) a you be married is suddenly acquainted with the fact private individual, but the heiress to a crown groundwork to a story which the author man a number of exciting incidents. But the here easily taken in by his not overskilful antagonis

---

True romance and something of the hero in Mr. James Prior's powerful and engrossi FOLK (Heinemann, 6s.). It is planned on a la details of the life of the people of Sherwood characters become our intimate acquaintance may be like that, as we close the book. Th "felt," as the painters say. For those atmosphere "Forest Folk" is, par excellence,

Mr. J. S. Fletcher can unquestionably te and we did not feel inclined to skip a singl GOLDEN SEED (John Long, 6s.), though we di reason for the title in any incident in the story a penniless hero who has been cashiered fro regains his character in devoting himself to German princess whose person and jewels are conspiracy against her centres round an old I she is awaiting her lover; and it is very elev though in the culmination the author gives a s scope to the gruesome and the sanguinary.

The Dreyfus case provided matter too n novelist to neglect, and it inspires a pleasan John Oxenham, called OUR LADY OF DELIVERA 6s.), in which Monsieur Lamont, a well-to-do Eng undertakes the protection of the beautiful Comptes and the salvation of her soldier broth imprisoned in a remote island by the machinati enemies. The guardianship of Mademoiselle l love-making, over which M. Lamont (who r dwells with a little too much gusto. But hi brightly told, and the book is full of vari incident.

THE GODDESS OF GRAY'S INN, by G. B. 6s.), gives us the story of Lilian, who was lawyer's rooms in the Inn. It is a superficial harmless one, and we would not dissuade any mildly interested from reading it.

IN A BLIND MARRIAGE (Chatto and Windus, R. Sims presents to his particular public exact story for which they have learned to look to hi stories—there are fourteen between the boards massy type, and all are workmanlike and c alone, entitled "In the List of the Killed," e for commendation on the score of some original

Mr. Reginald Turner, in CYNTHIA'S DAMAG gives us, with a little wit and a good deal of story of Cynthia Walpole, who "does" song a at the "Colonial," her love for Toby, the relations with a young Lord Gillie. The s often slangy and a little long drawn out, b similar books, it is not without merit.

The anonymous author of THE LOVER'S 6s.) would appear to be a leisurely writer. character who tells the story of his loves i shows a fine persistence in narration. "The L is dedicated "To all who love." We rather of Lotis, Salta, and Hesperis will appeal t class. But "The Lover's Progress" is not gives good pictures of life in Paris and in "B

Mr. A. J. Dawson is always an acce JOSEPH KHASSAN, HALF-CASTE (Heinemann, 6s.) in the beginning, but, as the interest in the N science of Mary Whateley—entangled with th temperament of the highly-educated half-caste Wellington's officers." Like some other elderly gentlemen, these three have their troubles, and one has a love affair. The story of their doings after their return home is not striking, but it is certainly readable, and no one need be frightened by the design on the cover of three wicked-looking gentlemen, which is, we fancy, a joke of the artist.

No Vindication (John Long, 6s.) begins with a pretty setting—a Cornish coast, an elderly recluse and his granddaughter, and a young waif, who has been rescued from shipwreck. It seems a pity that so idyllic a scene should have been disturbed, but presumably Mrs. Coulson Kernahan felt the necessity of putting some stronger meat into her book, and consequently her little Cornish village must be thrown into confusion by Captain Graham, ex-convict, and his abduction of Minnie Berryman. Thence forward the story descends to a lower level, half-farcical, half-melodramatic. It is readable, but hardly one of the author's most successful efforts.

Women Must Weep, by Sarah Tytler (John Long, 6s.), is not a cheerful book—perhaps cheerfulness could hardly be expected with such a title. The author had it in her mind, apparently, to tackle a social problem of the customary kind—a married man with an ante-nuptial entanglement. But her male characters are essentially those of the lady novelist, and it is not easy to feel much faith in Captain Hepburn as the young and blustering husband, or in Colonel Hepburn the reformed and broken-down rake. Some of the women are better drawn, and the injured wife is an amiable character enough, but the book lacks vitality. The dramatic opening apparently exhausted the author's powers; even when Mrs. Bridgnorth reappears upon the scene (as Lady Cumberbatch) the story cannot be galvanized into life again. It gives the impression of being dull and long drawn out.

A stolen manuscript—especially when, as in A Stolen Opera (Pearson, 6s.), by Clarice Danvers, it is the manuscript of that rara avis, an English operatic composer of genius—is a theme to make the head ache with possibilities. Mr. Danvers has not treated it in quite the most exciting manner conceivable. But the book is based on an American play called Heartsease, and the author is not therefore altogether responsible for his plot. We would have laid heavy odds on the person who was going to steal the opera very early in the book, and it is actually stolen much too soon. If not too well planned, the story is well told, Mr. Danvers being much better at narrative than at drawing his characters. These are too conventional, and one at least, Mr. Pudbury, a man who, after making a fortune, turns to money-lending in order to get a footing in the drawing rooms of his clients' families, is highly improbable.

Those who revel in plot and counter-plot will find Kate Andrews' Stephen Kyrle (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.) to their liking. It is concerned with the Australian goldfields in the fifties, when the fever possessed men's blood, and when many a crime was committed and many a life sacrificed to the lust for the yellow metal. The character of "Stephen Kyrle," who is physically a fair imitation of John Ridd, but without that hero's immaculateness, is not unhappily drawn, and the same is true of Delia de Carle. But this is pre-eminently a novel of sensation. As a literary effort the book is not remarkable. But there is ingenuity in the construction of the story and the interest is well sustained.

The Real Christian, by Lucas Cleeve (John Long, 6s.), is not badly written, but it is a little dreary. The people in it wander confusedly among the creeds and the emotions, succeeding finally in making chaos of most of their lives. The author, we are afraid, writes too often and too copiously. We note that three books, at least, bearing the name of Lucas Cleeve have lately appeared.

The Fortune of Christina M'Nab, by S. Macnaughtan (Methuen, 6s.), can be unreservedly praised. Christina is delightful; her adventures are most humorously given; the pictures of modern society are not the usual caricatures, and the interest never flags for a moment. Miss Macnaughtan is to be congratulated on the advance which

Hetty Oswin precipitates her own death and seeks to d
the man she had hoped to marry strikes us as improbab
the book is above the average and will give pleasure to th of the West country.

Mrs. Charles Marten affects long words which she understand, while there are several pearls of novelist scattered through her chapters. Miss Pauncefort' (John Long, 6s.) is a commonplace story, and judgin Press notices of Mrs. Marten's other works it must way below her former efforts.

The Work of his Hands, by Chris Healy (Hutchin is a romance of the wild and undisciplined type, dealing career of one Robert Barry, journeyman worker in the an architectural carver, who rises to fame as an arti
Healy professes his intention of drawing a faithful pictu life of the working classes, but his hero reminds us of the baron of the penny novelette, partially redeemed by for music and some skill as a craftsman.

Mr. Albert Kinross is an experienced novelist, and h work, The Early Stars (Arrowsmith 6s.), displays the ac hand and acute brain of the ready writer. The characte of Philbrick, whose fortunes between the loves of th
Helen and the passionate Sinka engage our atten admirable; the story interests all the way; it is life-sincere, often amusing and not infrequently re touching. If "The Early Stars" is not a great novel, i which is more generally appreciated, a good one.

We referred in our last issue to the great impr observable in the illustrations to boys' books. It is e noticeable in the half-tone drawings, and we are glad a reproduction of a picture in Mr. W. A. Fraser's cap about the life of the Canadian trappers—Mooswa and of the Boundaries (Pearson, 6s.)—which we recently r

BOOKS AT AUCTION.

The six days' dispersal of important books, &c., partially dealt with in the last issue of Literature, was concluded in Wellington-street on December 7. The following table indicates a few of the outstanding lots:—

Scott.—Waverley, Woodstock, Chronicles of Canongate, and Anne of Geierstein. First editions, uncut. Condition not fine	£118	0
Wycliffe Bible, MS., in vellum, early 15th-cent. MS.	80	0
Lactantius, on Transmigration, with Liturgies. Sec. XIII.-XIV. MS., on 226 l. of vellum	51	0
Voltaire.—Bataille de Fontenoy. Sixth edition, 1745, corrections and emendations in author's autograph, the word "épreuve" on title	41	0
Morris, William, of University College.—The Harrowing of Hell, 1890. Two printed copies of play, one containing Morris' original MS.	32	0
Trevisa, 1495, printed by Lino Zel, Gothic letter, c. 1470-2	25	0
Stevenson.—An Object of Pity, and Objects of Pity. 1892. (In March £20 was paid for these pieces.)	24	0
Lamb, Charles.—Last Essays of Elia. First edition, 1833, original boards, uncut, with half-title	21	0
Steele, R.—The Christian Hero. First edition, 1701, original calf	18	5
Sec. XIII. MS., on 200 l. of vellum, inserted little engraved "Fragmentum Bibliothecæ Petrarchæ," with annotations perhaps in Petrarch's handwriting	17	0
D'Eon, Chevalier.—Letters, 1764. Walpole's copy, with his MS. additions, autograph letters, portraits, &c.	17	0
Tennyson.—Two autograph letters to Miss Hayward	13	5
Whittington, R.—Mirrour or Glasse of Manners and Wysedome, 1547. (The Huth copy, 1871, brought 24s.)	13	5
Johnson, Samuel.—Autograph prayer, January 1, 1784—eleven months before he died	13	0
Southwell, Rob.—St. Peter's Complaint, 1616. Original limp vellum	13	0
Stevenson.—Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes. Presentation copy, first edition, 1879	12	5
Vermeulen Engravings, the Wittie Companion. Amsterdam, 1679	11	15
Swift.—Gulliver's Travels. First edition, 1726. (In March, 1890, a copy on large paper, separate title-pages, and pagination to each part, made £36.)	11	15
Tusser, R.—The Flowers of Sundrie Gifts, 1547	10	5
Queen Victoria.—Journal of Our Life in the Highlands, 1868. "To dear Jessie Ely in recollection of former happy Days from Victoria Reg. Osborne, July 29, 1868."	10	5
Pantheppam, T.—Certaine Selected Prayers. Original autograph MS., Sec. XVI., of an unpublished work	10	0
Stevenson.—Father Damien, Sydney, 1890. Two MS. corrections on p. 13. (Apparently this same example made £27 5s. on March 1.)	10	0
Kipling.—Kitten de luxe, 24 vols. (20 vols. brought £19 last year.)	9	0
Tennyson.—School Atlas, with pen sketches and names of twenty school-fellows in poet's hand	8	15
Wilde, Oscar.—The Ballad of Reading Gaol, corrected proof sheets. (On May 1 these proofs, with two autograph letters, made £19 15s.)	7	10
Doves Press.—An Address on William Morris, 1891. (Issued a few months ago at 15s.)	3	5

In another kind were portraits, reputedly contemporary, of Sir Hugh Clopton, the builder and one-time owner of New Place, Stratford-on-Avon, and of Lady, wife of Sir William, Clopton. These two pictures realized £200, and a miniature portrait, on ivory, of Shakespeare, £33. They were from the collection of Major W. Clopton-Wingfield. The 1,475 lots dispersed during the six afternoons show an aggregate of £6,210 11s. 6d., this taking eighth place among the totals of the year.

The most notable paper in the Contemporary is the "Diary of the Natal Campaign" by Dr. Raymond Maxwell, a Johannesburg physician who served on the Boer side under the neutrality of the red cross. He tells us how the battles of Dundee, Elandslaagte, Colenso, and Spion Kop looked from the Boer trenches, and occasionally throws fresh light upon an incident previously incomprehensible. Maxim Gorki, whose works are attracting

Correspondenc

THE LIMITATION OF DRAMAT

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am sure your readers must feel the gratitude. I am proud myself to have been the of the amusing article in which Mr. Walkley letter. No man, however, can be all things a If Mr. Walkley's arguments had been conv have amused us less. As they stand in yo ber 7, they win smiles enough, but scarcely t

The real difference between Mr. Walkle to me to lie deeper down than the question w miracles, and the contrast between Christi Christian practice, are or are not fit subjects fo the larger question, What do we go to the th we hope to see some grouping of characters, s opposite views and opinions, some selectio the life around us, which will stir emotion, s and give food for reflection? Or do we contrived patchwork, calculated to tickle cur admiration for the neatness with which it together? For my part, I confess myself o thinking. What is Mr. Walkley's case? akin to that of the policeman who stands at the to keep order. Mr. Walkley, sitting at a pla falls into the frame of mind of an intellectual there to see that dramatic law and order ar infringement of the Code must be at onc proprieties sanctioned by custom must be obs call forth indignant protest, such as Cato and Dante entered into the realm of Purgato

> Son le legge d'abisso così rotte?
> O è mutato in ciel nuovo consiglio

which we may irreverently adapt into theatri

> Are the Pit's laws thus openly tra
> Or have "the Gods" aloft new co

Does a playwright step outside the provinc assigns to him, he is told firmly that th again. Does an unmannerly fellow in the cro against such ruling, Mr. Walkley pelts him belabours him with Lessing and the Laocoon.

Well, I am more than content to be pelt so deftly and wittily, but, after all Mr. Walk I am still impenitent, still contumacious.

> My head is bloody, but unbow

All that Mr. Walkley said with deli week confirmed my opinion that he has fall with the stream of tendency in Drama. The he stood among the sharpshooters of the Now he seems to hold that the time has com quarters. His present mood is that of the ti can look back through the ages and imagine with pathetic insistence upon laws and formu turn of the successive blows that have stru playwright's limbs. He would have repre his innovations in stage arrangement, reb encouraging actors to study rather express condemned Euripides for his realism and his

the moment it quite unhinged his syllogistic faculty. Example: this strange syllogism that he invented to damn my argument.

> Fyfe says the whole of nature is open to the artist's choice.
> "Whitaker's Almanack" is in nature.
> Therefore Fyfe says the artist can make a novel out of "Whitaker's Almanack."

Oh! Mr. Walkley, M.A. Oxon! Oh! Shade of Jowett! Tell it not in Oxford, nor publish it in the courts of Balliol! What does "choice" mean save this—that the good artist is he who knows what materials are fit to use, and the bad artist he who knows not? If I were to say that all edible substances are at Mistress Cook's disposal, Mr. Walkley would, I am afraid, at once ask with triumphant visage whether you could make omelettes out of nutmegs or flavour soup with asafoetida.

Selection and treatment, these are the secrets of the artist's calling; upon these must his success depend. He may seek his subject where he will, but he must choose according to the number of his talents, he must so deal with his material as to make it interesting, and he must recollect that Art is the presentation of passages from life with the object of arousing emotion. The greater the artist, the wider the field of choice over which he may range. Is it impossible that an artist should possess so powerful a mind, so noble an imagination, as to be able to treat even subjects which seem to us to be subjects of "sheer horror and disgust"? No one but Shakespeare could have made a beautiful play out of the subject of Measure for Measure. No one but Shelley has ever dealt poetically with the theme around which The Cenci is constructed. Only a poet of Webster's quality could make The Duchess of Malfi even tolerable. You cannot set limits to the choice of themes in drama any more than you can in other dominions of art.

Nor do I believe Mr. Walkley really means to suggest that you can. All he says, in effect, is that one method of treating themes in fiction is suited to the printed novel, and another method to the acted play. This is undeniable. When he goes on to ask whether the subject of The Comedy of Errors could make a good novel, or the subject of L'Education Sentimentale a good play, he is, I think, confusing subject with treatment. Many novels have been based upon the "exchange of personality" idea—"Vice Versa," for instance, and "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." If Flaubert had possessed the dramatic gift and had decided to exhibit Frédéric Moreau in a drama instead of in a novel, Frédéric and Sophie Arnoux and the rest would have served his purpose equally well. He would merely have been obliged to treat his theme in a different way. When a painter fails, or a sculptor, or a novelist, or a musician, it is not because they have chosen a subject essentially unfit for the artist's handling, but because they have not handled it in an acceptable manner. And the dramatist is in exactly the same case. He knows of no subjects essentially unfit for dramatic treatment. You can say, of course, that he has failed to justify his selection of theme by his manner of treatment, or you can say that some subjects never have been treated by the playwright with good effect. But to go beyond this, and to say they never can be, is to enter the rev[illegible] of prophecy, which is to give a hostage to futurity with [illegible]nce of losing it and being found in a ridiculous position.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

H. HAMILTON FYFE.

Chelsea, December 10.

THE GOSPEL RIOTS AT ATHENS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Hogarth has had better opportunities than I have found it difficult, after a few experiments, to understand or [illegible] myself understood in Crete, Rhodes, Cos, Lesbos, Asia Mi[illegible] the Greek mainland. But that is not the point. I never said [illegible] was only one Romaic dialect; but that a literary genius [illegible] develop a literary modern Greek from the popular speech. C[illegible] found the same varying dialects in England; his speech [illegible] from the Northumbrian as much as any two Greek dialects [illegible] yet he created a literary English, and so might a Greek C[illegible] do. The comic papers, such as that of Souris, are intenti[illegible] vulgar, and they do not express the capacity of Romaic. There is nothing vulgar in the best Greek ballads, su[illegible] instance, as the Bridge of Arta, which I publi[illegible] Folk-Lore for 1898, or many others. I am not con[illegible] with the measure of M. Pallis' success in his Gospels, bu[illegible] the principle. Nor is it, as "W. M." assumes, a quest[illegible] getting rid of foreign words; νερὸ is as truly Greek as [illegible] again, can the Athenian commons be taken into account; [illegible] Athens the influence of the artificial dialect is stronges[illegible] everybody is more or less affected by it. The Byzantine [illegible] is not a bad parallel; and a fearsome dialect it is. Precis[illegible] same results as we see in Byzantium, the loss of sim[illegible] the divorce of feeling from words, must come about in prop[illegible] as the modern Greek does violence to the natural meth[illegible] expression.

But, Sir, it is easy to test one of the rivals. I gave examples from the prospectus of a society which believes [illegible] to be moderate; take up any Greek newspaper, and y[illegible] find plenty more. Here is the first sentence of the first Ac[illegible] I lay hands on:—τὸ ζήτημα τῆς ἐκ τοῦ φρενοκομείου ἀποδράσε[illegible] ἰατροῦ κ. Κ. Ὀρνοτάκιν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀπλοῦ τυπικοῦ ζητήματος καὶ τοῦ τ[illegible] ἀδελφικοῦ, ἤρχισε νὰ προσλαμβάνῃ μετὰ τὰς σημερινὰς ἀποκαλύ[illegible] διασπάσεις ἀσυνήθους σεισμόδλον, οὗτινος ἡ μελέτη καὶ ἡ ἔρευνα τρ[illegible] στραφῇ ἀλλοῦ καὶ οὐχὶ κατὰ τῆς φιλαδέλφων γυναικοῦ, ἥτις μὲ τρυφ[illegible] ἀγγελικήν, μὲ θάρρος τὸ ὀστοῖον μόνον ἡ ἀλήθεια, ἡ διαιωνίζ[illegible] φιλανθρωπία ἐμπνέουν ἀπήλλαξε μιᾶς βασάνου ἄνθρωπον οὐδὲ ἔχο[illegible] φρένας ἐγκλεισθέντα δ' ἐν τῷ φρενοκομείῳ τίς οἶδεν ἔνεκα τίνος μισ[illegible] ἀκριβῶς ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ, οὗτινος οὐδένος τὴν προστασίαν ἐγκ[illegible] πατρικὴ οἰκογένεια. Shades of Plato and Sophocles! What [illegible] have we here? Did any one ever see such a string of geni[illegible] What is the upshot of it? The Greek would, perhaps, [illegible] stand most of the nouns; but he does not know ἥτις and οὗτ[illegible] says τοῦ for these and for τὸ ὀστοῖον, he uses ἀπὸ with the accus[illegible] he never brackets phrases between article and noun, the[illegible] ἀποδράσεως, ἀσυνήθους, ἔχοντα, and ἐγκλεισθέντα would be un[illegible] to him, he uses no augment with ἀπήλλαξε and ἤρχισε. Th[illegible] word reminds me that in conversation with a Greek M.[illegible] year, who used the most stilted expressions, I used the [illegible] form, thinking it would probably suit him; but he di[illegible] understand me until I had repeated my sentence with [illegible] It is absurd to call this jargon a style, or to think it h[illegible] literary possibilities. English manuals of chemistry are [illegible] And, as I have shown, in conversation the words which p[illegible] a printed book are often unintelligible. The particles [illegible] δέ are found in no spoken dialect; here they are ramp[illegible] newspapers. In common speech δέ is often used for δέν, "[illegible] are we not to know whether the speaker means yes or no? [illegible] participles have disappeared, leaving only one of the form [illegible] indeclinable like the Italian gerund. But enough; giv[illegible] space, and I will not leave the purists a leg to stand on.

Yours faithfully,

W. H. D. ROU[illegible]

"SHAMELA."

Before his 'Joseph Andrews' (hints and names taken from that story with a lewd and ungenerous engraftment) the poor man wrote without being read."

This may not be absolutely conclusive evidence, but written, as it was, a few years after the publication of the parody, and speaking of the authorship as an undisputed fact, it is, I think, a fair justification for assuming that Fielding was the author.

Faithfully yours,

ETHEL M. M. McKENNA.

22, Portland-place, W., Dec. 7th.

AUSTRALIAN VERSE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It is difficult to keep up an argument at such long range as this, but Mr. Canney's letter in your issue of Oct. 19 deserves a word or two of reply.

His claim to speak for the bushman of to-day, because he spent "some years" in the bush more than eight years ago, is self-refuting for any one who knows how easy it is to lose touch with Australia. But his quotations alone would condemn him. The sonnet is "pretty" enough, but it is no Australian's talk; the whole phraseology is modelled on what was then thought correct in English versifying. And Gordon's Dedication, fascinating as it may be to the romantic globe-trotter, is a libel on the country he tried to describe, for Australia has song-birds to match most English ones, and her flowers are more delicately, not less sweetly, scented than ours.

Gordon explained a good deal of Australia to its native-born no doubt; but he did not, and does not "voice" them, for he did not speak their tongue.

For my own part, after eighteen years spent almost entirely up-country in four colonies, I do not claim to speak emphatically or authoritatively for the Australian-born, and this letter (like my article) is a "personal view." But I am ready to take the judgment of my mates on it.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

Lucknow, Nov. 18, 1901. ARTHUR W. JOSE.

Books to look out for at once.

"A History of the Meynell Hounds and Country, 1780 to 1901." By J. L. Randall. Sampson Low. £2 2s. net.

[Photogravure plates and other illustrations.]

"The National Portrait Gallery." Edited by Lionel Cust. Cassell. £6 6s. n.

[Uniform with "The National Gallery."]

"Scottish Men of Letters of the Eighteenth Century." By the Rev. H. Grey Graham. A. and C. Black. 18s.

"Art Sales of the Year." Compiled and Annotated by J. H. Slater. Virtue. 30s. net.

[A record of the prices obtained at auction for pictures and prints sold during 1901—a companion volume to "Book Prices Current."]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS,

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

ART.

HOLBEIN'S PICTURES AT WINDSOR CASTLE. By Ernest Law. 20½×15½. 32pp. 1641.

[Note the inches of measurement. This fine volume is a companion volume to Mr. Law's book on Vandyck's pictures in the Castle. It contains ten large photogravures of portrait paintings, with introductions and notes on the pictures. It does not touch the drawings.]

BIOGRAPHY.

HALL CAINE. By C. Fred Kenyon. (English 7½×5½, 224 pp. Greening. 3s. 6d.

[A readable biography by an enthusiast English writer past or present who evinces so sympathy with all mankind as does Hall Caine."

BY ALLAN WATER. The True Story of an Old H Stewart. 8½×6, 310 pp. Andrew Elliot (Edin

[Adopts the original plan of tracing the fo two Scottish families (1632—1783) from parish weaving the history and changes in social manne

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF SIR HARRY SMITH addition of some supplementary chapters, by M.A. 9×6, 381+431 pp. Murray. 24s. n.

[Reminiscences of the Peninsular War, the C the Waterloo Campaign, and various Kaffir wars.

REMINISCENCES OF A LONG LIFE. By W. D. 294 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

[Dr. Killen is President of Belfast Pres nonagenarian "well acquainted with all the m Presbyterian Church."]

MARY BOYLE, HER BOOK. Edited by Sir Cou 8½×6, 282pp. Murray. 10s. 6d. n.

[Reminiscences of Court and social life teenth century to about 1860, introducing Dick Landor, &c., with illustrations. Edited by the late Sir Courtenay, and, after his death, by Lad

BOOKS FOR THE YOUN

VALOUR FOR VICTORIA. By James A. Manson. 1s. 6d.

[A dozen Victoria Cross stories, includin Boer war.]

THE BOYS OF ST. ELMO'S. By Alfred T. S Newnes. 3s. 6d.

[A story of camping out on the Coast of Wa

TALES OF THE SPANISH MAIN. By Mown 357 pp. Macmillan. 6s.

[The story of the discovery of the New Eldorado, the buccaneers, &c. With illustratio JOAN'S TRIP TO THE WEST. With five illust 9×7, 108 pp. The Chiswick Press. 2s.

[A pleasant story telling how Joan with h York; of her disillusionments, and of her tr American ways.]

LEM. A New England Village Boy. By N. Bu Newnes. 5s.

[A well-illustrated story for boys.]

TALES OF GREYHOUSE. By R. S. Warren Newnes. 3s. 6d.

[A school story with plenty of fighting, ending with a storming of the school by strikers

BEAUTIFUL MAMMA AND OTHER STORI Graham. 7½×5½, 253 pp. Newnes. 3s. 6d.

[These are delightful stories about, rather tales of social life in which a child is the hero by a true child lover; and also well illustrated.

THE COWSLIP. Stories in Verse. (New Ed Poems. By Mary Elliott. (New Edition.) T By J. E. M. (New Edition.) THE DAISY. St Williams. (New Edition.) THE THREE W WOMAN AND HER PIG. 6×3¾. Cornish (

[Neat little reprints of those early Nineteen rhymes with the old-fashioned wood-cut illustrat

HAND AND HEART, 1901. 10×7½, 240 pp. ing Office.

CLASSICAL.

ANECDOTA OXONIENSA. Classical Series. Part I C.M.G. 9×8, 62 pp. The Clarendon Press. 7s

[Collations from the Codex Cluniacensis s. century MS. of Cicero in Lord Leicester's Libra

DRAMA.

KIARTAN THE ICELANDER. A Tragedy. By 7½×5½, 107 pp. Dent. 4s. 6d. n.

ECONOMICS AND SOCIOLOG

PRINCIPLES OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. Vol. III. 9½×6. 441 pp. A. and C. Black. 1

[This is the concluding volume of the wor

EDUCATIONAL.

BOYS AND GIRLS OF OTHER DAYS. By JOHN FINNEMORE. 7×4¾, 215 pp. Black. 1s. 6d.
[A reader for upper standards.]

HISTOIRE DE BAYARD. Abrégée et modernisée. Par W. G. HARTOG, 7½×4½, 73+xxiii. pp. Black. 1s. 6d.
[With a vocabulary and a very few notes.]

NORTH AMERICA. Selected and edited by F. D. HERBERTSON, B.A., and A. J. HERBERTSON, Ph.D. 7×4¾, 252 pp. Black. 2s.
[A reader selected from the works of travellers in all parts of North America.]

THE JOURNAL OF EDUCATION—1901. 12×9, 812 pp. William Rice. 7s. 6d.

NATIONAL EDUCATION. Edited by LAURIE MAGNUS. 9×6, 300pp. 7s. 6d. n.
[A "symposium" dealing with the various educational questions by Professor H. E. Armstrong, Sir Joshua Fitch, Professor Hewins, Mr. Storr, Mr. Eve, and others, with a bibliographical note by the editor.]

SCHOOLS AT HOME AND ABROAD. By R. E. HUGHES. 7½×5½, 314pp. Sonnenschein. 4s. 6d.
[Addresses, delivered before various audiences, on the English and Continental systems.]

DOMESTIC ECONOMY. By ETHEL R. LUSH. 7×4½, 251 pp. Macmillan. 2s. 6d.
[This is briefer and somewhat less closely scientific than the Cambridge University Press Manual recently published. It is written "for scholarship and certificate students." It is very clearly printed and arranged, and is well illustrated. A good book for private study, with questions at the end of the chapters.]

FICTION.

A CORNER IN BALLYREG. By N. P. MURPHY. 7¾×5, 256 pp. J. Long. 3s. 6d.
[Sketches of Irish Life, many reprinted from magazines.]

RAY FARLEY. By J. MOFFAT and E. DRUCE. 7¾×5¼, 295 pp. Unwin. 6s.
["A Comedy of Country Life" (in England), giving part of the "life story" of Mr. Ray Farley, Scholar and Millionaire.]

BACK TO LILAC LAND. 7¾×5¼, 320 pp. Greening. 6s.
[An agreeable story of theatrical life in London, and of the separation and subsequent reconciliation of an actor and his wife.]

THE APOSTLES OF THE SOUTH EAST. By FRANK T. BULLEN. 7¾×5¼, 331 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.
[A study of life in south-east London, from real characters.]

A FURY IN WHITE VELVET. By H. COMPTON. 7½×5, 230 pp. Treherne. 1s. n.
[A briskly told and original story of the search for a snow leopard in the Himalayas, and an Englishman's love for an Indian girl of high caste.]

LA PRINCESSE LÉNA. By MARKEVITCH. 7½×4¾, 320 pp. Paris, 1901. Ollendorff. 3fr. 50c.
[The introduction to Frenchmen of a new Russian writer, translated for M. Ollendorff's series of "The Great Foreign Novelists." Decidedly worth reading.]

THE REAL WORLD. By ROBERT HERRICK. 7¾×5¼, 358pp. Macmillan. 6s.
[American life on the coast of Maine, in Boston, New York, &c.]

MY OWN DEATH. By "Limbo." 7¾×5¼, 272pp. Drane. 6s.
[A rather well-told story of the adventures about the world of the spirit of a young baronet after death. Before his funeral he elects to return to life.]

FOLKLORE AND ANTHROPOLOGY.

THE AINU AND THEIR FOLKLORE. By the Rev. J. BATCHELOR, F.R.G.S. 8¾×5½, 594 pp. R. T. S. 7s. 6d. n.
[The author wrote "The Ainu of Japan" in 1889 and since then has been engaged in missionary work among this race, the aborigines of Japan, and treats fully of their customs and religion, with many illustrations. After January 1 the price will be 10s. 6d. n.]

HISTORY.

STUDIES IN HISTORY AND JURISPRUDENCE. By JAMES BRYCE, D.C.L. Two vols. 9×6, 553+525 pp. The Clarendon Press. 25s. n.
[Substantial volumes on the principles and history of law and politics, with chapters on the Constitutions of the U.S.A., of the Australian Commonwealth, and of the South African Republics.]

THE FOUNDATION OF BRITISH EAST AFRICA. By J. W. GREGORY, D.Sc. 8½×5½. 270 pp. Horace Marshall. 6s. n.
[Relates the principal events in the history of the country down to the appointment of Sir Harry Johnston as Commissioner of Uganda in 1890. Maps and photographs.]

LITERATURE AND BELLES-LETTRES.

PERSIAN LOVE SONGS. Edited by J. POTTER BATESON (Bibelots.) 5×3, 157 pp. Gay and Bird. 2s. 6d. n.
[Mainly from Miss Costello's Rose Garden of Persia (1894) an introduction explaining Suffism, &c.]

PÈRE GORIOT. A New Translation. (Turner Home Classics.) 390 pp. Virtue. 2s. n.

MILITARY.

SEPOY GENERALS. Wellington to Roberts. By G. W. F. C.I.E. 8×5½, 466 pp. Blackwood. 6s.
[From Wellington to Roberts. Studies resulting from the work as Ex-Director of Records.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

COMMENTS OF A COUNTESS. 8½×5¾, 195 pp. Duckworth.
[Light and amusing chatter about social life and manners The Outlook.]

PHIL MAY'S ILLUSTRATED WINTER ANNUAL, 1901-1902. H. THOMPSON. 8½×6½, 94 pp. Thacker. 1s.

LOVE, COURTSHIP, AND MARRIAGE. By the Rev. E. J. 198 pp. Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d.
[Light papers by the author of "How to be Happy Married," and in the same style.]

WHITAKER'S ALMANACK, 1902. 2s. 6d. n.
[This invaluable book of reference has been reset from n The accession of the King and the military honours of the y necessitated many changes, and there are new sections devot Australian Commonwealth, the census, submarine boats, local the housing of the poor, &c.]

DEBRETT'S PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, AND KNIGHTAG 8½×6. 1,112pp. Dean. 31s. 6d.

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE BOOK OF BULBS. By S. ARSCOTT. (Handbooks of Gardening, Vol. 5). 7¾×5½, 111 pp. Lane. 2s. 6d. n.
[Carries on the character of this useful and practical litt Photographs.]

THE LIVING ANIMALS OF THE WORLD. Vol. I.—Manuals. CORNISH, &c. 11½×8¾, 384 pp. Hutchinson. 14s.
[An interesting and popular work (so far issued in Copiously illustrated by admirable photographs. The first volumes.]

POETRY.

POEMS. By ARTHUR SYMONS. 2 vols. 8¾×5¾. 210+227 pp. mann. 10s. n.
[A revised edition of Mr. Symons' poems, with a new c entitled "The Loom of Dreams."]

THE WAY OF THE WILDERNESS. By R. PICKTHALL. 8× Elliot Stock. 3s.
[Ten poems in a graceful lyrical vein.]

TURQUOISE AND IRON. By LIONEL JOSAPHARE. 7¾×5½ Stevens and Brown.
[Poems by an American, sometimes strong and orig unequal in musical quality and rather rhetorical.]

IN LOVE'S GARDEN. By L. M. WATT. 6½×4½, 47 pp. Dent.
[A little slim book of picturesque and musical lyrics.]

THE GARDEN OF KAMA. By LAURENCE HOPE. 8½×6, 174 pp mann.
[Lyrics inspired by Indian life and legend.]

LATER POEMS. By ALICE MEYNELL. 7½×4½, 37 pp. Lane.

POLITICAL.

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF LORD ROSEBERY. 9½×6½, 8
[Reprinted from the Contemporary Review of July and 1901, with excerpts from Lord Rosebery's speeches.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE DUAL LAND. 8×5¾, 426 pp. Elliot Stock. 5s.
[A cheaper edition of this Anthology of Poetry "bereaved."]

THOUGHTS FOR THE SUNDAYS OF THE YEAR. By t Rev. H. C. G. MOULE, D.D., Bishop of Durham. 7½× R.T.S.
[Fourth Edition. Most came originally from the Sunday

BARCHESTER TOWERS. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. Ed. Thorold. 6×3¾, 737 pp. Lane. 1s. 6d.
[A capital little reprint in dark green cloth.]

SHAKESPEARE'S TOWN AND TIMES. By H. SNOWDEN W

DAN LENO. His Books. Written by Himself. 7½×4½. 128 pp. Greening. 6d.

WARWICK EDITION OF GEORGE ELIOT. 6½×4½. IMPRESSIONS OF THEOPHRASTUS SUCH, and ESSAYS AND LEAVES FROM A NOTE-BOOK. 367 pp. THE SPANISH GYPSY and THE LEGEND OF JUBAL, &c. 695 pp. Blackwood. 2s. n. each.

THE LIBRARY EDITION OF GEORGE ELIOT. Vol. VIII. DANIEL DERONDA. 9½×6½. 580 pp. Blackwood. 10s. 6d.

SCIENCE.

THE EXPERIMENTAL STUDY OF GASES. By M. W. TRAVERS. 8½×6½. 320 pp. Macmillan. 10s. n.

SPORT.

EVERYBODY'S BOOK OF THE DOG. By P. GRESHAM. 5½×4½. 134 pp. W. R. Russell. 6d.

[A little clean red book with photographs. Described as "The Dog-Keeper's Vade Mecum."]

WILD SPORT IN THE OUTER HEBRIDES. By C. V. A. PELL. 8½×5½. 133 pp. Robinson. 7s. 6d. n.

[Many kinds of sport, including seal-shooting. Many and excellent photographs.]

THEOLOGY.

ST. LUKE THE PROPHET. By E. C. SELWYN, D.D. 7½×5½. 378 pp. Macmillan. 9s. 6d. n.

[This is a sequel to the author's "Christian Prophets" and is designed to show that St. Luke belonged to the order of Christian Prophets, that he is identical with Silas, that he wrote, for St. Peter, the second Epistle of Peter, and acted as mediator between St. Paul and St. Peter.]

THE STORY OF STORIES. By R. C. GILLIE. 8½×6½. 428 pp. Black. 6s.

[A life of Christ written for children. Profusely illustrated by reproductions of famous pictures.]

THE GOSPEL STORY OF JESUS CHRIST. By IDA W. HUTCHINSON. 7½×5½. 142 pp. Dent.

[A selection from the A.V., arranged as a continuous narrative and printed like an ordinary book. For the young. Good illustrations by Mr. Patten Wilson.]

THIRSTING FOR THE LIVING WATERS. By R. TRIMMER. 7½×5, 141 pp. Skeffington. 2s. 6d.

[Sermons by the late Canon Trimmer of Guildford, edited by his son.]

SUNDAY AFTERNOON PRAYERS. Collected from the British Weekly. 7½×5½. 132 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 3s. 6d.

[An elegantly-printed collection of short prayers of uniform length, unclassified.]

TWELVE SERMONS ON GRACE ABOUNDING. By C. H. SPURGEON. 8½×5½, 208 pp. THE METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE PULPIT containing Sermons by C. H. SPURGEON. 8½×5½, pp. 517-576. Passmore and Alabaster. 5d. Paper bound.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE BIBLE. By Mrs. BRIGHTWEN. 7½×5, 156 pp. R.T.S. 2s. n.

[Mrs. Brightwen has made a collection of Oriental Curios, and now writes popular notes about them in illustration of Scripture customs, with pictures. An instructive little book.]

THE USE OF SARUM. II. The Ordinal and Tonal. Edited by W. H. FRERE. 9½×5½, 236 pp. Cambridge University Press. 12s. n.

[Giving the original texts edited from the MSS., with full introduction.]

THE CHILDREN OF NAZARETH. By É. LE CAMUS, ÉVÊQUE DE LA ROCHELLE. Translated by Lady Herbert. 8½×6½, 131 pp. T. and T. Clark. 6s.

[An account for children, with photographs, of child life at Nazareth to-day.]

THE TEMPLE BIBLE. LEVITICUS. Edited by J. A. PATERSON. 5½×4½, 103 pp. The Gospels according to ST. MATTHEW and ST. MARK. Edited by the Very Rev. the DEAN OF ELY. 5½×4½, 104 pp.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

IN SICILY. By DOUGLAS SLADEN. 2 vols. 10½×8, 417+528pp. Sands. £3 3s. n.

[A sumptuous work, well illustrated.]

JAPAN. A Record in Colour by MORTIMER MENPES; Transcribed by Dorothy Menpes. 9×6½, 207 pp. A. and C. Black. 20s. n.

[Mr. Menpes' impressions of the life in Japan, recorded by his daughter, with copious and beautiful illustrations in water colour by Mr. Menpes.]

THE GUIDE TO SOUTH AFRICA. Edited by A. SAMPER BROWN and G. CAMPBELL BROWN. Ninth Edition. 7½×5, 475 pp. Sampson Low. 2s. 6d.

THATCHAM, BERKS, AND ITS MANORS. By the late [illegible]

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing Ho

PROBLEM No. 279, by H. BUCHMANN, Germany.

BLACK 10 pieces.

WHITE 11 pieces.

White to play and mate in two moves.

PROB
Dr. PA
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play

PROBLEM No. 280, by R. L'Hermet.—K at Q R 4; R at Q 8; pawn at K 7. B Three moves.

PROBLEM No. 281, by C. Hartlaub.—K at K 3; Q at Q Kt 7; pawn at Q 7. Blac moves.

PROBLEM No. 282, by Otto Würzburg, Gr (7 pieces) K at Q Kt 8; Q at Q B 2; R at Q 4 and Q R 6; Kts at K B 4 and K 3. Bl K Kt 6; B at K Kt 7; Kts at K Kt 2 and K B 3, K B 6, and Q Kt 2. Mate in three

M. Janowski on "British Chess" in an by Lasker recently at Manchester, M. alia:—I had announced my intended visit beforehand. I must confess, to my regret, t disappointed. Of course, you know that Club has the reputation of being the leadin manner of my reception in that club was qui one of its members seemed to take any inte I nearly had the impression of being in no c was only asked to play Kriegspiel or whist. in the North where I found such cordial great interest in chess. I am very gl Manchester. The manner of my reception at t Club and, in fact, by all chess players wh have made here, has quite delighted me. quite depressed after my cold reception i Club. We quite understand M. Janowski's impressions need not be taken too literally.

GAME No. CXV.—Played in the match St. George's and Manchester:—

QUEEN'S GAMBIT DECLINE

WHITE. A. J. Mackenzie.	BLACK. F. C. Carroll.	WHI A. J. Mack
1. P–Q 4	P–Q 4	19. K–R 1
2. P–Q B 4	P–K 4	20. P–B 5 (e)
3. P×K P	P–Q 5	21. Q–Kt 3
4. P–Q R 3	Kt–Q B 3	22. Q R–Q 1
5. Kt–K B 3	Q B–Kt 5	23. R–Q 7
6. Q Kt–Q 2	P–Q R 4	24. R–Q 1
7. P–R 3 (a)	B×Kt	25. K×P
8. Kt×B	B–B 4	26. K–R 1
9. Q–Kt 3 (b)	K Kt–K 2	27. P–R 4
10. P–K 3 (c)	Castles	28. P×B
11. P–P	Kt×Q P	29. Q×R ch
12. Q–Q 3	Kt–Kt 3	30. B–B 3
13. Kt–Kt	Kt×P	31. Q R–Q 1
14. Q–B 2	B×Kt	32. R×R
15. B–K 2	P–K B 4 (d)	33. K×Q
16. B–B 4	P–K Kt 4	34. R–K 1
17. B×Kt	B×B	35. P–K 6
18. Castles	P–Kt 5

NOTES BY MR. MACKENZIE.

(a) If Kt–Kt 3, B×Kt; 8. Kt P×B, P–R 5; followed by Kt–P. 6. P–Q 4 allows of B–Q R 4.

(b) To enable the K P to advance; but

BLACK.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 218. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 569, 570, 571

CHARLES DICKENS—

Dickens in Memory—A "Personal View," by George Gissing 572

Dickens—His Life and Writings 576

Dickens and His Illustrators 581

Dickens Topography 582

The Various Editions of Dickens 583

THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 584

CURRENT LITERATURE—

Annals of Christ's Hospital 587

The Roman Theocracy and the Republic 587

The Velvet Glove—Christopher Deane—The Shoes of Fortune—My Brilliant Career—The Marriage of Mr. Molyneux—Captain Landon—Memory Street—Sister Carrie—The Cavalier—Antonia—Circumstance—Bergen Worth—The Continental Dragoon—They that Took the Sword—In Our County—Lords of the North 588, 589

LIBRARY NOTES 590

CORRESPONDENCE—"Shamela" (Mr. Austin Dobson)—The Gospel Riots at Athens (Mr. D. G. Hogarth)—'Varsity Journalism (Mr. R. Ellis Roberts) 590, 591

BOOKS TO LOOK OUT FOR 591

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 591, 592

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON.

* * * *

Lovers of Dickens will note with interest the five portraits of the novelist which we are able to present with this issue—one of them in a photogravure plate—and which have never before been seen by the public. Of the other illustrations the larger number are taken from "Pictorial Pickwickiana" and from the pamphlet "Charles Dickens; some Notes on his Life and Writings"; and for permission to reproduce them we are indebted to the courtesy of Messrs. Chapman and Hall. Those from the former volume are marked [A], those from the latter [B].

* * * *

Books to read just published:—

"Types of Naval Officers." By A. T. Mahan. Sampson Low, Marston.

"Palaces, Prisons, and Resting-Places of Mary Queen of Scots." By M. M. Shoemaker. Virtue.

"Kiartan, the Icelander": a Tragedy. By Newman Howard. Dent.

"Confessions of a Caricaturist." By Harry Furniss. Fisher Unwin.

* * * *

With very few exceptions, Charles Dickens bequeathed the original MSS. of his important works to John F[illegible] from the printed version. Messrs. Sotheran bought the of this minor work for £400, though in 1884 a Lond valued it at no more than £160. Even trifles in this worth literally much more than their weight in g Instance, £35 was paid for a single 4to. page of an unp "Travesty of Othello," penned in 1832-33, and deemed t earliest preserved dramatic composition by Dickens. A three-and-a-half pp. 4to., "Mrs. Gamp with the Strolling P fetched £78 15s.; the original agreements between Dicke Macrone, and Chapman and Hall for the publication of "S by Boz," £20; similar agreements relating to "Pic "Nicholas Nickleby," and the second series of

CHARLES DICKENS, 1838.
From a Sketch by SAMUEL LAWRENCE respectively £39, £26, and £27; and, on November 21, "Holiday Romance," 1868, for long supposed to appeared, £105.

* * * *

originally issued, that the two suppressed plates by Buss are not essential, and that one only of the twenty wrappers need be preserved. As a fact, the difference in value between a set bound with one wrapper only, and lacking the Buss plates, and another set, unbound, in parts as originally issued, may be approximately indicated as that between £10 and £90.

* * * *

Perhaps the most interesting set of "Pickwick" original numbers in existence was that bought for America, on June 13, 1899, forming part of the unexampled Dickens collection brought together by Mr. William Wright, well-known in sporting circles. The first fourteen numbers were presented to "Mary Hogarth. From her's Affy., Charles Dickens." The recipient died suddenly on May 7, 1837, and so profound was Dickens' grief that for two months the effort of writing was impossible, and the publication of "Pickwick" interrupted. This identical set was taken some years ago to a Reading bookseller with the request that the parts might be cheaply bound for nursery use. In 1899, against an issue value of £1, the series realized 100gns. On the same day in 1899, a presentation copy of "The Village Coquettes," 1836, uncut, in original grey boards, initially priced at under a shilling, if we mistake not, brought £36 10s.; "Sketches by Boz," complete in original parts, 1839, £46, against a published price of £1, while another example fetched £36 last year; the editio princeps of "The Strange Gentleman," 1837, containing, however, the original drawing of the frontispiece by "Phiz," and with remarks in Dickens' autograph, £84; a presentation copy to Mr. Serjeant Talfourd, of "Oliver Twist," 1838, first edition, £50; the editio princeps of "Nicholas Nickleby," with inscription to "J. P. Harley" and an autograph letter, £69; the earliest issue, 1842, of "American Notes for General Circulation," to "Thomas Carlyle from Charles Dickens, Nineteenth October, 1842," having, too, the signature of Carlyle, £61; the "Christmas Carol," 1843, the earliest issue, given by the author to Mr. Henry Austin, £71; and a unique example, by reason of certain details, of "The Chimes," 1845, £66. This last has an unpublished drawing by Leech which shows a dissipated Trotty Veck. The mistake was evidently discovered by Dickens prior to publication, for the plate was altered.

* * * *

Relics associated with the novelist are greatly prized. The copy of the "Highland Journal," presented to Dickens by Queen Victoria, who inscribed the novelist's name therein, fetched, in 1893, 30gns.; on November 22, 1899, it made 100gns., and, we believe, is now in the library of Mr. Henry Dickens, K.C. A petty cash book kept by Dickens when he was in the office of Mr. Edward Blackmore, lawyer, Lincoln's-inn-fields, the first entry dated January 5, 1828, has realized £95 under the hammer—13s. 6d. a week was the salary he then received; the despatch box, alluded to in Forster's "Life," vol. 3, p. 364, £48; and a sun-dial, fixed on the top of a stone column made of one of the balustrades of old Rochester Bridge, from the garden at Gadshill, £48.

* * * *

Some time ago the foundation of a "Boz Club" in London was notified in the Press. Its establishment was due to that well-known and learned student of Dickens, Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, who has just published an interesting account and commentary on the famous trial "Bardell v. Pickwick" (Office Stock, 6s.). The Club's headquarters were at the summer. Its members, according to the list whi has kindly sent us, are as follows, those marked known Charles Dickens personally:—*Lord (President), *the Marquis of Dufferin and Rosebery, Lord Acton, *Lord Brampton, *Ham

Austin (Poet Laureate), Very Rev. Dean Bradl
minster), Hon. Judge Bompas, K.C., *Sir Squ
Professor T. Bonney, F.R.S., Augustine Birre
Burnand, Oscar Browning, *Arthur à Beck
Baynham, *Francisco Berger, Sir J. Crichton
Sir Robert Cunliffe, Bart., Professor J. Churt
Brudenell Carter, F.R.C.S., *Henry Fieldin
*Edward Dicey, C.B., Frederick T. Dalton, *
*William P. Frith, R.A., *William Farrow (Pr Club, Birmingham), *Otto Goldschmidt, Georg Percival Graves, Robert Holmes (King's Li
*John Hollingshead, George Herbert, *Very
*Sir Henry Irving, *Frederick A. Inder
Hubert Jerningham, K.C.M.G., Jerome K.
Kent, *Frederick G. Kitton, Sir Joseph
K.C.B., F.R.S., Andrew Lang, Sir Lewis Mor
Right Hon. Mr. Justice Madden, *Right
Otway, Bart., Walter Herries Pollock, M.A.,
*Joseph C. Parkinson, *Marcus Stone, R.
*George Storey, A.R.A., Alexander Innes S Sterry, Hon. William Warren Vernon, *
Drummond Wolff, G.C.B., K.C.M.G., W. Sackville West, Rev. Francis Waugh, M. and the Honorary Secretary, *Percy Fitzgera

* * *

On Saturday last Messrs. Sotheby sold seve graph letters, &c. Five from Dr. Johnson to M
the longest and most important dated fro
£46 15s.; one from Boswell to Johnson, Ed 1772—in which he says: "I am convinced push you for a private correspondence wit must therefore look upon you as a Founta whence few rills are communicated to a dis one from Garrick to Mrs. Thrale, £14; and a "American Rights and Wrongs," in Steve £14 5s., (bought for America). In the sam
117 examples by the Guild of Women Bo Hampstead Bindery, protecting volumes mo brought £1,203 odd, against about £720 for December 10, 1900. For £310 there was k
Service book on vellum, designed, written,
Mr. Frank Harding after study of splendid p and 14th century scribes and illuminators.
apart from designing, is said to have occupied and at £310 this was recompensed at abou
Before the sale, his Majesty the King bo elaborately bound books. Five supplement aggregate of £54, comprised two water-colour Frederick, a portrait of the King by E. T presentments in water-colour of Queen Vi Albert by R. J. Lane and Sir W. C. Ross.

* * *

Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin, the well-known are publishing a new edition of the novels o ing 600 steel engravings and etchings, in tw at a cost of six shillings each, with an i E. P. Whipple. The standard English autho losing their hold on the American public, announce a complete edition of Shelley w sketch and notes by Professor Woodberry, of their tour in the Colonies, will shortly publish an account of his impressions and observations.

Among the literary men who obtained votes for the Nobel prize are, Ibsen and Tolstoy with three votes each; Mistral, Sienkiewicz, Ossip-Lourié, and Hauptmann with two votes each; and Rostand and d'Annunzio with one vote each.

Mr. Zangwill addressed a meeting at the Shoreditch Town-hall last Saturday night in support of the Zionist movement.

Only one or two books remain to be published before the end of the year. One of an interesting kind is "The Lady Poverty," which Mr. Murray is bringing out—the first translation into English of a thirteenth-century allegory, which was the first book ever written about St. Francis of Assisi, and was completed within a year of the saint's death. The busiest publishers at the present moment are those in charge of the new edition of the Prayer-book, who are working night and day to cope with the demand. The new edition came in the nick of time for the Christmas season, and everybody seems bent on buying a copy as a present for somebody else.

Publishing will begin again in earnest on the first day of the New Year, when George Sand's "Mauprat," in Mr. Heinemann's "Century of French Romance," with an introduction by Mrs. Craigie, will appear. Mr. Murray will also have the fifth volume of poetry ready shortly in his new edition of Byron, which will leave the sixth volume—containing "Don Juan"—to complete the work in the spring, the final volume of the letters having already been published. Another interesting reprint which Mr. Murray has in hand is Professor Baldwin Brown's book on "The Fine Arts"—an old "University Extension" volume, which is being entirely reprinted and brought up to date. It is worth noting, too, that the title of the new work by Professor E. B. Tylor, announced by Mr. Murray under the title of "The Natural History of Religion," has been changed to "Animism: A Treatise on the Natural History of Religion." The volume is based on the Gifford Lectures, delivered in Aberdeen in 1889-90 and 1890-91. Canon Moberly's volume of sermons, entitled "Christ our Life," is expected early in the year.

Mr. Murray also has two anonymous novels in the press for early publication, one being entitled "High Treason"—a story of the Jacobite days—and the other "The Trial of Man: An Allegorical Romance." Another volume which he may have ready next month is Mr. Basil Thomson's "Savage Island: An Account of a Mission to Niué and Tonga, in the Pacific Ocean," describing the negotiations which led to the establishment of a British Protectorate over these latest additions to the Empire. The book is, to some extent, a sequel to Mr. Thomson's "Diversions of a Prime Minister," and is said to contain much native lore which is new to anthropologists. January, too, should see the publication of Miss Rickards' memoir of "Felicia Skene, of Oxford"—whose friendship with Scott is recorded in the dedication to the 4th canto of "Marmion"; an illustrated volume on "Greek Coins and their Parent Cities," by Mr. John Ward; and the "Speeches and Correspondence of Henry, 4th Earl of Carnarvon, on the Affairs of British North America," edited by Sir Robert Herbert.

The volume on "Cromwell on Foreign Affairs," which the Cambridge University Press is about to publish, has been written under the conviction that the speech with which it mainly deals, though delivered some 240 years ago, "may appear to some of us to contain infinitely more significant matter than can be found in the political speeches of the present day." The author, Mr. F. W. Payn, wishes to show the true meaning of the Anglophobia in Germany. "At a time when the English Press," he writes in his preface, "is slowly recovering from a severe attack of Kaiser-mania (brought about by a cleverly-timed visit to this country), it is as well occasionally to look ugly facts in the face." The volume also contains essays on "Neutral Trade in Arms and Ships"; "Intervention Among States"; "The Burning of Boer Farms and the Bombarding of Coast Towns"; "The Extent of Territorial Waters," and "Nelson and the Admiralty."

mate fashion, correspond with the history of Chri[illegible] institutions. Originally Christmas day was only, or [illegible] religious anniversary, suggesting few of the ideas [illegible] modern times. But the religious observances of [illegible] Church—a Church which frankly recognized the pole[illegible] promise—became gradually not wholly untainted with [illegible] elations of the pagan Saturnalia, giving a spiritual [illegible] as it were, to various indulgences of a more worldly [illegible] Against this the Puritans revolted, with the result that [illegible] as a social and even a religious festival passed under [illegible] Then, in the early Victorian period, came the literary [illegible] Christmas, which our special Dickens number, appear[illegible] beginning of the Christmas season, naturally invit[illegible] remember. It was a revival which had only the mo[illegible] and indirect connexion with religion. The traditio[illegible] Saturnalia were the traditions that really appealed to [illegible] who had little in common with his religious contem[illegible] whether Tractarians or Revivalists, but had a riche[illegible] high spirits than any other novelist that the world [illegible] seen. His natural gaiety, however, was tempered [illegible] equally natural benevolence. The amazing proceedin[illegible] amazing house party at Dingley Dell were evidently s[illegible] to him of a comprehensive scheme of peace on earth [illegible] will towards men. He developed the symbolism mor[illegible] his more serious works. It became a confirmed habit [illegible] to write Christmas stories in which gloomy misers, aft[illegible] ghosts, became reformed characters, and descended f[illegible] atties to upset all the wise calculations of the Charity [illegible] tion Society. From his writings, and from those of W[illegible] Irving and one or two others, date, we imagine, som[illegible] peculiarities of the English Christmas by which the in[illegible] foreigner is puzzled. Abroad, whether in Roman Cath[illegible] Protestant countries, the rule is to keep the feast r[illegible] and decorously, with or without Christmas trees, bu[illegible] any frantic secular excitement. With us, the C[illegible] according to Charles Dickens, is associated with al[illegible] deviations from the norm—with ghost stories, haunte[illegible] moated granges—the "moated grangist," we belie[illegible] considered a necessity on the artistic staff of an ill[illegible] weekly—and volcanic outbursts of romping, feasting, an[illegible] geniality. The English Christmas, in fact, has been o[illegible] most characteristic monuments that have kept alive the [illegible] of that man of genius. Certainly it would be difficult t[illegible] other case in which a novelist has exercised an equal [illegible] over the manners and customs of his countrymen. N[illegible] it is true, that influence is waning, if not altogether [illegible] but it lasted a wonderfully long time. It is quite withi[illegible] memory that a kind of cynicism asserted itself, and i[illegible] the fashion to vote Christmas a bore, only tolerable on [illegible] that the holiday should be treated like any other holi[illegible] made the occasion of a trip to Bournemouth or [illegible] Whether even those of us who are not cynics would w[illegible] were possible, to restore the Dickens Christmas is [illegible] question. No doubt it was sometimes very amusing [illegible] depended for its success upon conditions which n[illegible] philosopher would wish to see revived. Chief am[illegible] conditions was the difficulty of obtaining rational am[illegible] in early Victorian days. The annual Christmas erup[illegible] somewhat of a revolt against the dulness of middle-[illegible] throughout the remainder of the year. Dickens, as a [illegible] obeyed a sound instinct in making the most of it, and se[illegible] cause of gaiety not only by amusing people, but by enc[illegible]

CHARLES DICKENS.

Drawn by S. Eytinge, Junr., expressly for "Every Saturday," No. 15, April 9, 1870

MR. PICKWICK'S RECEPTION.

"Sam Weller introduces to Mr. Pickwick the leading characters in Mr. Dickens' novels.

Published by Messrs. Field, Osgood and Co., 1870. [A]

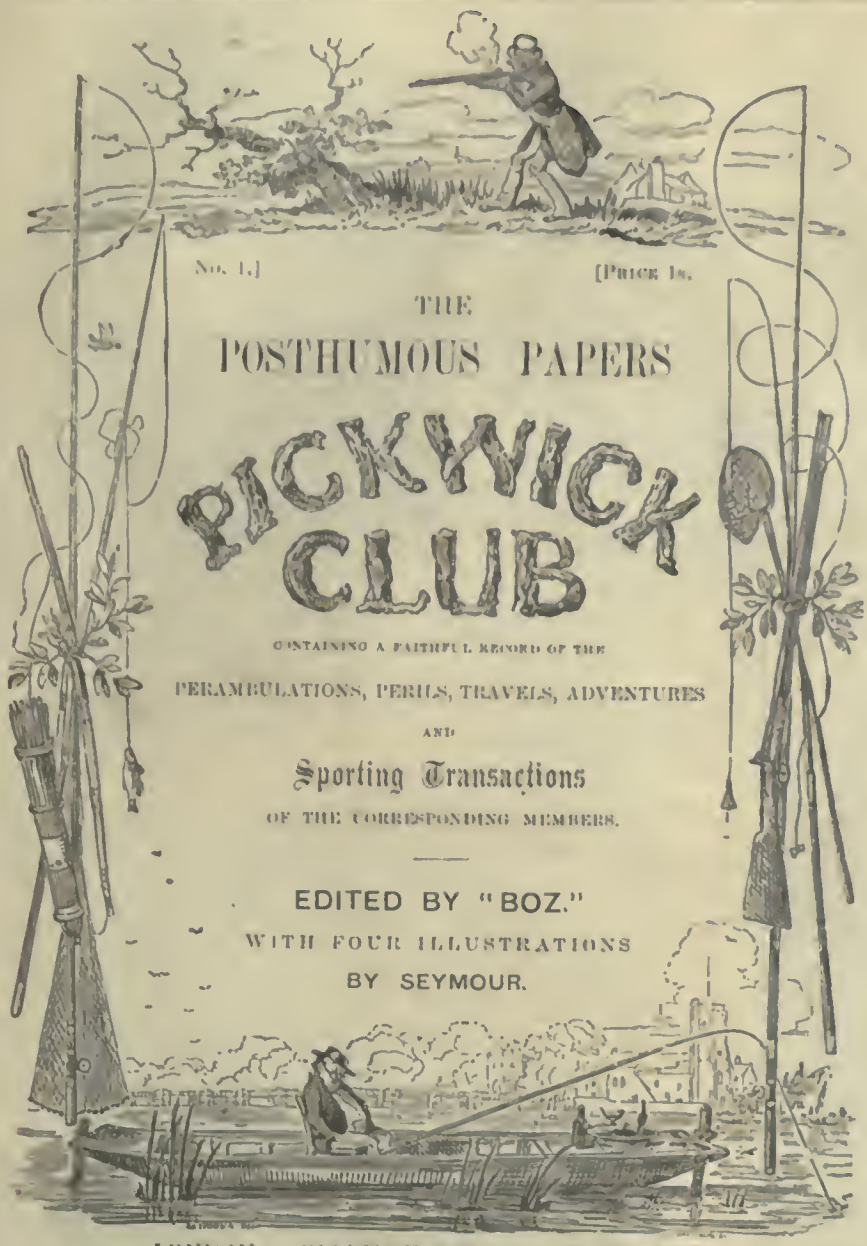
DICKENS IN MEMORY.

A "Personal View"

By GEORGE GISSING.

In one of those glimpses of my childhood which are clearest and most recurrent I see lying on the table of a familiar room a thin book in a green paper cover, which shows the title, "Our Mutual Friend." What that title meant I could but vaguely conjecture; though I fingered the pages, I was too young to read them with understanding; but this thin, green book notably impressed me and awoke my finer curiosity. For I knew that it had been received with smiling welcome; eager talk about it fell upon my ears; and with it was associated a name which from the very beginning of things I had heard spoken respectfully, admiringly. Charles Dickens, Alfred Tennyson—these were to me as the names of household gods; I uttered them with reverence before two of the framed portraits upon our walls.

Another glimpse into that boundless cloudland shows me a bound volume, rather heavy for small hands, which was called



MDCCCXXXVI

This shows the drawing on wood executed by ROBERT SEYMOUR.

Designed for the wrapper of "The Pickwick Papers," issued with the first number, March 31, 1836.

Engraved on wood by J. JACKSON.

Mr. Winkle missing a robin; Mr. Pickwick asleep in a punt moored on the Thames off Putney Bridge; Putney Church in the distance. [A] remote, had begun to play the necromancer in my brain. Moreover, the poor bareness of that garret, and the wistful gazing of the lonely girl, held me entranced. It was but the stirring of a child's fancy, excited by the unfamiliar; yet many a time in the after years, when, seated in just such a garret, I saw the sunshine flood the table at which I wrote, that picture in "Little Dorrit" has risen before me, and I have half believed that my childish emotion meant the unconscious foresight of things to come.

a younger imagination, and contains is beyond its scope. Dickens' however it may distress the matu
our later day, is not unwholesome, events in this story, addresses itself enough to feelings unsubdued by His quality of picturesqueness is he its best, with little or nothing of drama which makes the alley of " Nickleby" and "Oliver Twist" only of the early books. The open that dim lighted storehouse of thin grotesque, is the best approach to world, where sights of every day figured in the service of romance. T ness of the author's spirit, his o sympathy with poor and humble folk mind to a sort of music which it is live with; and no writer of moral showed triumphant virtue in so chee as, that which falls upon these hone when rascality has got its deserts, good, too, whether for young or atmosphere of rural peace breathed i pages of this book; I know that it make conscious in me a love of Eng and lane and village, one day to solacing passion. In "The Old Shop," town is set before you only of contrast; the aspiration of the the country road winding along unde sky. Others have pictured with fidelity the scenes of English rusti who succeeds better than Dickens in a charm upon the wayside inn and t church? Among his supreme mer of having presented in abiding form best of our national ideals—rural h
By the way of happiest emotions, reader takes this ideal into mind an and perhaps it is in great part Dickens' books are still so much read one sees edition after edition scatt town and country homes, that on wholly despair of this new Engla tries so hard to be unlike the old.

Time went by, and one day I sto
a picture newly hung in the childre
It was a large woodcut, published by The Illustrated London News, a
"The Empty Chair." Then for the I heard of Dickens' home, and knew had lived at that same Gadshill of whi speare spoke. Not without awe did picture of the room which now was tenantless; I remem curiosity which led me to look closely at the writing-tab objects upon it, at the comfortable, round-backed chair, at shelves behind; I began to ask myself how books were and how the men lived who wrote them. It is my last of childhood. Six months later there was an empty cha own home, and the tenor of my life was broken. . .

When, seven years after this, I somehow found my no matter the distance, to see and delight myself. At times, when walking with other thoughts, I would come upon a discovery; the name at a street-corner would catch my eye and thrill me. Thus, one day in the City, I found myself at the entrance to Bevis Marks. I had just been making an application in reply to some advertisement—of course, fruitlessly; but what was that disappointment compared with the discovery of Bevis Marks? Here dwelt Mr. Brass, and Sally, and the Marchioness. Up and down the little street, this side and that, I went gazing and dreaming. No press of busy folk disturbed me; the place was quiet; it looked, no doubt, much the same as when Dickens knew it. I am not sure that I had any dinner that day, but, if not, I dare say I did not mind very much.

London of that time differed a good deal from the London of to-day; it was still more unlike the town in which Dickens lived when writing his earlier books; but the localities which he made familiar to his readers were, on the whole, those which had undergone least change. If Jacob's Island and Folly Ditch could no longer be seen, the river side showed many a spot sufficiently akin to them, and was everywhere suggestive of

DICKENS IN HIS GARDEN AT GADSHILL.
[An unpublished Portrait from the negative in the possession of Mr. H. E. Smith, of Watford.
(Copyright in Great Britain and America.)

Dickens; I had but to lean, at night, over one of the City bridges, and the broad flood spoke to me in the very tones of the master. The City itself, Clerkenwell, Gray's-inn-road, the Inns of Court—these places remained much as of old. To this day, they would bear for me something of that old association; but four and twenty years ago, when I had no London memories of my own, they were simply the scenes of Dickens' novels, with all romantic history enriching their effect on the great writer's page. The very atmosphere declared him; if I gasped in a fog, was it not Mr. Guppy's "London particular"?—

In Marylebone-road, where he lived and worked for many years. But Forster did me another and a greater service; from the purchase of his book dates a second period of my Dickens memories, different in kind and in result from those which are concerned with the contents of the novels. At this time I had begun my attempts in the art of fiction; much of my day was spent in writing, and often enough it happened that such writing had to be done amid circumstances little favourable to play of th intentness of the mind. Then it was that t came to my help. When I was tired and disc not spur the brain to work, I took down Fo random, sure to come upon something wh spirits and renewed my intellectual zest. narrative of a wonderfully active, zealous, an this book scarce has its equal; almost any it exhilarating; but to me it yielded such spe in those days, I could not have found elsewh

From "Martin Chuz
MR. PECKSNIFF, HIS DA
TOM PINCH
Designed by "Phiz" for the title-pa Edition," 1859-18

which, I should perhaps have failed by the way. I am not referring to Dickens' swift triumph, to his resounding fame and high prosperity; these things are cheery to read about, especially when shown in a light so human, with the accompaniment of such geniality and mirth. No; the pages which invigorated me were those where one sees Dickens at work, alone at his writing-table, absorbed in the task of the story-teller. Constantly he makes known to Forster how his story is getting on, speaks in detail of difficulties, rejoices over spells of happy labour; and what splendid sincerity in it all! If this work of his was not worth doing, why, nothing was. A troublesome letter has arrived by the morning's post and threatens to spoil the day; but he takes a few turns up and down the room, shakes off the worry, and sits down to write for hours

[From "Nicholas Nickleby."]

MRS. NICKLEBY RECEIVING THE ATTENTIONS OF THE GENTLEMAN NEXT DOOR.

Designed by "Phiz" for the title-page of the First "Library Edition," 1858-1859. [Bl and hours. He is side, his desk at a window overlooking and there all the writes with gusto,

again bursting into his own thoughts.
method, too, with the theory of tion; fine artist as goes to work regul tually; one hears o advanced by a qua hour, that the morni
may be more fruitful.

Well, this it was me, not to imitate
a novelist, but to off his example as
From this point of debt I owe him is i Among the best of m are those moments lowering sky when light in the pag biographer, and rar
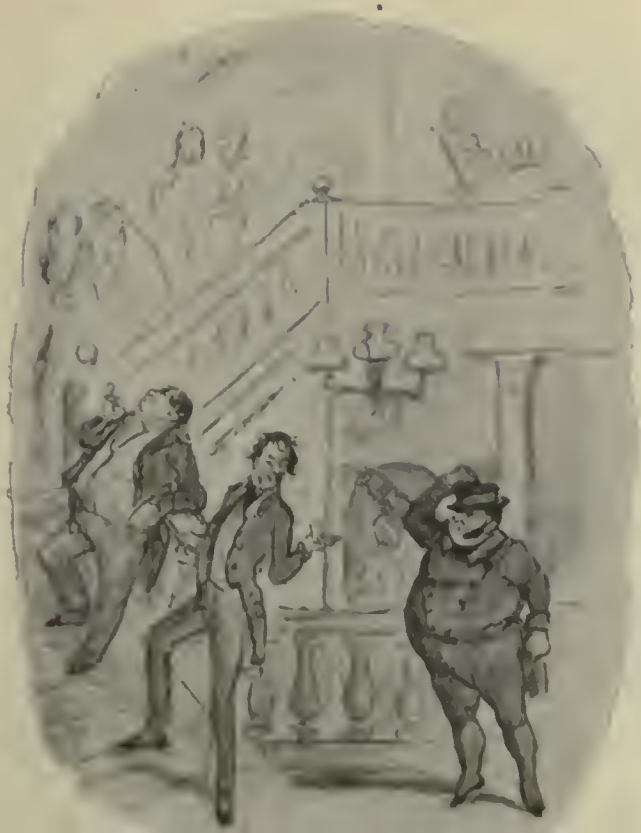
in vain.



DICKENS HIS LIFE AND WRITINGS.

There is no personality in the whole world of letters so absolutely English in every respect as that of Charles Dickens; there is scarcely a name of a writer in the whole history of English literature so universally familiar to everybody. To call his name a "household word," although hackneyed, best indicates the far-reaching extent of his influence. Every person in the street not only knows his name, but is more or less familiar with the characters of his creation. One has only just to think of some of our much discussed and advertised modern authors for a moment, in that respect, to realize how remarkable these facts are. And although it was supposed to be a fashion a little time back—we hear little of it just now—to profess to be unable to read Dickens, there never has been a period since his death which showed any wane in his popularity so far as the demand for his works is concerned.

Dickens is for all time and for all classes; wherever the English language is spoken, his books are read and his name respected; the fact cannot be blinked. There is absolutely no parallel—excepting Shakespeare—in our history. Mr. Gissing, in another part of this issue, deals with the influence of Dickens in a "Personal View." In this article we shall confine ourselves to biographical and bibliographical details.

Charles John Huffam Dickens—to give him his full name—was the second child of John Dickens, a clerk in the Naval Pay Office at Portsmouth Dockyard, and was born at Landport on February 7, 1812. The house is in the main street out of Portsmouth. Up to a short time ago there was nothing to show that therein was born England's greatest novelist. Now a plate let into the pavement in front of the railings publishes to the world the fact that "In this house Charles Dickens was born, February 7th, 1812." But as the family resided there for so short a time the associations with the place are as nil. The household was removed when he was two years old to London;

CHARLES DICKENS.

[An unpublished Portrait from the negative in the p
Mr. H. E. Smith, of Watford.]

[Copyright in Great Britain and America.]

and when he was four years old his father was Chatham. Charles must have had a marvellous could remember the house and front garden a the lodgings near the Middlesex Hospital where t before going to Chatham. It was where he first after a period with his mother as his teacher, in health, he did not take part to the same exten
of his fellow scholars, but preferred the associa books of his father. Consequently, it is not su that he took to writing, and whilst a child perpet called Misnar, the Sultan of India.

Dickens was only nine when his father left C had become by that time so interested in th surroundings as never to forget it. As everyl returned later the one great ambition of his lif Gadshill Place. From Chatham to London and things became so bad as to enforce little Charles business to earn a mite to help sustain the rapidl fortunes. He started in Warren's Blacking F taught his business by one, Bob Fagan, whose n wards immortalized in "Oliver Twist." Dicke six shillings a week, and the joy of taking home th on a Saturday was soon outweighed by the remov to Marshalsea Prison for debt. Charles, howev near by, and he contrived to exist on his weekly blacking warehouse.

In addition to Dickens' remarkable memory, vellous power of observation, and his experience this period were made ample use of in his writing life was put into "David Copperfield" and "

set to earn a livelihood, entering a solicitor's office. Being an ambitious youth, this humdrum, mediocre life was not appreciated, and he determined to follow in his father's footsteps and become a reporter. Whilst studying Gurney's system of shorthand, he filled in all his spare time at the British Museum, diligently satisfying his love of reading and desire for knowledge, and attempting to fill in the gaps of his education. He soon attained his object, and became the reporter in the House of Commons for the Morning Chronicle, earning the reputation of being one of the best reporters of the day. He continued his journalistic work until near the end of 1836 after the publication of his first book, and when "Pickwick" had commenced to spread merriment throughout the land.

The account of Dickens' life has been presented to the world in such a minute manner by Forster that one sometimes loses sight of the man himself in staring at a detail. But at any rate we are thankful to Forster for the picture of his hero's early struggle with life, the trials he had to endure, and the determination shown to overcome them. Dickens had no education, in the sense in which one talks of an educated man to-day. The time he devoted to reading at the British Museum was probably of little help to him in his after-life. No; Dickens went through the world with open eyes and keen intellect, both of which worked together with the strength and application of a resolute man.

The earliest exemplification of this is seen in "Sketches by Boz," his first published book. These sketches are solely the outcome of his great power of observation. Some of them appeared first in the pages of the old Monthly Magazine, during 1834 and 1835, and others in the Evening Chronicle, whilst he was on the staff of the latter. They were collected and published in 1836 in two small volumes, with illustrations by George Cruikshank. A second series appeared in 1837; and in 1839 the two series were issued with forty pictures by the same artist, in the familiar octavo form, and all subsequent authorized editions contain the same amount of matter. About this time Dickens was imbued with the idea of becoming connected with the stage, and although circumstances prevented him from being an actor—except in private in which he always shone—he nevertheless was muc in things theatrical, and wrote a farce, The Strange and the libretto of an opera entitled The Village the end of 1836. Subsequently, Is She his Wife plays emanated from his pen.

[From "The Pickwick Papers,

YARD OF THE "BULL INN," WH

Designed by "Phiz" for the title-page the First "Library Edition," 18

This brings us to Pickwick—the immortal Papers." The story of how it came to be wri familiar to bear repetition here. It is set out himself in the preface to the book itself. One wonder whilst reading it what the success of the would have been had Dickens not been obdurate on the plates of Seymour illustrating the text, a the text should be written to the pictures. Seymour died—by his own hand—before the sec was issued, whatever fear existed of disagreeme pelled. The first part appeared in April, 1836. to receive £14 for each part, and he seemed to satisfied with the payment, for he wrote concerni dearest Kate, the work will be no joke, but the is too tempting to resist." Almost simultaneous publication of Part One, Dickens married (Apri Catherine Hogarth.

The early parts of "Pickwick" were surr various troubles and difficulties, so much so tha lishers wondered if it would not be more satisfa concerned if it were abandoned altogether. Only were first bound of the initial part. Before Par the light, came the trouble of finding a ma Seymour's place. Amongst the many who offere on the work was Thackeray. In a speech a Academy banquet he related how he walked up to Inn "with two or three drawings in my hand, whi to say, he did not find suitable." R. W. Buss, was not unfamiliar to the publishers, was given a failed to please. Part Three should have appear but did not do so until July, owing to a family be which prevented Dickens from working so the Hall, and of Dickens too, for that matter—for he received at least £3,000 over and above what was mutually agreed upon—was turned into confidence, for the demand became so great it was as much as the publishers could do to cope with it. The rest everybody knows. There is no book in the English language like "Pickwick." There is no book, we venture to say, which has sold like it, and, having been once bought, read like it. It would be difficult to discover how many different editions have been issued; it would be absolutely impossible to tell the number of copies that have been printed and circulated. It stood out pre-eminently as the book of the nineteenth century, and at the end of the present one we doubt if there will be a book to compare with it in any of these respects.

To dwell at proper length on the topic of "Pickwick" would be to occupy more space than has been allotted for this article. Allusion can only be made to the innumerable spurious imitations, continuations, plays, farces, which came blundering on the market—"The Penny Pickwick," "Pickwick in America," "Pickwick Abroad," "The Pickwick Gazette," to name a few. These piracies annoyed Dickens, but, as he could get no satisfaction from the law, he looked upon the other side of the picture, and prior to the publication of his next book, "Nicholas Nickleby," issued a proclamation on February 28th, 1838, beginning "Whereas we are the only true and lawful 'Boz,'" and continued in his usual good spirits and "sportive playfulness," to the end of the document.

Dickens was always a hard worker, but at this period of his career the amount of work he was accomplishing was almost stupendous. Early in 1837 ("Pickwick" did not finish until November) he became editor of "Bentley's Miscellany," and the second number under his care contained the opening chapters of "Oliver Twist," which did not end until 1839. Yet in April, 1838, came the first part of "Nickleby" and continued its monthly issues up to October, whilst in the same year he published "Sketches of Young Gentlemen," as a companion to a similar book on "Young Ladies," which his publishers had previously issued. Later, he wrote still another companion volume, "Sketches of Young Couples."

"Oliver Twist; or, the Parish Boy's Progress, by Boz," was the title of Dickens' third book as it appeared in three volumes in 1838, with illustrations by George Cruikshank. The second edition bore the plain title, "Oliver Twist: by Charles Dickens," whilst the one volume 8vo. edition of 1846 had for title-page, "The Adventures of Oliver Twist; or, the Parish Boy's Progress, by Charles Dickens, with twenty-four illustrations on steel by George Cruikshank." The book must have come as a great surprise to Dickens' public in those days. Hitherto its author was known as a humorist, pure and simple. Here the tragedy of life was shown with all that power, whose full extent and catholicity were each succeeding book.

[From "Oliver Tw

Designed by "Phiz" for the li
"Library Edition."

In his next book Dickens set himself to expos neglect of education in England, and the disreg State, as a means of forming good or bad citizen or happy men, by showing up as an example the schools which were in existence at the time.
fact that in the books ostensibly written by purpose, we do not find the moral or purpose where. It is so particularly in "Nicholas Ni appeared in 1839, after its issue in the famil parts. About this period Dickens conceived periodical, Master Humphrey's Clock. It wa short stories, essays, and miscellaneous papers

THE CHALET AT GADSHILL, IN WHICH DICKENS DID HIS WRITING.

[B]

chiefly by himself, after the style of Addison's Spectator, and to be issued in weekly numbers. But the public, finding the title was not that of a complete continuous narrative, would have none of it. Dickens tried many ways of making the weekly numbers "go," by bringing the inimitable Sam Weller and his father, Mr. Pickwick, and other good old friends on to the scene, as he had planned to do originally, but without success. Eventually in number four, "The Old Curiosity Shop" commenced and continued, with but slight interruptions, until the story was finished. Then came "Barnaby Rudge; A Tale of the Riots of Eighty," which had been causing him such perturbation before and whilst he planned the ill-fated periodical. Master Humphrey's Clock ceased its ticking with the publication of the issue containing the last chapter of "Barnaby Rudge." "The Old Curiosity Shop" and "Barnaby Rudge" were issued respectively in 1848 and 1849, in book form, with the illustrations of Cattermole and Browne. Dickens' other contributions to the periodical were afterwards added to his published works under the title of "Master Humphrey's Clock."

Immediately after the abandonment of the periodical, Dickens started on his first tour of America. With what success he met, how he was feasted as "the guest of the nation," the excitement he caused, and the admiration displayed by the Americans for him—all this has been well told at length in a familiar volume. What his own impressions were are to be found in his "American Notes," published soon after his return (in two vols., 1842), and later on in "Martin Chuzzlewit," which began to appear in the usual shilling parts in 1843. "Martin Chuzzlewit," at the time was considered by Dickens to be far and away the best book he had written. But, when "David Copperfield" came later, he shifted his affection to the new "child of my fancy." Yet "Martin Chuzzlewit" was not so successful as the preceding books, much to Dickens' and his ways; with an Historical Record of what what he didn't: showing, moreover, who inherited plate, who came in for the silver spoons, and who for t ladles: the whole forming a complete Key to the Chuzzlewit. Edited by Boz."

Whilst "Chuzzlewit" was appearing in serial form wrote and published that masterpiece "A Christ (1843). Nothing need be said of it here; it tow among the classics of English literature long since, a for its author the sobriquet of "The Apostle of Chri was the forerunner of others—"The Chimes" (18 Cricket on the Hearth" (1845), "The Battle of Life and "The Haunted Man" (1848).

In January, 1846, Dickens started the Daily occupied the editorial chair, but only for three sh
He had but recently returned from a sojourn in Italy, new paper his "Pictures from Italy" appeared,
and biographer succeeded him in the editorial chair.
"Dealings with the Firm of Dombey and Son, Whole and for Exportation," begun at Rosemont, Lausa book Dickens took longer to write than usual.
it in 1846, and did not complete it until early in 18 which time it was appearing in parts. The descrip death of Paul quite electrified Thackeray. He dec was "no writing against such power," and character
"unsurpassed, stupendous." "Dombey and Daugh spurious imitation which came out in penny numbers a time, was announced as a "production of exalted written to sustain moral example and virtuous precept

"Of all my books," Dickens wrote of "David Cop (1850), "I like this the best . . . . like many fond have my favourite child, and his name is 'David Copp
There is no doubt that "Copperfield" brought h height of his fame. To-day it appeals to reader tionably on account of the personal, the autobiographic which go to the filling out of the story. "I seem to some part of myself into the shadowy world," he Forster at the time, although the public then suspicious of it. But apart from this, it is a great boo

Before "Copperfield" was published as a volum launched the first number of Household Words (1850), which practically became All the Year Round in 1859. Among the most noteworthy features of these enterprises were the famous Christmas numbers, comprising "Mugby Junction," "Seven Poor Travellers," "The Wreck of the Golden Mary," "No Thoroughfare," &c., all written by Dickens in collaboration with Wilkie Collins, Hesba Stretton, Amelia B. Edwards, and others. In the pages of Household Words appeared the "Child's History of England," "The Uncommercial Traveller," and "Hard Times"; whilst in All the Year Round, "A Tale of Two Cities" and "Great Expectations" first saw the light.

"Bleak House," issued in parts, came in 1852. In two of the characters Dickens, it is known, drew upon his friends for models—Landor being Boythorn and Leigh Hunt Skimpole. It is also in this book that his early acquaintance with law and lawyers was made much use of.

Dickens' next book, "Hard Times" (1854), was dedicated to Thomas Carlyle, under whose influence he had more or less come. Eighteen months elapsed before the first part of "Little Dorrit" appeared. The volume was published in 1857, and was dedicated to Clarkson Stanfield. Dickens originally intended calling it "Nobody's Fault," and did not alter it until the eve of publication. It was at this period he purchased Gadshill Place—the ambition of his life—and made it his final home. At this time also he was fascinating everybody who was lucky enough to hear him with readings from his own works, filling halls, causing speculations in tickets for admission, and coining money, so to speak. But he was also writing another book—a book which was destined to be one of his best, and one, too, entirely different in style from any of his others—"A Tale of Two Cities." It commenced in All the Year Round in 1859, and was simultaneously issued in the usual parts and appeared as a volume all in the same year. In it he hoped to add something to the popular and picturesque means of understanding the terrible time of the French Revolution; "though no one," he said, "could hope to add anything to the philosophy of Carlyle's wonderful book." To-day it is one of the most popular and most read of all his works.

In 1861 "The Uncommercial Traveller," a series of papers from All the Year Round, appeared, and was enlarged from the same source in 1868. In this latter year also came "Great Expectations," the only other one of his books for which the orthodox three-volume form was chosen. In it, as in "Copperfield," he used the incidents of his boyhood to such an extent as to make it autobiographical.

"Our Mutual Friend" was published in parts, as in the case of the former works, but two volumes were chosen for the book form in 1865. It was illustrated by Marcus Stone.

Dickens died on the 9th of June, 1870, leaving "Edwin Drood" unfinished. What he had written of it appeared in the usual green paper parts and afterwards in volume form. In October, 1871, a continuation entitled "John Jasper's Secret" began to appear, and occupied eight monthly parts produced uniformly with "Drood"; and recently a gentleman in Holland sent the publishers—Messrs. Chapman and Hall—a completion written by himself. There were other attempts of this nature, but Dickens' book must always remain as he left it.

It is curious and extraordinary that, although none of Dickens' works were completed before they began to appear—as a matter of fact each part was published immediately it was written—it cannot be said of any of them that they are disjointed, or show any signs of having been written to spread appeals in a realistic and convincing way to all w

They stand for types to-day—Mark Tapley, Sa Carton, Mrs. Gamp, Scrooge, Bob Cratchett, Cuttle, Bob Sawyer, to name a few.

Most of Dickens' minor writings from Round and Household Words have been collect called "Reprinted Pieces." Among the m these is "A Child's Dream of a Star," issued several delightful reprints; and we know of a edition in this country used in place of a Christ

A writer in Blackwood's Magazine shortly death said:—"Were all his books swept by catastrophe out of the world, there would world some score at least of people, with all sayings we are more intimately acquainted tha our brothers and sisters, who would owe to While we live, Sam Weller and Dick Swiveller, Mrs. Gamp, the Micawbers and the Squee die. . . . They are more real than we are ou outlive and outlast us, as they have outlive
This is the one proof of genius which no critic carping and dissatisfied, can gainsay."

There is little fear that the works of Dic forgotten. At the present time, of all the writers he is still the favourite, whether judge of view of the interest taken in his personal interest taken in the writings he has left us. H of the many great writers the period produced, an years after his death—his genius shines brillian light of our modern stars.

DICKENS AND HIS ILLUSTRATORS.

The relations which existed between Dickens and the artists who illustrated his books were most intimate. To-day it is the publisher who chooses the artist and approves or disapproves of his work. But Dickens was more particular, and superintended the choice of subject for illustration and the manner of the treatment of it in his books. Sometimes the artist was happier than at others, and produced Dickens' own ideal in his drawings. But at other times he did not. At the very outset of his career we find Dickens insisting that Seymour should illustrate his text and not introduce ideas of his own. And many of the original pictures of "Phiz" and Seymour in "Pickwick" had to be considerably altered at Dickens' suggestion. The suggested amendments would be conveyed either in a letter or by writing on the original drawing. We are able, through the courtesy of Messrs. Chapman and Hall, to reproduce one of these original drawings so marked, with the steel plate as it afterwards appeared (see next page). In "Oliver Twist" is found another early instance of the importance Dickens attached to the pictures. He writes describing how he came to town and found that he had not seen the plates to the last volume, and how he objected to the one "Rose Maylie and Oliver," begging Cruikshank to do it again. Later, he became almost abusive to poor "Phiz" over "Dombey," notwithstanding the pains that famous artist took to please. And so it was throughout all his books; he knew what he wanted, and insisted upon having it. It is this working together of author and artist which makes the work of the latter so valuable, particularly at the present time, when so many attempts are made by the artist to re-create some of his characters.

The one artist since Dickens' death whose work stands out prominently as depicting the true spirit of the master is Fred Barnard. He became associated with Dickens' writings in the

MR. WINKLE SHOOTING.
By WILLIAM HEATH. Pickwickian Illustrations.
2. "Not the Man" (Chap. II.).
Published 1837. [1]

"Household" edition, and illustrated several volumes. his style was very different, yet not inferior in techniq of "Phiz" and Cruikshank, both of whom realized ideal, it is nevertheless thoroughly and truly in syn the humour and pathos of the author. At times he was masterly, and nothing better of the kind has been don series of character studies published some years since

"Pickwick" has always been a fascinating book artist. At one time everybody who could draw atte illustrate it. Indeed, the number of artists who in such attempts are legion, "Pickwick Papers" be favoured in this respect than the others. At the time of in 1836 and 1837, several artists issued sets of c be used as "extras" for the monthly parts as they The best of these were Onwhyn, who used the pseu "Sam Weller" on some of his engravings, Willia Alfred Crowquill (A. H. Forrester), and T. Gilb reproduce a characteristic one by Heath, and one by Gilbert (p. 583), whose series on wood appeared later. T is a fascinating one, and could be dealt with at length, i by a specimen of each artist's work. That, of course, is i —impracticable, in fact. But of the "authorized" arti are Sam and the housemaid clearly made out; and ter if he were looking on with his arm round

I rather question the accuracy of the housemaids

HABLOT KNIGHT BROWNE.—Facsimile of the original drawing by "Phiz," with remarks and suggestions written by Charles Dickens in the margin.

MR. WINKLE DISCLOSING HIS MARRIAGE ON HIS KNEES.
Chap. XLVII. (Part XVIII.) [A]

plates carefully tied up, and n Dickens' portraits." They are a teresting as showing Dickens as real life and without the effect of th of an artist, and form valuable already large collection of Dick pictures. The small vignette pictur 575, 577, 578) are from water-colou which were so delicately engraved title-pages of the first issue only Library edition. There were twen

It would be superfluous to ente respecting the illustrations to th books of Dickens. "Pickwick" comparatively, that created any speak of. And as nearly every ed issued by Chapman and Hall con illustrations, they have become famil
Those of our readers, however, w more of the wonderful collectio which "Pickwick" has inspired mend to add to their library wickiana," edited by Joseph Greg brought together nearly 400 drawing from all over the world, illustrating

There were others of the work plates were published, includi
"Barnaby Rudge," "A Tale
besides collections of portraits of th
In the novels. Among these shor
"Phiz's" set to "Dombey and Son

Not the least interesting p issue of Dickens' works were th blue paper covers. These were d illustrating the book, and depicte characters therein. We give Seymour's design for "Pickwic
page 573.

Dickens Topography.

Of the topography of Dicken said, much written, and much pu there seems to be no finality to th have observed already, Dickens ha took in everything he saw. Havi his mind's eye, his marvellous memo
It is not strange, therefore, that houses, inns, streets, private roo scenes which figure in his novels their prototype in reality. Most the same manner, but perhaps Dickens had so many confidenti great men all of them who survi have helped in identification an facts. But time, the ravisher, wi all traces of association with D London is concerned. Every new our thoroughfares destroys somet connected with Mr. Pickwick (particularly the old hostelries, of in London now), Oliver Twist, Di
the Marchioness and of scenes Boz," "Copperfield," "Dorrit,"

and Jingle started their coach ride to Rochester, and where later Copperfield and his friend Steerforth stayed at one time; one could stroll through the dark arches of the Adelphi, as Dickens did, and then into the Temple to Fountain-court and observe the rooms where Dickens lived and the spot where Ruth Pinch went to meet her lover; one could discover where Pip lodged in Barnard's Inn, and then find oneself in Holborn wondering where Sairey Gamp and Betsy Prig once resided. The Kent districts would require much time. One could see the house in which Dickens spent his honeymoon; the house where he lived as a boy in Chatham, and where he died at Gadshill. One could visit the hotel where the Pickwicklans stayed at Rochester, and even the bed room in which Mr. Winkle slept. One could discover the pond on which the Pickwicklans disported themselves when it was frozen that famous winter's day; and if one's imagination be keen enough, one could see Mr. Pickwick sliding; the Leather Bottle, Cobham, could be seen, where Mr. Pickwick, Mr. Winkle, and Mr. Snodgrass inquired "for a gentleman of the name of Tupman." The cricket ground where

Illustrated by Sir JOHN GILBERT, R.A.
"Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club."
"The Fat Boy" (Chap. LIV.) [A]

the historic match took place is not difficult to d and, if we were so inclined, there is delightful Broadstai many associations. Dickens lived and wrote there, in th on the cliff's side, and one of his most charming pieces English Watering Places") is devoted to it. There thousand and one places and things to see. There are a t and one things to write about, had we not come to the en space. The subject of "Dickens" is gigantic.

B. W

MR. PICKWICK.

[From "Pickwick Characters" (Bell's Life in London, 1838). Drawn by KENNY MEADOWS.]

From an Original Drawing in Boz Hall (Bell's Life, Sunday, March 25, 1838).

Offspring of Boz's fertile brain,
Whose bright creations never fail,
Enter our gallery with thy train—
Sire of the Pickwick Club, all hail!

Welcome, thou man of Goswell Street,
To warm and kindly feeling true;
And in Bell's sporting journal greet Old friends this day with feature [new?]

Enlarged in form, as thou in heart,
A gallant race well braced to run,
With thee, old boy, we'll make a start,

The Various Editions of Dickens.

Admirers of the great novelist have been well looke in respect to editions of his works. New ones follow eac nowadays in an extraordinarily rapid succession, and no s classics makes its appearance without at least three or Dickens' works finding places in its list. In the fo table we give an account of the various collected which have issued from the press since the original octa Wherever mention is made of the "original" Illustrat refers, of course, to those which were done for th editions. The date given is that of the year the pa edition was commenced. No Continental or American ed included.

1847.—The Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo. This was issued i halfpenny weekly numbers, and green wrappered parts, w type set in double columns. At the completion of each wor

Executed by R. W. Buss.

Original illustration for the first edition (Part III.) of "The Pickwick Papers" as issued in monthly numbers, May, 1836.

(This is one of the designs described as the Buss "Suppressed Plates," as they were omitted from subsequent issues.)

THE CRICKET MATCH—DINGLEY DELL AGAINST ALL MUGGLETON (Chap. VII.)

N.B.—The design by "Phiz," Mr. Wardle and his friends under the influence of the salmon, was substituted for this plate in the collected edition. [A] issued with the original illustrations, but minus the vignettes, and extended to 30 volumes by the addition of the remaining works of the author. The price was 7s. 6d. per volume, but was afterwards raised to 8s. (Chapman and Hall.)

1895.—The People's Edition. Crown 8vo. This edition was a reissue of the "Cheap" Edition above, in green paper boards, at 2s. each, with a picture on the cover, in 25 volumes. (Chapman and Hall.)

1867.—The Charles Dickens Edition. Crown 8vo. This is the well-known red-cloth edition which contained the autograph of Charles Dickens on the cover. Each book was illustrated with eight pictures chosen from the originals and the whole of the series was revised and amended by the author. The edition was complete in 21 volumes, at 3s. and 3s. 6d., but in the early eighties the prices were raised sixpence a volume. As this edition was the one revised by the author shortly before his death, it has been the standard edition from which all subsequent ones have been printed. (Chapman and Hall.)

1871.—The Household Edition. Crown 4to. This in cloth at 2s., 2s 6d., and 4s. Sub prices were raised to 3s., 4s., and 5s.

1873.—The Illustrated Library
This edition occupied 30 green cloth v
Library form and contained all the c printed from the steel plates and wood were priced uniformly at 10s. each. (

1878.—The Popular Library Editio edition was printed from the stereo plat Edition and contained 16 illustratio selected from the "Household" Editio in 30 dark green cloth volumes at 3s. 6 afterwards raised to 4s. each. (Chapm

1880. The Pocket Edition. 16mo. volumes without illustrations, price 45
green cloth. (Chapman and Hall.)

1880.—The Diamond Edition. 16mo cloth volumes, printed from an America illustrated. (Chapman and Hall.)

1881.—The Edition de Luxe. Roya
this edition is indicated by the title Dickens' works and contained impress mounted of all the original illustratio limited to 1,000 numbered sets of 30 buckram, with paper label, issued a
The price was raised on the day of pu
It was dedicated to Queen Victoria. (

1885.—The Cabinet Edition. 16mo.

stereo plates of the "Pocket" Edition, extended to 32 volumes, each containing eight illustrations reproduced from the originals. Bound in half cloth, paper sides, 1s. 6d. a volume.

Subsequently reissued—1896—in scarlet cloth with gilt tops. (Chapman and Hall.)

1889.—The Two-shilling Edition. Crown 8vo. In 21 red cloth volumes with frontispiece only. (Chapman and Hall.)

1890.—The Crown Edition. Large crown 8vo. In 17 maroon cloth volumes containing reproductions of all the original illustrations, 5s. each. (Chapman and Hall.)

1890.—The Pictorial Edition. Royal 8vo. This edition was a reprint of the famous "Household" Edition with the double rules round the page of type omitted. It contained all the illustrations of the "Household" Edition, and was issued in 38 monthly parts (including "Forster's Life"), and 17 red cloth volumes at 3s. 6d. each. (Chapman and Hall.)

1892.—48-volume Edition. Crown 8vo. This edition was imported from America and issued in this country without illustrations. (Chapman and Hall.)

1892.—The Half-crown Edition. Crown 8vo. In 21 blue cloth volumes containing reproductions of all the original illustrations. (Chapman and Hall.)

1896.—The Shilling Edition. Crown 8vo. In 21 crimson cloth volumes with frontispieces. (Chapman and Hall.)

1897.—The Gadshill Edition. Square crown 8vo. This edition is noteworthy as containing several stories and sketches which had not been included in any previous collected edition of Dickens' works. They comprise several stories and sketches which were hidden away in periodicals, and such pieces as "Sunday under Three Heads," "The Mudfog Papers," "Sketches of Young Couples and of Young Gentlemen," &c., which had hitherto only been issued in independent separate form. In addition to the original illustrations it contains entirely new ones by Charles Green, Harry Furniss, Jules Goodman, Maurice Greiffenhagen, and others. To this edition Mr. Andrew Lang contributed an introduction to each book and a general essay on Dickens. The illustrations were printed from an unused duplicate set of plates in the possession of the publishers. It is in 34 scarlet cloth volumes, 6s. each. (Chapman and Hall.)

1899.—The Daily News Memorial Edition.—Large crown 8vo. This edition was issued by the proprietors of the Daily News, whose first editor was Charles Dickens. It contained, in addition to the complete works, Forster's "Life" and "The Dickens Dictionary," comprising nineteen volumes with all the original illustrations. Issued on the instalment plan, but sold in sets, only £2 cloth, £3 10s. in leather. (The Daily News.)

1900.—The Authentic Edition. Square crown 8vo. This edition is in 21 olive green volumes and is as complete in respect of text and illustrations as the "Gadshill" Edition above. The frontispiece to each volume is printed in colours, and the price is 5s. each volume. (Chapman and Hall.)

1901.—The People's Edition. Large crown 8vo. This edition, issued by the Dickens Society, was printed from the same type, comprised the same number of volumes, and contained the same illustrations as the Daily News Memorial Edition. Issued on the instalment plan and sold in sets, only £2 cloth, £3 15s. in leather.

1901.—The Oxford India-paper Edition. Foolscap 8vo. This edition is now in course of publication, and is issued jointly by Messrs. Chapman and Hall and Mr. H[illegible] still copyright, Messrs. Chapman and Hall are t[illegible] publishers who can issue complete editions of his [illegible] But there are various editions of the non-copyright [illegible] notably:—

Macmillan's Threepenny Edition, crown 8vo. [illegible] Charles Dickens the younger contributed bibliographic[illegible] ductions to some of these volumes, which contain also repro[illegible] printed with the text of the original illustrations. (M[illegible] and Co.)

The Temple Edition. Foolscap 8vo. The works in th[illegible] occupy as a rule three volumes and contain frontisp[illegible] modern artists, each volume costing 1s. 6d. net in cloth, [illegible] in leather. (Dent and Co.)

The New Century Edition. Foolscap 8vo.—Printed [illegible] paper and containing a frontispiece by a modern artis[illegible] 2s., leather 2s. 6d. and 3s. (Nelson and Sons.)

The Rochester Edition. Crown 8vo.—The works [illegible] edition are chiefly in two volumes, and contain an intro[illegible] by George Gissing and topographical pictures and m[illegible] latter by F. G. Kitton. They are published at 3s. [illegible] volume. (Methuen and Co.)

The Imperial Edition, with new illustrations by [illegible] artists and including a literary character study by [illegible] Gissing, illustrated by F. G. Kitton. (Gresham Pu[illegible] Company.)

In addition to these, many cheaper and more inc[illegible] editions have been issued, and there are at least two [illegible] being prepared in America—one from Mr. Sproul, m[illegible] recently in our columns, and one from Messrs. Ho[illegible] Mifflin, and Co. If there still remains a taste unsatisfied [illegible] doubt not it will be satisfied some day.

THE DRAMA.

THE LIMITATION OF DRAMATIC THEMES (continued).

I read Mr. Fyfe's letter in reply to my previous article with something very like despair. He had misapprehended the point at issue and contradicted himself with so blithe an unconsciousness, misrepresented me with a shamelessness so childlike and bland, and reiterated his old fallacies with a dogmatism so pontifical, that I felt inclined to let him go as an incurable case. This kind, I felt, cometh not out but by prayer and fasting. But the truth is that the matter in dispute is too serious to be dropped merely because Mr. Fyfe does not understand the A B C of it. For it is a matter affecting the future of our drama, which will assuredly cease to be drama if it ceases to mind its own business. Has the drama a business of its own, which limits its stock-in-trade—that is to say, its choice of themes? I say it has; Mr. Fyfe, on the contrary, says it is a Universal Provider, unlimited in choice of themes. I return to these questions, then, because of their intrinsic importance and not, as I say, with any hope of converting the incorrigible Mr. Fyfe.

He himself is evidently aware of their importance, for he calls my treatment of them "amusing" and even "flippant." That is to say, conscious of the weakness of his case, he abuses the plaintiff's attorney by representing him as a farceur in a discussion which ought to be serious. This stale controversial device from a professed champion of "novelty" is somewhat unexpected. Now, I am not fond of the "You're another" retort, which belongs to the Fifth Form stage of mental development, but when my adversary tries to score a point by crying "Oh, Mr. Porter, what a funny man you are!" I must answer him in his own schoolboy fashion. And so I say that the "flippancy" is on his side, when he apostrophizes me with a line manifestly inspired by Coleridge's burlesque invocation quoted in my previous article,

"Oh, Mr. Walkley, M.A. Oxon.!"—

"Inoculation! Heavenly Maid!"

By the way, it will probably matter little to him to know that he has made an error in a capital letter, for a man who can repeat fallacies with his cheery confidence would evidently undertake command of the Channel Fleet at a moment's notice, so that he may well make nothing of repairing a little oversight on the part of a mere University. But of course his "flippancy" is only a red herring. I meet him quite seriously, with facts and arguments. Let us examine what he has seriously to say in reply.

It will at once be seen that Mr. Fyfe belongs to that distressing class of reasoners who, starting with an undeniable truth, proceed to state a falsehood as though it were an amplification, instead of a contradiction, of that truth. He does this in his letter twice over, and I am going to number the cases—he shall not accuse me of "frivolity" this time!—and nail each to the counter in order.

(1.) He likens me, at the play, to an "intellectual policeman." I am "there to see that dramatic law and order are preserved." Well, there he pays me—to be sure, without intending it—a great compliment, for he testifies to my due performance of my proper duty. Critics are the "policemen" of the arts. They are "there" to preserve artistic "law and order." But mark how Mr. Fyfe proceeds to amplify this statement. "The proprieties sanctioned by custom must be observed. Innovations call forth indignant protest. . . . Does a playwright step outside the province which convention assigns to him, he is told firmly that this must not occur again." Mr. Fyfe, you see, has slyly expanded "dramatic law" into "custom" [illegible]

—the law that the dramatist is limited in hi by the conditions of his medium. That is not it of "custom" or "convention." It is not that prevents a painter from painting the swe It is not a "custom" that allows a sculptor in certain subjects of aerial flight and poise w the sculptor in marble. It is not a "convent the clash of wills, say, a peculiarly " ject, and the gradual progress of the essness a subject peculiar to the no "custom" which banishes scenes of mere from the playhouse, or subjects of "stable equ the course of true love always running smooth happiness of any sort. No, all these things a "law," the law which limits the artist's choic peculiar conditions of his artistic medium.

(2.) Mr. Fyfe offers us an explanation o ment that "the whole of nature is open to th "What does 'choice' mean," he asks, "s good artist is he who knows what materials the bad artist he who knows not?" The ita very important they are, for the phrase me whole show away. I might lay down my pen my case." For it is an admission that certa for the artist to use and certain others a words, the dramatist's choice of themes is are subjects "unsuitable for dramatic treatme suppose that Mr. Fyfe sees that he has in si his position and come right over to mine? N proceeds once more to apply his familiar meth disguised as amplification. "Selection and tr the secrets of the artist's calling; upon thes depend. He may seek his subject where he choose according to the number of his ta deal with his material as to make it intere recollect that Art is the presentation of pass the object of arousing emotion." So that depends solely upon the artist's talent an ditioned by the nature of his medium! An told, a moment before, that, within the l good artist, "certain materials are fit to us fit to use! Could there be a more hopeless c self-contradiction?

This is the pass to which all controve come when they start incautiously, like sweeping proposition. Certain obvious except out which destroy their case, they are drive with false reasoning. But I leave Mr. Fyfe. "fallen out of sympathy with the stream of te He calls me a "tired reformer." Well, he i Certain so-called "reformers" do make m American sense; because I very much do really know what they are driving at, beca see drama "reformed" into something whic call that abolition, not reform; ending, not the "stream of tendency" is in that dire against the stream with such strength as I ca is it in that direction? I think not. I do not demand among intelligent playgoers for an for a drama that shall take over business materials unfit for its use. And in particular sion grew out of my comment on an episo thumping in Björnson's play! I do not thi playgoer (except Mr. Fyfe) will demand that Mr. John Morley's words, "imitate the meth type of histronic failure, the church pulpit."

A last word (for the present) about th drama, its limitations of subject; and it sha but Lessing's. "It is not sufficient for the ar duce an effect upon us; the effect must be work, by reason of the species to which it b You don't sink mines in order to blow up away, or light a faggot to burn a fly. Wha voting yourself to the painful labour of the dr

CURRENT LITERATURE.

THE FAMOUS "BLUE" SCHOOL.

ANNALS OF CHRIST'S HOSPITAL. By E. H. PEARCE, M.A. (Methuen. 7s. 6d.)

In view of the removal of the famous "Blue" School to Horsham and the appointment just announced of a new Headmaster, Mr. A. W. Upcott, Mr. Pearce's volume comes with a special appropriateness. A former "Grecian" and assistant master at Christ's Hospital, and now the vicar of Christ Church, a church at which the "Blues" have for the last quarter of a century formed a very large proportion of the congregation, Mr. Pearce is peculiarly well qualified to write such a history. Owing to the allegiance of Charles Lamb, Coleridge, and Leigh Hunt, Christ's Hospital is unusually blessed among public schools with literary associations. Mr. Pearce has not aimed at presenting a rechauffé of literary allusions, or compiling a series of notices of famous old boys. That has been done before. He has broken new ground in constructing a continuous record from "the voluminous and carefully preserved minutes of the Courts and Committees, whose benevolent work has never ceased since the foundation." A strange difficulty has offered itself, however, in the construction of this record. "The annals of Christ's Hospital cannot be arranged in periods christened with the names of successive Headmasters." The gradual evolution of the Headmaster has only been witnessed by the last half-century; it was begun by "the impetuosity of Dr. Jacob," it was developed by "the natural aptitude of the present Master of Marlborough," while the Headmaster's assured position to-day is the result of "the cool judgment and long experience of the Rev. Richard Lee." The Rev. G. C. Bell, so we are assured by Mr. Pearce, "was the first Headmaster who, when he visited a colleague's class-room, ran no danger of being bowed out or even less ceremoniously disposed of." It might have been possible to group the annals in periods by taking for chronological units the committees, or the Councils of Almoners, in whose hands have rested the smallest details that regard the fortunes of the Hospital, only these "bodies will not serve for chapter-headings, as they never died."

Christ's Hospital entered into the labours of the Grey Friars, who came to England flushed with the apostolic zeal of their founder, St. Francis of Assisi, and finding the neighbourhood of Cornhill too salubrious for their self-denying energy were delighted to acquire a property in Stynkyng Lane, and in the parish of St. Nicholas Shambles, the very names of which must have made the mouths of the Franciscians water with the possibilities of sickness and smells. When the property of the order was sequestrated, part of it was re-granted, with that vicarious generosity which was so marked a feature of the Tudor character, for the purposes of a Hospital. What Henry VIII. conceded for one purpose, his son confirmed for another. Christ's Hospital was established as a foundling and a scholastic establishment. The Christ's Hospital of to-day "has one medical officer and thirty masters," but in 1553 there were two surgeons as well as a not inadequate staff of masters. The Court Book shows that the Governors were willing to give all manner of medical assistance. In 1559 a boy "being almost blynde, at the sute of his mother was admitted." Another, "being lame on one legge, was admitted for surgerye." There is some excuse same lines as the Tudors. He claimed to rank as a b because he granted to the Hospital a sum of money whi reality part of the legacy of a former Governor, one Aldworth, invested in what might be described at that "Government insecurities." But the Court conveyed deep impression on the course of "Hospital" develo because it originated that Mathematical School which up so wide a sphere of activity for old "Blues." The "mats" were intended to feed the Royal Navy and the Me Marine. They not only did that, but they supplied the Guinea Company, the African Company, and, on a liberal scale, to the East India Company, while a lette served in the Governors' archives from "Stephen G Richard Grice, the two Mathematicall boyes, that we sent into the Czar of Muscovy's service, giving an ac their safe arrivall at Archangell and of their being migh used there by Mr. Woolfe."

Mr. Pearce has done full justice to Christ's Hospit possessor of "a richer store of quaint ceremonies th Public Schools." He writes of the dress of the "B "Blew-coate, Yellow-coate, Shirt, Shoes, Stocking Girdle, and Badge," with some curious research original pattern and eventual disappearance of the "Hally-Blags," which took their rise in a donation to to at least sixty children, after attendance at the Chur Saints in Lumber Street, of "a penny apiece and raisins," of the Public Suppers, of St. Matthew's Day, a Public Lotteries, at which some of the boys were assist in the drawings. The idiosyncrasies of an essenti school are dwelt upon. One of these idiosyncrasies "when the bell rings," the masters "are not only but, the sooner they are off the premises, the higher reputation stand." Another caused the Governors much from the imperfect aspirations to celibacy which were headles, nurses, and the tradesfolk who occupied t under the Writing School, and were to be "single p neere as may be." Mr. Pearce's memorials of the "w cloisters pale" may justly take rank with Mr. Sa "Annals of Westminster" and Mr. Fisher's "A Shrewsbury."

THE UNITY OF ITALY.

THE ROMAN THEOCRACY AND THE REPUBLIC, 1846-1849. JOHNSTON. (Macmillan. 10s. n.)

The struggle for the unity of Italy, which attracted sympathy in England half a century ago, is now pe enough off for the historian to form a just estimate of t course of the movement, and of the character of the actors. Mr. Johnston has taken as his subject what is episode in that movement—the disastrous opening year Pius IX. But the lessons which those years tang Italian patriots who were striving to free their country stranger were of the utmost significance. And it is merit of this volume that these lessons are clearly brou to the reader, as they doubtless were to those who were in the fray. In all such movements the ground is str chimerical projects, which have to be cleared away after fruitless experiment, before much progress can At the beginning of the struggle two such schemes h influence in Italy. One was that of the priest Giob dreamed of a league of Italian States for the expuls contingency had arrived. The Pope appointed a Ministry, in which the laity were preponderated; and in 1848 he granted a Constitution, which was to include a popular assembly. For a time, too, it seemed as if he favoured a coalition with Sardinia for the expulsion of the Austrians from Lombardy. But when in March, 1848 the decisive moment arrived, and Sardinia declared war against "the foreigner," the Pope, after some hesitation, abandoned the national cause. The "Supreme Head" of Catholicism could not bring himself to join in a warlike combination against a Catholic State; and his desertion, when it was followed by the inglorious campaign of Custozza, left much bitterness behind. It is not pretended that the small forces of the Pope, if they had been freely, instead of involuntarily, employed in the work of liberation, would have sufficed to turn the scale; it was his moral support that was all-important, and this, under the influence of his retrograde advisers, was resolutely withheld. The utter failure of Gioberti's scheme, just at the moment when it seemed to be succeeding, brought Mazzini and his party to the front; the Pope's Minister was murdered and his Government overthrown; and the disillusioned Pontiff had to seek refuge at Gaeta. But the six months' Republic, in which Mazzini was virtually dictator, had from the first no chance of success. The sovereignty of the Pope at Rome, like that of the "Sick Man" at Constantinople, seemed necessary to lull the mutual jealousy of the European Powers; and Pius was reinstated by the arms of France and under her protection. Here Mr. Johnston's history closes; and the fulness and impartiality of his narrative make it superfluous for him to point a moral.

To one trifling the main blemish in a most interesting book, which is based upon a careful comparison of authorities, lies in its peculiar title. The originator of the term "Theocracy" was Josephus, who invented it to describe the Jewish commonwealth under the Law of Moses. Strictly speaking, it applies only to that commonwealth before the time of the Kings, when the people had no visible ruler; but in a sense it can be used of the later period in so far as the Kings were forced to obey the accredited messengers of the Most High. And without much impropriety it may be applied to the empire which Hildebrand and Popes of his class aspired to exercise over the whole European society; because, selfish as their aims may appear in practice, yet in theory the authority which they claimed for the Church over all civil States was supposed to derive directly from God. But to speak, as Mr. Johnston does, of "the Roman Theocracy" (meaning thereby merely the rule of the Pope and his clerical advisers over the States of the Church) appears to us a misuse of the term, which has no good authority in English, though French examples might perhaps be quoted. We do not think that the Popes have ever based their claim to the civil rule of Rome upon their supposed position as God's vicegerents. The term "Pontifical Government" would seem to meet Mr. Johnston's needs; and we are glad to note that the "Century Dictionary" lends no countenance to this restricted use of a word, which has its own proper meaning and a most instructive history.

FICTION.

Mr. Seton Merriman.

"Drawing-room melodrama" usually describes the work of Mr. Henry Seton Merriman. It certainly describes THE VELVET GLOVE (Smith, Elder, 6s.). The scene is laid in Spain, and the [illegible] "[illegible]" [illegible] ances are not always very clear. The whole s[illegible] rather like the chorus of the conspirators i[illegible] Madame Angot." But, as it is well constructed a[illegible] the people for whom it is intended will not mind [illegible] read it with pleasure, though not, if we may a[illegible] Mill's view that pleasures can be qualitatively di[illegible] pleasure of the highest sort. It confirmed u[illegible] which we have long held. The first is that Mr. [illegible] is decidedly the best of the novelists whom it [illegible] take seriously; the second that our theatrical [illegible] chance in not producing dramatic versions of his [illegible]

Winchester and Cambridge.

CHRISTOPHER DEANE (Elkin Mathews, 6s.) is [illegible] first work of fiction by the agreeable essayist o[illegible] Bohemia," Mr. E. H. Lacon Watson. It is [illegible] based on the author's own impressions of [illegible] Cambridge, but without any of the tedium [illegible] associated with autobiography. Mr. Watson ha[illegible] forgotten his "notions" or any other of the am[illegible] school, whether "up to books" or in New E[illegible] ever, have athletics been turned to such good [illegible] Mr. Watson's description of a match between Eton [illegible] challenges comparison with the account of [illegible] M.C.C. match given in "Tom Brown." Deane, [illegible] part in the contest of which his friend Ridley [illegible] author himself) is the anxious spectator. Re[illegible] highest point when Ridley, strolling nervously r[illegible] encounters the cricket professional, Hunter. "[illegible] was too full for words; he turned and spat on th[illegible] simple act was perhaps more eloquent than al[illegible] harangues of the energetic Chapman, the t[illegible] described rowing coach who afterwards exhorts [illegible] from the banks of the Cam. But Mr. Watson' [illegible] athletics. A very pretty comedy of rural life an[illegible] Inn runs through the book. Without the help o[illegible] incident the author impels attention by his geni[illegible] quiet study of familiar characters. Most of [illegible] Mrs. Venables, the querulous wife of a count[illegible] regards "atheism with almost as much horror a[illegible] Clare Venables is an excellent study of a flirt, t[illegible] good-humoured tolerance and insight.

Stevensonian.

Mr. Neil Munro is an author from w[illegible] considerable things, in spite of his subjection [illegible] of the late R. L. Stevenson. He has done [illegible] past, and no doubt he will do still better work i[illegible] THE SHOES OF FORTUNE (Isbister, 6s.) is not alto[illegible] It begins admirably, and we are prepared for [illegible] Sects romance in the Stevensonian manner. [illegible] nephew of Andy Greig gets over to France [illegible] speckle "red shoes of his uncle) the interest of [illegible] a sad eclipse. There are adventures enough, it [illegible] do not wholly convince. Father Hamilton, t[illegible] has a touch of real character, but the other pe[illegible] are not remarkable.

Melancholia of the Southern Cross.

But for the convenience of classification [illegible] whether one should consider MY BRILLIANT CA[illegible] 6s.) to be in the ordinary sense a novel. The [illegible] Franklin," addresses her "dear fellow-Australi[illegible]

> This is not a romance. I have too often f[illegible] life to the tune of hardship to waste time [illegible] gushing over fancies and dreams; neither [illegible] simply a yarn—a real yarn.

Her book is crude, overwrought, and often d[illegible] same time, deeply marked with the rare qu[illegible] It deals with the commonplaces as well as the r[illegible] life and the emotions of a passionate woman r[illegible] a young and powerful people. The best critic[illegible] doubtless, its introducer, Mr. Henry Lawson [illegible] "While the Billy Boils," who says of it, "th[illegible] danseuse, and the smoke of club life and drawing-room gossip all contribute to the atmosphere of a strong story. It is a careful study of a man with rare gifts of persuasion and oratory, but inwardly infirm of purpose. His brilliant qualities make for success in politics, but his weakness allows him to enjoy a too great success in love. Confront this man with two women—one vagrant, goodhearted, but unconventional, the other cultured, romantic, and innocent—and we have the problem. The dialogue is amusing, but the hero is a little too prone to indulge in monologues and unnecessary definitions. There is an old recipe of the St. James's Theatre. Take a well-known word—the more obvious its meaning the better; insert "Ah," repeat the word and define flippantly. Let us not forget the importance of being earnest. Mr. Headlam, whose style is much above the average novelist's, has no need to cast about for these pretty definitions. He describes most amusingly the pangs of a young writer's first attempt, and the laughable attitude taken up by country folk to their prospective M.P. His book contains plenty of perspicuous comment and more than one dramatic scene; and Ted Bowness, the honest, uncompromising young squire, his Aunt Doreas—as forbidding and as good natured as Betsy Trotwood—and Monckton, the club cynic, are distinctly well-drawn characters.

American Stories.

The scene of Mr. R. H. Savage's CAPTAIN LANDON (Ward, Lock, 6s.) is laid in Rome. Otherwise there is nothing to justify the author in describing it as a story of modern Rome. His characters are taken almost without exception from the little colony of Americans, official or pleasure-seeking, the counterpart of which is to be met with in any European capital. The hero is a young officer, who, for reasons that remain mysterious till the last chapter, has left the United States army and drifted into the Consular service. Stationed in Rome, he promptly falls in love with an acquiescent heiress from Philadelphia, and thereby incurs the bitter hostility of a wealthy compatriot, an absurdly exaggerated type of the American millionaire. The rivalry between the two men sets the American colony by the ears, and furnishes the theme of the story. Despite several effective situations, the tale is much inferior in every way to "My Official Wife." All the old peculiarities of style appear again, and the author's habit of sprinkling his pages in season and out of season with scraps of foreign languages seems to be growing upon him. As a master of the art of periphrasis he remains inimitable. Here is the description of his hero's arrival in Rome:—

> The shades of night already invited rest, and the white stars sparkled like diamonds over the dusky ilex shades under the Pincian when the friends counted up all the disjecta membra of their luggage rescued from the Fra Diavolos of the customs and the Robert Macaires of the Universal Brotherhood of Insolent Railway Porters.

MEMORY STREET, by Martha Baker Dunn (Jarrold, 6s.), is an American tale, which, if it occasionally lapses into sentimentality, is saved by the undoubted humour of the heroine, who tells the story in her own person. As a child she is delightful, and spends her church hours in constructing a little personal scheme of the Deity, which, despite its quaintness, her parents are sensible enough to see contains no irreverence. It is an attractive book.

SISTER CARRIE (Heinemann, 1s.) bears upon its back the American eagle with outspread wings, and contains within its green covers a larger assortment of Americanisms than we have seen for a long time in print. Mr. Theodore Dreiser is the author, and he has given us a picture of a young girl who tries to find work in Chicago, but finds instead two young men. The first, Drouet, a "drummer" or commercial traveller, ruins her; but she equalizes matters more or less by most effectually ruining Hurstwood, the second. There is cleverness in the contrasting of the two men's characters, and the gradual descent of Hurstwood from a successful business man to a ragged loafer in the streets of New York is well done. The book is not exactly strates again his poetic grasp of the elusive but spirit of the South.

Miss Jessie van Zile Belden's ANTONIA (Murray, with a quotation about "Dutch tulips." It then pe dedication

To Holland
Silent—Sturdy—Indomitable—
Who wrested a Nation from the Sea, &c.

and to a "Publisher's Note" about new Amsterd a page or two of historical matter brings us to t preface. When at last we get to the story w fairly entertaining account of life as it may have been world in the seventeenth century, told in a careful, and, as it seems to us, somewhat insincere style.

CIRCUMSTANCE, by S. Weir Mitchell, M.D., LL.D. and Edinburgh (Macmillan, 6s.), has its scene in A deals with a clever adventuress and the people whose affects. The good women of the story present by no usual insipid contrast. They each have a strong which holds the reader. The flirtatious Kitty is a study. The book is printed on thick, shiny paper whi defect of its quality. It is not heavy to read, but heavy to hold.

BERGEN WORTH (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), by Mr. Wal is a powerful story with a pronounced American fla story opens in Chicago and the denouement take Monte Carlo. But the main incidents occur at t line"—a highway between two towns, most of w swamp in which unwary travellers were engulfed. were rough and given to profanity and pugnaciousne there were one or two delightful people in the b Bergen Worth, the blacksmith, and Nera Delvan, melodramatic story is told with a good deal of origi

THE CONTINENTAL DRAGOON (Ward, Lock, brisk told tale of the American Rebellion. Mrs Philips, a handsome young lady of fiery temperam loyalist, but fate throws her into the company of Har an officer in the Rebel Army. By a stratagem not p honourable he disarms her animosity and in the end is his own petard. Mr. Stephen does not sacrifice facts

In THEY THAT TOOK THE SWORD (John Lan Nathaniel Stephenson takes us to Cincinnati, at the Civil War. Amy Golding is "sweet seventeen" an her cousin, Captain Vincent Kainson of the Federal A she will never marry a man who has worn the "b uniform!" So there is a battle royal in her hea politics and love, and with her warmth of affection intellect she is charmingly portrayed. Some of t battles fought on the Ohio are given with great skill. There is a simple and pretty ending to this thri

How, exactly, can one describe reminiscences re the form of short stories? The facts of Marion Harla COUNTY (Putnam's Sons, 6s.) are vouched for, yet over t tion hovers a novelist's imagination. However th described, these garnered memories of old Virgini very agreeable reading. For a really absorbing, unex unexplainable ghost-story we recommend "The Lethe But the tales are mostly simple sketches of the Vir of half a century ago, with its culture and its Pur liberal hospitality, its paternal attitude towards colo so well illustrated in "Marthy," the most pathet stories. By a happy thought the stories are illustrated lent photographs of the actual scenes of the book.

LORDS OF THE NORTH, by A. C. Laut (Heine another specimen of the capital little "dollar American fiction." The series will give this count idea of home-grown American novels than it will eve the writers who cater as much for the English p their own. The present book is a little difficult to g it repays the reader who perseveres with its vivid pic great rivalry of the Hudson's Bay Company and the N Every page in it is stirring, and it persuades one th

LIBRARY NOTES.

A year ago the University library at Aberdeen was opened to the public subject to the payment of a small fee. Full advantage, it was thought, would be taken of this privilege, but it now appears that only twenty-four readers have availed themselves of it. Shall we take this as a recondite compliment to the public library? It may be that Aberdonians are so well satisfied with the knowledge obtained for one penny in the pound that with proverbial canniness they decline to pay five shillings for further enlightenment. However, the experiment is to be continued for another year in the hope of some better result.

The youngest organized body of library workers—the Northern Counties Library Association—has issued its first annual report. The number of libraries or societies represented is thirty-seven, and during the year successful meetings were held at various centres.

The Kensington Borough Council have accepted an offer by the committee of Leighton-house for the transfer to the public of the building and its valuable art collection. This step of the Kensington Council is an advance towards the day when library, art gallery, and museum shall everywhere be formed into a triune academy.

The reports of the Cardiff public libraries are usually of interest, and the thirty-ninth, just issued, is no exception to the rule. The books in the libraries number over 95,000, and the new branch lending libraries have not caused a decrease in the issues from the central institution. The circulation of 450,000 divides roughly into—fiction 105,000, juvenile literature 200,000, and other classes (non-fiction) 145,000. The acquisition of the Scott collection of Welsh manuscripts and books we noticed at the time. The efforts at Cardiff for a closer union between library and school have resulted in school libraries, comprising 9,000 volumes, under the direct control of the teachers, supervised by the librarian. We believe that the system is more complete than any even in America. It includes visits of scholars to the reference libraries and the grant of a borrower's ticket upon leaving school.

An article on early magazines in Victoria is continued in the third issue of "The Library Record of Australia." Nearly all these periodicals came to a premature end. A pregnant commentary is supplied by an editorial note complaining of the failure of librarians in Australia to support their association, and, through that, their journal. We trust that precedent will not be followed out too far, and that colonial craftsmen will appreciate the use of having some corporate and articulate voice of their own.

Dundee has again been favoured with a munificent gift. Following Mr. Carnegie's offer of £37,000 comes a valuable local collection, comprising paintings, books, pamphlets, coins, and charters, all relating to the town, and comprising some 10,000 items. They were gathered together by Mr. A. C. Lamb during thirty years, but upon his death were acquired and presented by Mr. Edward Cox, son of the first chairman of the public library committee.

Those invaluable friends of the forgetful, Messrs. Charles Straker, send us their varied series of "Pettitt's Diaries" for the new year—the large "Folio Diary" (1s. 6d.), the small "Octavo" (1s.), and the "Narrow Foolscap Diary" (1s.), each with three days on one page, and the "Quarto Diary" (1s.), each page taking the entries of a week. These are, as usual, supplemented with almanacs and a wilderness of informing tables—including the New Companies Act—and interleaved with blotting paper. For the richer diarist there are more sumptuous editions of the "Octavo Diary," increasing to 3s. 6d., and of the "Folio Diary," devoting a whole page to one day, and swelling to 3s. 6d. "Blackwood's Three Days Diary" (3s.) is a quarto

Correspondence

"SHAMELA."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In her valuable study of Richards September last year, Miss Clara L. Thomson c I believe for the first time in print—to the ne from his letters to which your correspond Thomson also pointed out, as supporting her Fielding wrote "Shamela," that "Mr. B." is in the pamphlet (which preceded "Joseph "Mr. Booby." There is other evidence believed Fielding to have written "Shamel also other internal evidence in support of ship. Still, Richardson's hostility to Fieldi rate and so unreasoning that I should hes "Shamela" as Fielding's "famous parody" firmatory testimony from the other side. S testimony, at present, I have failed to find. I question is, of necessity, discussed in my forth Richardson in the "Men of Letters" Series.

Faithfully yours,

AUST

75, Eaton-rise, Ealing, W., Dec. 16.

THE GOSPEL RIOTS AT AT

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Rouse replies more courteou fairly to the Greeks. He evidently knows t muleteers of Greece better than its very large and in his sympathy for the rougher elements (my northern blood leads me fully to share) real representatives of the nation. The passag from the Acropolis is in the stilted style of journ often enough in English leading articles; but it w understood in every part of the Hellenic world spent last spring in the remotest district days' ride from a town or port of any conseque near which I was encamped, has never seen head man and its schoolmaster wear the nat with the poorest hinds. It suffered a great stay, and, on behalf of the Cretan Fund, I offe This is in part how it expressed itself in ackno

Εὔχεται προσέτι ὅπως ὁ Πανάγαθος Θεὸς σκέπῃ τὴν κραταιὰν Αὐτοῦ προστασίαν τὸ Εὐγενέστατον τὰ φιλελληνικὰ αἰσθήματα ἀείποτε ἐπεδείξαντα ἀλη τὴν σκληρῶς δοκιμαθεῖσαν Πατρίδα μας.

Now this was written, of course, by a Demarch, the schoolmaster, and the priest; take to say that, when read to the company in house, before being sent to me, it was perfectl by every one present. The villagers do not co and stately words, but neither do I, nor does an write.

It really seems worse than futile to att this matter. If ever a nation has a right to itself it has absolute right to determine its langu have chosen, not in Athens only, but in the Epirus, and on the isles and coasts of Asia, to dis suitable for their common literary language,

"'VARSITY JOURNALISM."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Although 'Varsity journalism is not a subject of very much importance, it is a pity it should be treated by anonymous Oxonians writing in amazing English and with considerable inaccuracy. As one of the founders and editors of the X, I should like to protest against the suggestion that either the staff or the staff's opinions suffered much change during its career. Of the four original editors, one resigned after the second number; of the other three, two continued to edit the periodical till its death; the third, while resigning his editorial duties a year before the demise, always kept up a fairly close connexion with the paper. The vacant place caused by the resignation of one of the founders was immediately filled by two gentlemen, who remained on the staff till within a year of the burial of the X; and it was certainly under the government of this Ministry of all the talents that the X flourished most in popularity and finance. Why your contributor should bring against either the X or the Quad (which was edited, as its title-page could have told him, by the same gentleman from its birth to its untimely and accidental end) the charge of aestheticism is a mystery as obscure to me as the English which he uses to convey his accusation. How any one, who knew anything about 'Varsity journalism could state that the X fell into the hands of a clique, when its staff had no addition made to it since the second number, except for its last summer term, when it received the extremely able support of a business-like assistant editor; or how any one with a ghost of the critical faculty could find aestheticism in the Quad, I cannot conceive; and if he knows nothing of 'Varsity journalism (as I suspect), and has no critical faculty (as I am certain), why in the name of the 'Varsity did he send you his notes on Undergraduate journalism?

I am yours faithfully,

R. ELLIS ROBERTS.

St. John's College, Oxford, December 14, 1901.

P.S. I should just wish to add that of course the X has no claim to rank as the "forerunner" of light journalism in Oxford. While the Isis is still with us and the J.C.R. (with the inimitable H. B.) a fragrant memory, such a claim would be absurd.

Books to look out for at once.

"The Lady Poverty: A Thirteenth-Century Allegory." Translated by Montgomery Carmichael. Murray. 5s.
[See under Notes.]

"Cromwell on Foreign Affairs." By F. W. Payn. Cambridge University Press. 2s. 6d. net.
[See under Notes.]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

ART.

RELIGION IN RECENT ART. By P. T. Forsyth. 9×6¾. 316 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 10s. n.
[These are lectures, not for students of art but others, on Rossetti, Burne-Jones, Watts, Holman Hunt, and Wagner: which attempt to apply the methods of expository preaching to art and music.]

REMBRANDT. By Malcolm Bell. (Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture.) 8×5¾. 136 pp. Bell. 5s. n.
[Reduced for this well-known series of handbooks from Mr. Bell's large work on Rembrandt published in 1899.]

ART SALES OF THE YEAR 1901. Ed. by J. Herbert Slater. 9×5¾. 534 pp. Virtue. 30s. n.
[The first volume of an annual issue on the same principle as "Book Prices Current," by the same editor, with extensive notes and

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

FIRST MAKERS OF ENGLAND. By Lady M[illegible]. 7[illegible] Murray. 1s. 6d.
[Studies, for children, of Julius Caesar, Arthur, and [illegible]

THE LAST FORWARD. By S. L. M[illegible]. 7[illegible]×5, 15[illegible] Johnson. 3s. 6d. n.
[A collection of stories of school life.]

IN MEMORY OF W. V. By William C[illegible]. 7[illegible] Dent. 3s. 6d.
[Recollections—partly by Mr. Caton himself in [illegible] memoir, sketches, and poems, partly by a girl [illegible] of [illegible] little daughter, who inspired his charming "W.V." Her LA FONTAINE'S FABLES. Illustrated by M. B. De M[illegible] 48 pp. S.P.C.K. 6s.

[Adapted for children on a large decorative page [illegible] lightly-coloured Illustrations.]

DRAMA.

THE LIARS. By Henry Arthur Jones. 6¾×4¾. 120 pp. [illegible]millan Co. 2s. 6d.
[Ran at the Criterion from October 6, 1897, till N[illegible]ve[illegible]

THE PARTING and WAITING FOR THE TRAIN. By [illegible] FitzGerald. (Carpet Plays.) 5¼×4¼. 44 pp. Brimley Jo[illegible]
[The Parting was produced under Mr. Alexander's [illegible] in 1899, and Waiting for the Train at Terry's Theatre in 1[illegible]

JEAN. By H. Tight. 7¾×5. 92 pp. Stock. 2s. 6d.
[The scene is a Swiss monastery where Jean's mo[illegible] where he discovers his father in the person of a Ca[illegible] written in prose.]

EDUCATIONAL.

THE TEACHERS' MANUAL OF COMPOSITION. By [illegible] Vol. I.—Junior Course. 7×4⅞in., 154 pp. Macmillan. [illegible]
[For elementary school masters.]

VIRGIL: GEORGICS I. (Blackwood's Classical Texts.) Sargeaunt. 7×4¾. 76 pp. Blackwood. 1s. 6d.
[Pictures, notes, introduction, and an appendix on th[illegible] lower boys.]

VIRGIL'S AENEID. Book II. Ed. by M. T. Tatham. 7[illegible] Arnold. 1s. 6d.
[As in Book I. the new Oxford text is used, with ext[illegible] vocabulary, and an introduction on Virgil's life and t[illegible] metre, and subject of the Aeneid.]

PRACTICAL CHEMISTRY. By R. Abegg and W. Herz. [illegible] H. T. Calvert. 7¼×5, 118 pp. Macmillan. 6s.
[This translation from the German purports to supply [illegible] beginner with a guide based upon modern physical chemist[illegible]

FICTION.

THE NEW AMERICANS. By A. Hodder. 7¾×5. 472 pp. M[illegible]
[A quiet and leisurely tale of American upper class so[illegible]

A PARISH SCANDAL. By Mrs. C. Marshall. 8×5[illegible] Stock. 6s.
[The story of a typical London congregation, of the [illegible] affairs and encounters with his parishioners.]

THE CIGARETTE SMOKER. By C. R. Gr[illegible]. 7¾×5, 15[illegible] 2s. 6d.
[The gradual tragic fate of a slave to cigarette smokin[illegible]

THE ROMANCE OF AN EMERGENCY. By Mrs. G. [illegible] 394 pp. Drane. 6s.
[A novel of quiet country life a generation or two a[illegible] the hero and his family are Quakers.]

HISTORY.

THE DIAMOND NECKLACE. By F. Funck-Brentano. [illegible] H. S. Edwards. 8×5¼. 350 pp. Macqueen. 6s.
[A translation of the book based on recently discovers[illegible] which was reviewed by us on August 10.]

YEAR BOOKS OF THE REIGN OF KING EDWARD [illegible] XVIII. Edited by L. O. Pike. 10×6¾. 661 pp. Eyre [illegible] woode.
[Another volume of this important issue under the [illegible] the Master of the Rolls, with full introduction by the Edi[illegible]

THE DISCOVERY OF THE SOLOMON ISLANDS BY A[illegible] MENDANA IN 1568. 2 Vols. Ed. by Lord Amherst [illegible] and B. Thomson. 9×5¾. 428 pp. The Hakluyt Society. [illegible]
[Second Series, No. VII. Two volumes translate[illegible] original Spanish MSS. Introduction and notes.]

LITERATURE AND BELLES-LETTRES.

NEW GLIMPSES OF POE. By J. A. Harrison. 9×5½, 78pp. The De la More Press.

[Suggested in defence of Poe by a Professor at Virginia University, where a Poe Memorial Association has been started.]

THE TRAGEDY OF SIR FRANCIS BACON. An appeal for further investigation and research. By H. Bayley. 8×5½, 274 pp. Grant Richards. 6s. n.

[Accepts the Baconian authorship of Shakespeare, the cypher, and Queen Elizabeth as the mother of Bacon. The argument is largely founded on the use of Renaissance symbols, in watermarks, &c., in the printing of Bacon's and Shakespeare's books.]

MORAL NERVE AND THE ERROR OF LITERARY VERDICTS. By F. Jessup, F.R.C.S. 7½×5, 141 pp. Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d. n.

[The author is consulting surgeon to the Queen's Hospital. His thesis is that all human character and activities are explicable only as the result of nerve force, and applies the thesis to typical men and periods of history, showing that the moral verdicts of writers such as Tennyson, Mill, and Carlyle ignore it and are, therefore, erroneous.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

HAZELL'S ANNUAL FOR 1902. Hazell, Watson, and Viney. 5s. 6d. n.

[With a large number of new articles.]

A KALENDAR OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH (1902). 7½×5, 364pp. Burleigh. 1s. 6d.

COUNTY COURT PRACTICE MADE EASY, OR DEBT COLLECTION SIMPLIFIED. By a Solicitor. 7½×5, 152pp. Effingham Wilson.

CLERGY DIRECTORY, 1902. 7½×5, 806 pp. Phillips. 4s. 6d.

[One disappearance annual more.]

NATURAL HISTORY.

INSECT LIFE. By J. H. Fabre. Translated from the French by the Author of "Mademoiselle Mori." Edited by F. Merrifield. 2½×5, 320 pp. Macmillan. 3s.

[Fabre is one of the most famous of insect observers and a graphic and [illegible] writer. Darwin thought very highly of him, though he [illegible]. He here deals mainly with the instinct of Hymenoptera. Many illustrations.]

THE UNDERGROUND WATERING OF PLANTS AND GARDENS. By J. Gray. 7×4, 77 pp. Ward, Lock. 1s.

[A small pamphlet. The author has invented bamboo water spikes to be thrust into the ground, the water to be poured through the spikes so as to moisten the ground beneath the surface.]

NAVAL AND MILITARY.

TYPES OF NAVAL OFFICERS. By A. T. Mahan. 8½×6, 478pp. Sampson Low.

[The period is from 1781 to 1815, and the types are Hawke, Rodney, Howe, Jervis, Saumarez, and Pellew. There is an introductory chapter on the "Conditions of Naval Warfare at the Beginning of the Eighteenth Century."]

ESSAI DE PSYCHOLOGIE MILITAIRE INDIVIDUELLE ET COLLECTIVE. Par Dr. M. Campeano. 7½×5, 214 pp. Paris, Baudoin. 1 f. 2.

[An elementary study of the moral of an army from a psychological point of view by an "médecin militaire."]

PHILOSOPHY.

THE ART OF LIFE. By R. De Maulde La Clavière. Translated by G. H. Ely. 7½×5, 342 pp. Sonnenschein. 6s.

[General reflections on various aspects of every-day conduct, partly reprinted from the Monthly Review].

THE WORLD AND THE INDIVIDUAL. By Josiah Royce. 8½×5½, 400 pp. The Macmillan Co. 12s. 6d. n.

[Based on the second series of the author's Gifford Lectures (1900) bearing "Nature, Man, and the Moral Order."]

THE CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS. By E. T. Campagnac. 7½×5½, 252 pp. Clarendon Press. 3s. 6d. n.

[This contains—with biographical introduction—extracts from the writings of Benjamin Whichcote, John Smith, and Nathaniel Culverwel. The editor is Assistant Lecturer in Classics at Cardiff.]

POETRY.

SONNETS OF EMPIRE. By Laura Ackroyd. 6½×3½, 63pp. Brimley Johnson. 2s. 6d.

[Sonnets and Lyrics of much merit, many from the Pall Mall Gazette, commended in a Preface by Sir Frederick Young.]

POLITICAL.

THE RIGHTS OF MAN. A Study of Twentieth Cent[illegible] L. Aucott. 8½×5½, 375 pp. J. Clarke. 6s.

[Lectures delivered in 1901 before the Lowell I[illegible] and the Brooklyn Institute on the rights of man in [illegible] Society, and the fundamental principles of governm[illegible] reference to the United States.]

COMMERCIAL GEOGRAPHY OF FOREIGN NA[illegible] Boon. (Methuen's Commercial Series). 7½×5. 1[illegible]

[A companion volume to Mr. Lyde's book in t[illegible] Commercial Geography of the British Empire."]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIO[illegible]

NORTHANGER ABBEY. By Jane Austen. (Th[illegible] 6½×4. 273pp. Methuen. 1s. 6d. n.

[As in the other volumes, there is an Introdu[illegible] Lucas.]

THE FLOWERING OF THE ALMOND TREE. (Poe[illegible] Burke. 8×5½. 153pp. Blackwood. 1s.

A BOOK OF SPIRITUAL INSTRUCTION (Institu[illegible] Blosius. Trans. from the Latin by Bertrand A. W[illegible] 136pp. Art and Book Company.

[First Ed., March, 1900. With Cardinal Vaugh[illegible]

THE COMPANIES ACT, 1900. With Commentaries a[illegible] Simonson. Second Edition. 10×6½, 151 pp. E.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS. DOMBEY AND SON. ([illegible] Ed. of Dickens' Works. 7×4½. Chapman and Hal[illegible]

[Two more volumes in this handy little edi[illegible] and printed on fine paper. The volume containi[illegible] also "Reprinted Pieces," "The Lamplighter," [illegible] Dusk," and "Sunday under Three Heads."]

THE FAIR MAID OF PERTH. ANNE OF GEI[illegible] Walter Scott. (New Century Library.) 8×4, 5[illegible] 2s. n. each.

LOVE POEMS OF SIR J. SUCKLING. (The [illegible] 5½×3, 120 pp. Lane. 1s. 6d.

[Another of these diminutive and decorative v[illegible]

IN MEMORIAM. By Alfred Tennyson. ISOPE[illegible] George Borrow. (The Red Leather Libra[illegible] 363 pp. Hodder and Stoughton. 2s. 6d. n. each.

["In Memoriam" has a commentary and [illegible] "Isopel Berners" is edited, with an introduction [illegible] Thomas Seccombe.]

SCOTT'S MARMION. (Blackwood's English Cla[illegible] A. Mackie. 276 pp. Blackwood. 1s. 6d.

[Introduction, notes, and frontispiece portrait.]

THE NEWCOMES. By W. M. Thackeray. 7½×5, [illegible] 3s. 6d.

[With facsimiles of the original wrapper and t[illegible]

HOW WE ESCAPED FROM PRETORIA. By Capt. [illegible] 7½×5, 231 pp. Blackwood. 5s.

[A new edition giving a fuller account of [illegible] Haldane (2nd Batt. Gordon Highlanders). Maps [illegible]

THEOLOGY.

THE REVISED VERSION OF THE BIBLE. B[illegible] D.D. 6½×4½, 138pp. S.P.C.K. 2s.

[The Bishop of Gloucester's charge to th[illegible] Cirencester last October.]

IN HEAVEN'S PORCH. By H. Clement. 7½×3[illegible]

[A religious fancy. Paper bound.]

INNS OF COURT SERMONS. By the Rev. H. C. [illegible] 228pp. Macmillan. 1s. 6d.

THE TEACHING OF JESUS. By George B. Steve[illegible] The Macmillan Co. 3s. 6d.

["A text-book for Schools and Bible classes [illegible] private study."]

THE SECOND ADVENT AND PRAYER. By A Pa[illegible] 51 pp. Skeffington. 1s. n.

[A little book founded on four sermons on pra[illegible]

A STUDY OF MODERN ANGLICANISM. By [illegible] 223 pp. Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.

[A candid examination by a moderate Churchm[illegible] of Anglo-Catholicism.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVE[illegible]

FAMOUS HOUSES OF BATH AND DISTRICT. [illegible] 10½×6½. 214pp. J. and H. F. Meehan. 10s. 6d. n.

[Mr. Meehan's interesting articles in the Bo[illegible] Bath and their famous inmates, with admirable [illegible] volume.]

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 219. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1901.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 503, 504, 505
LITERATURE PORTRAITS.—No. XXXIV. Mr. Frederic Harrison. An Appreciation by G. Le Grys Norgate ... 505
THE IMPORTANCE OF ADOLPHE—A "Personal View," by Francis Gribble 507
ABELARD 508
LONDON-BRIDGE AND ITS ASSOCIATIONS 509
THE "BOTANIC GARDEN," by E. H. Lucon Watson 600
"THE LIFE OF THE SAILS"—Poem 602
THE DOVES PRESS 603
CURRENT LITERATURE—
Recent Verse 603, 604, 605, 606
La Philosophie d'Auguste Comte—La Sociologie chez Auguste Comte—The Letters of Auguste Comte 606
St. Gilbert of Sempringham—Saints in Christian Art—Saint Jerome—The Dominican Saints—Francis, the Little Poor Man of Assisi—Joan of Arc 607, 608
Kiartan the Icelander—Aphrodite against Artemis—Gioconda—Laboremus—Rienzi and Ygraine—Sintram: A Drama 609, 610
Frederick the Great on Kingcraft—Origen—Muhammad and his Power—History of Intellectual Development on the Lines of Modern Evolution—From Squire to Prince—Apollonius of Tyana—Caius College—Stringer Lawrence—Recent Finnish Literature 610, 611, 612
The Wooing of Sheila—An Episode on a Desert Island—The Story of Eva—The Skipper of Barncraig—Lady Christ—The Greatest of These—Black Mary—Lord Culmore's Error—Glendarroch—Blue Bonnets Up—The Extermination of Love—The Triumph of Hilary Blachland—One Life Between—Mary Anne of Parchment Buildings—A Set of Flats—A Fool's Year—"Mad" Lorrimer—A Modern Slave Dealer—A Black Vintage—A Journey to Nature—Retaliation—A Child of Art—Manassch—The Most Famous Lobs, &c. 612, 613, 614
CORRESPONDENCE—Lapsed Copyrights—"Varsity Journalism"—Sussex Records—The Microcosm, Man, in Shakespeare 614, 615
BOOKS TO LOOK OUT FOR 616
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 616

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

* * * *

Books to read just published:

"The Mission of Margaret." By Adeline Sergeant. John Long.

"Rural Life in Hampshire." By the Rev. W. W. Capes. Macmillan.

"Luke Delmege." By Father Sheehan. Longmans.

* * * *

A rush of reprints of "The Mill on the Floss" is expected next Spring, when the copyright of the work expires. "I am grateful and yet rather sad to have finished," wrote George Eliot to John Blackwood in sending the last pages of the book on March 22nd, 1860, "sad to think I shall live with my people on the Floss no longer. But it is time I should go and absorb some new life and gather fresh ideas." "'The Mill on the Floss' achieved," she wrote in her journal, "a greater success than I had ever hoped for it. The subscription was 3,000 (the number originally printed was 4,000); and shortly after its appearance, Mudie having demanded a second thousand, Blackwood gave her £300 for publishing rights in America, and Tauch £100 for the German Edition. Already several publi reprints in hand for the coming expiration of copy withstanding the several new editions of George El published by Messrs. Blackwood this year. The reprints, which have sold well, did not prevent nine lishers from issuing "Adam Bede" as soon as the c that work expired at the beginning of the year.

* * * *

Herr Lutz, the Stuttgart publisher, writes to us:

"People are great readers in Germany and a gre matter is printed; nevertheless the output of books, e novels, is comparatively astonishingly small. We hear editions of novels in England, France, and in the Un of America—of editions which often, in a very few their publication, run to hundreds of thousands. Ther like this in Germany. Our most celebrated novel attain in the course of several decades to anything a varying from 10,000 to 50,000. The largest sale at novel—Scheffel's 'Ekkehard'—in the course of th years reached 180,000 copies. Among new novels authors an edition rarely reaches 10,000 in the co first and second years.

"But it is not about German publication th write, but of the sale in Germany of celebrated E American works in German translations. Their fort sponds to the very small sale of our own authors. As a admirer of English literature, I have made an introduce into Germany by means of the best translati of the best novels which may rightly claim to be admired in all cultured lands, and I should like to result to your readers. I published in 1890 the tr Barrie's 'Window in Thrums' and have reached in a sale of 202 copies. Blackmore's 'Lorna Doone' a 1894—sale 825 copies. Miss Corelli's 'Romance of Tw also appeared in 1894—sale 688. Crawford's 'A Maker's Romance' appeared in 1893—sale 513 copies.
I published an excellent selection of Mary Wilki Stories'—sale 417 copies. Miss Howard's 'Queen in 1889—sale 907. Finally, Hawthorne's famous n Scarlet Letter,' which appeared in 1897, up to now ha 507. From the financial point of view the result is t just covered costs with two of the above works; that have got back the capital spent on them. On most of has been a loss so far, and at the best I can only h back my money in the course of a few years. I sha myself lucky if I make any money on any one of the reader will agree that the choice I have made of book lation leaves nothing to be wished for; they are w in the aggregate are sold in England and America and which are dear to all friends of literature. We been wanting in recognition in Germany; several n appeared which gave them the highest praise. This wa
the case with 'Lorna Doone.' The fine translati

Yet the sale of the German translation of this book is no greater than that of those which have appeared in the Tauchnitz edition.

"It is said that in Germany the finest novels, as well of our own literature as those of foreigners, should be in such a bad way. Good taste, or in other words, literary culture in the land of poets and thinkers is not widely spread. Otherwise it would not be possible for sensational books to have so much larger a sale than good literature."

* * * *

Last week there took place two interesting book sales. The art library of Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse, and some volumes from the collection of the late Mr. Samuel Pope, K.C., attracted attention at Christie's; in Wellington-street the final book dispersal of the year comprised 197 lots of old books, many dating from the fifteenth century and most bearing a label printed "Ex Libris Lemnis, S. Olschki Bibliopolae Veneti," knocked down for an aggregate of £1,200. Some of the outstanding items in these sales and in one or two others are given below:—

	£	s.	d.
1. Flemish Horae, on fine white vellum, 22ill., 3¼ by 2¼in.	150	0	0
2. Goldsmith. Vicar of Wakefield, 1st edtn., Salisbury, 1766. 6¼ by 4in., original calf. Inscribed "Mary Ann Williams, 1810." One catch-word missing. Record price, comparing with £94 for a perhaps taller example, May, 1892	126	0	0
3. Annals of Sporting and Fancy Gazette, 1822-8, 13 vols. Plates	82	0	0
4. Pope. The Rape of the Lock, entirely uncut, 8¼ by 5¼in. 1st edtn., 1714. Record price	50	0	0
5. Dati, Goro. La Sfera. Sec. XV. Florentine MS., on vellum	38	0	0
6. Petrarch. I Trionfi. Venice, 1490. Unmentioned by Hain. Woodcuts. First and final blank leaves lacking	37	10	0
7. Dante. Comedia. Giunta, Venice, 1529. At the Gaisford sale, 1890, this volume made £19	35	10	0
8. Livius. Decades cum Notis. Venice, 1495. Woodcuts	35	10	0
9. Tory, Geoffroy. Champs Fleury. Paris, 1529	29	10	0
10. Fueros de Aragon, 1496. From the first Zaragoza press	27	10	0
11. Westmacott. The English Spy, 1825. Cruikshank illustrations	22	10	0
12. Savonarola. Operetta. Florence, c. 1496. Two outline woodcuts	22	0	0
13. Propert, J. L. Miniature Art, 1887	19	10	0
14. Eliot, George. Romola, 1st edtn., orig. cloth, uncut. "To Mr. Frost Burton, with high regards from George Eliot"	19	0	0
15. Officium. Bologna, 1498. A rare liturgical volume, soiled	14	10	0
16. Oviedo Y Valdas. Historia General de las Indias. Seville, 1535	13	0	0
17. Beckford, W. Hare and Fox Hunting, 1st edtn., 1781. Engravings	13	0	0
18. National Gallery, 3 vols., edited by Sir E. Poynter, 1899. Every picture reproduced. Publ. 6 guineas, price now asked 14 guineas	10	0	0
19. Armstrong, Sir W. Gainsborough, 1898. Plates	7	12	6
20. Westmore, P. Catalogue of Whistler Etchings, 1886; Laboune, Etchings, 1880, with plates. 2 vols.	5	17	6
21. Lister, R. J. Catalogue of Edmund Gosse's library, 1893. One of sixty-four copies	5	0	0
22. Gower, Lord Ronald. Historic Galleries of England, 3 vols., 1881-4	5	0	0
23. Armstrong, Sir W. Reynolds, 1900. A work about whose contents there has been a dispute. Published £5	4	7	6
24. Swinburne. Atalanta in Calydon, first edition	4	4	0
25. Strang, W. The Earth Fiend, large paper, 1892. Proof etchings	4	0	0
26. Williamson, G. C. John Russell, 1894	3	0	0

THE BIRTH OF CHRIST.

The sunset is not sad: its gold is worn,
Its ruined glories crumble to their do
Beyond, in phalanx behind phalanx, lo
The phantoms of innumerable morn.
The Autumn is not sad: in woods forlorn
Down desolated avenues of gloom
There float the future fragrances, the
Of all the infinite Springs that are not bo

Around the ceaseless perishing of things
The circle of eternal being runs.
We see, when Winter grips the co
A Life more lovely than the life of Spring
A Light diviner than the light of sun Along the ways that radiate from

ETHEL

* * *

A remarkable example of American bookselli
tion of a poem, which New York critics say shou Omar shelf," composed by Lee Fairchild, a well orator, and published by Messrs. Croscup and York. It is called "The Tippler's Vow," and O that the vow is one of temperance. It is wo illustration of American publishing methods. T limited edition of fourteen impressions on imperi priced at $500 (£104 3s. 4d.) each with twenty by Jean Palaeologue in triplicate, one set suitable 1,025 impressions on Holland hand-made paper numbered, and as the type is broken up no fu be issued.

Lord Wolseley, we understand, has just memoirs, which deal not only with his own car question of civilian control of the War Office.

Among the literary birthdays of next we those of Carmen Sylva (Dec. 29, 1843), Mr.
(Dec. 29, 1857), Mr. Rudyard Kipling (Dec. 30, Selous (Dec. 31, 1851).

Mr. and Mrs. Rudyard Kipling, with their sailed for South Africa on Saturday last.

The Atlantic Monthly is about to issue a n lished letters by Southey. They will probabl book form.

The Town Council of Cambridge has deci
the University in inviting the British Associati in 1904.

Several French libraries are adopting the p
the Library of Ste. Geneviève, of permittin borrowed for a term not exceeding five years shown by the borrower that their retention is work he has in hand.

A new statue to Voltaire is going to be erec near Sceaux by the Society of Aroucists.

A site has been chosen for the late M. Falg Balzac at the corner of the Rue Balzac and the land. Balzac died in a house at the other end of bears his name.

The death is announced from Cologne, at Heinrich Düntzer, the well-known comment
Schiller, and Herder.

An American counterpart of the Pearson v. is shortly to come before the courts. The parties called the Delineator and Messrs. Stokes, the hold the American rights of "The Secret Orcha

"Audrey," by Miss Mary Johnston, the a Old Dominion" and "By Order of the Compa

because the name of Dr. Smiles recalls to most of us interesting memories of the books we read in the days when we were younger. A man of letters, indeed, in the highest sense of the words, Dr. Smiles never has been and never, so far as we know, has claimed to be. Such importance as he has had and he was at one time a really important writer—depended almost entirely upon what he said and very little upon the way in which he said it. It might be affirmed of him that he was always dull except when he was preaching—a strange inversion of the usual order of things. But he preached so much that a good many people never discovered that he was dull; and his lay sermons had most of the attributes by which the discourses of most popular preachers are distinguished. His range was narrow and his energies were concentrated. He did not want to prove too much, and he did not mind repeating himself, but returned to the charge over and over again, re-establishing his thesis with fresh relays of anecdotes and illustrations. Moreover he was desperately in earnest. The revivalist's desire that his hearers should pass from a state of nature to a state of grace was not more intense than Dr. Smiles' desire that the readers of his books should walk into towns with half-crowns in their pockets, attend to orders with punctuality and despatch, merit a continuance of esteemed favours, become proprietors of great "concerns," subscribe generously to the local charitable institutions, relate the stories of their rise in life over the dinner table, and challenge the community in general to "look at them now." It was difficult to read his recommendations without being inspired with the idea that "push" was a virtue to be ranked with faith, hope, and charity, and that to add field to field was a religious exercise. In the circumstances it is not surprising that his books ran through many editions, that his name became a household word, and he himself the chosen prophet of the religious people who wanted to know how to make the best of both worlds. His position was, indeed, a proud one; and one feels a certain diffidence in estimating the exact value of his books. They have been described as "the most mischievous books ever published" a gross exaggeration. The truth which underlies it is that the ideals of Dr. Smiles are those of the middle-class materialist, and that he has but an imperfect appreciation of ideals which bear no reference to the creation, distribution, and exchange of wealth. Decidedly it is impossible simultaneously to accept the gospel according to Samuel Smiles and the gospel according to Matthew Arnold. Decidedly too, if we had to choose between the two gospels, it is for the gospel according to Matthew Arnold that we should vote. But, though the ultimate ideals conflict, neither of the gospels cover the whole of the ground, and consequently, for the practical purposes of ordinary people, they do not clash to any great extent. What may be described as the junior form work of Dr. Smiles' teaching is sound enough. He teaches energy, zeal, perseverance, attention to detail, and these are all things which should be taught. He also teaches that these qualities are causes that may be relied upon to have effects advantageous to the material interests of their possessor; and that idea also is one which should be well hammered into the heads of the young. The Law of Causation is a most consoling law to meditate upon when one is doing good work and does not quite see how it is going to be rewarded. Up to that point, therefore, Dr. Samuel Smiles has been a very valuable lay preacher. It is more difficult to follow him when he writes as though the successful business man were to be regarded as the noblest work of God. When we find him taking that line,

Literature Portraits.—XXX

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON

Frederic Harrison belongs to a class of men becoming rarer and rarer as the years go on. He i elect ones who can take a large view without becomi and slipshod. He knows both men and books; can liv the past and in the present; is able to enjoy what is is English without a touch of insularity, to imbue him the thought and literature of other countries without contemptuous eye on home products. He is an amateu amateurishness, a scholar, but no pedant. That he ha a deeper mark upon the age is due to the very versati gifts, to the extent of ground over which he has ra most of all, perhaps, to the fact of his having been an in most of the subjects of which he has treated. Th ours; the loss, if there be any and he would be the firs it himself is his own.

To the great public Mr. Harrison is the Positiv the man who fills up with his luminous annual a Newton Hall an interesting column or so in the newspa It is this which he regards as his real mission in life— the gospel of Auguste Comte; the rest are but pure this gospel, except in its esoteric developments, is no cerned; it touches and plays upon every human intere cardinal doctrine is the service of humanity. Mr. parts from John Stuart Mill when he exalts individual Matthew Arnold's doctrine of culture is to him without void. He only accepted Comtism very gradually, specifically religious side last; what took him first which most will think the strong side of the sy conception of history as a grand systematic whole. Co pupil of Dr. Arnold, was Frederic Harrison's tutor at W is a pity that men with such a grasp upon history as h H. Bridges and other Positivists like Cotter Morris have left such scanty fruits of their powers.

Mr. Harrison was singularly happy in what he "formative influences." He passed his childhood in village within easy reach of London. He witnes Palace-yard the procession at the coronation of Queen and then first began to conceive what living histo "There, too," he adds, "I first heard the roar crowd." So impressed was he, that half a-century could recall every separate scene of the day like historical pictures. At King's College the curric catholic; he was taught Italian by Mazzini's friend Saffi; he had opportunities of seeing Chartists an debates in Parliament. As a schoolboy he passed thre in France, which country he continued to visit almost for forty years. By the time he was twenty-five he also the principal cities of Germany and Northern I knew something of the language and contemporary histo At Oxford he spent some six years as undergraduat fellow and tutor of Wadham; but though he was awar class by examiners who included Mark Pattison and J congratulates himself that he was never "put through His tutors taught him to read for his mind's sake and "the schools," to use his common sense and not to rep of systems. He read what he enjoyed, and enjoyed

After leaving Oxford Frederic Harrison was called to the Bar and read for some time in the chambers of Sir Henry Maine. He practised in the Chancery Courts for some fourteen years; and afterwards was for eleven years professor of jurisprudence and international law to the Inns of Court. Meanwhile he had been a member of the Commission on Trade Unions in 1867-69, and also acted as secretary to the Commission on the Digest of the Law in the two following years. He had made himself intimately acquainted with social and economical questions by attending congresses both at home and abroad; studying questions, as he says, "on the spot," and by means of personal converse with leaders of all parties and sections. He had talked with Mazzini, Garibaldi, Puerio, and their allies in Italy; with Gambetta and the Socialist leaders in France; and had intimate relations at home with the Rochdale Pioneers and their successors. France and Italy were the dominant influences with him; Germany was, comparatively speaking, neglected, and America, I believe, he never visited till quite recently, though he always commanded a certain amount of attention across the Atlantic. In London he assisted Maurice in teaching at the Working Men's College, Great Ormond-street; he often examined both there and in Oxford. In public life he took up a semi-independent position, but generally acted with the Radicals; he stood as a Home Ruler for London University against Sir John Lubbock in 1886, and he sat for four years as an Alderman on the first County Council. But in "Order and Progress," his first important work, he severely criticized Liberal methods and ideals during the period between the Conservative Reform Bill and the return of Disraeli to power in 1874.

"Order and Progress" is made up of articles contributed to the Fortnightly Review under the editorship of Mr. John Morley. Its central thought is the maxim, "Society without a Government is no less impossible than Government without a society," and there is contained in it the first attack on culture. Frederic Harrison caught the ear of a larger public by the collection of essays which took their title from the subject of the first four, "The Choice of Books." The volume includes most of his characteristic notes as a historian and literary critic. Of the other pieces the dialogue on "Culture" seems to find out many of the weak places in Matthew Arnold's armour, but is perhaps based upon the misconception that what he meant by the word was a system of thought and not a temper of mind. Mr. Harrison, who puts Plato at the head of all prose-writers, has a great fondness for the dialogue, and displays no small skill in its management. He uses this form in later works to defend Ruskin against the mere art-critic, and in lighter vein to ridicule the butterfly-like habit, prevalent among the youth of Oxford and elsewhere, of taking little sips from the flowers of literature without any attempt at discrimination or desire for deeper draughts. The defence of the eighteenth century against the diatribes of Carlyle is effective and typical. It also shows the power of detachment of a man, who, strong in his disapproval of the Imperialism typified in Burke's epitaph on Chatham ("who made commerce to flourish by war"), could yet calmly estimate the deeds of Empire-builders like the elder Pitt. The consideration of this century, so great in music, affords him an opportunity of stating his view that music ranks next to poetry as a touchstone of civilization. In this same volume, again, we have in the essay on "Histories of the French Revolution" a penetrating conspectus of a mighty subject. Who that has read Taine's book could better the description of it as a "scintillating mosaic" which gives the described as Carlyle's conclusions modified by r worship. It was remarkable for a lucid arrange little or nothing to historical knowledge. The m the Silent is a model of this species of work, exemplified the author's notions as to history

Some six years were devoted to its preparation, a thousand documents consulted in Holland, Bel Germany, as well as in London and Paris. In the entitled "The Meaning of History" he expound gospel; but he returned to the subject in t Freeman and Froude which are included in "Ten Literary Estimates," published several years most nearly among the moderns attained to hi lived before the age of sociology. Freeman and as the two types of the modern historian; an balance between them with admirable skill. I Frederic Harrison as a literary critic I must pau to glance at that fascinating but somewhat perp
"New Calendar of Great Men." The scheme w it was his English disciples who carried it out edited the publication but wrote many of the l as those of Molière, Corneille, Madame de Sévig Madame Roland among the French; Benvenuto and several operatic artists among Italians; Vo poet, to whom he thinks Milton owed the ge "Paradise Lost"; besides Fielding and Ric noteworthy of all, however, are his articles o Palestrina, Gluck, Weber, Handel, and Mozart.

Mr. Harrison's work as a literary critic is c in the two volumes called "Studies in Early V ture" and "Tennyson, Ruskin, Mill, and other l former work is almost entirely taken up with th contains chapters also on Macaulay and Carlyle.
the general high level of mediocrity which he fin he considers to be that we have over-trained most characteristic passage, perhaps, of the earl in which he talks of this "lady-like age," in wh it all their own way with their stories of soci refined waverings of the heart. The social roman is the true poetic function of women, he assert vague possibility that an age of colour, movem may come again "some day we know not how."

Two things are particularly striking in consi Harrison as a man of letters. One is his regar style. "We of the older age," he writes, pr heavy writer like Corneille, who had nobility of t whose realism carries you away with him, but wh the core." The other thing is his extraordinarily comes out in his minute analysis of those harmon diction which he so greatly admired; and it enabl not only the defective melodies of Matthew Ar
Eliot, but even to find flaws in the almost perfec

Of his particular verdicts I cannot say m frequently contain illuminating remarks, such of a true song, in a criticism of Kingsley—It sho familiar, musically suggestive of a single tone nothing more."

Trollope and George Eliot Frederic Harrison and he heard that rather celebrated discussion be their respective modes of writing. In George Eli took a peculiar interest. He read "Felix Hol advised upon the point of law in fact act

epoch. The severities which the critic has allowed himself towards a poet, for whom he has such a high regard, he justifies, rather ineffectually, on the ground that he has been unduly exalted by indiscreet and uncritical admirers.

I cannot leave Mr. Harrison without a word about his "Annals of an Old Manor House." That charming book is itself a refutation of his disclaimers as to being a man of letters. Sutton Place, Surrey, was leased by the Harrison family in 1874. Here his father, mother, and brother successively lived, and here he passed his leisure hours. The place had memories of old Tudor and Stuart days, and the servant of humanity held it "a sort of social duty to those whom chance has thrown it in their path to preserve such wreckage of old things as the tempest of change has left." In this sentence it seems to me that we have revealed the whole man—Positivist, historian, lover of good literature.

G. LE GRYS NORGATE.

A complete list of Mr. Frederic Harrison's writings is obviously impossible in the space at our disposal. We have limited our bibliography to a selection from the seventy or so items entered in the British Museum catalogue.

Literature.

1886.—"The Choice of Books."(Macmillan.) Seventh impression.
1895.—"Studies in Early Victorian Literature." (Arnold.)
1896.—Introduction to Carlyle's "Past and Present."
1897.—"Louisa Shore's Poems, with an Appreciation by F. Harrison. (Lane.)
1899.—"Tennyson, Ruskin, Mill, and other Literary Estimates." (Macmillan.)
1901.—"The Writings of King Alfred." (Address delivered at Harvard College, March 1901.) (Macmillan, 1901.)

History and Biography.

1862.—"The Meaning of History"—two lectures. Republished with other historical pieces by Messrs. Macmillan in 1894.
1888.—"Oliver Cromwell." (Macmillan.)
1892.—"The New Calendar of Great Men: Biographies of the 558 Worthies of all Ages and Nations in the Positivist Calendar of Auguste Comte." (Macmillan.)
1893.—"Annals of an Old Manor House" (Sutton Place, Guildford). Now in an abridged edition. (Macmillan.)
1896.—"William the Silent." (Macmillan.)
1897.—"The Millenary of King Alfred." (An address delivered at Birmingham.) (Osborne and Son, Birmingham.)
1900.—"Byzantine History in the Early Middle Ages." (The Rede Lecture, 1900.) (Macmillan.)

Politics.

1867.—"Martial Law." Six letters to the Daily News. (No. 5 of the Jamaica Papers.) (Published by the Jamaica Committee.)
1868.—"The Political Function of Working Classes."
1875.—"Order and Progress."
1880.—"Martial Law in Kabul." (Reprinted from the Fortnightly Review, with additions.) (Chapman and Hall.)
1882.—"The Crisis in Egypt." (An address forming No. 2 of the Anti-aggression League Pamphlets.)
1886.—"Mr. Gladstone! or Anarchy!" (Pamphlet advocating Home Rule in Ireland.) (National Press Agency.)

Philosophy and Religion.

1878.—"The Soul and the Future Life." (Reprinted from the Nineteenth Century.)
1879.—"Science and Humanity." (Virtue.)
1885.—The Controversy between Herbert Spencer and Frederic Harrison in the Nineteenth Century and Pall Mall. (An unauthorized reprint under the title of "The Insuppressible Book," with comments by Gail Hamilton. (Cassino and Co., Boston, U.S.A.) 1886.—"The Positivist Library of Auguste Comte." (Translated

THE IMPORTANCE OF "ADOLPH

A "Personal View"

One is apt to think of Benjamin Constant merely friend and appanage of Madame de Staël. One is ind to say that it was in this capacity that he served the part of his apprenticeship to life. For the rest of his a ship he loved Madame de Charrière, the Neuchâtel Madame Talma, Madame Récamier, Madame Constant and Madame Constant the second. To have loved a women (with the possible exception of the last two) wa liberal education. Benjamin Constant, therefore—Co inconstant as the women of his period called him—h liberal educations. It cannot, indeed, be said of him t only books were women's books "since he had also s Edinburgh, at Oxford, and at certain Belgian and Ger of learning; but it was indubitably the literal educat boudoir that qualified him to do the one bit of work with his name which lives. It is forgotten that he politics and led the Liberal opposition in the Louis XVIII. It is forgotten that he was the only du ever fought a duel in a bath-chair and declared hon satisfied when the bath-chair was hit. But it is not that he wrote "Adolphe." The book marks a dist forward in the history of fiction in France—more esp those who look to the novel for the criticism of l editions of it continue to appear with introductions by as Paul Bourget and Anatole France. And "Adolp book that Benjamin Constant learnt to write by lovi
and getting tired of them.

This statement is no idle conjecture, but an establi
A few years ago there was published Benjamin diary—his Journal Intime. It is a running comment love affairs, and the emotions which they caused him, names and dates. The tone, almost invariably, is that whose emotions have tired him out and whose inabilit the emotions which he would like to feel, and clamorously demanded from him, is an abiding tra cannot be happy whether in freedom or in chains.
Madame de Staël; he tired of her; he left her; he her. When she died, he spent a night of mourning in chamber. Knowing those things—as well as other thi there is no space to recapitulate—we see clearly how autobiography there is in "Adolphe." It may not true of any of his love-stories; but it is partly true of a

As a story, no doubt, "Adolphe" is rather together. The stage management and even the stage leave much to be desired. Not only do our modern know more about these matters than he did. The no his own time, and of still earlier times, were also bett men. They knew how to present a story in pictures, could only relate one. His little narrative is perhaps a work of fiction than like a statement of a case draw counsel's opinion. But that does not matter; or at it does not matter much. Benjamin Constant was do thing though he did it clumsily. He set the conventi side, and plucked his own heart out of his breast, and it. He told the world, in the form of fiction, not wh observed, or what he had imagined, but what he had what he had felt at this or that moment of supreme but what he had felt on the whole, during illusion disillusion. He was, in short, the pioneer of the analysis, or rather of analysed experience. It is a s common genre nowadays. The novelists—more partic young novelists—who are bitten with the passion for s are like the sands of the sea-shore for multitude. B Benjamin Constant who set them the example. He w siècle (as the favourite phrase used to be) at the very
of the century.

It was the most natural thing in the world that candid, and careful attitude of the novelist towards always ready to hand. Men were deceivers ever; women had been the victims of their deceptions through the ages.

To have read "Adolphe" when saturated with these conventions must have been like entering a dark room with a guide carrying a lantern; or like hearing a new witness whose unexpected evidence, abounding in "new facts," upsets the calculations of the Court. We have, at once, a new point of view, a new emotional situation, a new psychology. It is seen and shown that a love affair may involve many other tragedies besides that of loving in vain, and that the man who, according to the conventions of fiction, is merely a heartless deceiver may be quite innocent of any guilty intention, and may himself be the principal sufferer from the failure of his emotions to answer to the call upon them.

The story is merely the story of a young man who contracted a liaison, and got tired of it, and was then divided between his desire for freedom and his sense of responsibility to his mistress. It ends with her death which brings him no joy in his emancipation, but only self-reproach and sorrow at having first wasted and then lost the precious treasure of a single-hearted love so freely offered. He has squandered his emotional substance in riotous living which he has not even enjoyed. He is an emotional bankrupt, dazed and dumbfoundered by the sense of his inability to begin his emotional life again. So that at least three tragedies, then new to literature, are involved the tragedy of fighting with society, which is strong enough to prevent lovers from attaining happiness by the violation of the rules which it prescribes; the tragedy of trying to love and failing, of fanning a fire that cannot be made to blaze; the tragedy of the sense of futility and wasted effort which comes to the lover whose love has flickered out, and who reflects that he has missed what was, perhaps, his last chance of finding happiness in love.

Benjamin Constant did not invent these tragedies; he lived through them. In fact he lived through them twice—once as the lover of Madame de Charrière, and once as the lover of Madame de Staël. The diary proves it amply. His incapacity to love with the constancy and devotion of a paladin was obviously a very real tragedy to him; that is why his analysis of the situation is so poignantly convincing. One does not suppose, of course, that he was the first man who endured the mental agony of which he writes. He was no more the first than he was the last. Love being, as even the earliest novelists knew, the most intense and absorbing of all kinds of happiness, it seems obvious that no man who had once tasted it would put it away from him deliberately and of malice aforethought; he would be no more likely to do this than deliberately to deafen or blind himself. It seems obvious too that the cœur sensible—as they said in those days—must have felt that there was tragedy in ceasing to love no less than in ceasing to be loved, and have suffered further pain from the belief, erroneous though it may have been in many cases, that the extinction of his passion would make a woman miserable for the remainder of her days. But the feeling had not yet been rendered in literature—partly because it was not perceived to be either romantic or dramatic, and partly, one suspects, because those who felt it were ashamed of themselves. In "Adolphe" this aspect of love appears in fiction for the first time; and it was discovered by the new method of critical introspection, by means of which many other "new facts" of the same order have since been brought to light by novelists. In this consists the importance of "Adolphe."

The book made no immediate stir. In a preface to the third edition the author states that even he has ceased to take much interest in it; and its influence did not begin to be very perceptible until after the romantic movement had run its course, and the gaiety of the esprit Gaulois, exemplified by Paul de Kock, had flagged. But its hour came. Critics like Paul Bourget, and Anatole France, and Maurice Barrés have recognized in Benjamin Constant the great anticipator of the most "modern" of their contemporaries—those, notably, with whom self-analysis has developed from a habit to a disease. M. Bourget himself obviously owes much to Benjamin Constant's methods. Some other famous French writers have actually retold his story and republished his ideas. Flaubert, for

ABELARD.*

Abelard the lover of Villon's "très saige Hel known than Abelard the founder of medieval and the avant-coureur of rationalism in Theol with the personality than with the intellectual this brilliant philosopher that Mr. McCab Perhaps his familiarity with scholastic logic and claims the acquaintance of all that scholastic thirteenth century to the present day have writte of "Universals"—has induced contempt for the
he was afraid that his exhaustive learning treatment with the academic taint. Certainl Abelard's teaching is as sketchy as the least readers can desire. He even, in his desire discussion, attributes to Abelard a psychologic is alien to his exclusively logical outlook. To ill idea of generalization by the composite pho guilty of the commonest and worst fault in philosophy—anachronism. Abelard did n approaching the controversy between Nominal how we are able to form a general conception predicating a general term, we predicate som a real existence. His solution was only the sol revived. The Universal has existence, but no ence. It exists only in the Individual, which alo In his assumption, however, that the Universal ence, though not separate existence, in the extern
it is found in the mind, Abelard laid the foundatio metaphysics. Like the Naturphilosophie of Schelli thought that it held the key to Nature in the a concepts. Abelard's Aristotelianism is less moment in philosophical thought than its r Church is as a religious phenomenon. The and metaphysics, at their first introduction mo of heresy, came to be regarded as the test of O notable phase of the perpetual conflict betw Faith.

The personality of the great dialecticia even to-day. Mr. McCabe's preference for the is excusable. This scion of a noble family his hereditary rights for the precarious career who confronted and overthrew, in the happy a the most subtle and learned doctors of his charm of his manner and the magic of his crowds of ardent disciples to follow hi mazes of that arid sophistry which pas was a figure worthy himself to fix the w even if he had not stood out against the tragic a history. That history has taken romance of all time.

The enthusiasm of learning had quenched t in Abelard during the most susceptible years seemed to have reached the end of his an "thought himself the first philosopher in ascetic devotion to study relaxed, and the desi born in him. He, the famous Master, the su became the favoured lover of Fulbert's niece, of Paris ring with songs of their illicit passi secret could no longer be kept from the un carried her off in the garb of a nun. Full afterwards, as he recalled the bitter humiliation. He was thrown into prison by the Abbot of St. Denis, for quoting in jest a passage of Bede which denied the identity of the patron Saint of the Abbey with Dionysius the Areopagite. When he sought refuge from a hateful world in the lonely Abbey of St. Gildas, perched on a granite crag overlooking a dark and angry sea, the unruly monks sought his life with poison and dagger. The last days of his life were made miserable by the polemical zeal of St. Bernard. Even his intercourse with Heloise, whom he had established with her nuns in his oratory of the Paraclete, was probably a source of more pain than comfort to him. The fire of her love terrified him. Her letters, thrilling, under a stiff disguise of formalism and pedantry, with untameable passion, have been the subject of rhetorical imitation from the seventeenth century till now, and the imitators have met with a success that their cold-blooded simulation did not deserve. A selection from the correspondence of the lovers may be read in a new volume of the Temple Classics, which is well edited with biographical and other matter by Miss Honnor Morten.

Mr. McCabe is rather too prone to sneer at the things which belong to the Church which he has left. His attitude to the monastic life is peculiarly misleading. The most bigoted Protestant cannot believe, in the moments of reflection, that the monastic life is alone responsible for the suppression of the joyous side of human nature. Charles Nodier voiced the despair of the generation which had seen its youth made sombre by the storms of the Revolution in the appeal "give us back our monasteries." The monastic life was as often a protest against the inherent unhappiness, as against the inherent sinfulness, of human life. The cloister was perhaps a less offence against the ideal than a loveless marriage. When the religious houses were most thronged, there were more aged mothers left destitute of affection by the selfish marriage of their sons than by their sons' vocation.

Abelard stands for the type of the conflict between Intellect and Faith, and for the type of the unhappy lover. He stands no less for the secular spirit of the Middle Ages. The Heloise idyll is a Troubadour's song clothed with reality. "If the name of wife is holier, the name of mistress is sweeter." Heloise scorned the "compulsion of the marriage vow," she desired to be united "by love alone" to the man who was as a god to her. Abelard is a Gallicized "Clerk Saunders."

And in the shame and suffering of his later days Abelard turned to the consolations of religion, and found them, perhaps, unavailing. If in his youth, before the awakening of his passions, he incurred the censure which the Church ever holds in readiness for innovators in things intellectual, in the last period of his life, when passions had been ruthlessly extirpated, he encountered the persecution which the Church will always extend to those who try to modify her dogma. Alone of all mediæval thinkers

LONDON-BRIDGE AND ITS ASSOCIAT

"Women and bridges always lack mending," wro Middleton in "The Blacke Booke," 1604. If, howeve be made aware of the contemplated outlay of tens of of pounds on the widening of London-bridge, Middle modify his facetious statement that a man could "wit keep London-bridge in reparation every fall than Bridget his wife." Yet the projected outlay on the p City authorities appears to be necessary; for, de construction eastward of the Tower-bridge, an increas tude here pass annually over the Thames.

But, in the hastening life of the twentieth cen few pause for a moment to evoke the past! A bridge ha the river hereabouts for many centuries; Mr. Ro indeed, has produced plausible, if not conclusive, arg support of the theory that the Romans could fare Middlesex to the Surrey side at this point otherwise boat. An old proverb has it that "if London-bridge eyes it would see better." On the other hand, a historic incidents are connected with it. On Londo battle has been waged; it has been a place of tou heads of traitors have been there exposed on spikes gaze; glorious pageants have crossed it; one of beautiful of Elizabethan mansions stood thereon—in

OLD LONDON-BRIDGE, LOOKING WEST.
From an old print drawn in Queen Elizabeth's time, but not published till 1624
[By permission of Messrs. Chatto and Windus.]

has answered to the pulse-beats of the metropolis onw the eleventh century.

In 1008 was fought the Battle of London-bridge, Olaf, the saintly king of Norway, assisted Ethelred the to defeat the Danes. thirteenth-century Icelandic ch Snorro Sturleson by name, describes how Olaf fast vessels to the piles of London-bridge, and thus drag the structure—an event the memory of which is perpet the name of Tooley-street, a corruption of Olaf or Olav decades thereafter, a mighty whirlwind "from Africa, ing to Florence of Worcester—caused the Thames rapidly that London-bridge was swept away; the structure, and hundreds of folk were drowned or burned, wedged in between flames from houses on either side. Moreover, a Patent Roll, temp. Edward I., mentions "innumerable people dwelling" on the bridge. The bridge of Peter of Colechurch—which stood some seventy yards east of the present one, in a line with Fish-street-hill—survived in more or less its original form until the middle of the eighteenth century. In 1757-60 the picturesque, if dilapidated and unhealthy old houses were removed, including Nonsuch House, a pile of four storeys, with elaborately carved galleries, cupolas, and turrets. Shakespeare in Henry IV., causes a messenger to announce to the king that "Jack Cade hath gotten London-bridge," nor is this by any means the only allusion to it by Elizabethan dramatists. As we have seen, the piles from the first withstood but imperfectly the force of the waters; hence repairs were constantly needed. In Ben Jonson's Staple of News Shunfield says—

> He minds
> A courtesy no more than London-bridge
> What arch was mended last.

Alike at flood and ebb-tide it was hazardous for boats, not only because of the narrow passages between the piers, but because at one time corn-mills were permitted to obstruct the openings. One of Ray's proverbs is to the effect that "London-bridge was made for wise men to go over, and fools to go under." There is a quaint passage in "A Chronicle of London," relating to the year 1429:—

> This same yere viij of November the Duke of Norfolk with many a gentilman squyer and yoman, tok his barge at Seynt Marye Overeye, between iiij and v of the belle ayens nyght, and purposed to passe thorugh London brigge, where the forseid barge thorugh mysgovernaunce of steeryng, fill upon the pyles and overwhelryd, the whiche was cause of spyllyng of many a gentilman and othere, the more ruthe was, but as God wolde, the duke hymself and too or iij othere gentylmen seenge that myschief, leped upon the pyles and so were saved thorugh helps of them that weren above the brigge, with castyng down of ropes.

The premature birth of Charles I.'s first son is attributed to the Queen's excitement in shooting the bridge on her return from Greenwich after hearing Mass; and one of Anne Killigrew's poems is entitled "On my Aunt Mrs. A. K. Drown'd under London Bridge in the Queen's Bardge, Anno. 1641." There were those, again, who took advantage of the dangerous passage between the starlings to commit suicide; among them Sir William Temple, Secretary of War, and, in 1737, Eustace Budgell, who left on his desk a slip of paper bearing the words "What Cato and Addison [the poet was a cousin of Addison] approved cannot be wrong." Canning, in his "Loves of the Triangles," alludes to the steersman who

> Shifts the thin oars, the fluttering canvas drops;
> Then with closed eyes, clenched hands, and quick-drawn breath
> Darts at the central arch, nor heeds the gulf beneath.

For long it was held that Peter Paul Rubens, during his visit to London in 1629, was capsized under London-bridge; but a letter from Lord Rochester to Isaac Wake proves that the Flemish painter was not of the company.

According to Walpole, Hans Holbein once lived on London-bridge. "The Father of Lord Treasurer Oxford," says Walpole, "passing over London-bridge, was caught in a shower, and stepping into a goldsmith's shop for shelter, found there a picture of Holbein (who had lived in that house) and his family. He offered the goldsmith £100 for it, who consented to let him have it, but desired first to show it to some persons. Immediately facing the Thames, towards the spires and beautiful churches, dominated by old St. Pau Jonson wrote. The southern gate, as shown decorated with a score of human heads on spike fact that in 1305 the head of the Scottish Wallace, was here exposed, and 230 years Thomas More, and Fisher, Bishop of Rochest middle of the eighteenth century Canaletto he left behind several faithful, and not f charming and individual, pictures of the Brid may be seen, too, in works by Samuel Sc swinging signs of tradesmen must have added t appearance of the narrow thoroughfare. Th "Three Bibles," whence in 1660 was issu Merchant, or the Peerless Pearl," and the " where the second edition of "Crocker's Dictio printed. Of many quaint shop bills here is example:—"John Allan at the (Three) Locks Bridge. Sells all sorts of Hair, curled or uncu cauls . . . with all goods made use of by P the lowest prices." There is extant, again, Herbert, who continued the researches of occupier of one of the Bridge houses when thes in the middle of the eighteenth century.

A FORGOTTEN BOOK.

THE "BOTANIC GARDEN" OF DR. ERAS

In the second half of the eighteenth centur Dr. Johnson was still the recognized arbiter of there had sprung up, in his native town of band of singers whose verses made no small st Indeed, these were great days for the poetical lables were in vogue still—the easiest of a respectably—and any gentleman who had cul smooth versification had as good a chance of fin perhaps, even a better) in rhyme as in plain p sadly changed now; and it would surprise us Lord Avebury, for example, were to choose rhymed heroics to expound his views upon ants grown rather intolerant of unnecessary orn sophical writings. If a man has anything of im in these degenerate days—anything important, point of view of science—we should regard hi than a madman if he attempted to gain our ear theories in verse, as one might conceal powe Dr. Erasmus Darwin, happy man! living in an with materialism, found his masterpiece receive tion enough, and paid for by the publisher stands) at the rate of ten shillings a line. I been worse paid, before and since the time physician.

Erasmus Darwin, born of a good Lincol educated at Chesterfield school, graduated at St Cambridge, in 1750, thus adding one more t poets hailing from the mathematical University Dr. Dodd had but just gone down from Cla common with him and the majority of poets in time, Darwin found himself inspired by the dea Prince of Wales, to add his contribution t lamentation called forth by that unhappy e on intimate terms with him; and he became acquainted with such prominent scientists as Boulton, Watt, and Wedgwood. The Doctor himself had no small share of inventive genius, tending perhaps to rather impracticable directions. He invented an aerial machine, in which he proposed to use wings similar to those of a bird, worked by high pressure steam. Kindred tastes led to a correspondence with R. L. Edgeworth, the father of the famous instructress of our youth, and hence came an introduction to Thomas Day, the author of "Sandford and Merton," who was then busied in his long quest for a model wife. He met, and disliked, Johnson. Perhaps these literary acquaintances stimulated his fancy, but he displayed no indecent haste. It was not until 1778 that he bought the few acres near Lichfield, and formed the botanical garden that was to make him famous. Eleven years later, after his second marriage, he published the part which now stands second—"The Loves of the Plants." It was of a piece with his eccentric character to publish the second part first; probably he thought it the better of the two. The first part, "The Economy of Vegetation," did not come out for three years more.

It is to Miss Seward (whom, by the way, Miss Mitford called "a Dr. Darwin in petticoats") that we owe the conception of the "Botanic Garden"; and, indeed, some of the introduction was actually written by her. She wrote a short poem about his little wilderness at Lichfield, which so pleased him that he declared it ought to form the exordium of a great work. The lady gracefully declined to undertake it—"the plan was not strictly proper for a female pen"—but she felt that such a scheme was eminently adapted to his own fancy. Accordingly, after some further polite correspondence, Darwin began his task, opening with the very lines that the lady had sent him. No acknowledgment was made of their source, at which the fair author was justly offended, and a certain coolness sprang up between the two. The doctor had added to his crime by making a few alterations, which were not altogether improvements, in her lines.

The general design of Darwin's poem, as he himself phrased it, was to "inlist Imagination under the banner of Science; and to lead her votaries from the looser analogies, which dress out the imagery of poetry, to the stricter ones which form the ratiocination of philosophy." He embellished his work with numerous notes, which, indeed, were sufficiently necessary to the uninitiated, for his passion for grandiose language was so remarkable that he could never deliver a plain statement in a comprehensible form. Endowed with a good ear for rhythm, and a fertile fancy, he crowded his work with tropes and personifications, and polished his couplets until their smoothness became monotonous. It was his custom, like another celebrated physician, to compose in his carriage, while driving to the houses of his patients, and for that purpose he had contrived a vehicle fitted up with paper, pencils, and books—and also with light refreshments. He had theories about poetry, of which one was that every line should present a finished picture to the reader, and this unfortunate conviction tended, as was only natural, to produce a sadly artificial effect in so long a poem. His lines are overloaded with epithet; they are all cut to the same pattern; and after a time we long for more freedom and less ingenuity. Yet he was undoubtedly an ingenious thinker and a clever versifier. In part he may be said to have anticipated several of the theories subsequently identified with the name of his more celebrated grandson. The "philosophical notes" are filled with curious information. The glorification of the

And to this passage he appends a note predicting the cheapness with which a very powerful gunpowder seem to be manufactured from [illegible] may probably in time be used to move machinery, and [illegible] the use of steam."

He is more fortunate in his prediction about [illegible] His friend Boulton had lately constructed "at [illegible] Birmingham, a most magnificent apparatus for raising [illegible] by an improved steam engine, which he describes at le[illegible] with a noble command of language, thus:—

> Descending screws with pendrous fly-wheels [illegible]
> The tawny plates, the new metallicus round,
> Hard dyes of steel the cupreous circles cramp,
> And with quick fall the massy hammers stamp.
> The Harp, the Lily, and the Lion join,
> And George and Britain guard the sterling coin.
> Soon shall thy arm, Unconquer'd Steam! afar > Drag the slow barge, or drive the rapid car;
> Or on wide-waving wings expanded bear
> The flying-chariot through the fields of air.

When we recollect the date of these lines, published but known to have been written at least ten years [illegible] must be admitted that Darwin displayed no inc[illegible] powers of discernment. On electricity, then but [illegible] touches immediately afterwards, but on this point [illegible] nothing remarkable, except to suggest that rain might [illegible] from the clouds, as Franklin with his kite had d[illegible] lightning. He is prettily descriptive on the beauties o[illegible] experiments in vogue at that date. Here, one might s[illegible] drawing-room experiment in excelsis:—

> Or, if on wax some fearless Beauty stand,
> And touch the sparkling rod with graceful hand
> Through her fine limbs the mimic lightnings dart
> And flames innocuous eddy round her heart;
> O'er her fair brow the kindling lustres glare;
> Blue rays diverging from the bristling hair;
> While some fond Youth the kiss ethereal sips,
> And soft fires issue from their meeting lips.

Things of this sort interest our genial philo[illegible] mensely. It is not, at first sight, easy to see what [illegible] steam, or gunpowder, or electricity have with the [illegible] botany and the Linnæan system, but the learned [illegible] sweeps them all into his capacious net, and cannot wit[illegible] pen from the "sympathetic inks made by Zaffre."

I confess to a kindness for "The Loves of the P[illegible] now standing as the second part of the "Botanic Gar[illegible] was burlesqued, I am aware, by Canning and Frere [illegible] "Loves of the Triangles," but surely a parody of such [illegible] magniloquence was unnecessary. The luxuriance of e[illegible] this poem is incomparable; the personification of t[illegible] sublimely ridiculous. "The Linnæan system," wrot[illegible] to Miss Seward, when suggesting the subject for her [illegible] unexplored poetic ground, and a happy subject for th[illegible] It affords fine scope for poetic landscape; it sugge[illegible] morphoses of the Ovidian kind, though reversed. O[illegible] men and women into flowers, plants, and trees. You s[illegible] flowers, plants, and trees into men and women." [illegible] correspondent modestly refused the task, it may be [illegible] what gusto Darwin carried out his Ovidian ideas. I may [illegible] that the fair damsel of this passage is a species of [illegible] (Anglicè sea-weed):—

> Night's tinsel beams on smooth Lock Lomond d[illegible]
> Impatient LEGA views the bright expanse:—
> In vain her eyes the passing floods explore, > Wave after wave rolls freightless to the shore.
> —Now dim amid the distant foam she spies
> A rising crest:—"'tis he!" 'tis he!" she cries.

THE LIFE OF THE SAILS.

" La Vie des Voiles."

(From the French of Dr. F. T. Marinetti.)

Our readers will, we think, be interested in the following attempt to render into English verse a poem by one of the most noticeable of the younger French poets. Dr. F. T. Marinetti, though of Italian parentage—he was born in 1878—and at one time secretary, at Milan, of the Franco-Italian review L'Anthologie Revue, has identified himself with French thought and expression, particularly as regards the vers-libriste or Symboliste school, to which he has brought his pronounced individuality in poetic style. Most of his lyrics have appeared in La Revue Blanche, La Vogue, and other Parisian journals, and two years ago his "Les Deux Marins" was selected by MM. Catulle Mendès and Gustave Kahn for recitation at the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt. The translation of the fine poem "La Vie des Voiles," which we print with the author's permission, has been made by Mr. F. G. Bowles, whose poetical work will be known to many of our readers, and who is engaged in the work of presenting the production of other contemporary French poets to the English public in a similar way.

I love the sighing melancholy life
Of the Sails, the beautiful Sails. They rise
Cold and timid at day-break, and shake off Between the mists, the damp and golden dust,
The wonderful starry gems of the night.
They rise humbly, like young servants, silent
And diligent, moving softly at morn;
Then they depart into the curling blue,
Love and Tragedy beckoning afar
Under the reeling sky of cloud and gleam.
Heedless are they of what the morrow brings,
Careless of all th' encircling wings of birds,
And with no envy of the tow'ring ships
Whose tall ambitious masts, full rigged and set,
Loom into sight, stand stricken by the sun,
Then pass transformed, like white cathedrals built
On all the flowing splendour of the sea.

Amid the summer lightnings of full noon,
(Pale on the far horizon's long low bridge),
The drowsy Sails hang hopeless at the mast,
Or, with the short hoarse rattle of the ropes
Sudden they sink like corpses 'neath the sun
Engulfed within the silent, spacious sea.

Later, when comes the lazy breeze to sigh
Of secrets that are known to it alone,
The trembling Sails awaken and are glad—
They climb into the sweetness of the wind
With playful tosses, shy coquettish ways,
And then, as though o'er-burdened with the heat
They grope with plaints and sighs, uncertain, weak,
And stumble, fall and quiver, till the gust
Shakes ev'ry fold to one expanding sheet,
And drives the boat across the laughing waves
That break in silver and subside in song!

Now glows the humid verdure on the hill—
A precious stone in heaven's exalted blue,
And as for feast prepared the dazzling bay Lies dreaming in the sun. Cloud upon cloud,
Like sumptuous marble which the Western wind
Has sculptured into spirals, stained with fire, (Encrusted with the sapphire, set with Renders again the Heaven's rich mosal
Reflects in trembling fusion all its clou
Its bubbling crucibles of molten stars.

Behold the Sun, a fiery charlot, rolls
Along the distant sands of molten gold,
Like some great car with vintages supe
Which overflow and colour all the tide
The Sails turn from his setting, for the
The strange mirage, the sorcery of ligh
Then Night's foul Shadows leap across (The dismal brooding spectres of the D
And wildly run before the waves that s
And snap like dogs that once have tast
But ever innocent the Sails speed on,
Their light wings from the conflict swif
Leaving the wrack of cloud and sea bel

It is the solemn hour when darkness fli
Her inky pall above the coffined world,
And Night, a mournful Sexton, slowly
Within the vasty hollows of the deep
His nameless graves beneath the vacan
Tossing the rolling spadefuls of black s
From side to side, the while he mumble
A bitter canticle of Death. Fearful,
The Sails escape from their impending
And tread the unseen pathway of the w
In silent horror, and with suppliant air
Like frail old women who with timid st
In twos and threes keep doleful compan

Amid the pomp of newly risen stars,
With noiseless motion as to Evening pr
The Sails sweep slowly to the harbour-
And pass along the darkenel aisles of (Their shadowy outlines black against t
Like pious priests, who, robed in pulli Commune awhile in silence with their Then in the distance sweetly chime the Above the tidal voice, the blue waves'
And ring their rosary of silver sound
Athwart the heaving waters of the wor
" To prayers! to prayers! O wanderin
And on the ancient pathway of the sea,
Lapt in deep peace the tired Sails kne
With jibs close-clasped, like hands in f
Then one by one the boats with pensiv
Move to the land, each black and strea
Stretched like a bare and supple arm t
A chaplet luminous with dropping bea
Or wantons playfully with precious sto
Sudden the keels grate softly on the sa
And the rough sailors leap into the sur
Waist-deep they stand within the rolli
And haul the boats upon the shelving
Till the sharp cry of pulley and of yard
Sinks into silence and the sea's sad vo
Alone complains, a weary monotone.

Along the wild horizon's unknown reac
Black months are whistling their derce
And the waves break upon the sullen s
Like clashing swords that giants wield
The sailors pause, appalled, for in thei
Now that the day's long duty is fulfill Comes the loud rumour of the sea's un
The roar of billow and the raucous sho Follow them home like hammers madly
Upon the stalwart anvil of the heart.

At last, at dead of night, beneath the
The Sails lie spread on thwart and peb
And breathe their lamentation to the

THE DOVES PRESS.

Since, in 1891, William Morris founded the Kelmscott Press, increased attention has been paid to the production of beautiful books. Fifty-three works in all, notably the great Chaucer, bear the imprint of the Kelmscott; of the many volumes issued by the Vale Press, one of the most eagerly sought is Mrs. Barrett Browning's "Sonnets from the Portuguese," published in 1897 at 6s., whereas last year a copy fetched £9 5s.; again, there is the Essex House Press, conducted on a similar system of limited editions, printed with specially designed type. The Doves Press is the latest comer, with Mr. T. J. Cobden-Sanderson, the well-known binder, and Mr. Emery Walker, who was all but a partner in the Kelmscott, at its head. The name of this adventure is of some literary interest. At the Doves Coffee-house, a few yards from the headquarters of the Press, James Thomson was wont to rest when he walked from London to his cottage at Richmond; it was in a room overlooking the river, not now part of the coffee-house, wherein, according to Faulkner, "Winter" was conceived and written; and from the Doves, it is said, the poet took the boat journey to Kew which issued in chill, fever, and death.

The aim of the Doves Press is to produce books whose beauty shall depend upon simplicity. In effect it is a protest against the riot of ornamentation and pseudo-ornamentation which menaces us. William Morris delighted to design initial letters and borders for his books; the Doves Press makes no attempt to follow him. It is impracticable to carry on a tradition so idiosyncratic as that of the Kelmscott; and Messrs. Cobden-Sanderson and Emery Walker desire neither to imitate on the one hand, nor to abandon, because already used by Morris, certain methods of craftsmanship sanctioned by their own taste. Eccentricity, too, is sternly eschewed, and if, as is hoped, the books have character, it is a character attaching to an ensemble where each contributory part is subordinated to the whole. So far, a Roman type only has been designed. It is based on that used by Jensen in Venice for a folio edition of Pliny, issued in 1476. This type is considerably larger and less heavy than the Kelmscott Golden fount; moreover, it is a purer Roman, without that tendency towards Gothic which Morris loved. There is some thickening and thinning of the line, absent alike in the Kelmscott type and in that of Jensen. Scrupulous heed has been paid to spacing. There are no leads between the lines, save at the end of a paragraph, and in order that the page may have as rhythmic an appearance as possible the space between the words is as small as legibility will permit. Book-making is regarded as a vehicle between the author and his audience; and anything, whether it be decoration, insistence on this or that character of type, or what not, which tends to make this vehicle as such less perfect, however beautiful in itself, is deemed a blemish. As to the paper, it is of linen, "laid," and about half the weight of that ordinarily used by Morris—a similar paper is to be found in a Tasso printed by Giunta four centuries ago. The ink, suitable for use only on hand-presses, is the blackest procurable. Like many of the old craftsmen, and like Morris, the Doves Press adopts two pages as the unit of space to fill decoratively. The exact position of the matter on these pages depends upon the length of the lines, the character of the type, whether or not there be paragraphic breaks, and other things. The margins, however, are always considerable; that at the bottom widest, then those at the sides, afterwards that at the top, the inner margins reaching the minimum. The bindings are on William Morris, delivered at Kelmscott Hou consists of 27pp. of text printed solid—that is to paragraph breaks—the 300 paper copies of which at 15s. In this booklet red as well as black ink was time used. High as are these issue prices—clearly the Kelmscott "News from Nowhere" would have £15 as against an actual 2 guineas—the "Tacitus" £4 12s. at auction; "The Ideal Book" has chang about £1; and the last of the issues cannot be pro three or four times its initial cost. It will be intere whether or not these are permanent valuations.

Two important works are in progress at the Doves first is Milton's "Paradise Lost," each of whose two to have a rubricated initial. The second is a folio ed by 9in., of the Authorized Version of the Bible. will be in five parts, and it is intended that the te on unbrokenly, not only as far as the verses, but also chapters, are concerned. Again here it is intended t rubricated initials. Probably the Doves Press, for at least, will not go farther in the direction of decora Roman fount now in use will serve for these forthcom

CURRENT LITERATUR

SOME RECENT POETRY.

Mr. W. E. Henley.

It is pleasant to welcome another volume of M verse. He is a writer of lyrics with a strong and note, whose mastery of form is considerable (it is means perfect), who has something to say that is wo and is the possessor of a remarkable and compelling p He is not a great poet, but he is certainly something a minor poet. There are pieces in this volume, HAW LAVENDER (Nutt, 6s.) that come very close to perfecti kind, but there are many more that seem purposely t Mr. Henley loves strange flowers of speech; he lo sudden and discomposing change of metre. To ou one of the finest poems in this collection is delibera by an unexpected break of this kind. And let u example, this ode on p. 49:—

> There was no kiss that day?
> No intimate Yea-and-Nay,
> No sweets in hand, no tender, lingering touch
> None of those desperate, exquisite caresses,
> So instant—O, so brief!—and yet so much,
> The thought of the swiftest lifts and blesses?
> Nor any one of those great royal words,
> Those sovran privacies of speech,
> Frank as the call of April birds,
> That, whispered, live a life of gold
> Among the heart's still sainted memories,
> And irk, and thrill, and ravish and beseech,
> Even when the dream of dreams in death's a-c
> No, there was none of these,
> Dear one, and yet—
> O, eyes on eyes! O, voices breaking still,
> For all the watchful will,
> Into a kinder kindness than seemed due
> From you to me, and me to you!
> And that hot-eyed, close-throated, blind regre never have run his train off the rails in that sixth line. A jar of this sort will perhaps be excused on the ground of excess of emotion, but no amount of authority can render it artistic. The reader, thus early, is brought to a dead stop, perplexed and confused: when he gathers himself again to resume, he has lost his sympathy with the poet. And this is what Mr. Henley is perpetually doing, in one form or another. Sometimes it is an unusual and ugly word. "Bloomkins," we notice, and "distrimus," and "dowle," and a fondness for certain words such as "sovran" and "irk." These are little things, but they mar not a few poems which it is a sin to spoil. Mr. Henley will certainly live among the lyrical poets of the century. He has the genuine gift: he is strong and sincere and his range is wider than that of most. There are poems in this volume that would disgrace no anthology. By turns he is tender, passionate, humorous, inflamed with patriotic sentiment, and in all alike he has the note of a dominant personality.

Mr. Thomas Hardy.

Mr. Hardy's new volume of verse—POEMS OF THE PAST AND PRESENT they are called (Harpers, 6s.)—is in many ways a remarkable book. It is the work of a poet at heart, but of a poet who has not yet obtained complete mastery of the method he would employ. Now and again, as if by accident, metre and rhythm and the choice of words seem to flow naturally, and the result is very nearly a flawless poem; at other times we are confronted with lapses from the true rhythm, with strange and uncouth words, with curiously clumsy turns of expression. Mr. Hardy's lines come with difficulty; they have the air of being rough-hewn; but they are tense because the writer has something to say, and something that demanded to be said in verse. The ideas are those of a poet. They force their way into poetical expression, and occasionally emerge from the struggle in rather a battered condition, but they are always recognizable. War poems in all kinds we have had frequently enough lately, but "The Going of the Battery" will outlast the most of them. It has verses in it that are worth any amount of patriotic jingle in Cockney dialect:—

Great guns were gleaming there, living things seeming there, Cloaked in their tar-cloths, upmouthed to the night;
Wheels wet and yellow from axle to felloe,
Throats blank of sound, but prophetic to sight.

Anthologies will include that poem (we have seen it in one already) if only for the sake of that single verse. But Mr. Hardy has a wide range, and writes in many moods. Now he is frankly architectural (and not a little encumbered with the terminology of the trade) as in the sonnet on "Rome"; now he betrays a gaily mocking spirit, as in the rhyming exercise called "The Respectable Burgher—on the Higher Criticism"; or he is once more the chronicler of old Wessex stories, or again he writes a little poem breathing the weirdly melancholy spirit of Heine, as in "The Dream-Follower":—

A Dream of mine flew over the mead
To the halls where my old Love reigns;
And it drew me on to follow its lead:
And I stood at her window-panes.

Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse.

The verse of the late Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse, whose PASTELES THE ELDER has just been published by Mr. Brimley Johnson (5s. n.), is the verse of a critic rather than of an inspired poet. That is to say, it is cold, clear, and classical in expression, but seldom arousing the reader to enthusiasm. There can be little doubt, as Mr. Austin Dobson points out in his men of cultivated taste. To quote once more fro "He knew—no one better—that verse cannot exis but that an informing conception, a defined purp all, a genuine and overmastering impulse, are in is to have any chance of ultimate survival in a Style, the informing conception, and the defin Cosmo Monkhouse possessed; but we doubt if overmastering. These poems have the air rat experiments, pruned and polished under the crit were worth making, and printing, but they do poetry.

Dr. Weir Mitchell.

The SELECTIONS FROM THE POEMS OF S. (Macmillan, 5s. n.) contain the work of a culti stored with memories of earlier and greater turn out a verse prettily. Sometimes the r echo of Browning, sometimes of Tennyson; occa across a frank imitation of what may be call Lover" school:—

Give me thy thoughts, my gentle m
And I will lend them wings
To soar elate above this world
Of transitory things . . . .

Alas! Alas! the trumpet calls;
God help thy tender tears!
Ah, love would not be half of love
Had it not also tears.

This is perhaps Dr. Mitchell at his weake Villon," a clever exercise in the Browni "Francis Drake," a long dramatic poem in blan most important in the book so far as length i are distinctly well composed; the stories are w and are well told. Dr. Weir Mitchell is essenti poet. He pleases by judicious selection; he and resets them; but there are one or two Magnolia Flower" and "The Sea gull," which a real poet, though not a great one. He is apt to in "The Centurion," for example, the note of and too long drawn out. Even "The Seagull" worse for compression, happy as are many of the t

Thou silent raider of the abounding Intent and resolute, ah, who m
What primal notes of gladness thou
In this vast loneliness!

The sonnet, one would imagine, would be th of a poet of this stamp. But the selection con This is a book that no lover of minor verse shou rises now and then to the level of true poetr not remain at that level for any length of time.

Mr. S. Lysaght.

Mr. Lysaght's little volume is worthy of POEMS OF THE UNKNOWN WAY (Macmillan, 4s. these lyrics we have the sense of the sea, an undiscovered shore at which no prow has touch with the outreaching spirit, ready to go " sunset," comes the inevitable ache for boundari

Vast, we saw, when the sun was low,
A trackless forest where none may ro
But 'twas not so vast as a wood we know Across three fields from the house at

We saw the peaks of eternal snow, often, but the note is so wistful and sweet that the complaint would be thankless indeed. Mr. Lysaght's book is one for twilight hours with their Dreams of the unfulfilled and unpossessed.

Mr. A. Symons.

If, as Mr. Alfred Noyes told us in these columns the other day, we are all of us haunted men at Christmas time, Mr. Heinemann has chosen a very apt moment to publish a collected edition of Mr. Arthur Symons' Poems, in two volumes. Mr. Symons is a prince among haunted men. "The Loom of Dreams," a new collection of poems now printed for the first time, opens thus:—

I broider the world upon a loom,
I broider with dreams my tapestry;
Here in a little lonely room
I am master of earth and sea
And the planets come to me.

As he sits, apart from the world, in this "little lonely room" and "the world as a cloud drifts by," his ghosts come to him—the most melodious of any that visit our poets at present. Sometimes it is a grey wolf which he cannot rid himself of—it is seldom anything more cheerful—and, whatever the impressions may be that reach him from a far-off world, they are generally of a shadowy, symbolical kind. But there is nothing shadowy about Mr. Symons' grip of the reader, and in "The Loom of Dreams," though there may be nothing quite equal to "Wanderers," or "The Villa Emilia," there is still the same swift succession of images and subtle melody as in his previous work.

From a pile of minor verse it is refreshing to extricate THE BOOK OF THE HORACE CLUB (Blackwell, Oxford, 5s. n.). The club was founded in 1898, and on its short list of members are several well-known Oxford names. Of nineteen contributors no single one has more than half a dozen short poems, but whether written in English, Latin, Greek, or French, from the opening dedication to Horace to the final "Thorfinn Karlsefni's Dream," it all bears the same stamp. It is the verse of cultivated men writing for pleasure and in good camaraderie, and there is little or none of the self-consciousness that clings to so much of our minor poetry. Mr. John Buchan has a breezy, tuneful romance or two; Mr. Belloc writes with feeling and effect in his stanzas on "The South Country" and vigorously in the "Sussex Drinking Song"; while among many landscape pieces this picture of "Bembridge Harbour in January" is very delicate:—

The air, a liquid crystal, flowed
O'er sea and land, till pure from stain
And jewel-clear their colours glowed,
As in a glass of Claude Lorraine.

The water, like a sheet of steel,
Mirrored the moveless swans afloat,
The solemn Sabbath-keeping wheel,
The masts of many a fishing boat.

Around the harbour, spire and tree
Were etched against the vaulted blue;
Across the strait were plain to see
The trees and spires of Portsmouth too.

So still the scene was, so refined,
It seemed a sleight of magic art,
Till in a gust of sudden wind
The scent of coltsfoot cheered my heart.

There are many clever social verses, too, while a madrigal from Mr. Herbert Warren's pen on "The Triumphs of Victoria" is remarkable for its tuneful flexibility.

TRANSFIGURATION, by Catherine Blunt and John Fielding (George Allen, 3s. 6d. n.), is a little [illegible]

Mr. Rudland writes, however, in a [illegible] hearted manner; in pieces like "The Song of [illegible] "Australasia," or "The Pilgrim Fathers," "the [illegible] is vaunted" with great gusto, and it is all healthy enough.

To dip into Mrs. James Glenny Wilson's Poems (Stock, 2s. 6d.) is to enter a quiet and real world. [illegible] —of Rangitikei, New Zealand—is well known as the [illegible] of a volume named "Themes and Variations," from which many of the pieces collected here are taken. Other [illegible] reprinted from various Australasian and English [illegible] Wilson's themes are never beyond her capabilities, [illegible] has breadth and tenderness, and she is completely [illegible] of her smoothly flowing metres.

Miss Nellie B. Badcock is, we think, a younger [illegible] in her prettily entitled book, BY GREY OLD GARDEN (Grant Richards, 5s.), she sings a few short songs with a [illegible] ness and spirit. As an instance of many a happy [illegible] quote the opening quatrain of the little poem called "Orchard."

I was small, but you were smaller,
So I held you down the bough,
And my pride in being taller
Stirs within me even now.

Miss Badcock is not always quite sure of her [illegible] are many echoes of contemporary poets, and perhaps her best when leaning for support on some one [illegible] herself. But one or two careful little studies of women evidence some talent and independence of thought.

We chanced to open SONGS OF LUCILLA (Elkin Mathews) in the middle, and lighting upon a little piece [illegible] Candles"—reminding us, in common with many another in this part of the book, of Herrick—went on dipping further into the volume without tiring. The anonymous authoress, we will not commit ourselves—has an ear and a very pretty pen, and though many of his ideas are too slight to be enshrined in verse, there are so many that the reader is kept pleasantly awake and [illegible] Some rather longer pieces, inspired by antique [illegible] remarkable for poetic feeling, and six sonnets from [illegible] of fine workmanship. But, alas, that on the very last we should have come upon this:—

Pearls that are chosen to suit beauty's se[illegible]
Before each precious stone.
Are not the work of magic or sea elf,
But of the oysters' moan.

The italics are ours, but can a moan be an oyster's [illegible]

The title poem of Mr. Gascoine Mackie's MAN [illegible] (Grant Richards, 5s. n.) relates a sufficiently weird [illegible] dream, in which the dreamer, confronted with Judas [illegible] expressing his abhorrence of the arch-betrayer, [illegible] cannot at first see, suddenly finds that he has been [illegible] vision of himself. Dream poems of this kind are [illegible] successful execution, but Mr. Mackie handles his [illegible] considerable skill, neglecting neither its agony nor [illegible] "The Herdsman of Admetus" is, perhaps, the most [illegible] two or three blank-verse poems.

THE OXFORD YEAR AND OTHER POEMS, by J. Williams [illegible] well, 3s. 6d. n.), is a pleasant and scholarly book of [illegible] the twelve sonnets on the months display a tender [illegible] the charm of the year's waxing and waning. They [illegible] the best of Mr. Williams' sonnets, but they hardly [illegible] level of excellence, while some of the others, notably [illegible] Blenheim, might well have been omitted. The time [illegible] the bard can pretend with any decent show of sincerity [illegible] he is moved by the real and irresistible afflatus to [illegible] glories of Marlborough in Addisonian fashion, [illegible] allusion to the woods of Blenheim. But the Cotswolds [illegible]

Williams, too, has scored a success, and his abbreviated rendering of "Aquam memento" is excellent:—

> Bring hither all that makes life fair,
> Cool wine and roses debonair,
> The while the sisters three > Allow such things to be.
>
> 'Tis certain that thou soon must cede
> Thy rooms that look on Christ Church mead,
> And thy scant box the knee
> To one more rich than thee.
>
> We travel all the self-same way,
> June laughs at lecture notes of May,
> So all alike we bow
> Our necks before the plough.

Mr. Williams is less successful in his imitations of Dante, and it shows an imperfect knowledge of the art of parody to associate with Dante such a marked phrase as "the tainted wethers of the flock" or the Miltonic allusion to "Ternate or Tidore."

As a poet of languorous love lyrics in several metres, all manipulated with graceful ease and occasionally with vigorous intensity, Mr. Laurence Hope is extremely successful in THE GARDEN OF KAMA AND OTHER LOVE LYRICS FROM INDIA, (Heinemann). Though an artist in words, Mr. Hope never allows the vivid colouring and subtle music of his verse to clash with his gift for direct and powerful narrative. His book is impregnated with the fascinating atmosphere of the land of the Moghra and Oleander flowers; and at the close of almost every lyric we feel that the artist has achieved his purpose. But many readers will doubtless quarrel with the purpose of these extremely erotic poems derived from Oriental romance. In more than one instance the themes are as unpleasant as their treatment is skilful.

COMTE.

LA PHILOSOPHIE D'AUGUSTE COMTE. By L. LÉVY-BRUHL. Paris. (Alcan. Fr.7.50.)

ESSAI HISTORIQUE ET CRITIQUE SUR LA SOCIOLOGIE CHEZ AUGUSTE COMTE. By F. ALENGRY. Paris. (Alcan. Fr.10.)

PASSAGES FROM THE LETTERS OF AUGUSTE COMTE. Selected and arranged by J. K. INGRAM, LL.D. (Black.)

The editor of Stuart Mill's letters to Auguste Comte, M. Lévy-Bruhl, has published a very lucid study of Comtism. There is perhaps in the nineteenth century, so rich in philosophers, none that can vie in importance with the founder of the Positivist Church and at the same time none whose doctrines are so imperfectly known. His most famous disciples, both in England and in France, almost immediately wrested his theories from their original meaning, which goes far in explaining the neglect into which some of his works have fallen—for instance, the early opuscules. M. Lévy-Bruhl very properly applies to the study of such a thinker the so-called "historical method." His object is to throw out in bold relief the origin and the unity of Comte's system, and he gives a striking picture of a mind arriving almost at once to the main conclusions, the dissemination of which constitutes the work of a lifetime.

According to M. Lévy-Bruhl, Comtism is the necessary outcome of the French Revolution. The ideal of the eighteenth century, a negative one, inasmuch as it strove to overthrow existing beliefs and institutions, culminated in the wave of fanatical destruction that swept away old France. Comte opposed to it an ideal closely resembling that attained by the mediæval teachers. His was the task of "reorganizing destroyed beliefs." This system falls into two separate parts. social dynamics. On this basis the apostle that lurk temperament endeavoured to rear a structure essapared with that of a Gothic monastery, the is the philosopher himself. There was in Comte bias towards over-regulation. Napoleon would good prefect in him. We need not dwell on t Comte's genius in this second part of his career. teacher he is followed only by a small and f disciples, at least in the old world.

There is between M. Alengry's work and tha Bruhl a curious contrast. The latter insists o Comte's life, the former lays stress on the break w after the famous meeting with Madame de Van sopher was fifty at the time. He had up to then ap reason in his scheme of reorganization. Sudde to tread on unknown ground. The hidden region unfold themselves before him and henceforward th given to sentiment, and a sentiment that is not alw taste. Thanks to a woman—in his early days he h as a principle the utter intellectual inferiority of w came back from the stage of Positivism to th of humanity called fetichism. We find him abs trifles to which are attached souvenirs of his "Cl the religious observances of the Positivist C resemble a compromise between the ceremonies Church and a familiar fetishism. It is to be r M. Alengry, while studying sociology in Co deemed it advisable to include in his work the fu ment of the Positivist Church since Comte. Wh of Comte is to be the founder of a religion—a nece mation to his early studies of philosophy—as M will have it, or whether his teaching represe outcome of a sentimental adventure, and even believe M. Alengry, a rousing of the tender pas the element of mystic ideal arose merely from Clot in any case the organization of a new Chur humanity must be the test of the value of h theories. Comte's discovery of the law that the the individual man is to society what the cell i frame consigns to decent oblivion the social c which Rousseau from a mere judicial fiction, w historical fact. Another title of honour t conceded to Comte is based on the impulse th historical studies. In making history the basis and the study of man the object of history, he vein rich in ore. What is Taine's "Origines contemporaine" but an unexpected development Taine made biological law the mainspring of hi history. Of course Comte did not foresee all th is excellently stated by M. Alengry as "an ef political science by founding it on the gene humanity."

One point is overlooked both by M. Lévy Alengry. Montesquieu, Condorcet, the French not account entirely for Positivism. Romanticism sponsible both for the classification of sciences tivist calendar. As M. Lévy-Bruhl says, phil Comte, was an individual and abstract science concrete and social science. Instead of consi general, he studied the several transformations the course of centuries. Now this idea is the g due to Romanticism. In the eighteenth cent member of a polite society was the sole object o littérateurs, as well as of the philosophers. The wi volution, so Positivism seems, at times, a reactionary movement. The grain of catholic, counter-revolutionary spirit in Comte is probably the cause of the dislike entertained towards Comtism by most liberal minds. His city of the future was after all only a generous scheme of tyranny.

Many such reflections will be suggested to the reader by these two works. M. Lévy-Bruhl's is the more admirable, because the more lucid. It is a masterpiece of clear and methodical exposition. A professor alone, loving philosophy, could have clothed philosophy in so attractive a dress.

In Dr. Ingram's book we are not concerned with the historical development of Comtism. The philosopher appears here solely in his pontifical character as head of the Positivist Church. Just as the young ladies who subscribe to monthly magazines are advised how to bring this too bashful young man to the scratch, and how to send that too audacious young man about his business, so, it appears, the rising young Positivists of the fifties used to open their hearts to the inventor of Positivism and consult him about the choice of a profession and a wife. In this little book, therefore, we see the Pontiff sitting, so to say, "Over the Teacups," receiving confidences and dispensing counsel. As regards the choice of a profession there is little to be said, as Comte seems to have wanted all his followers to be doctors. His views about matrimony are more interesting. "I believe, as you do," he writes to Mr. John Metcalfe, "that a worthy marriage is indispensable for you to render your moral culture more determinate, and even to give more steadiness to your social progress—both political and industrial." It is a delightful picture this of passionate youth repairing to the altar for the high purpose of rendering moral culture more determinate; but it transpires that the ideal is less easy of realization than it looks, for we read :—

> Whilst recommending to you a condition of happiness and improvement to which you appear to me spontaneously inclined, I cannot too seriously warn you to proceed with great circumspection in the principal event of private life; gloomy and painful as celibacy is, a bad marriage is much worse.

What is the nature of the danger? That also is explained :—

> A recent incident in our body shows how dangerous it is to form a connexion by marriage with a family incurably revolutionary. . . . Under the influence of a father, stupidly devoted to the doctrines of the school of Rousseau, the bride thinks and says that human life has no need of being systematically regulated.

The conclusion is that "many worthy Positivists will probably be forced to abide by celibacy, notwithstanding its sacrifices and its dangers."

ACTA SANCTORUM.

St. Gilbert of Sempringham.

ST. GILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM AND THE GILBERTINES. By ROSE GRAHAM. (Elliot Stock. 7s. 6d.)

St. Gilbert of Sempringham is famed as the founder of the only monastic order of English origin. He was born about 1089 at Sempringham, on the border of the Lincolnshire fens. Young Gilbert was presented by his father, who was a considerable landowner, to the livings of Sempringham and West Torrington. The fame of his devotion to his parishioners came to the ears of Bishop Bloet of Lincoln, who attached him to his with secular women. This led to the serving maiden lay sisters under a rule and dress of their own. community attracted a good deal of attention, a Gilbert's feudal lord granted him land at Sempring on to build a priory. Soon other lands were offere where, and ten other monasteries, chiefly in Lincoln like plan were built by him in the course of the next Gilbert, shrinking from the responsibilities he ha resolved to ask the Cistercians to take charge of h communities. For this purpose he visited Citeaux in was allowed to state his case to the General Chapte the abbots declined to accede to his request, his jour a momentous one; for at Citeaux he formed a close with that great man Bernard of Clairvaux, with whom for some time on the dispersion of the General Ch conjunction with Bernard, Gilbert drew up the instit Order of Sempringham, which the Pope insisted on to his charge.

By the remarkable scheme then adopted, ca appointed to live side by side with nuns, to act chaplains, and to administer the outside and financi the house. In the main the nuns, who were strictly followed the Cistercian rule, whilst the canons appre that of St. Austin. Several, however, of the Sempri correspond to those of the Premonstratensian Order, thorough and somewhat complicated arrangements the two sexes apart were of necessity original.

Miss Graham gives a fairly good summary of the life of St. Gilbert, though she has omitted certain incidents, such as his connexion with the saintly Bi of Lincoln. The curious Sempringham rule was give the original Monasticon of Dugdale, and has been the modern extended edition. Hitherto, however, been no translation or analysis of the Gilbertine statu this volume they are given in an abbreviated and form with certain important omissions and some mist nuns and the canons had entirely separate cloist common church. The church was divided length partitioned wall which was areaded at the top, so a the nuns hearing the canons' daily high mass, and of hearing the same sermon on certain festivals and other On the days of a general procession of the whole ho was made round the nuns' cloister as the more curtains were hung around the colonnades on all four other hangings suspended at the four angles, through procession had to pass. By these means a common chanting the litany, could be made, without the one the other. The main part of the cooking and wash whole establishment was done by the nuns; but all communication with the canons had to be strictly co domus fenestræ or window-house, where a turn- arranged of strictly defined proportions. To this approached on each side by a long passage, admission restricted to certain of the older nuns and canon the rules that we fail to find mentioned in this b curious one on the provision of beer. It is therein s if the nuns, having no beer, are obliged to drink water just that the masters of the house, who provide the sup share in their deprivation. Whenever the nuns, through gence or carelessness of the proctors, have to drink four proctors are to associate themselves with them in t drinking, even if on a journey, or absent from the ho letters from the incumbents of the different parishes. It is a great pity that this book was published before each site had been critically investigated by some competent archæologist. The peculiarly interesting results of the excavations on the site of Watton Priory, recently undertaken for the East Riding Antiquarian Society by Mr. St. John Hope and the Rev. Dr. Cox, whet our appetite for the further examination of Gilbertine houses.

The Saints in Art.

Mrs. Arthur Bell's aim in the SAINTS IN CHRISTIAN ART (Bell, 10s. n.) is a good one—to focus the work of the numerous workers in the same field by gathering together, in an accessible form, the known facts and the legends about early Saints, and the results of the most recent researches into symbolism, with an account of the treatment of the Saints by artists. She starts with a full account of the Apostles (it is odd, by the way, that she omits the Corinthus story under John the Evangelist) and confines herself to the first three centuries. Looking to the object of the book, we cannot but think that its value would have been much increased by a considerably larger selection of pictures so that the student would have a better opportunity of comparing the treatment of the Saints by different artists and different schools. The pictures given are chiefly Italian; there is one Rembrandt, two Mesdlines, and four English pictures. Mrs. Bell has gathered a great amount of information which she puts well together, and she has studied the most recent authorities. It is at least curious that her only reference, apparently, to Clement of Alexandria is in the index, where the life of Clemens Romanus is indexed under Clemens Alexandrinus.

Lives of the Saints.

It seems to be the privilege of sinners to have adequate biographers. The saints suffer from their friends, who, lacking the humanity which is a characteristic of every great Christian, have a terrible habit of remembering eccentric fables and forgetting essential facts. St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Catherine of Siena, for instance, are great characters and have no mean place in the world's history, but the author of the "Short Lives" gives us no impression of their position in theology and literature, while she tells us of St. Catherine that Christ "vouchsafed to her the mysterious favour of the exchange of hearts and the impression of the sacred stigmata, and of St. Thomas that "the words Ave Maria were the first which his baby lips were heard to utter." The very first page of the book relates of Blessed Gonsalvo of Amarantha that at his baptism "the bystanders observed that the infant fixed his eyes on the crucifix with a look of extraordinary love." Yet what a chance does such a volume offer! What a fascinating and edifying collection of stories might have been made of the Dominican Saints! Hagiology ought to be so interesting that we feel a constant disappointment at finding it so dull. Father Procter promises us "an album of Dominican pictures." "Word-painted and not limned in crayon or oil, they are drawn with a graphic pen and not painted with an artist's brush." Fortunately the author's style is simpler than her editor's, but it is just the "graphic pen" that we miss.

As for St. Jerome, as he is presented to us by Father Largent, he certainly needs the apology which Father Tyrrell provides by way of preface. Yet, when we emerge from the dreary pages of his biography, our memory goes back to many an old picture (not "word-painted"), and we wonder whether the popular mind had not seized a truer conception of the Saint. The [illegible] character into too high relief. Father Largent [illegible] the credulity of the Dominican Sister, and [illegible] Jerome's lion with some contempt. Yet sure[illegible] stood for something, and was an attempt to p[illegible] humaner side of the learned disputant's character [illegible] unfortunate that some saints should have fo[illegible] meaningless stories of infantile piety, while an[illegible] deprived of the legend which found for him a pla[illegible] of mankind. But such is the common lot of saint[illegible]

Two other volumes in the same series are [illegible] Nicholas I." is a valuable contribution to it. E[illegible] testants will no doubt quarrel with some of Mr. Ro[illegible] as when he tells us that the conception of the Papac[illegible] of priesthood, of doctrinal authority of royalty," w[illegible] carried to its highest point, was in fact "lai[illegible] Christ himself and is no doubt a fundamental r[illegible] built His Church." We have here a graphic [illegible] the most remarkable pontificates in the histor[illegible] The reign of Nicholas I. ushers in the first gre[illegible] revolt of the Curia against the secular power an[illegible] attempt to assert the spiritual independence a[illegible] papal authority. Imperialism having failed to [illegible] of the Christian world, it was a grand conceptio[illegible] Nicholas to bring it about on the basis of the [illegible] make the Rome of St. Peter the centre of a [illegible] unity. To this end the autocratic pontiff spar[illegible] shrank from no sacrifice. The very stars in the[illegible] in his favour, both in Italy against John of Rave[illegible] against Hincmar. He did not live to enjoy th[illegible] his ideas, but he had laid the foundations of [illegible] took many centuries to weaken. The most in[illegible] Mr. Roy's book is the chapter in which he deals [illegible] use made by Nicholas of the pseudo-Isidorian De[illegible]

When one has said that "Saint Domin[illegible] from the Roman Catholic point of view, one has [illegible] that it is necessary to say. Miraculous stories w[illegible] events, do not seem conspicuously credible a[illegible] respect, and without much regard to the laws o[illegible] the persecution of the Albigenses is justified on [illegible] "the triumph of Albigensianism would have r[illegible] Christianity, of which it constituted the ra[illegible] Readers who are not Roman Catholic will [illegible] premiss nor allow that the conclusion follows [illegible] syllogism depends, of course, upon a "suppresse[illegible] is suppressed because it is shocking to modern [illegible] book is learned, though illogical; and we cannot [illegible] it is the fault of the writer or the translator tha[illegible]

St. Francis has been fortunate in his biog[illegible] because he was so intensely human, in fact so [illegible] that mankind has easily grasped his characteri[illegible] has received the further tribute of finding a bri[illegible] in a Protestant, M. Paul Sabatier, who com[illegible] enthusiasm with literary skill, and is a historic[illegible] first rank. Mr. Adderley has set himself t[illegible] English the results of M. Sabatier's researche[illegible] so in simple fashion but with a sympathy [illegible] Francis very near to our times. An A[illegible] mission, Mr. Adderley believes in the need [illegible] brotherhood that shall be of the people as th[illegible] was, and he sees in the humane poor man of Ass[illegible] that are needed for the restoration of religion a[illegible] masses. It is significant, as he points out, that [illegible] of the Salvation Army is a biography of St. Fra[illegible]

DRAMA.

KIARTAN THE ICELANDER, by Newman Howard (Dent, 4s. 6d. n.), is a play which no one interested in the modern "literary drama" should overlook. The writer has chosen for his background the wild and romantic scenery of Iceland and the hall of the Norse Chieftain, for his period the age at which paganism clashed with Christianity a Christianity wielding the sword of division which its Founder foretold, and working in a spirit of subtlety and intrigue little in accordance with its Founder's spirit. It is mainly, in fact, on this that the story hinges, ending on a note of tragic sorrow with the death of Kiartan at the hands of his friend, who had connived at the deception of Gudrun, the maiden to whom he was betrothed. The merit of the play lies not so much in the delineation of character—it is a little over-laid with characters not always strongly defined—but in its construction and its virile diction, a diction not smooth and classical, but full of Elizabethan reality and vigour, rising into fine poetry in the mouth of the chorus-like blind Skald, Llot.

Very prettily got up is APHRODITE AGAINST ARTEMIS (Unicorn Press, 2s. 6d. n.), a little play on the Greek model by Mr. J. Sturge Moore, whose poems "The Vine-Dresser" showed him to possess a gift of distinction rare among minor poets. There is real talent and individuality of expression in this little drama, dealing with the love of Phaedra for her stepson Hippolytus. Mr. Moore takes an essentially modern view of the young wife of Theseus—she might almost be the childishly inconsequent heroine of a modern novel. This is how she narrates to Hippolytus the story of Ariadne's desertion :—

PHAEDRA. I care not. On the ship I sailed with them :
My sister was the yielding-natured sort,
Taking me when I begged agog to see
The world. I caught small fish and fed the gulls, Flinging them silver shining through the air ;
The greedy birds swung strident down and gulped
Them ere they fell. Still Ariadne smiled
Leaning on Theseus' shoulder, though his eyes Never sought hers but followed me about,
As I would chalk white dolphins on the sail,
Till all the rowers laughed and called me queen.

HIPPOLYTUS. Ha !

PHAEDRA. He kissed me once while Ariadne slept.
How proud I was !—unkind to her as well,
Making my power over him appear. . . . .
He left her on that isle, thou knowest which,
And claimed my love ; I was afraid of him,
But pleased to be a queen ; and, as for love,
I never dreamed of such a thing as love
Till I saw thee. . . . .

There is something divertingly original in reading so modern a spirit into the heroine of a Greek myth. Yet Mr. Sturge Moore has caught much of the true classic spirit. He handles his blank verse decidedly well, with dignity and variety, and there is plenty of fire in what may be termed the choric ode at the end, although no chorus figures in the list of dramatis personæ. Mr. Moore has a touch of true poetry in him, and if on one occasion he chooses to rhyme "dawn" with "mourn"—well ! better-known poets have erred in his company. "Aphrodite against Artemis" is a considerable achievement, and augurs well for Mr. Moore's poetical future.

intellectual. The central motive of King Lear is not th of Gloster, but Gioconda may perhaps be likened to a version of Lear, in which the suffering of Gloster wou culminating point of the tragedy. The physical l
"beautiful hands" of Sylvia, in trying to save a sta husband's creation from destruction by his mistress, is painful rather than purely pathetic. Scarcely dramatist would have ventured from that point upon ending than a definite reconciliation between husband but D'Annunzio's pessimism is of a harder mould, an involuntary sacrifice is proved useless by her husba desertion of her for Gioconda. The book is written in an style, with many passages of beauty ; but at the close behind it a sense of dissatisfaction and must be re an attempt rather than an achievement.

Björnson's play LABOREMUS (Chapman, 3s. 6d.)
of antithesis to Ibsen's last work, "When We Dead
The latter depicts work shattered by love ; the for work the redemption of the lover. Longfried Kann, composer, is not redeemed when the curtain falls.
instigation of Dr. Kann, his uncle, he is going to redemption by grinding to paint his recent experienc celebrated lady pianist, and so obtain colour for his Lydia, the lady pianist, is introduced to us in the fi
a German hotel, as the one-day old wife of an elderly gentleman named Wisby. The marriage is alread over, for that very night the old gentleman has se wife in a dream, and the vision has pronounced the words, "She whom you left just now has taken In point of fact, Lydia had been engaged to sooth
Mrs. Wisby by her playing, and, instead of doin succeeded in playing her to death. No one who has next door to a professional pianist will doubt the pos this, but it is a new motif in fiction. The crim undetected, and Lydia stepped into Mrs. Wisby's sh murdered lady, with the strange unpracticality of makes no sign until it is a few hours too late for a be of use, and the information which she now gi cannot save him, but only serves to cast him into a c
the blackest despair. This renders him a dull com the young and lively Lydia, and we find her in Act II.
turning her attention to Longfried Kann, a fellow co staying at the same hotel. She has become the insp his opera Undine, and, while they discuss the work Wisby sits alone bewailing his mad infatuation. To h his old friend, Dr. Kann, Longfried's uncle, and he b him Wisby's daughter Borgny, a young lady who, t
"seventeen years three months and five days," ne has already seen life in America, and displays an a amount of aplomb and wordly wisdom for her youth.
Kann set themselves the congenial task in Act III. of Wisby from the fetters of his second marriage, of Longfried's eyes to the terrible true character of hi and of driving the wretched little adventuress, as Lydia be, with hisses from the scene. Bjornson never, publishes anything without a good sound moral atta
the moral here is so obvious and so trite that one wo he found the courage to write a whole play in order to The first performance of Laboremus took place in C last May. There is a very good portrait of the author piece to the book.

attempt by way of trial some less ambitious task. In RUNZI AND YORAINE we have a neat little book, bound in green cloth, containing two creditable efforts in this line. E. Hamilton Moore is the author, and it is published by Messrs. Sherratt and Hughes of Manchester (4s. 6d. n). Creditable is, we fear, the warmest praise that we can give Mr. Moore. He writes blank verse smoothly and fluently; here and there you may find even a touch of real poetry; some of the songs are tuneful; and there is a certain dramatic talent in the presentation. But the ratio of fustian and windy declamation to poetry is too high to warrant us in giving the two tragedies any higher praise.

SINTRAM: A DRAMA, by Helen Leslie (Chapman and Hall, 3s.), is a longer, stouter, and more ambitious performance. The author has previously, she informs us, made a translation of De la Motte Fouqué's story for her own pleasure, and now she has dramatized it, with additions of her own. The verse is sometimes blank and sometimes rhymed, with no method and for no apparent reason. "Sintram and His Companions" is not particularly well adapted for a play, and it would be flattery to say that Miss Leslie displays a strong vein of poetical talent. Her verse never rises even to a modified pitch of excellence, and very frequently it flags sadly.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Turkish Reminiscences.

FREDERICK THE GREAT ON KINGCRAFT, from the Original MS., with Reminiscences and Turkish Stories, by Sir J. William Whittall (Longmans, 7s. 6d. n.), is an extraordinary collection indeed. First we have the so-called "matinées" of Frederick the Great, not at all (as the title-page says) from the original MS., but from a copy taken by Sir William Whittall's grandfather from the manuscript which Savary, Duc de Rovigo, professed to have stolen from the private library in the Palace of Sans Souci. Of this there is little new to be said. Sir William Whittall's copy, which he prints both in the original French and in a translation of his own, has a few additional paragraphs which have not hitherto been published, but it adds very little to what historians since the beginning of the nineteenth century have debated upon. The evidence of authenticity is extremely slight. The external evidence is, of course, practically valueless; and the internal seems to us on the whole rather to tell against the authorship of Frederick than in favour of it. But the question is undoubtedly one for the minute investigation of specialists; and the specialists have long ago decided it. The story of the adventures of Savary and his association with the Whittall family is on the other hand extremely interesting, and Sir William Whittall deserves our thanks for telling it. Still more do we thank him for the next part of his book—the family reminiscences. The Whittall family, as every one knows, has for over a century dominated the English colony at Constantinople, and has ever sustained the honour of the English name in its great commercial transactions, while it has become closely connected in different ways with the Levantine associations of the city. We can hardly imagine any one whose reminiscences would be more attractive than those of Sir William Whittall. What he has written down fully comes up to our expectations and we only wish there were more. The story of the miracle of St. Polycarp was not unknown before, but it appears freshly in Sir William's telling of it. His pride in the prolific nature of his family is humorously expressed in a section which he calls "prospective over-population of the Globe," a title which is justified by the fact that he has at present a near relation "who is alive and hale and has 128 living descendants of her own." After this we have some exciting tales of the early nineteenth century such as would make the reputation of a raconteur, and such as we have no doubt Sir William has often told at his hospitable table. The do not make a special study of it." He finds, a ing his work, that some of the stories have le the remarkable book of the clever diplomatist mask himself under the name of Odysseus; and that he has said with such intimate knowledge warning suggested by the book which has success. There is indeed much to ponder ov Whittall's more serious statements, and it is p

those who know the Near East may have tw them. But as to the Turkish stories those smallest sense of humour cannot possibly be they are really delightful. We should like to of them; but that would not be fair to the ma of this charming book.

Two Epoch-Makers.

In writing a more or less popular account o
T. Clark, 3s.) for a series of religions "Ep Rev. W. Fairweather has done an extremely work. As he truly says, Origen was the fou theology, the pioneer of a reverent criticism, free and unrestricted investigation, and a bold spe
To do justice to this great Christian teacher writer should not only be familiar with all the c arose from the conflict of Christianity and N should be able to present them to his readers in vehicle of abstract thought than our own Fairweather has written with all the precision pe of Alexandrian philosophy in the time of Origen own daring and ingenious views on the de mysteries; but he must probably be cons subtleties can hardly be made intelligible to theologians. We can only say generally of a work that it is a careful study, backed up by co and authorities, of Origen's theological positi regard to the doctrine of the Trinity. This, h part, though a vital part of the book. Rea specialists, will be able to appreciate the ch and character of Origen, on his critical work f Old Testament, and on his reply to Celsus, described as a refutation of all actual and all p to Christianity. Above all, the book will he the fluid state of early Christian doctrine, speculations and abstruse controversies from wh belief at length emerged.

Mr. P. De Lacy Johnstone's MUHAMMA
(T. and T. Clark, 3s.) belongs to the sam an able summary of all that is known abo
So much has already been written on this Johnstone does not claim for his work an but he places before us the latest results criticism. Still, when all is said and done, G remark holds true, that the faith of Islam "is eternal truth and a necessary fiction, that there and that Mahomet is the apostle of God."
Mr. Johnstone's point of view. He shows h advance, in consequence of Mahomet's teachi to monotheism, and how Mahomet made his s
—the necessary fiction—subserve his sensuali And besides the biographical chapters, he has the land and language of Arabia, the Kor modern times. He is just to Mahomet and his sufficiently generous; but he insists on the the maintenance of slavery and the degradation an obiter dictum of the late Khedive Tewfik of his wives ended absolutely with their de Mahometan country stagnant or retrogressive, religion on civilization may be exaggerated ignored. We should add that though the "Muhammad," Mr. Johnstone is no fanatical Arabic words. He calls the Koran the "Qur customary "Omar" instead of the correc
"Umr." After all, if we speak of Alexander

INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT ON THE LINES OF MODERN EVOLUTION (Longmans, 18s.) contains much that is interesting and instructive. The volume appears at a wide interval after the first, and before the second, which failing eyesight compels the author to postpone. It suffers somewhat from the inappropriateness of the title, for its connexion with intellectual development is very slight. It really aims at giving advice to practical statesmen in England, France, and America for the reform of their national institutions and character. In the execution of this ambitious plan Mr. Crozier has won a very fair measure of success. He has a good deal of first-hand knowledge of England and America and has used it acutely, while his generalizations are ingenious and sweeping. Many of them, indeed, seem to us remarkably flimsy, but sometimes they are true and usually they are interesting. Literary style is not Mr. Crozier's strong point. Still his style is perfectly intelligible and not so dull as one might expect, considering its monstrous verbosity. The section which will attract most notice is that on America; those who read it will wait with curiosity to see if President Roosevelt, who has a unique opportunity before him, will adopt any of Mr. Crozier's counsel.

The evils of American political life, which are held to be superficial, he traces first to the want of publicity and rational system in the elections to Congress and to local offices; and, secondly, to the clap-trap doctrine of abstract equality which forces the franchise upon voters who are totally unworthy of it. His remedies for the first are excellent: more publicity with greater stability and dignity in the minor offices; President Roosevelt could not do better than adopt them. The remedy for the second evil is peculiar and leads us to notice a very strange feature in Mr. Crozier's doctrine. He holds that to do away with the mischievous clap-trap of abstract equality America must give up the rights-of-man gospel of Rousseau and Jefferson and adopt in its stead the Evolution of Civilization as the "National Bible." Very good, we reply, but in what volume is the new Scripture to be found written? Mr. Crozier speaks strongly of the inadequacy of all extant history books and thus points us to an unmistakable inference. It is his own "History of Intellectual Development" which, when completed, is to become, in his own phrase, the "Bible of the Nations": that is, the canon of national institutions and basis of European education. To impose this new Sacred Book upon the American people is an enterprise to tax the powers of the most innovating of Presidents; and Mr. Roosevelt (or Don Quixote) might well be excused if he declared the task too hard for him.

Ost Friesland.

FROM SQUIRE TO PRINCE, by Walter Phelps Dodge (Unwin, 10s. 6d.), is the fanciful title of a book about a little known German district, its sub-title being "The Rise of the House of Aikema." We can certainly say that the subject was well worth undertaking; but equally are we certain that it was worth better treatment. The history of Ost-Friesland has never been written in English. It has a romance of its own, and yet it is also thoroughly characteristic, from the fifteenth to the eighteenth century, of familiar features of German life. At many points it seems to crave the touch of Meinhold or Goethe. Mr. Dodge would claim no such powers; but still he could surely have taken more pains. As it is he has given us an involved and scanty summary, in which facts are thrown about at haphazard, authorities are used in very unscholarly fashion, and very little information is in the end conveyed to the reader. From the town hall at Aurich and from the collection of Mr. John Chester Eno, of Connecticut, some excellent illustrations of portraits and coins are given; but we learn practically nothing about the originals. Is it possible that some association is claimed with the Counts Enno by Mr. Eno of Connecticut? Grote's stemmata illustrating the history are conveyed by the author, with acknowledgment, in his book; but they only serve to whet our appetite. The great Kannitz appears in the pedigree. What an association! What an opportunity! But there mistaken nor states uncritically what he believes. H true from the false in the miraculous parts of his and, as regards Christian miracles, is content to poin weakness as a basis of proof, without either den accuracy or decrying the Founder of the religion. T a brief sketch of the life, travels, and work of the re Greek antiquities (as, for instance, Trophonius and Mr. Mead is not deeply read; his scholarship is not for he writes ἰμμρς (p. 84) for ἰεγγυε; but he uses his with care and judgment, and gives exact references.

suggestions are made in the book. The Gymnosophist prets metaphorically, on a hint from one of them wh resigned my patrimony, and naked I sought the naked he regards as a corruption of Arhat, which is quite Paraea of Bharata, also possible in view of the con pronunciation of β and π. The style is lucid and te
In a translation from the Greek Life, which is pal consisting of scraps of iambic verse written as pros taining the tearsome split infinitive, "no more to wh beloul." We regret to see Mr. Evans' labyrinth cro here; it spreads like tares.

Catus.

CATUS COLLEGE (Robinson, 5s. n.) by Dr. John Ve of the College, is added to the series of College Histor is nothing dounish about the author's manner. It fault that the history of the College he writes a picturesqueness; he makes it as picturesque as he remarks on the haphazard University ways of the century are strong and graphic, and show that what G about Magdalen, Oxford, might have been said, with e at the same period of Caius, Cambridge. "No pla was recommended for my use," says Gibbon, "and a precious season of youth whole days and weeks we to elapse without labour or amusement, without account." Compare the case of Francis Blom historian:

> At any well-conducted college of recent > energetic tutors who had secured such a student wo > have coerced him into a tripos. As it was, he see > been left entirely to himself, and to have spent > from his first term in transcribing MSS. in our li > in noting and copying inscriptions in all the s > villages, and in like desultory work.

Another graphic picture of this period is as follows:—

> The Georgian student has, indeed, one merit w > not be overlooked. He dressed for his college din
> those days dinner was early probably about o > Etiquette rigidly demanded that for this he should > hair, and should wear silk stockings and pumps. T > barber accordingly became an important person, a > daily visits to his employers. . . . In 1738 an > passed that the barber should not come into t > upon Sundays.

On the whole, Caius College hardly seems to have p fair share of illustrious alumni. Perhaps some may Dr. Venn might have made his list longer by includin of Mr. Max Pemberton.

Colonel Biddulph's memoir of GENERAL STRINGER
(Murray, 5s. n.) describes him truly enough as the fa Indian army. He was in command of the forces of India Company when that company thought only of tra hardly alive to the much greater possibilities of the He may not have been a genius. Macaulay, inde him no more than common sense but he rendere services at a critical time, and brought the home Gove recognize the importance of our interests in India.
though he was eclipsed by his brilliant subordinate Clive, he was one of the makers of British India. A ethical development of female student life. Among the volumes of short tales and sketches we note with pleasure "Syyslehtiä" (Autumn Leaves), by Pietari Päivärinta, a famous narrator of old standing, who has long been silent; "Tienhaarassa" (At the Parting of the Ways), eighteen short tales by Santeri Alkio, bearing on social questions of the present day; and "Kevään ajoilta" (From the Times of Spring), a set of captivating stories, by Samuli Suomalainen. Väinö Anderlin, in his "Tyynen meren rannikoilta" (From the Shores of the Pacific), gives sketches of Finnish life in North America, vividly drawn, if somewhat hastily filled in. Johan Henrik Erkko, the best known living poet of Finland, has, in his "Ilmeän tullen" (The Approaching Gloom), brought out a collection of pieces, in poetry and prose, and some of the verses are in his best style, although of a rather mournful cast.

Of the many volumes of poems we can especially notice only "Lauluja ja runoelmia" (Songs and Poems), by Ilmari Calamnius, short lyrics and patriotic songs written in a popular and pleasing manner; "Hiihtäjän virsiä" (Songs of a Snow-shoe Runner), by Eino Leino, poetical effusions evincing much depth of feeling, arranged in groups according to their subject, and concluding with a few love-sonnets; also "Primuloita," by Hilja Liinamaa, a bouquet of "Primroses" as the poetess calls them, "for village youths and maidens." The poet Leino has also published two dramas, i.e., "Johan Wilhelm," in three acts, and "Sota Valosta" (The Contest for Light), in five acts. The latter play takes its subject from the Kalevala. Kaarle Halme's "Purimossa" (At Purimoi, a drama in five acts, presents a curious but exaggerated picture of Finnish provincial life.

We cannot omit to notice the "Dictionnaire Finnois-Français," by E. S. Yrjö-Koskinen, lately published under the auspices of the Finnish Literary Society. It will be most useful to foreign students of the Finnish language. The society is continuing its series of translations, by Cajander, of Shakespeare's dramas, Timon of Athens having been added to the repertory in 1890, and Cymbeline and King John in the present year. These versions in Finnish are very faithful and show much elegance of style.

FICTION.

The Irish Peasant.

The quaint charm of the Irish peasantry is not easily reproduced in words. Thanks to her keen perception of the varying moods of the Celtic temperament, Miss Grace Rhys essays the task with no little success in THE WOOING OF SHEILA (Methuen, 6s.). The title suggests the nature of the story, which contains several scenes of distinct dramatic power. Sheila herself is a child of nature, the embodiment of grace and winsomeness, and effectively contrasted with her rugged and masterful lover. Here we have for once a picture of the Irish peasant free from exaggeration. But the feature of the book is undoubtedly the character-study of Jack-a-Dandy, a half-witted village Mercury, whose folly masks his goodness of heart. Miss Rhys severely resists one temptation to which too many writers of Irish tales succumb, and does not "spatchcock" into her narrative irrelevant anecdotes of more or less hoary antiquity. The tag from the "Agamemnon" which appropriately prefaces the story might as well be correctly quoted in later editions.

On a Desert Island.

AN EPISODE ON A DESERT ISLAND (John Murray, 3s. 6d.) is told in a score of letters, written in a style charmingly simple and dainty. Louise Mamsym's idealism is counterbalanced by a keen sense of humour. She is twenty-eight and every one is expecting her to make "that suitable marriage for which the whole bringing-up of girls is the preparation." Cyril, with his "dear, stupid, ailing wife," Janette, the eldest sister, married to a widowed lord and determined that there shall be no old maids in the family, and other sisters and relations, join in shop-girl and the "gentleman," who, after a's his passion and better self, persuades the girl the first happy days, the gradual estrangeme rupture of relations are familiar episodes of "Eva" of Mr. Will Payne. Puritan, practical, and things, and a woman to the core—in her pu is a real heroine. Philip, too, appeals to o There is a fine scene in which he becomes all ness and lack of moral refinement—defects app in the male sex—and his redemption comes to seiousness of the woman's generosity and un lesser characters, the Bohemian Mrs. Hollingshe supercilious Miss Worthington, and Sarah, w devotion to her friend, form a well-drawn pic grumble less at the "American Invasion" if it like the "Story of Eva."

Scotch Stories.

THE SKIPPER OF BANNCRAIG (Constable, of the sea, full of the tragedy of a man wh vocation. Lawrence Russell is a lad of a highl temperament, with an artist's soul and a whe the sea. He is wedded to his violin, which in becomes the expression of his inmost soul. His old sea-dog with a contempt for land-lubbers an fiddlers. Fate is against the fisher lad; the the father carries the day. The pathos of the by Phloss, the philosopher, and his companion's tatives of the "kailyard." Scotch humour Scotchmen. But even Southerners will derive Mr. Seton's whimsical humourists.

Mr. Duncan Macgregor's novel LADY C 6s.) is of a character difficult to describe an evidently the work of a highly religious person dowered with a sense of humour, and who do the art of novel writing. It would be easy t but the book, with its curious picture of a se who lived in a Scotch village in early Vict any rate sincere, and readers who do not scriptural style may find interest in it.

Miss Helen Wallace must be a very Scott GREATEST OF THESE (Hodder, 6s.) is taken up with the quarrel between the Established Kirk the Secessionists of 1753. It is not a bad stor contain very much of the Jacobite rising (for w thankful), but it is cruelly overweighted with author relentlessly mangles the spelling of ev attempt to reproduce it. This rather derogat power which the book shows.

The spirit that breathed in those lines of R
The bridegroom may forget the bri
Was made his wedded wife yestre
The monarch may forget the crown
That on his head an hour has bee
The mother may forget the child
That smiles sae sweetly on her kn
But I'll remember thee, Glencairn,
And a' that thou hast done for me is that which informs Allan M'Aulay's admir MARY (Fisher Unwin 6s.) and gives romance to elaborate detail. A Scottish laird lives with h at the "big house" of Ardwinnoch. They ha totally different character who sends them keg the Indies; and as a last gift, the prodigal's fric Mary, his natural child, whose black blood is taint and who is looked upon in the Scottish vi legacy. But the history of little Mary and Hepburn is told with delightful sentiment, with simple joy which make such a book a valuable quiet class of literary novels.

Murho's only apparent excuse for writing GLENDARROCH (Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.) is some slight acquaintance with the West Coast of Scotland. The sayings and doings of a remarkably dull house-party are chronicled with ludicrous fidelity. The characters are as numerous as they are tedious, and a favourable opportunity which a yacht accident gave of getting rid of a few of them has unfortunately been neglected. "A man always calls a girl little if he thinks she is scrumptious" is a fair specimen of the writer's wit and wisdom.

It must be difficult to devise a new variant of the stereotyped novel relating to the Forty-five, and the difficulty has hardly been surmounted by Mr. Thomas Pinkerton in BLUE BONNETS UP (Long, 6s.). The best thing in it is its vein of humour, especially in the first half of the story. The plot is conventional, though one character, Miss Camilla Chisholm, has freshness and individuality.

THE EXTERMINATION OF LOVE (Blackwood, 6s.), by E. Gerard (Madame Emily de Laszowska), is an interesting and original novel. Dr. Eric Peterstorff, a young scientist, is horrified at the evil wrought by the "Bacillus amoris, the poisonous germ devouring the hearts of men and women." "No escape is possible—none—none—till science has found the antidote, the precious serum that is to kill and exterminate the Bacillus amoris." But Dr. Peterstorff finds it necessary that he should be married, and chance throws a delightful girl in his way. The rest of the story must be discovered by the reader, and we are sure he will be well entertained in the process.

In THE TRIUMPH OF HILARY BLACHLAND (Chatto and Windus, 6s.) Mr. Bertram Mitford falls between two stools. The experiences of gold-prospectors in Matabeleland in the days of Lo Bengula and the battle scenes in the subsequent war are entertaining enough. But the love intrigues sandwiched between the adventures are vulgar and sordid, and mingle incongruously with the "simian clamour" of baboons and the roaring of many lions. Mrs. Hilary, who is the cause of much unpleasantness, is a person of "polyandrous experiences," and the real triumph of her husband consisted in getting rid of her.

ONE LIFE BETWEEN, by Alice Maud Meadows (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.), is quite as interesting as many another story of a murder and its discovery. Its coincidences are indeed grotesque; its improbabilities purely farcical. But they are, nevertheless, utilized very ingeniously, and the love of Frank Atherley—who committed, but was not really guilty of, the murder—and his wife give a pleasant human touch to the tale. It certainly never flags; and there are thousands of readers who are content with a book of which so much may be said.

MARY ANNE OF PARCHMENT BUILDINGS, by Lucas Cleeve (Digby, Long, 6s.), has some striking improbabilities, but there is a good deal of human nature about it. Mary Anne is not always quite consistent. Sometimes in her conversation she forgets that she is an uneducated woman. But her mixture of surface vulgarity and innate refinement appeals strongly to the reader.

To the inconvenience of living in a flat should be added, as we learn from A SET OF FLATS (John Milne, 6s.), the possible unpleasantness of finding a corpse in the lift. Every occupant of the house is accused of the murder. And in the end, of course, the culprit is found in an apparently guileless individual whom no one had suspected. When we add that the criminal was a Pro-Boer his cup of iniquity is surely full to the brim. The story is wildly exciting.

"Mr. Blake of Newmarket" made a vast number of friends who are ready to welcome any sporting book from Mr. Edward H. Cooper, and so A FOOL'S YEAR (Methuen, 6s.), with its owners and jockeys, its racehorses and tales of the Turf, is likely to be popular. One must possess at least a modified interest in racing matters to enjoy it; that granted, the book is entertaining enough.

Mr. Finch Mason always appeals to one as an all-round sportsman in art and letters. His collection of sixteen stories dealer, carries off in true caballero style. We hope out more satisfactory than did his attempt to grow trees. The interest of the story lies in its local author uses a background with which he is acquain being the introduction of an occasional anachron

A villainous Italian count, a brave and chiv Englishman, with the customary allowance of lay fi and Italian, make up A BLACK VENTAGE, by M (Digby, Long, 6s.). The author is untramme bonds of probability. His Count (Campanella is h coiner who puts interfering fools out of his way in melodramatic fashion. Any relations who passes shut up until they are old enough to sign away thei or else they meet sudden and mysterious ends. Gill on the other hand, is a modest fellow of infinite wor (Italian) dies in saving his life from Campanel (English) marries him. It is all as it should be, a an interesting and ingeniously-constructed tale, o society order, told with many gorgeous passages o writing.

There is a love affair in Mr. J. M. Mowbr JOURNEY TO NATURE (Constable, 7s. 6d. n.) which m for claiming it as Fiction. It purports to be the nine months' holiday in a country retreat, taken by street operator who has been living too hard. Th deal of clever writing in the book, and the doctor (w ally runs down on a visit to his patient) is a decid in his way. Mr. Mowbray is fond of introducing l tions on the subject of Love and Life and other su not forgetting Natural History—but his book is contains many shrewd reflections, sometimes happil "A Journey to Nature" is handsomely bound and it is not quite easy to see why it should be priced s RETALIATION, by Herbert Flowerden (Constable in a cowhouse with a bout of fisticuffs. The combat sons of the squire and a local farmer, and the spo contest are their admiring sisters. The rivalry thus the keynote of the story. The cowhouse was no for it stimulated the young farmer's imagination purpose that, seven years afterwards, he has becom ful novelist. The author tells his story easily and pl it is curious to notice how carefully he has eliminate of culture or distinction from the conversation of characters. This is surely realism with a vengeance. marriage, one Derring, "poet and maker of phr "pray for no better fate than to find my ideal in to my music." Judging from the evidence before that the woman would be fortunate. The tale wi with those who take their fiction seriously, for th excuse for a smile in the whole book.

A CHILD OF ART, by Annabel Gray (Simpk 3s. 6d.), has on its title-page an imposing row of wo to us. Otherwise we should have taken it to be by a writer. The profoundly cynical generalities, the descriptions, the incoherence of the style, the gy of the swarming ideas that tumble over one a bewilderment of the reader, all suggest youth and i The "Child of Art" is a model—a "divine wo inspired head." But it is more the affairs of he which the book is concerned. These are too description. The author writes like this:—"Hidd consumption, for instance, or cancer poisoning beau are of far less importance to society than the m makes and the way her smart frocks and coats are c is occasionally an idea in the whirl of words, bu should cultivate a saner style.

MANASSEH (Macqueen, 6s.) does not exactly pr translation of Dr. Maurus Jokai's book, of which th title is "Egy az Isten," i.e., "One is the Lord"— the Unitarians of Transylvania. It is "retol Hungarian" by Mr. P. F. Bicknell, who has found troubadours, of the machinations of the wicked and the devotion of the good, of lonelyest castles and the clash of arms. The author has been at extraordinary pains to realize the atmosphere of France in the thirteenth century, and she may be congratulated on her success. One hardly knows which of the principal characters to prefer, the most famous Lola herself, of surpassing beauty of feature and of character, Raimon Taillefer, Vicomte of Béziers, her long undeclared lover, Peire Vidal, the gay minstrel and apt improvisatore, or Barral de Peyrors, the courtly knight who surrendered his abbacy because he would not see his ancient faith bestraggled. It is all remarkably well done, both as to the quaintly appropriate archaic diction and the realization of the characters and the times.

Among the books held over from the autumn by Mr. John Lane is the translation of "The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám" from the French of J. B. Nicolas. The translation has been done by Frederick Baron Corvo, and the volume, with the reprint of the French text as well as the English version, is developing into a more elaborate work than was originally intended. Mr. Lane has also postponed "The Love Poems of W. S. Blunt," and of Herrick in "The Lover's Library" until the more appropriate season of the spring. The latest announcement in the way of anthologies is a volume of poems on Friendship, collected by Mr. Edward Carpenter and expected early in the new year; while "A Book of British Song for Home and School," edited by the Principal of the Hampstead Conservatoire (Mr. Cecil B. Sharp), will be among the spring books published by Mr. Murray. Biography and autobiography will again play an important part in the spring publications. One of the most interesting of these will be Sir Henry Layard's autobiography from his childhood to his appointment as British Ambassador at Madrid, with additional chapters on his Parliamentary career by Sir Arthur Otway (Murray). Mr. H. St. Maur's "Annals of the Seymours" has been promised for the spring by Messrs. Kegan Paul—a volume giving the history of the Seymour family from its early days to the recent achievements of Admiral Seymour in China. The "Annals" will be in one volume, divided into three parts, each with a complete pedigree.

Correspondence.

LAPSED COPYRIGHTS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir, You lately printed a list of editions of the works of Dickens that have lately been put upon the market, and a shorter, but considerable, list of recent editions of Scott's novels. It would be easy, if it were worth while, to make further lists of reprints of other non-copyright works from Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" to Carlyle's "French Revolution." The prevalence of the reprints, whatever the exact number of them may be, proves that a literary property often continues to be valuable long after the death of its creator; and I contend that the way in which the law of England (to say nothing of the law of any other country) deals with that property is not only unjust but illogical. Copyright is the literary man's equivalent for what the tradesman calls a "going business"; and a going business in history or poetry or philosophy or romance has just as strong a moral claim to protection, irrespectively of the duration of its founder's life, as a going business in jams or pills. If the property of men of letters is to be confiscated at all, ought it not to be confiscated by the State in the interest of the community? What happens at present is that, after a certain term of years, every work of genius is taken away from are to be applied to literary property at all, the rational mode of procedure would, it seems to me, when copyrights cease to be the property of th should become the property of the State; that tration of this property should be undertaken Government Departments say, the Board of licences to reprint should be granted to appro who apply for them, subject to the payment of Department. It is difficult to calculate what royalties could be made to yield; but the Shake and Dickens royalties alone would be substantial, Daniel Defoe, Fielding, Thackeray, Kingsley, Carlyle would swell the total appreciably. The mon mately be used for the general purposes of the Go might be ear-marked for expenditure in the interest It might, for instance, be capitalized to form a fund. Or it might be devoted to the endowme Or it might be spent on the production of some works of reference which are so badly needed, to repay the outlay involved in their publicatio already in operation to a certain extent at Ox profit made by printing Bibles and Testamen University Press for the loss incurred in printi as Sanskrit Dictionaries. The thing might be larger scale if the profits on other books whic public property were devoted to public purpos then have an Imperial Gazetteer on the sam "Dictionary of National Biography," and reprin important historical documents now kept in ma Record Office and elsewhere, and do many other t the difficult path of the student in all the vario of learning. All this by the systematic use of asset from which the nation now derives no a considering.

I am, Sir, yours faithfu

"'VARSITY JOURNALISM.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have read with some interest an arti issue on the subject of Oxford periodicals, wri by some one not unconnected with the 'Varsit in themselves incorrect, I consider his remarks misleading, and as the editor of a "rival impelled to amplify them for the enlightenment, mission, of your readers.

As the article in question suggests, the m feature of the Oxford periodical is its mushroom- equally transient existence. It stays with us for a and then, like the "nightingale that in the hra evanesces," and whence, and whither flown again Messrs. Burroughs and Doe may hold the gha not the sorrowing public, unless a chance echo f shire County Court arrives to enlighten them. three years there have been published in Oxfor periodicals (and perhaps others) besides the Oxfo The X Rays, which, having been reduced fro threepence, finally collapsed after a chequered thing under two years. The Quad was a rat terminal magazine containing purely literary ma a shilling. It started life in a very bilious yello is to be regretted that it collapsed (after thres extinct. Their speedy downfall is regrettable, but most natural. Enterprises of this kind need capital, which undergraduates (and particularly literary undergraduates) do not usually possess. Initial outlay is necessary and one whose stay in Oxford lasts three or four years only is little likely to reap much return. And even if some misguided but wealthy devotee of the muses does elect to embark on an undertaking of this kind, it is more than likely that none will be found to follow in his rather expensive wake.

To return from the noble dead to the more permanent living. The Broad, a fortnightly, which has already achieved two numbers, no doubt still claims to be extant. Of the 'Varsity your correspondent has already told you a great deal. It has been going now for about a year and a half, and still appears to be in a highly-flourishing condition. Whether it will long outlive its present able staff is a doubtful question. Its excellence persuades one to hope that it will.

And now I come (like Mr. Henley) to my grievance. Your informant does not mention the Isis. The Isis has always been run on a different footing from other Oxford journals and for that reason I have reserved an exposition of its charms to the last. The Isis is the property of Messrs. Alden and Co., the well-known Oxford printers and stationers, and is edited by a paid editor and staff of undergraduates. Its stability being thus assured (it has now been running for about ten years), it very naturally has always had by far the largest circulation of any 'Varsity paper, and has also been able to secure the best available contributions. It has, of course, had periods of decrepitude, but owing to its ever-changing personnel these periods have been few and far between. It very naturally serves as a model on which most new undertakings of a similar nature are based. The Isis numbers among its contributors some well-known names, including Mostyn Pigott, its reverend founder, R. C. Lehmann, Max Beerbohm, A. E. W. Mason, Paul Rubens, C. B. Fry, H. B. Irving, and many others. Without further detailing the manifold beauties of the Isis I will conclude by repeating that I send you these facts because I think your correspondent, by a skilful sin of omission, has denied the Isis that proud position of pre-eminence which it undoubtedly holds.

I am yours very sincerely,
CYRIL H. BRETHERTON
12, Paragon, Blackheath. (Editor of the Isis).

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—A considerable portion of Mr. Roberts' letter seems to fall under the category of personal recrimination, and so hardly calls for comment. I will, however, avail myself of your courtesy in allowing me to reply. Mr. Roberts suspects that I know nothing of 'Varsity journalism, and is certain that I have no critical faculty. Whether the latter statement is true or not is hardly my business to discuss, but the former suspicion is incorrect. The details which Mr. Roberts gives of the changes in the editorial staff of the X seem to me simply to confirm my statement that the paper passed through many vicissitudes. As to my "charge of æstheticism" brought against the Quad, I may assure Mr. Roberts that the term was not used as one of abuse. For much that appeared in the Quad even my critical faculty was thankful, and I condole in its "untimely and accidental end," thanking Mr. Roberts for his pleasing euphemism.

Finally, I should like to express my regret that any "amazing members of the society and forward their subs[illegible] guineas) to Mr. Turner, The Castle, Lewes, the [illegible] promoted by the society would be greatly encouraged. [illegible] volume, now in the press, will be Simon Marr[illegible] (1580-1642) for the Archdeaconry of Lewes.

Your obedient servant,
E. H. W.

The Heath, Fairlight, Hastings, Dec. 21.

THE MICROCOSM, MAN, IN SHAKES[illegible]

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The word "microcosm" is, as denoting [illegible] familiar. But, in Shakespeare's time, under the inf[illegible] Paracelsus (circa 1493-1541) had exerted, the word [illegible] not only to have attained a good deal of currency, [illegible] have been employed concerning man with a liberali[illegible] a first view, may seem surprising. The word itself [illegible] once in Shakespeare. Menenius in Coriolanus (ii. [illegible]) says, "If you see this in the map of my microcos[illegible] that I am known well enough too?" Here "microcos[illegible]" Menenius' body, and, as appears from the context, [illegible] an expression very worthy of note—signifies [illegible] characteristics, the body having a map on it analo[illegible] found on a terrestrial globe. But here the face [illegible] now particularly intended.

We may again see the microcosmic map in the [illegible] be pointed out on Nell's body, Comedy of Er[illegible] ii. 117 seqq.). She is "spherical, like a globe." Th[illegible] "microcosm," the "little world," may be regarde[illegible] lying the mention of the "globe." A similar rem[illegible] made with regard to Falstaff, whom Prince Hal ca[illegible] of sinful continents" (2 Henry IV., ii. 4, l. 309).

There is another curious place which is well wo[illegible] ing. King Richard, hearing that his cause is lo[illegible] Bolingbroke is triumphant, says:—

> Let's choose executors, and talk of wills,
> And yet not so—for what can we bequeath,
> Save our deposed bodies to the ground?
> Our lands, our lives, and all, are Bolingbro[illegible]
> And nothing can we call our own but death
> And that small model of the barren earth,
> Which serves as paste and cover to our bo[illegible]
> (King Richard II., iii. 2, ll. 1[illegible]

I wish to call particular attention to the last two [illegible] the commentators, so far as I know, have altogeth[illegible] explain. The "small model" has been thought to [illegible] but this would scarcely suit the fact that it is some[illegible] the King can call "our own." According to the m[illegible] does not possess even one "little, little obscure [illegible] may have to lie "in the King's highway." More [illegible] argument were waived, does it seem at all conceiv[illegible] grave can be a "model of the earth"? But what [illegible] chief importance is that the "small model of the bo[illegible] which the King can call "our own," as he can the [illegible] "death," manifestly answers to "our deposed bodies" [illegible] mentioned—something still owned, and which can be [illegible] We thus come to the conclusion that the "small m[illegible] barren earth" denotes the softer parts of the body [illegible] cosm, which serve as "paste and cover to our bones." [illegible] "the barren earth"? Probably, because, in acco[illegible] what precedes, it is only the King's bare body which [illegible]

Books to look out for at once.

George Sand's "Mauprat." With an Introduction by Mrs. Craigie. [illegible] 1s. 6d.
["A Century of French Romance." Illustrated.]

"[illegible]." By F. Marion Fosbin. [illegible] 3s. net.
["Great Masters" Series. Illustrated.]

"Contemporary American Opinions of the French Revolution." By Charles Downer Hazen. Fisher Unwin. 5s. 6d. net.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

SCHOOL AND SEA DAYS. By Alan Ducan. 8×5½, 360 pp. Burleigh. 6s. n.

[Travels and adventures by sea, for children, with drawings by the author.]

EDUCATIONAL.

THE METAMORPHOSES OF OVID. Book I. Edited by E. Essor. (Blackie Latin Series.) 7½×4½, 108 pp. Blackie. 1s. 6d.

[With introduction, notes, and illustrations as in the former volumes of the series. The text of the Corpus Poetarum Latinorum.]

THE PICTURE SHAKESPEARE: MACBETH. 7½×5, 122 pp. Blackie. 1s.

[With introduction, coloured frontispiece, and line illustrations. The notes and appendices are substantially the same as in the Junior School Shakespeare.]

BYRON'S CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE (Canto II.). Blackie's English Classics. 2d.

[With introduction and copious notes at the end.]

KING RICHARD III. (Junior School Shakespeare.) Blackie. 10d.

[Another of these useful school text books, bound in paper, with introduction, notes, and classified index.]

SELECTIONS FROM GARGANTUA. MATEO FALCONE. Blackie's Little French Classics. 4d. each.

[With short introductions on Rabelais and Prosper Mérimée and notes.]

FRENCH CONVERSATIONAL SENTENCES. By G. E. Avery. Blackie. 6d.

[Useful for the beginner.]

A BRIEF SKETCH OF FRENCH HISTORY, 1789-1815. L. Guilhault. 1871-1872. By H. Hirsch. 6½×4½. 114-155 pp. Blackie. 1s. 6d. each.

[These books provide a mean between the voluminous history and the mere book.]

LA JEUNE SIBÉRIENNE. By Xavier de Maistre. Edited by W. G. Etheridge. (Modern Language Series.) 6½×4½. 128 pp. Blackie. 1s.

[With biographical note on the Savoyard soldier and author (1763-1852) and notes adjusted to the wants of lower forms.]

FICTION.

UNDER THE SWORD. By the Countess de Sumalla. 8×5½, 316 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

[A story of art life, mystery, and romance in England.]

A BID FOR EMPIRE. By Major A. Griffiths. 7½×5, 319 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

[A story of modern Egypt.]

LUKE DELMEGE. By the Rev. P. A. Sheehan. 7½×5½, 380 pp. Longmans. 6s.

[The author of "My New Curate" here gives us another far more intensely study of the life of a Roman Catholic priest, in Ireland and in London.]

THE MISSION OF MARGARET. By Adeline Sergeant. 7½×5. 341 pp. J. Long. 6s.

[Short stories connected with Christmas.]

THE CALLING OF THE WEIR. By F. Langbridge. 8×5½. 301 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

["A story of life in an Irish village" ten or twelve years ago.]

LITERARY.

THE VICTORIAN ANTHOLOGY. Edited by Sir M. E. Grant Duff. 9×5½. 250 pp. Macmillan. 7s. 6d.

[From Samuel Rogers to Mr. Laurence Binyon. Selected on no principle but the author's own pleasure, and divided into three groups according to periods, with an introductory note to each group. A

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE LICENSED VICTUALLERS' OFFICIAL [illegible] 1902. The Licensing World and Licensed Trad

ALMANACH HACHETTE FOR 1902. 7½×5, 43

BURKE'S PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, AND KN Harrison. £2 2s.

HERBERT FRY'S ROYAL GUIDE TO THE FOR 1902. Edited by J. Lane. 7½×5, 391 p 1s. 6d.

DOD'S PEERAGE FOR 1902. 7×4½, 1,085 pp.

VANITY FAIR ALBUM. Vol. XXXIII. 13¾×1

[This delightful volume is really an his significant that literature is represented by t Tolstoi, and Rostand; and excellent caricatur they are.]

POETRY.

MIRTH AND MUSIC. By F. B. Doveton. 7 2s. 6d. n.

[Short poems, mostly reprinted from Literature.]

POLITICAL.

CROMWELL ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS. Togeth International Matters. By F. W. Pays. 9×5 Press. 2s. 6d. n.

[The title is that of the first of Six Essays national Politics and our military position, reference to the rivalry of Germany and Engla

REPRINTS AND NEW EDI

HISTORY OF LACE. By Mrs. Bury Palliser, and Alice Dryden. 10½×7, 536 pp. Sampson

[The third edition of this standard work, and rewritten, appeared in 1875. A sumptuou cover, with the original woodcuts and nearly tions.]

THE LADY POVERTY. A XIII. Century Alleg M. Carmichael. 6½×4½, 200 pp. Murray.

[A translation of the "Sacrum Commercin how St. Francis wooed and won my Lady unknown Franciscan in the thirteenth cent different editions, authorship, and date of the

TALES OF PAST TIMES TOLD. By M (Temple Classics for Young People.) 6×4, 19

[The well-known Fairy Tales of the seve man of letters.]

GOD IN SHAKESPEARE. By C. Downing. Greening. 6s.

[A new edition of Mr. Downing's elaborat spiritual ideals.]

BALLADS OF THE FLEET AND OTHER POEM Robb. New Ed. 7¾×5, 151 pp. Arnold. 3s.

[Reprinted from the first edition and fro with additions.]

THEOLOGY.

A CRITICAL AND HISTORICAL ENQUIRY IN THE THIRD GOSPEL. By P. C. Sesse. 8 and Norgate. 7s. 6d.

[The writer's view is that the Canonical G attempt made in the second half of the second to unite warring sectaries; and that the Thir mainly from the Marcionite Gospel. The orig he has already discussed in another book.]

THE PROGRESS OF DOGMA. By J. Orr, Hodder and Stoughton. 7s. 6d.

[Lectures delivered before an American embracing religious thought during the whole author is Professor of Apologetics and S the United Free Church College, Glasgow.]

THE CHURCH'S ONE FOUNDATION. Christ By the Rev. W. R. Nicoll. 7×4½. 227 pp. 3s. 6d.

[Based on articles published in the British

IDEALS OF MINISTRY. By A. W. Willia Blackwood. 3s. 6d.

[Advice on the conduct of services and

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 230. SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1902.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 617, 618, 619
LITERATURE PORTRAITS.—No. XXXV.—Sir Theodore Martin. An Appreciation by Robert Machray 619
THE "LOWER BRANCHES"—A "Personal View," by Francis Gribble 620
BOOKS OF THE YEAR 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628
SCOTLAND IN 1901 628
BOOK AUCTIONS OF 1901 629
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 630
ALEXANDER SMITH REDIVIVUS 631
A FIFTEENTH CENTURY BOOK OF SPORT, by Mary Dormer Harris 632
CURRENT LITERATURE—
The Life of Sir William Molesworth 633
The Works of Thomas Kyd 634
Life and Letters in the Fourth Century 634
Synesius the Hellene 635
The Journal of Stella 635
The Prose Works of Jonathan Swift 636
The Poems of Leopardi 637
The Westerners—In the Blood—The Cankerworm—Hubert Sherbrooke, Priest 638
LIBRARY NOTES 638
CORRESPONDENCE—English Fiction in Germany—The Gospel Riots at Athens (Mr. W. H. D. Rouse) 639
BOOKS TO LOOK OUT FOR 640
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS 640

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the Literature Portrait next week will be

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

An appreciation of Mr. Phillips' work will be contributed by Mr. Stephen Gwynn.

* * * *

Few painters have been so full of literary inspiration as Sir Noel Paton, who passed away last week. He derived from his parents the love of the traditional lore of Scotland which breathes through such beautiful work as his illustrations to Aytoun's "Lays." Apart from his easel work he did much illustration—of Shelley, Milton, Scott, &c., and he was a devoted student of the Arthurian legend. He was an eminent antiquarian, and he published in the sixties two volumes of poems, "Poems by a Painter," and "Spindrift."

* * * *

Owing to the Christmas holiday we went to press last week too early to refer to the work of Mr. Onslow Ford, whose sudden death robs the Royal Academy of a distinguished sculptor, London society of a true gentleman, gifted with a charm of unwilling to sacrifice any significant line of the isolation that he gave to the figure was that of a called upon to govern, not that of an intangibility.
by the impetuous originality of a Rodin, the imagin of, for instance, Mr. Gilbert's "Broken Shrine," w dignified interpretation of Victoria, of woman a Queen; with, behind, a figure of "Maternity," a ba by either breast, aptly inscribed "Let me but be I'll bear your cares." At the National Liberal C Onslow Ford's "Gladstone"; at the Tate Gallery h respectively at Chatham and at Oxford his memorial and Shelley; and Lord Roberts possesses an equestri in silver of his gallant son, who died of wounds Colenso.

* * *

On February 26 the whole of France is evoke the memory of Victor Hugo. In the Place Victor Hugo's house—offered to the city of Paris Blémont, a gift of 300,000 francs—will be inaug museum. A statue will be unveiled, and there will of the Burgraves at the Comédie. A project is als the organization at the Panthéon of a ceremony o in which the poets of France and the represent world of letters in foreign lands shall take part.

* * * *

The latest of Hugo's posthumous volumes, the "P de ma Vie," will, with a final volume of poems, c cap-stone of the pyramid of his works. There is in a remarkable essay on "Taste." Hugo contrasts th taste habitual to genius" with that "relative taste
a useful rôle in the rhetorics and prosodies." Th taste," what is it? Hugo gives us some of those instances which dispense with argument. We m sample, and a curious one:—

> The pun when it is Æschylus's, the grimace > Goya's, the hump when Æsop bears it, the > Murillo crushes it, the flea when it pricks Volta > bone of an ass when Samson uses it, hysteria when > of Solomon" throws over it a mantle of purple . . .
> when it is that of Œdipus, an eye wrested from its > it is Gloucester's, the barking woman when it is > snow when it comes from the Eumenides, the bl > Cid avenges it, spittle when Jesus receives it, b > ness on the lips of Homer, savagery when it is > who is responsible, slang when Villon speaks it, ra > trails them, blows with a stick when Scapin > carrion when the vulture and Salvator Rosa gnaw > part of this supreme taste.

* * *

Mr. Thomas Dunbar Ingram, who died on Mond known for his works on Irish history, especially his the Legislative Union of Great Britain and Ireland wrote a history of "England and Rome," from the 1688. He passed most of his life in India, where Professorship at the Presidency College, Calcutta.

* * *

give you not only the magazine "most perfectly adapted for real utility and interest," but also the complete works of George Eliot, or for 20 cents a week the same "one important magazine in the world" and twelve volumes of the "Little Masterpiece Library." The Cosmo for one year and President Roosevelt's works in fourteen volumes can be secured for $5, and new subscribers to the Century or the Atlantic Monthly have the November and December numbers free. The Youth's Companion for one year's subscription throws in all the weekly numbers for the balance of 1901 (the advertisement appeared in November) and a calendar for 1902. Another house offers more than 1,000 combinations by which two, three, or more of their magazines may be had for about 60 to 75 per cent. of the usual price. The particulars given in the advertisement are most bewildering and make a kind of algebraic problem. If the Cosmopolitan, Success, the Designer, and Household can be had for $4, the Cosmopolitan, Success, and Leslie's Monthly for $2, and the Cosmopolitan, American Boy, and Black Cat for $2, what is the intrinsic worth of a Black Cat or an American Boy? The prize system, too, is very popular. One hundred dollars in gold is at the disposal of the person who gives the best reason why every married man should read "What Happened to Wigglesworth," by W. O. Fuller. One thousand dollars is offered for the "right guess" as to the authorship of the twelve stories included in "A House Party"; twenty-seven well-known writers are asked each to contribute a story, and the person who most nearly guesses the authorship of the selected twelve is the prize-winner. "The Story of an American Countess" (Small, Maynard, and Co.) is illustrated by twelve artists, each of whom has made a drawing expressing his idea of the heroine. The opinion of the public is invited as to the best of these, and the person whose choice "comes nearest to the choice of the majority" will be the recipient of $500.

* * * *

Mr. F. G. Kitton sends us some notes as to our Dickens portraits. "Dickens," he says, "never cared for sitting to photographers, probably because he considered that the results were generally unsatisfactory. When he did sit, however, he not infrequently assumed a number of poses, as testified by particular sets of photographic portraits in my own collection, some of those certainly fail to do justice to the subject. The most successful were by such experts as the brothers John and Charles Watkins and H. H. Mason. The latter I knew personally, when he had given up photography and had adopted literature as a profession, his last work being a 'History of Norfolk,' the completion of which was prevented by death. On referring to my printed list of Dickens portraits, I find that both the full-length, standing portrait and that from which the photogravure was made, are reproductions from Mason's photographs, circa 1867. The publishers of the 'History of Norfolk' (1892) were Messrs. Werthheimer, Lea, and Co., and the name of Lea in this connection rather suggests the possibility that Mason may have handed over (or bequeathed) his negatives to the junior partner, from whom Mr. G. L. Lea, of Watford (who owned those of Dickens until recently) may have acquired them." With reference to the large photogravure portrait which we published for the first time, Mr. Kitton tells us that the head and hand only were lithographed many years ago by Messrs. Ebenezer and Co., the lithograph being now very scarce. An engraving somewhat similar to the standing portrait on page 618 of Literature—the head being turned a little towards the left shoulder—appeared in the Favorite Magazine, October, 1868. The portrait of Dickens in his garden at Gadshill is, Mr. Kitton says, not entirely new, having appeared, though slightly reduced, in Miss Mamie Dickens' "My Father as I Knew Him."

* * * *

The Diary of the Imperial Tour of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York in 1901, written by Mr. Donald Mackenzie Wallace, Assistant Private Secretary to a translation by the well-known painter and litt Horsfall, of a play by Mr. W. Somerset Maugh entitled Marriages are Made in Heaven.

Among the books already announced for the two volumes of essays and plays by Macte from Mr. George Allen, who will publish early book of dialogues by Maeterlinck's translator, M entitled "Women in Love: Eight Studies in Se Allen's list also includes two series of "Pen Ruskin," selected by Caroline H. Wurtzburg; a Belloc's "The Path to Rome: Notes of Trav announced last autumn. Several important work from Mr. Murray early this year, including the deacon Denison: Fifty Years at East Brent, 18 on his diaries and correspondence, and edite Miss Louisa Denison; Lord Ronald Gower's 1881-1900" giving reminiscences of many men and women met by the author in this abroad during the past twenty years; and t and Correspondence of Henry, 4th Earl of Car Affairs of British North America," edited Herbert. This month, too, Mr. Murray hopes anonymous novel entitled "High Treason"—a Jacobite days; and it is rather singular that novel at present announced by Mr. Murray Man: An Allegorical Romance") is also—for the all events—anonymous.

* * *

THE SONG OF THE WIND.

With a swirl around, and a whirl away!
(Hey! for the swirl of the
With a shriek and a sigh,
And a wail and a cry!
(Hey! for the wail of the

In the rigging, there's a drumming,
Can't you hear the ropes a-humming,
And the eerie bo'sun's whistle through th
Can't you hear the voices crying
Of the poor lost souls undying,
Who ever wander through the air in pain?

With a flurry around, and a scurry away!
(Hey! for the flurry of win
With a leap and a yell,
It sweeps o'er the fell!
(Hey! for the sweep of the

It clamours o'er the town,
And sweeps across the down;
On the bleak, wild moorland, dancing as it Can't you hear the spirits calling,
And the ghostly echoes falling,
As the driving cloud-wisps send across the

With a chuckle close by, and a laugh afar (Hey! for the laugh of the
With a whine of despair,
And a sigh through the air!
(Hey! for the whine of the

See the stately tree-tops bending,
And the broken boughs descending,
And every little rabbit grey with fright!
Can't you hear the forests wailing,
And the wind-fiend's garment trailing
Over tree, and bush, and gorse and grasse

With a frolic around, and a rollick away!
(Hey! for the frolic of win
With the laughing shriek
Of an elfin freak!
(Hey! for the freak of the

Can't you hear the muttered rumbling,
As the wind-sprites come a-tumbling,

Anthologies and their Makers.

Almost every man who writes has a vague notion at the back of his head that he has never yet seen a perfectly satisfactory collection of verse. Hence, partly, the perpetual flow of new anthologies. The year that has just closed has seen a good many. Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff's "Victorian Anthology" (Swan Sonnenschein) is only just out. The end of the year saw two little collections of light verse, Mr. T. A. Cook's "Anthology of Humorous Verse" (Virtue) and Mr. Anthony C. Deane's "A Little Book of Light Verse" (Methuen), and also a volume of "Patriotic Song" (Pearson), edited by Mr. Arthur Stanley. In the early part of the year Professor Arber continued his programme with a "Cowper Anthology" and a "Dunbar Anthology" (Frowde), and there have been others. None can be wholly satisfactory; we all have our separate and individual likes and dislikes, and no editor can please everybody. Even the best of them discover, here and there, strange lapses from sanity. Some of them include matter not germane to their subject; they omit altogether one or two poets who should certainly (in our opinion) have found a place; occasionally they mangle the verses that they quote or clap on to them some title of their own invention. The actual labour involved in a compilation of this kind need not be anything remarkable, and in old days, at any rate, it was often more remunerative than original work. Goldsmith received two hundred pounds for his "Selections of English Poetry." For this he did nothing but mark passages with a red pencil, but then, as he was wont to add, with great gravity, "A man shows his judgment in these selections, and a man may be twenty years of his life cultivating that judgment." The "Vicar of Wakefield," on the other hand, was disposed of by Dr. Johnson for sixty pounds, though Goldsmith, with the usual vanity of an author, told Boswell it had brought him four hundred. Judgment in those days, then, was worth considerably more than genius, and in all probability the same is the case still, from the point of view of pecuniary profit. There are few who do not fancy themselves possessed of a nice judgment in the matter of verse. Taste, that so subtle and elusive quality, is one that all claim, and it is a quality that can safely be assumed, for the position of the man of taste can never be shaken by argument; he has always, to fall back upon, the unanswerable retort of his individual preference. But every collection, honestly made thus as the result of individual affection, has its own value. It is an expression of the collector's personality almost as much as if the poems were his own: we may get from it (in addition to the enjoyment of the verses themselves) the same sort of pleasure that we find in looking over the library of a new acquaintance. But the making of anthologies is by no means always an honest mirror of the collector's mind. There are anthologies of all kinds, from the Reciter's Handbook to the Golden Treasury, and some represent merely the marking of passages (with pencils red or blue) by men who have spent twenty or more years without discovering that they have no judgment at all. Anthology-compiling has become a business, and there are some who do not hesitate to base their collections upon the collections of others, instead of going to the fountain head. The tendency is now, as in most other trades, towards specialization and the division of labour. We no longer take universal poetry for our province, but are content to mark off for ourselves some little corner of the garden, and gather there our posy of flowers. This is well enough in itself. We have no objection to the compilers who seek to make a representative selection of the best verse of any epoch, or in

Literature Portraits.—X

SIR THEODORE MARTIN

"I have always been a very busy man," said S to me the other day, "and a very busy man I still

He was speaking more particularly about connexion with the eminent firm of Parliament Messrs. Martin and Leslie, of which he is the se but he has always been a very busy man of letters when his life comes to be written it will be a record
one remarkable respect, of what I fancy is an unl ment—that is as regards its literary side. In interest, chiefly and naturally, is centred upon the
of a man's career, no matter how many-sided it ma
as a general rule, men of letters are men of lette simple, literature being a good deal like an exa jealous mistress who brooks no rival. But to thi have been some conspicuous exceptions. Now, scope, and excellence of the literary product of S Martin are in themselves striking, but they will app extraordinary when the circumstances come to be in which these "notes" or characteristics, so to s literary work have been exhibited and developed.

With respect to mere amount, a full biblio writings embraces upwards of twenty volumes, many o siderable length. Not a few of the volumes have gon and third or more editions—his translation of Goeth for example—and his "Bon Gaultier Ballads" is j enter on its sixteenth, exclusive of innumerable America—and in several of these newer editions the revisions of the original text, and the addition, oft matter. Stated even in this bald, mechanical way, literary work is seen to be fairly extensive. In various books of his have a wide range, comp essays and reviews critical and otherwise, plays, almost invariably in metre, of Horace, Catullus, V
Rabelais (in prose), Goethe, Schiller, Heine, Ö
&c., and lives, such as the "Life of the Prince Co a monumental work, the "Life of Lord Lyndhur
"Life of Aytoun." The "Life of the Prince Co only an admirable biography but also a genuine co
the history of England. And the general exce product, in other cases as well as this is quite as mar of it as are its amount and its scope. To take Martin's translation of "Faust" is recognized by are competent to pronounce upon it as the best tra English of Goethe's drama; to give another, the " Ballads," of which new editions are being constantl from time to time, have a secure though, of course, place in our literature—and this is all the more re
many of the ballads belong to the class of partic lived literary infants yclept parodies.

Thus, if Sir Theodore Martin had done no othe world—if he had been a man of letters only—the b to his credit could not fail to be considered a not performance. But when we also take into circumstances which have surrounded this performa perceive, I think, how very notable it really is. T of course, add to or subtract from the actual value

not kill—at any rate, it has not killed him. He is in his eighty-sixth year, having been born in 1816 at Edinburgh, at whose High School and University he was educated. There he practised as a solicitor—it was his father's profession—till 1845 when he removed to London. He has been hard at work at his profession ever since he was eighteen; he works hard still. Sixty-seven years of work! His first contribution to literature was published as long ago as 1838; a small volume of Memorial Poems, which I have before me, is dated 1901. The late Queen ascended the Throne in 1837, so that his literary life and experience range over practically the whole of the Age of Victoria. One by one the great writers whom he knew and with whom he associated have passed away—Bulwer Lytton, Tennyson, Dickens, Thackeray (the novelist and Sir Theodore lived a few doors from each other in Onslow-square), the Brownings, Friends, Kingsley, George Eliot. In the early forties, Professor Aytoun and Theodore Martin were writing in Blackwood, then, as now, easily chief of magazines in its own class. Other magazines for which Martin wrote not a little, as, for example, Tait's and Fraser's, fifty and sixty years ago, have disappeared. In the retrospect of his life he looks back on the rise and the eclipse of a hundred reputations, policies, plans, ideas. A long life truly! Should Sir Theodore ever write his reminiscences (to some extent he has done so in his biography of Aytoun, and, more especially, in his life of that gifted woman, his wife, the late Helen Faucit) what an interesting book it would be! A long life, and a full; it is with the latter aspect of it, however, that we have to deal.

In his address as Lord Rector of the University of St. Andrews in 1891 he said:—"A crowded life of hard professional work has left me little leisure for

> The search of deep philosophy,
> Wit, eloquence, and poetry."

For by far the greater part of his professional life Sir Theodore has been engaged many hours a day on his legal work—frequently, day after day, from 9 in the morning till 9 in the evening, with scarcely any time, or no time at all, for a meal in between. And the bulk of his literary work has been done between half-past 10 at night and 2 in the morning! When other men in his circumstances would have retired to rest, with the satisfying consciousness of having well deserved it, he turned to literature—one might almost say as a recreation; yet he took it up seriously, not in the spirit of the dilettante but in that of the worker. That is to say, that Sir Theodore's working day, professional and literary, has often, indeed generally, been one of fifteen to sixteen hours! But even this does not state the whole truth with respect to his insatiable industry. Never was there such a glutton for work. For another feature or secret of his literary activity and productiveness is the way in which he has economised (what most of us lose, hardly conscious how great is our loss) the odd, unconsidered quarter-hours and half-hours, the small change of time. He never lost a moment—indefatigability personified! (I will confess that to a man like myself, who finds six hours a day about enough, there is something comprehending as well as enviable in Sir Theodore's Gargantuan capacity for work.) Thus, with respect to his translation of Horace, which was in his mind, off and on, for twenty years before its publication, he would think over this and that metrical rendering of given passages as he went to and fro between his house and his office, and cast and recast them until the perfect mould had been attained. His translation of Catullus was achieved in a somewhat similar manner.

was an adept in his youthful days in Edinburg perhaps, I may be permitted to repeat a little per bearing on that part of his life. One day, a year grave and right reverend ecclesiastic came up to in the Athenaeum Club, and observed that he l gotten seeing and admiring Sir Theodore's disp with the foils at Johnson's Fencing Academy in E sixty years before, and how he was filled with a on beholding his skill. Sir Theodore did not speaker, who, however, presently introduced Archbishop of York! Dr. Maclagan is ten year Sir Theodore, so that he could only have been a b he referred to, but evidently the other's sword-pl deep impression upon him.

Of the mass of Sir Theodore Martin's literary proportion of what appears in published volumes is that is, it consists in translations into English of th of other writers. It may be that in the circumsta forth he found it easier to do work of this kind, in a way, it made less continuous demand on him work would have done. The object he aimed at in tions was, to quote his own words, to transmut for the benefit of those who could not read the ori the great masterpieces of foreign literature, son which might be termed sealed books. As early appeared his rendering of the old, monkish Lat the "Disputation between the Body and the Soul." years later Martin became acquainted with Prof and, as both men were disgusted with the tr current of Goethe, they set to work to prese versions. Previous to this, however, Martin h biography of Sir Thomas Urquhart, of Cromarty, édition de luxe of that eccentric knight's translati romance of Gargantua. This book, which involve close study of the Old French of the original, wa first "work," as the "Disputation" ran to no m pages of print. After this time Sir Theodore magazines, and took from Rabelais the name " as his nom de guerre. Martin met Aytoun in 184 introduction of Edward Forbes, the eminent nat fessor, at Edinburgh University. As they had a tastes and pursuits they soon became intimate; ship was productive, from a literary point of removal of Sir Theodore to London in 1846, unbroken till Aytoun's death.

The chief outstanding result of their frie "Bon Gaultier Ballads." In 1839 Sir Theodore Tait's Magazine, under the pen-name of "Bon Gau the absurdity of the taste then distinctly prev might be styled "thieves' literature." Harris Bulwer, and even Dickens, as in "Oliver Twist into literature a sort of glorification of crime, a Newgate was the argot of the day. Even in sta Edinburgh the bells of St. Giles's rang out the ai Newgate. Martin protested against all this manner; and about this time he contributed various articles, written in a light vein, over t "Bon Gaultier," in which a large proportion of the Ballads," by Aytoun and himself, appeared, many in what Sir Theodore, in his life of Aytoun, ca Beaumont-and-Fletcher partnership." "In these Sir Theodore, "we ran atilt with all the reckless pleasant surprise to us when we found how rapidly they became popular not only in England but also in America." In these parodies Aytoun and Martin had before them the example set in the "Rejected Addresses" of James and Horace Smith, published in 1812.

In 1848 Martin contributed to the Dublin University Magazine a translation of Hertz's "King René's Daughter." It was published in book form in 1850, and acted by Mrs. Stirling in that year and afterwards by Helen Faucit, for whom it was translated. Then followed translations of Oehlenschläger's "Correggio" (1854) and "Aladdin" (1857), and also Schiller's "William Tell." In 1859 Messrs. Blackwood brought out a volume of Goethe's poems, some translated by Aytoun, some by Martin, and others by both conjointly; most of them had appeared in previous years in the pages of "Maga." In the following year Martin's "Horace" was published, and at once challenged comparison with any existing efforts in the same direction. In 1844 Martin had an article in Tait's Magazine on the Vita Nuova of Dante, with several extracts from the sonnets and canzonets done into English. The paper attracted much attention, and he was urged to give a translation of the book, which he did; it was issued in 1861. It was instantaneously successful, and several editions of it have since been called for. In 1861 also appeared his translation of Catullus, a second edition of which, largely rewritten, was published in 1875.

In 1863 Sir Theodore printed two volumes of essays from the Quarterly Review and other magazines, for "private circulation" only. Of original verse in late years he has written little. In his modesty he has always disclaimed the title poet. And perhaps it is more correct to say that he is possessed of a metrical gift, fluent, easy, happy, and melodious, than to style him poet. Yet ever and anon he strikes a deep, deep note, while his versification is always pleasing. The chief characteristics of his poetry are smoothness, grace, and rhythmic balance.

The translation of Faust came out in 1865. This truly admirable and adequate—which is saying much—translation has gone, as I have already said, into several editions, and is likely to become, at least in a restricted sense, a classic. As an example of his verse I quote the "Dedication" from Faust:—

Ye come, dim forms, as in youth's early day
  Ye blessed these eyes, which now so lonely grieve!
Still, still, to hold ye fast will I essay,
  Still let my heart to that delusion cleave!
Ye throng me round! Well! Lord it how ye may,
  As from the mists ye rise that round me weave,
Ye waft a magic air that shakes my breast
With youth's tumultuous yet divine unrest.

Visions ye bring with you of happy days,
  And many a dear, dear shade ascends to view;
Like some faint haunting chime of ancient lays,
  Come love, first love, and friendship back with you;
The heart runs back o'er life's bewildered maze,
  And pangs, long laid to sleep, awake anew,
And name the loved ones lost—before their day
Swept, whilst life yet was beautiful, away.

Alas! alas! These strains they cannot hear—
  The souls to whom my earliest lays I sang;
Gone is that loving band of friends so dear,
  The echoes hush'd, that once responsive rang;
My numbers fall upon the stranger's ear,
  Whose very praise is to my heart a pang;
And all who in my lays took guide of yore

Martin's memoir of his friend and one-time co-e fessor Aytoun, was published by the Blackwoods in biography, it is at once a fine picture of an interest ality and a graceful tribute on the part of a co worth of one whom death had struck out of the Theodore, in the preface to the fifth volume of his "
Prince Consort," very truly remarks that "the w impatient of the panegyric of the biographer." In hi of Aytoun there is panegyric, but it is discriminatin biographical work was one of vast importance, a involved the continuous labour of many years. It was the Prince Consort," the first volume of which was i
The second volume appeared in 1876, the third in 187
In 1879, and the fifth and last in 1880. It will be easily that a work of this kind entailed a great strain upo and while he was engaged on one part of it—that p dealing with the period of the Crimean war—Sir Theod broke down, and it had to be set aside for a time.
months of rest, however, he was able to resume it.
a very fine piece of work, able, just, well-balanced, an
It was exceedingly well received at the time of its p and translations of it have been printed both in Germany. After the death of the late Queen rumour that Sir Theodore was to be entrusted biography, but it was only a rumour. At his great a well shrink from such a work, which could be nothing
a History of the Reign of Victoria. And, again, customary for a life, such as this must be, of a n official character, to be written till some years after t its subject. While the "Life of the Prince Consort" published, and also after its completion, Sir Theodore enormous number of letters with reference to the work distinguished people. Not a few of these letters a importance. Sir Theodore has had them bound into t volumes, and intends to bequeath them to the Libr British Museum.

At the request of Lady Lyndhurst, Sir Theodore published his "Life of Lord Lyndhurst." A fi appeared in 1883, and a second in 1884. In 1896 he p translation of the first six books of the "Æneid"; it much praise from scholars and others as any of his clas lations. Another work of his which met with a gr recognition was his volume on "Horace," written wood's Series of Ancient Classics.

In 1900 was published his "Life of Helena Fa Martin." This book—a literary monument erect memory of his wife—is evidently written with great care. In it Sir Theodore keeps himself seclude background, and leaves it to others to speak of La both as artist and woman. The result is a fascinati of a most fascinating personality.

ROBERT MA

Sir Theodore Martin gives some interesting de literary beginnings in his life of Professor Aytoun, wi collaborated, as Mr. Machray has related, in the "Bo Ballads" and in the translation of Goethe's " Ballads." Sir Theodore Martin had already privat the little book of verse entitled "Disputation b Body and the Soul," of which only fifty copies w
The copy at the British Museum has been supplem several other poems by the same author, signed
"Martinus Scriblerus," and "I.G." The chronolog
Sir Theodore's books is as follows:—

Translations.

1878.—Rabelais' "Romance of Gargantua and Pantagruel." Translated by Sir T. Urquhart. With introduction and life of Rabelais by Sir Theodore Martin. (Stevenson, Edinburgh). (Only 100 copies printed.)

1878.—Henrik Hertz's "King René's Daughter." Translated by Sir Theodore Martin. Now published with "Madonna Pia and Other Dramas." (Blackwood.)

1884.—" Oehlenschläger's 'Correggio.'" Translated by Sir Theodore Martin, with notes.

1885.—" Oehlenschläger's 'Aladdin.'" Translated by Sir Theodore Martin.

1890.—" Goethe's Poems and Ballads." (With Prof. Aytoun.) (Blackwood.) Third edn.

1898.—" The Odes of Horace." Translated into English verse by Sir Theodore Martin. (Parker.) Now published in a new edition, with life and notes, in two volumes, under the title of "The Works of Horace." (Blackwood.)

1881.—" The Poems of Catullus." Translated into English verse. With life and notes. (Blackwood.) Second Edition, revised and corrected.

1861.—" The 'Vita Nuova' of Dante." Translated. With notes. By Sir Theodore Martin. Originally published by Parker, issued in a second edition in 1871 by Blackwood.

1865.—" Goethe's 'Faust.'" Translated into English verse. (Blackwood.) Part I., eleventh edition; Part II., second edition, revised.

1878.—" Wilhelm Tell." Translated by Sir Theodore Martin. Vol. I. of Schiller's Complete Works. Edited by C. J. Hempel.

1878.—" Heine's Poems and Ballads." Translated into English verse by Sir Theodore Martin. (Blackwood.) Third edition.

1880.—" The Song of the Bell, and other Translations from Schiller, Goethe, Uhland, and Others." By Sir Theodore Martin. (Blackwood.)

1888.—Schiller's Dramatic Works. "Wallenstein and Wilhelm Tell." Translated by S. T. Coleridge, J. Churchill, and Sir Theodore Martin. (Bohn's Library.)

1890.—Schiller's "Trompeter." Translated by Jessie Beck and Louise Lechner. With an introduction by Sir Theodore Martin. (Blackwood.)

1896.—The Aeneid of Virgil. Books I. to VI. Translated by Sir Theodore Martin. (Blackwood.)

Biography.

1867.—" Memoirs of William E. Aytoun, D.C.L." (Blackwood.) New edn.; also issued in cheap editions.

1875-1880.—" The Life of the Prince Consort." Prepared under the direction of Queen Victoria. 5 vols. (Smith, Elder.) Vol. I., seventh edn., Vol. II., fifth edn.; Vol. III., seventh edn.; Vol. IV., fifth edn.; Vol. V., fourth edn. The life is also issued in a people's edition.

1882.—" The Life of Lord Lyndhurst." (Murray.) 2nd edn., 1884.

1886.—" Sketch of the Life of Princess Alice."

1889.—" Helena Faucit (Lady Martin)." (Blackwood.) 2nd. edn.

Miscellaneous.

1881.—Inaugural address delivered by Sir Theodore Martin at his installation as Rector of the University of St. Andrews. (Blackwood.)

1890.—" Bacon or Shakespeare?" Reprinted from Blackwood's Magazine, with additions. (Blackwood.)

Ludwig Fulda, the German poet, novelist, and playwright, whose latest drama, The Twin Sister, is now being performed at the Duke of York's Theatre, in Mr. Louis N. Parker's translation, is forty years old. He achieved his first real theatrical success in 1889 with a comedy entitled Die Wilde Jagd. His greatest contribution to dramatic literature is undoubtedly The Talisman (1892), a poetical play, based on a story of Hans Andersen, and produced in this country by Mr. Tree in 1894.

BOOKS OF THE YE

POETRY.

Despite Mr. William Archer's cheerful the country is full of blossoming singers, the ye moderately rich in poetry. No new poet of any has come forward, and, while the veterans been silent or retrograde, it cannot be mainta have made any startling addition to their establi

It would, we suppose, be generally agreed important poetical publication of the year Meredith's "A Reading of Life," a fine and volume, relieved by greater lucidity than has its author's later utterances. To reduce the the the principal poem might be regarded as a pl and balanced life, "obedient to Nature, not he already familiar to the Meredithian philosophy.
full of brilliant phrasing and flashing, illuminat has everywhere in the background an eager man bending the harder circumstances of life in stimulating uses. Side by side with this we Thomas Hardy's "Poems of the Past and of the Hardy is much less of an optimist than Mr. Me he stands at the opposite pole. As he himself shares with Sophocles the conviction that "not best"; but, being born, man, he would ho make the best of life, and especially to do what his fellow-men. This spirit moves always unde Mr. Hardy's poetry. He is not a lyrist, and his ments, which are diverse and interesting, are and harmonious than musical and soaring;
marked by great dignity of an austere and Mr. Henley's "Hawthorn and Lavender" wa flavour. Like Mr. Hardy, he is not without depression—

> Dead things and dying! Now the long-l > Listens, and pines. But never a note of > Sounds—

but, again like Mr. Hardy, he finds his own con
Mr. Henley the secret of life appears to be existence, the delight of "taking with a fro thunder and the sunshine." His poetry, th degenerates into rhetoric, and is too apt t grotesque for the forcible, is nevertheless extre and "Hawthorn and Lavender," if it did not q indeed quite aim at catching, the careless raptu of Verses," is at least full of vitality and force.

Mr. Austin Dobson's "Carmina Votiva" printed, but no survey of the year's poetry wo without some reference to the evidence it affor its author might retire from the active services is still as buoyant in spirit and as freshly graceful in the early days of St. Paul's Magazine. "In rondeau of this year's making, is among the n touching in all Mr. Dobson's long gallery of dain

Mr. W. B. Yeats' mystic drama "The Shadow reasonably be reckoned among this year's publ characteristically full of imagination, symbolism melancholy. The poem is alive with a sor elusive beauty, but Mr. Yeats would perhaps be consider the propriety of restricting his mysticism, which threatens to render him unint but the professed Celtic student. There were p Shadowy Waters" which were very nearly inart suggestion. Mr. John Davidson, on the other h more and more realistic. His tragedy "Self's the fine moments, and a particularly powerful co some of its scenes, as in the first of his series o
the desire for actuality has led him into strange

grace" plays easily across the pages of Mr. R. C. Lehmann's "Anni Fugaces," a little book that will probably be long remembered for its manly memorial to a favourite dog, a poem which will often be reprinted in anthologies of poetry celebrating animal life. Sir Edwin Arnold's "Voyage of Ithobal" was conscientious, but dull. It contained, like all Sir Edwin's work, passages of description rich in colour, but the verse not infrequently degenerated into the prose of a rather imaginative catalogue. Mr. Sidney Lysaght and Mr. Aleister Crowley both invite mention for volumes full of lyrical volubility and some really musical strophes, but both alike suffer from lack of material and from youthful excesses of over-emphasis and hyperbole. In complete contrast is the gentle, intellectual talent of Mr. Arthur Munby, a veteran of the muses, whose "Poems Chiefly Lyric and Elegiac" were full of human sympathy and spiritual serenity. Mr. Munby also takes high rank among the few poets who have successfully essayed the elegiac metre in English. Three new-comers may be said to have shown promise above the average. Lady Margaret Sackville's "Poems," though not without self-consciousness and artificiality, are distinguished by careful and artistic workmanship, while "The Oxford Year" of Mr. James Williams and "By Old Grey Gardens" of Miss Nellie B. Badcock contained accomplished verse of a pleasant, unpretentious kind. There have been collected editions of Mr. W. B. Yeats' and Mr. Arthur Symons' work, and a complete reprint of Robert Buchanan's poems, while Mr. Robert Bridges has put forth the third volume of his uniform edition. On the whole, then, the year may be said to have been moderately but not strikingly fruitful. Perhaps the poets are husbanding their resources for a sudden efflorescence in the year of Coronation.

BIOGRAPHY.

The great biographical event of the year has been the issue of the supplementary volumes of the "Dictionary of National Biography." Two of the contributions to that work of reference—Mr. Sidney Lee's life of Queen Victoria and Mr. Herbert Paul's life of Gladstone, since republished separately in an extended form—have attracted particular attention. The former is notable as the first attempt to write critically at a time when the inevitable tendency was to merge criticism in praise. The latter was a marvellous example of concise writing, though the conditions of space and the immense number of the facts requiring to be recorded condemned it to an inadequacy which was only partially removed in the larger publication in volume form. The other lives in the Dictionary must be disposed of with a warm collective commendation.

Of the volumes containing lives of celebrities lately deceased the most talked about has been Mr. Graham Balfour's life of Stevenson. It was written from an abundance of information, in an interesting manner, and in admirable taste. Nevertheless one critic fell upon it, declaring that it insulted a great man's memory by making him out to be better than he was; and for several days the air was darkened with the winged words of controversy. We said our own say about the matter at the time, and need not here return to it. Another exceedingly interesting literary biography was that of Mrs. Lynn Linton, put together by Mr. George Somes Layard. Mrs. Lynn Linton's love-story, as shown by the correspondence, was made public for the first time and furnished evidence in support of the thesis that fact is stranger than fiction. It was also made abundantly clear that the great enemy of the New Woman had herself been something of the sort in her youth before the nickname was invented. To the same category belong the "Life and Letters of John Richard Green," introduced and edited by Mr. Leslie Stephen. Green was a good letter-writer, though not to be ranked with the greatest, and his mental history is only less interesting than his history of the English people. There was a similar psychological interest in the autobiography of W. J. Stillman, who wrestled with the creeds and conventions of New England before becoming the representative of The Times at Rome. Some reminiscences by Professor Max Müller, who was not only a celebrity, but the cultivator of celebrities, claim mention in the same narrator approached periods in which he had personally [illegible] positions of dignity and responsibility. We [illegible] thought of publishing the papers to the pre[illegible] smith, named after Sir Harry Smith's wife, and Al[illegible] named after his victories in the Punjab, in the early d[illegible] war with the Boers. Sir James Paget's autobiography [illegible] mented by a narrative written by his son, Mr. Stephen P[illegible] also published within the year; and so were lives of S[illegible] Graham, Hodson of Hodson's Horse, and Sir W. W. H[illegible] autobiography by Mr. William Broadhurst and an acco[illegible] sufferings on Devil's Island by the unhappy Captain Dr[illegible]

Of the set biographies of illustrious personag[illegible] distant part, the best was unquestionably Lord S[illegible] Fénelon. All the industry and accuracy of the ne[illegible] school of historians were here combined with a brilli[illegible] and a distinct turn for epigram. Another life of F[illegible] Mr. E. K. Sanders was good, but not so good. Mr. Osmu[illegible] Charles II. made a valuable contribution to historical l[illegible] Mr. Wilkins, in his "Caroline the Illustrious"—a[illegible] Caroline of Ansbach, consort of George II.—had bes[illegible] unpublished sources of information, though his tal[illegible] greater length than his material justified. Mr. Hilaire [illegible] study of Robespierre, though less ambitious, was a bo[illegible] siderable merit. One or two other biographies, which [illegible] character of studies of particular historical periods c[illegible] come perhaps more appropriately under the heading of

MODERN HISTORY.

It cannot be said that the year 1901 has been mark[illegible] publication of any historical work of the highest rank. [illegible] be remembered rather as the year in which the grea[illegible] historians of the later Victorian age passed away or c[illegible] write; and it does not seem at present that we are a[illegible] their places. Bishop Stubbs, probably the greatest hi[illegible] the nineteenth century, re-issued a volume of his lectu[illegible] a brief supplement and with some significant words on a[illegible] book of Professor Maitland's, before he died; and he [illegible] printed, too, a very remarkable estimate of Queen Victo[illegible] as no other historian could have written so well, an[illegible] which it is much to be hoped may be reprinted for pu[illegible] With these exceptions he had published no historical [illegible] many years. The same was true of Bishop Creighton, an[illegible] who only just missed the very highest rank. Dr. Willi[illegible] was an historian of the Church who died working; but [illegible] product of his vast learning is not yet before the world [illegible] the year, too, Dr. S. R. Gardiner and Lord Acton h[illegible] laid aside by serious illness, the former after comple[illegible] third volume of his "History of the Commonwe[illegible] Protectorate." Professor Maitland's work will [illegible] continue to bear the aspect of a legal even more [illegible] historical investigation. He has this year collected [illegible] jejune volume of essays on the study of history by me[illegible] his University.

Among the historical books of the year une[illegible] Dr. Gardiner's work stands first. It cannot, how[illegible] considered apart from its predecessors. It has the s[illegible] spicuous merits of clearness, accuracy, and patie[illegible] there are distinct exceptions to be taken, on purely h[illegible] not partisan grounds, to its assumed impartiality. It c[illegible] said that Cromwell's actions have been judged by t[illegible] standard as Charles I.'s; it cannot be said that not[illegible] been extenuated, though certainly nothing has been se[illegible] malice. Next in general interest we are inclined to [illegible] Andrew Lang's brilliant "Mystery of Mary Stuart." [illegible] contained errors has, we see, been admitted by the is[illegible] second edition, "revised." But it incontestably [illegible] times and the men to live; which is more than can be [illegible] many of our historians' work. If Mr. Lang's book is [illegible] attraction and of historical value, there are others whi[illegible] perhaps not unsuccessfully dispute its position of [illegible] A comparatively new writer, Mr. W. Alison Phil[illegible] made a very distinct success with a history of Europe [illegible] a book which, though it is undoubtedly indebted to s[illegible]

[illegible] history at every point, though not directly a story of [illegible] to the remarkable achievement of Mr. C. R. Beazley in the second volume of his "Dawn of Modern Geography," a most notable addition to the historical work of the year. Akin to it, at least in part of its interest, is the second volume of Sir W. W. Hunter's "History of British India," completed after his death by Mr. F. E. Roberts. It is a clear and painstaking survey, but hardly written with the power of the earlier work of the vigorous and prolific writer.

Among brilliant sketches we must place highest Mr. W. S. Lilly's fascinating selection of "Renaissance Types"; among other and interesting studies, useful to all who read history Professor Lodge's volume on "Mediæval Europe," Mr. Green's biography of "Pitt," Miss Strickland's of "Mary Tudor," and Mr. Hutton's of "Owen Glyndwr." A somewhat higher place than that may perhaps be assigned to Mr. F. Perry's brightly written biography of "Saint Louis." Much more ambitious, and on the whole achieving the goal of its ambition, is the first instalment of Mr. Stubbs's "Bolingbroke." Among new editions the first volume of "Social England," originally edited by Dr. H. D. Traill and revised by him with the able assistance of Mr. J. S. Mann, claims special notice as a valuable addition to our standard works.

THEOLOGY.

An unusually large number of theological works of more than average interest was published last year. In the department of Bible studies special mention must be made of "Encyclopædia Biblica," Vol. II., a massive work which, though it has met with much adverse criticism, is yet by far the most important publication of the kind, with the exception of Mr. Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible," that has appeared for many years. "The Historical New Testament," by the Rev. James Moffatt, is a careful and learned compilation already issued in a second edition. Messrs. T. and T. Clark have also published an English translation of Professor Deissmann's "Bibelstudien"—a work quite indispensable to students of Hellenistic Greek; and Dr. Eberhard Nestle's well-known "Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament" is a welcome addition to the "Theological Translation Library" of Messrs. Williams and Norgate.

Dogmatic theology has been enriched by two books which have deservedly been ranked as "epoch-making"—Dr. Moberly's "Atonement and Personality" and Canon Gore's "The Body of Christ." The first book has been warmly welcomed; it is rich in profound insight and stimulating thought. Its value as a theological treatise lies in its incidental analysis of personality, its rejection of the scholastic theories of redemption which have prevailed such sway over Protestant thought since the Reformation, and its inquiry into the connexion of the work of the Holy Spirit with that of the Redeemer. Canon Gore's book is a searching and admirably clear investigation of current teaching on the subject of the Eucharist, both Anglican and Roman. It has attracted much attention in England and America in consequence of its careful criticism of various theories implied in mediæval and in some forms of modern devotion. Perhaps its most valuable contribution to religious thought is its cautious discussion of the nature and limits of the authority to which the Anglican Church appeals. The Bampton lectures for 1901, "Regnum Dei," by the Principal of King's College, is an important work, only recently published.

Two or three commentaries of merit have appeared during the year—"The Earliest Gospel," an historical study and exposition of St. Mark, by Professor Allan Menzies; Dr. Bigg's scholarly commentary on the "Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude"; and a scholarly exposition of "The Acts of the Apostles," by the Rev. R. B. Rackham.

Several lives of Christ call for a word of appreciation. The popularity of "Life of the Master," by Dr. John Watson (Ian Maclaren), is proving to widely popular. Mr. Drummond's "The Man Christ Jesus" is a pleasing study; and "The Life and Work of the Redeemer," by national writers of various denominations, is a series of devotional essays that deserve [illegible]

Three remarkable books by Bishops of the [illegible] two of whom have passed away in the course o[illegible] to be mentioned. The Bishop of Salisbury (D[illegible] has published a recent charge to his clergy a[illegible] "The Ministry of Grace" (Longmans). Thi[illegible] scholarly book on ecclesiastical institutions [illegible] organization of the early Church, and [illegible] Of more general interest are the striking vol[illegible] by the late Bishop of Durham and by the late [illegible] the latter published by his widow. Dr. We[illegible] from Work" is in many respects the finest o[illegible] striking in its courageous discussion of practi[illegible] tenacious grasp of great principles, its profound[illegible] and its noble idealism. "The Church and Natio[illegible] of the late Bishop Creighton's addresses to [illegible] Its chief interest lies in its vigorous and phi[illegible] of the English Church, its keen historical insig[illegible] appeal to extremists on both sides to study [illegible] principles which are at stake in present-day d[illegible] of Church order and discipline. On the whol[illegible] to think that for practical purposes the last [illegible] mentioned are the most remarkable religious p[illegible] year, and are likely to be the most widely infl[illegible]

BELLES LETTRES.

In the department of belles-lettres one bo[illegible] our opinion, the most important, has been more [illegible] all the others put together. This is, of co[illegible] Collins' "Ephemera Critica." It was a savage [illegible] with the rapier but with the bludgeon, up[illegible] reputations appeared to the author to be [illegible] merits. The critical value of the book, though [illegible] impaired by the fact that Mr. Churton Collin[illegible] those extravagances and superlatives which he [illegible] It made however a great, though an ephemeral, [illegible] more significant contribution to the literatu[illegible] the first volume of Dr. Georg Brandes' "Main [illegible] teenth-Century Literature"—a discussion of [illegible] authors of the period of the French Revol[illegible] really profound studies of the work of M[illegible] Chateaubriand, Senancour, and some others o[illegible] Herbert Paul in "Men and Letters" gave us [illegible] written with distinction, showing sympathy [illegible] close knowledge of, the eighteenth century. [illegible] "Life in Poetry and Law in Taste" was a [illegible] production, though lacking in some of the q[illegible] books readable. Mr. William Archer studied [illegible] Younger Generation" in a laborious and me[illegible] assisted by woodcut portraits of some interest. [illegible] work, attributed to Mr. W. H. Mallock, entitl[illegible] Criticism" we had a plausible attempt to expl[illegible] of certain second-rate or third-rate writers. [illegible] essays, mainly on Italian subjects, by the late [illegible] contained some good work, together with some [illegible] so good, and some interesting personal reminis[illegible] Tolstoy. Mention should not be omitted of a "[illegible] Literature" by Professor H. A. Giles, and a "[illegible] Literature," as far as Dante by Mr. A. Gaspa[illegible] forgotten that an anonymous writer in the "Ho[illegible] endeavoured, with what success it would be p[illegible] to teach the world "How to Write a Novel."

The reprints have been very numerous, [illegible] good many readers still adhere to the good old [illegible] a new book comes out, read an old one. The f[illegible] has been the number of new editions of Di[illegible] One of the editions of the former has introducti[illegible] Gissing; one of the editions of the latter has int[illegible] Andrew Lang. There have also been two new [illegible] Eliot—two from the house of Blackwood, and o[illegible] Messrs. Constable's library edition of Smollett [illegible] part at least, to this year; and Messrs. Co[illegible] issued a new Boswell, edited by Mr. Augustine [illegible] Boswell is edited by Mr. Glover. Among the [illegible]

ART AND ARCHITECTURE.

Messrs. Geo. Bell and Sons have added a reasonable selection of books on art to their already long list during the year. But the honour of having published the three chief books of the year on art or architecture should perhaps be shared by Mr. Heinemann with his "Sir Henry Raeburn," by Messrs. Longmans, with "Andrea Mantegna," and by Mr. B. T. Batsford with "Early Renaissance Architecture in England." Sir Walter Armstrong's monograph on Sir Henry Raeburn shows more original research than his work on Sir Joshua Reynolds, and, with the introduction by R. A. M. Stevenson and Mr. Caw's catalogue, forms a very complete account of the work of a painter who is just now very much the vogue. The selection of works for illustration is very representative, and the book is both sumptuous and readable—a somewhat rare conjunction of good qualities. It owes its peculiar quality to the really admirable study of Raeburn's work which was written by Stevenson; it is superior to his "Velasquez" of six years ago, and this is according it very high praise. The English edition of "Andrea Mantegna," by Paul Kristeller, from Messrs. Longmans, throws a new light upon the art of one who has too long been regarded rather as an erudite and rigid pedant than as a great humanist. The German scholar draws a very attractive picture of the great master of the Quattrocento and does much to convince us that, in spite of our prejudices, the deepest insight into the secrets of nature lies at the root of Mantegna's art. Mr. S. Arthur Strong is the editor of this edition.

The various volumes of "Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture," which Messrs. Bell have been issuing during the year, are an advance upon the art biographies of twenty or thirty years ago, though they are somewhat unequal, at least, on the score of scholarship. "Giorgione" by Herbert Cook is an interesting study, and the author accepts neither Morelli nor Mr. Berenson without inquiry. It lacks, however, that freshness of outlook which we should expect from a study of the Venetian archives. Mr. W. H. James Weale's volume on "Hans Memline" is the most accurate biography of the artist which has as yet appeared; but it is not so well written as Mr. W. G. Waters' volume on "Piero della Francesca." Leader Scott has written pleasantly about "Filippo di Ser Brunellesco" for the same series, and she tells the full story of his life with animation; and to Evelyn March Phillipps has been intrusted the task of dealing with the interesting personality of a much less important artist in "Pintoricchio." The editor of the series, Dr. Geo. C. Williamson, has contributed a useful volume on the goldsmith painter, "Francesco Raibolini, called Francia," and he has done his work with enthusiasm. He has also instituted a new "Miniature Series of Painters" at the popular price of one shilling, and these may become useful primers. To the rest of the biographies must be added the "Sandro Botticelli," which has been published among the series of artists' lives, edited in Germany by Herr Knackfuss. The latest volume is by Ernst Steinmann and translated by Campbell Dodgson (Grevel). It is the best short life of the Florentine painter which has as yet appeared, and the chapter on the Sistine frescoes should be read by every student of Botticelli. A somewhat halting but appreciative life of "Giovanni Segantini," by L. Villari, has been published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, and Messrs. Bell are concluding their season with Mr. Edward C. Strutt's "Fra Filippo Lippi."

Amongst books on art other than biographies, Mr. Berenson's "Study and Criticism of Italian Art" (Bell) will be welcome; Ernest Fletcher's edition of the "Conversations of James Northcote, R.A., with James Ward" (Methuen) affords pleasant reading, and "A List of the Works Contributed to Public Exhibitions by J. M. W. Turner" (Bell) will be useful to the collector—with some corrections. Messrs. Vinton have published Sir Walter Gilbey's two volumes on "Animal Painters of England," which touches the fringe of a very interesting phase of British Art; and Mr. Cyril Davenport has written well and exhaustively on "Cameos" (Seeley). "The Painters of Florence" is the latest of Mrs. Ady's volumes (Murray) and it is an excellent example of useful if uninspired treatment. "The Engineer in Art" [illegible] of a Caricaturist" by Harry Furniss (Fisher Unwin), [illegible] amusing book, well calculated to stimulate after-dinner talk, a brighter book than Mr. Mortimer Menpes' "Impressions" of the early summer, but not so worthy of the artist. The two books which thoughtful architects will do well to remember are Mr. Gotch's "Early Renaissance Architecture" (Longmans) and Messrs. Harry Parker's and Raymond Unwin's "The Planning of a Home" (Longmans).

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

The year will not be memorable for its books of travel. Nothing has appeared to excite such wide and deep interest as Stanley's "Darkest Africa" or Nansen's "Farthest North." For such a work we shall probably have to wait until Dr. Sven Hedin returns and chronicles his discoveries in unknown Central Asia. However, if there have been no records of sensational exploration, there have been some records of good work. Messrs. Grogan and Sharp's account of their trip from the Cape to Cairo has, perhaps, the best claim to appear at the head of the list. Part of the country which the travellers traversed may be fairly described as "unknown to geographers," but they were not equipped to make a very [illegible] investigation of it. Mr. J. E. S. Moore's "Mountains of the Moon" deserved, we are inclined to think, more attention. It attracted from a public temporarily absorbed in the happenings in another part of Africa, and the [illegible] of Captain Wellby's "From Sirdar to Menelik," which threw light on certain unknown parts of Abyssinia. Two other books on Abyssinia came from the pens respectively of Mr. A. [illegible] Wilde and Mr. Herbert Vivian. The latter was entertaining but superficial; the former dull but full of information. The only other African book calling for remark is "The Sherbro and its Hinterland," by Mr. J. T. Alldridge, who had spent years in this part of the West Coast, and wrote as one with authority on the manners and customs of the savage tribes.

Of the accounts of travel in America, three call for [illegible]. Mrs. Tweedie's "Mexico as I Saw It" is an agreeable [illegible] of a journey. Mr. Fountain's "Great Deserts and Forests of North America" has the quality of charm, though he covered ground that had often been covered before. Sir W. Conway in his "Bolivian Andes" stood alone among American travellers in reporting that he had done things previous travellers had not done. He had climbed Illimani, had very nearly climbed Ancohuma; but his book was [illegible] more than a "climbing book." It also gave a very graphic and alluring account of Bolivian resources in the way of [illegible] rubber forests. Of the books about Asia the most important [illegible] that on "Armenia" by H. F. B. Lynch. This takes undisputed place among standard works of reference. The same ground is covered in Earl Percy's "High Asiatic Turkey." "Mount Omi and Beyond" [illegible] journey into the interior of China for the purpose of developing trade by that indefatigable pioneer of commerce, Mr. A. Little. "A Ribbon of Iron," by Annette B. Meakin, [illegible] story of a lady's trip on the great Siberian railroad. M. Stadling's "Through Siberia" was an account of the [illegible] Andrée. The writer exhibited descriptive talents of a high [illegible]. His picture of the vast Siberian forests was a fine [illegible] impressionism.

Europe also has its tale of books of travel of varying [illegible]. The best, beyond question, was Mr. George Gissing's "[illegible] Ionian Sea," describing with taste, sentiment, and [illegible] a tour through Magna Græcia. "Finland as It Is," by [illegible] de Windt, has no such literary merit, but will be of [illegible] value, in spite of some inaccuracies, to sportsmen and tourists. Mr. Charles Wood's "The Glories of Spain" [illegible] sort of book that Mr. Charles Wood is always writing—[illegible] but not important. The other books [illegible] mainly topographical. Most of the topographical series have been added to. Notably there have been histories of Worcestershire and Cumberland in the excellent series of Victoria History of the Counties of England. To the H[illegible] and included in any review, are "Lake Geneva and its Literary Landmarks," by Francis Gribble; "In Tuscany," by M. Carmichael; "Naples Past and Present," by A. H. Norway; "A Book of Britany," by the Rev. S. Baring Gould; and "The Women of Thomas Hardy," by R. C. A. Windle.

FICTION.

Whatever may be the quality of the output of fiction for 1904, it is certain that it has not been deficient in quantity. Novels have been coming out in a ceaseless stream since the beginning of the year, and the customary freshets in the spring and autumn have been large enough to bewilder the conscientious reader who struggles to keep almost with the times. Oliver Wendell Holmes once declared that every man had one good novel in him somewhere, and few of that witty writer's epigrammatic phrases have found more favour in the literary world. The surprise is, now that everybody writes novels, that the majority of them are still so readable. One can only conclude that fiction, as an art, is now the common property of all who can string together a few phrases, just as Johnson complained that, in his day, style was equally diffused. It is the exception now to meet with a thoroughly dull story, as it was then to meet with a thoroughly ungracious or cool-headed writer. Even the worst modern novel has generally some merit—some touch of character or some ingenuity in construction. But, while the crop has been plentiful and of fair quality, it is not easy to pick out any works of commanding merit. There may lie hidden among this mass of ephemeral fiction one or two books that the future critic may acclaim as masterpieces. But these will probably not be among those that claim most attention now. Our most admired novelists have not added much to their reputation during the past year. "Kim," it is true, may have raised Mr. Kipling's reputation, but we doubt if no Indian an atmosphere can ever permit the book to become a classic to other than Anglo-Indians. Mr. Hall Caine, again, did no more in "The Eternal City" than amalgamate certain Socialistic theories with a considerable blare of trumpets. We may trust "Anthony Hope" to be bright and entertaining; he was, perhaps, more ingenious than usual, but something less sparkling, in "Tristram of Blent." Mr. Stanley Weyman rearranged an old tune, with variations, in "Count Hannibal." And so with the rest of our old and established fabulists, Mr. Crockett continues to write with unexampled energy. Mr. Max Pemberton treads hard upon his heels. Spain once more provides a setting for Mr. Seton Merriman, Italy for Mr. Marion Crawford. It is not among the favourites that we must look for lasting work. The "Sister Teresa" of Mr. George Moore may endure for a time; it is a sound and conscientious piece of character-drawing, though the character itself is indeterminate and the presentment not particularly lively.

Of choice writing there is plenty, and especially among our younger school of novelists. Mr. Maurice Hewlett, "John Oliver Hobbes," Dr. William Barry, Mr. Bernard Capes—these have all a marked and individual style of writing which marks them out from the common herd. But none of the four can be said to have accomplished anything out of their usual range during the last twelve months. "Zack" produced a good piece of work in "The White Cottage," and has established her claim to be regarded as the official chronicler of her slice of territory in the South-West. Neither Mr. Quiller-Couch nor Mr. Eden Phillpotts, whose respective parishes are more or less in the same territory, have done much this year to advance their reputations, though the latter has published a creditable volume in "The Good Red Earth." Mr. Gilbert Parker's "The Right of Way" is perhaps as good a book as we have had from his pen; Mr. Moore's "Chevenix" was a bright and dashing bit of historical romance; Mr. David Christie Murray's two novels showed a welcome return to something of his old power. "Bala the Impossible" was rather a disappointment to admirers of Miss Sarah Grand. While Mr. H. S. Hichens essayed, not very successfully, in "The Prophet of Berkeley-square" to enjoy the farcical spirit displayed in "The Londoners," Mr. E. F. Benson attempted in "The Luck of the Vails" frank melodrama. Space is restricted, we cannot do more than points of resemblance to the work of Mr. H. G. gentleman is in a speculative vein. For acute ironical commentary it yields to few imaginary it fell a little short of its predecessor "Erewho

"An Englishwoman's Love Letters" started form of literary exercise which bade fair at one dangerous. "Rosa Amorosa," by George Eger the best of many imitations. In "A Modern unknown author of the "Love-Letter" cult embarked upon a novel which deserves noti attempt at character drawing. "The Visits of Elinor Glyn, is another book that had a gr outspoken and fresh, it offended many people, bu tous curious and immoderate enthusiasm. For s in part also to the success of "Elizabeth a Garden" (the name of Elizabeth on the bac almost sufficient to insure a considerable subs Benefactress," by the anonymous creator of t garden, deserves mention. "Sir Richard extremely powerful, but, as some people thoug story by Lucas Malet, was undoubtedly one of t year. In American fiction, the War of Indepe Civil War still absorb the energy of most Crisis" by Winston Churchill," Cardigan" by "D'ri and I" by Irving Bacheller, and "A Countersign" by B. K. Benson, are some of the books in this kind. Of more quiet fiction " Alice Brown, deserves a word of commendation, E. Wilkins has written a story of factory Portion of Labour." Mr. F. Norris has w Octopus," another of his powerful tales, and is responsible for a sound story in "The Cavali

In translation, we have only space to menti Gorki, a coarse and disagreeable but thorough who has produced a pessimistic philosophy b generalizing from his observations of Nijni Nov Bazin, whose description of provincial life in that agricultural depression is not confined to t Dmitri Merejkowski, whose book, "The Des has been given to us in an English dress by Mr. As for boys' books, we have dealt with them so is hardly necessary to do more than mention "The Young Barbarians," which, in spite o striving after the pathetic, has more character rivals.

It is impossible to avoid omitting many boo gladly name here. Mr. M. P. Shiel's colossal in a word of recognition, as does Mr. Clark R supply of marine adventure. "Bushwhack Clifford, was an excellent collection of sket Malay Peninsula. Max O'Rell has writte Highness, Woman," Mr. Egerton Castle "The A host of writers not even named here have quite worthy of attention. We have done ou with the mass and to pick out the best, conscious that many may have been omitte inclusion. "The Fiction of the Year!"—t terrifying in days when the autumn anno occupied nearly three pages in our Autum Supplement.

SCHOLARSHIP AND ANCIENT

The most important works dealing with anti lands are those on the Mycenæan question, brought into new prominence by Mr. A. J. Eva Crete. At their head must be placed Professo "Early Age of Greece," the first volume of the known evidence on the Mycenæan age, origin. A considerable controversy has arise continue, on the theory which is at the foundat namely, that the builders of Mycenæ were the position has not been seriously assailed, eith in a work we shall mention, or by Mr. Hal Civilization of Greece." The last book, alth

"Odyssey," a large part of which consists of excursus scanning the whole field of the Homeric question. Mr. G. B. Grundy's "Great Persian War" is a contribution to historical criticism, remarkable for its originality and independence, and valuable for the author's unique acquaintance with the geography of Greece. Mr. Laurie Magnus has done good service in translating Professor Gompertz's "Greek Thinkers," the first volume of which has been published. The book combines in a striking degree grace and wit with philosophic insight. Mr. Greenidge's "Roman Public Life" is a book of high value, and is the only book in English dealing philosophically with the political origins of Rome. The interest of times prehistoric has not blinded scholars to the interest of the Roman decadence; although nothing has been done of such weight as Professor Dill's book, Mr. Crawford has made a sympathetic study of Symmachus, and Mr. Glover has given us sketches of typical men in his "Life and Letters in the Fourth Century." In the archæology of bricks and stones we welcome once more the unwearying Professor Lanciani, whose "New Tales of Old Rome" brings recent discoveries before the public in the old vivid way. A capital handbook of "Christian Art and Archæology" by Mr. W. Lowrie meets a long-felt want.

In scholarship there is not much to show, but it is nearly all good. Professor Goodwin's "Demosthenes on the Crown," Mr. R. A. Neil's "Knights of Aristophanes," and in a less degree Mr. Monro's "Odyssey, XIII.-XXIV.," are primary editions. Messrs. Tyrrell and Purser have completed their commentary on Cicero's "Letters"; Professor Ellis has brought "Aetna" up to date. Besides this we have several new texts in the Oxford "Bibliotheca Classica," which will, we hope, supersede the ugly German editions in this country; and Mr. Peterson has given collations from a ninth century MS. of Cicero in "Anecdota Oxoniensia," Classical Series, No. IX. It is a thousand pities that scholars now waste their time on school editions, which often do more harm than good. Comparative philology is stagnant; but Mr. Meade's "Latin Pronouns Hic, Iste, Ipse" deserves mention as a patient study in Latin syntax. Professor Rhys Roberts follows up his excellent "Longinus" by an equally good edition and a still better version of "The Three Literary Letters of Dionysius of Halicarnassus." Palæography is represented in the "Amherst Papyri," a magnificent pair of volumes edited with the usual thoroughness by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt.

Several Oriental books of worth have been published during the year. Amongst them is the late Professor Wright's "Catalogue of the Syriac MSS. in the Cambridge University Library." To the late Mr. P. E. Pusey and to Mr. G. H. Gwilliam we owe the Peshitto Gospels with notes and Latin translation under the title of "Tetraevangelium Sanctum Simplex Syrorum Versio." Mr. E. G. Browne is to the front again with his "Dawlatsháh's Memoirs of the Poets" (Persian Historical Texts), Mrs. Gibson with "Apocrypha Arabica." An excellent book on "Baghdad during the Abassid Caliphate" is that of Mr. G. Le Strange. Amongst translations we may mention the "Chronicles of Kashmir," Mr. McCrindle's last volume of "Ancient India as described in Classical Literature," and the Cambridge "Jātaka Book"; the fourth volume of this, translated by Mr. W. H. D. Rouse, is out, and the last two, by Mr. Francis and Professor Cowell, are well advanced.

PHILOSOPHY.

In philosophy the record of the year has been one of that quiet but steady progress which has been the rule for some time past. In many points the range of our knowledge has been sensibly increased. The general tendency of the year's work may be briefly summarized by saying that on the one hand it shows a continued advance in the task of assimilating the idealism of Germany, and on the other hand a growing disposition to revolt against that idealism so far as it stands in opposition to the dictates of commonsense.

The book of the year which has attracted most attention is Mr. A. E. Taylor's ethical study entitled "The Problem of Conduct." Not that Mr. Taylor gives us any positive results; he leads us to the depressing conclusion that the "problem" is shows that they lead to somewhat orthodox results. Th ling is close and careful; but even the philosophic st complain that he has to move in a somewhat rare physical atmosphere. A similar complaint might be ma second series of Professor Royce's Gifford Lectures on th and the Individual," though the series deals with such matters as nature, man, and the moral order. There question of the vigour and lucidity with which Profe states his most interesting theory. But many will doubt a purely metaphysical foundation is substantial enough f structure of positive doctrine which he builds upon fessor Royce and Mr. F. H. Bradley are trenchantly though for opposite reasons, by Mr. Alfred Holder in his little book "The Adversaries of the Sceptic." Mr professes himself a sceptic, but the main value of his wo its refutation of that hyper-scepticism of Mr. Bradl

Mr. A. E. Taylor has been at pains to develop to h consequences. Unfortunately, Mr. Holder's book is th such a form as to leave it little chance of the recognit its power deserves. In striking contrast, so far as sty cerned, is Mr. G. L. Dickinson's dialogue on the "Me Good." Apart from its philosophic value, which is cons the work commends itself as a masterly example of form of literary composition. No such philosophic dial been seen in England since Berkeley. Another highly work is Professor G. H. Howison's "Limits of Evol series of essays in which he sets forth persuasively a d personal idealism. The volume is marked by good scholarship; but Professor Howison challenges criti making logic rather than morality the corner-stone of life. Those who are interested in logic will find a gre valuable matter in Mr. Alfred Sidgwick's "Use of Reasoning." It appeals mainly to professional inter an attack upon the formalism which has hitherto been th
the study. Among the works of erudition the first plac to Professor J. M. Baldwin's great undertaking "The D of Philosophy and Psychology," of which only the fir has appeared so far. It is a useful and spirited enterp deserves every support from those who desire the adv of philosophy. Mr. H. H. Joachim's "Study of the Spinoza" is a careful and scholarly exposition which Its place as an indispensable companion to Spinoza's e
Dr. A. Caldecott's "Philosophy of Religion in Eng America" ably summarizes the outcome of recent th that direction. Mr. T. Whittaker's "Neo-Platonists" written study of an interesting but neglected period o thought and is a guide which may be thoroughly reli Dr. J. B. Baillie's "Origin and Significance of Hegel's supplies a practical introduction to Hegel's system whi enough, is not to be found elsewhere. There are seve books about Hegel, but nothing to give much beginner. Dr. Baillie's work is not perfect, but, so far it is helpful.

SCIENCE.

An exhaustive review of the scientific publicat year would be so swollen with elementary text-books ephemeral or doubtful value as to be scarce worth the
But, if we discard these, activity in the biological sci been very marked. The third volume of Huxley's Memoirs may be awarded the pride of place in this de from its historic interest, and to plunge in medias re
the continuation of the "Treatise on Zoology," edited by kester; Otto Schmeil's "Text-book of Vertebrate Zoo III.; Shipley and McBride's "Zoology"; vol. II. of the Text-book of Zoology," by Adam Sedgwick; the s
"Birds," by A. H. Evans, in the "Cambridge History"; the "Zoological Results of an Expedition Britain and New Guinea," parts 5 and 6; the "Scientific of the Norwegian North Polar Expedition," by F.
vol. II.; a "Text-book of Palæontology for Z Students," by T. Groom; a new edition of Harting's Birds"; Seebohm's "Birds of Siberia"; the "Nat

Brooke; "Pflanzenphysiologie," vol. II., by W. Pfeffer; "Allgemeine Physiologie," by Max Verworn (third edition); "Einleitung in die Theoretischen Biologie," by T. Beccke; "Monographieen Afrikanischer Pflanzenfamilien und Gattungen," by A. Engler, part 6; "Methods in Plant Histology," by C. J. Chamberlain; Hugo de Vries' "Die Mutationstheorie" vol. I., part 3; and Suess' "Das Antlitz der Erde," vol. III., part 1.

In the department of physics the publication of vol. II. of Rayleigh's "Scientific Papers," vol. II. of Osborne Reynolds' "Papers on Mechanical and Scientific Subjects," and Hopkinson's "Scientific Papers" deserves mention, as also do the "Treatise on Physics," by Professor Andrew Gray; the "Text-book of Physics," by Professors J. H. Poynting and J. J. Thomson; vol. iii. of a new edition of "Deschanel's Natural Philosophy," by Professor J. D. Everett; Glazebrook's "Electricity and Magnetism"; Preston's "Theory of Light"; Poincaré's "Electricité et Optique," and Band I. of "Thermometrische Arbeiten," a most important contribution to the study of the mercurial thermometer, besides technical books of all kinds, such as Wordingham's "Central Electrical Stations," Worby-Beaumont's "Motors and Motor Vehicles," and so on.

In chemistry, apart from Cross and Bevan's "Researches on Cellulose, 1895-1900," and new editions of Green's "Soluble Ferments and Fermentation," Tilden's "Introduction to Chemical Philosophy," and other well-known books, the chief publications have been Moissan's "Le Fluor et ses Composés," and Berthelot's "Les Carbures d'Hydrogène," tomes I., II., and III. Such volumes as Allen's "Commercial Organic Analysis," Turner's "Metallurgy of Iron," Blair's "Chemical Analysis of Iron," and C. Le Neve Foster's "Text-book of Ore and Metal-mining" must not be omitted from the list, nor should Ostwald's "Die Wissenschaftlichen Grundlagen der Analytischen Chemie" (third edition) be dissociated from the German edition of Roscoe and Schorlemmer's "Treatise on Chemistry."

Of special interest to mathematicians are Hamilton's "Elements of Quaternions," vol. II., edited by Professor C. J. Joly; "Le Opere di Galileo Galilei, vol. X.; Brioschi's "Opere Matematiche," tomo I.; and "Les Œuvres Complètes de Christiaan Huyghens"; while astronomers will welcome Sir R. S. Ball's "Spherical Astronomy," Isaac Roberts' "Photographs of Stars," and a reprint of Tycho Brahe's "Opus primum de nova stella."

War Books of the Year.

The output of books on different aspects of the Transvaal War has been continuous, though not so large as last year. From a literary point of view the best is unquestionably "Linesman's" "Words by an Eye-Witness," and the second best Mr. Mortimer Menpes' "War Impressions." Important books from other points of view have been "The Work of the Ninth Division," by General Colville, and "The Civil War Hospital," by the Professional Staff. Books on the work of our colonial auxiliaries are "Australia at the Front," by F. Wilkinson, and "The Canadian Contingent," by M. S. Evans. The story of the war as seen from the Boer side is told in Mr. H. J. Batts' "Pretoria from Within," and the "War Notes" of the Unfortunate Villebois Marcuil, General Mackinnon wrote "The Journal of the C.I.V."; there have been books giving the point of view of the private of irregulars by the Hon. S. Peel and Mr. J. Fitzgibbon; and a word of recognition is also due to Mr. J. Stuart's "Pictures of War," Mr. Julian Ralph's "War's Brighter Side," and an anonymous book of great merit entitled "A Schoolboy's Letters to his Wife."

SCOTLAND IN 1901.

In any survey of the year's literature, it is but right that Scotland should have some separate attention. True, the

In looking at what remains of the Sco produced during the year, we find only three w to us to have a chance of being read and co years. We refer to Sir Henry Craik's "Cent History," Mr. Henry G. Graham's "Social Lif
the Eighteenth Century," and Professor Ki Monboddo and His Contemporaries." The la take it first, is not an entirely satisfactory w Knight can do some things well, but he is a phil rather than an artist; and Lord Monboddo, b distinctively a personality, has not been realized as he might have been. The same criticism mu the author's treatment of Monboddo's contempor hands are little more than the dry bones of th biographer. Still, the volume must always hav fullest attainable record of the career of a distl man who anticipated Darwin by proclaiming ma
the monkey, and who otherwise lives in litera connexion with Burns, Johnson, and Scott.

Sir Henry Craik's "Century of Scottish Hist in a measure for some of the defects of Professor Professor Knight had a splendid opportunity brilliant period in the literary history of Edin not avail himself of the opportunity, though h Monboddo's personality "would have furnished which to group the Scots men of letters who latter half of the eighteenth century." He plead the men—Hume, Robertson, Dugald Stewart, Bur —had been dealt with by other writers. Sir He have offered the same excuse. Fortunately h hence we have in his work a full and adequat period in Scotland's literary history which mu peculiar glory of her capital. Nor in other resp less to be commended, although its views upon so points are, of course, open to question. With t of Scottish life it deals fully, and on the whole the general Scottish history of the period it fur summary as may be found in any work of its Henry G. Graham's "Social Life of Scotland in Century" a great deal has been said on the nort Border, and the value of the book is amply atte that it has gone into a third edition. The approaches his subject in a spirit and manner sou from that of Sir Henry Craik. Mr. Graham is n his bias is, therefore, on the side of the Ki scholar—a scholar, too, with a speciality; an the Scotland of Allan Ramsay's and Burns' hardly be superseded. In any case, it must standard work.

In fiction, Scotland has done but poorly
It could hardly be otherwise, for we have h novelists who reside permanently in their nat only one of them can be said to be distinctive Crockett has long ago been given over to th of letters; and if he still fell to be dealt with impossible to credit him with any remarka during the year. The feeling in Scotland, as e
Mr. Crockett fails to do himself justice by th put, that haste and over-productiveness, which so rightly condemned in his recent Edinburg Walter Scott. It is to be hoped that Mr. Nel dissipate his talents by a similar machine-lik year has seen the issue of two stories from M both of them meritorious. We cannot say t
"Dosia Castle" as a great work, but it cert success. "The Shoes of Fortune," which we has attracted less attention so far, perhaps bec
the story is laid so far from that Argyle over w has cast such a glamour of romance in some of hi

Scottish publishers, particularly in Edinbu are steadily extending their fields of enter notes with pleasure the growing number of
to the reading public at large which are bel side of the Tweed. Messrs. Nelson's Century

BOOK AUCTIONS OF 1901.

In Dibdin's day the "bibliomaniac malady" was confined within narrow limits; now, on the other hand, a far wider section of the public demands authentic information as to what happens in the auction rooms. We may attempt, briefly, to recall one or two of the chief incidents of the year. No library of the first importance has come under the hammer; but those of Sir Augustus Fraser, Sir Henry Hope Edwardes, Signor Pirovano, and Mr. Frederick S. Ellis, all deceased, have with warrant evoked great interest. Taking the ten highest totals for 1900 and 1901 respectively, we should find that, whereas in 1900 an aggregate of 10,587 lots produced £51,484, or an average of under £4 18s. per lot, the corresponding figures for 1901 would be 12,441 lots, which yielded £85,008, or more than £6 15s. per lot. Far the highest average for a single library was for that of Mr. Ellis, the 133 lots comprising which brought £5,600, or about £42 each; while the fine Hope Edwardes assemblage, 670 lots, fetching £11,033 occupies a second place with an average of over £16. Were the year's catalogues to be analysed with such a purpose in view, it would be possible to compile a table of some 66 items coming more or less strictly under the head of printed books—excluding sets, and works with illustrations not forming part of the text—each of which brought at least £100. Of these 19 came from the Hope Edwardes library, more than a dozen from the Pirovano, five from the Ellis. The highest price realized for a single printed book during the year was on July 16, when an example of the First Folio edition of Shakespeare, 12¾in. by 8¼in., fetched the record sum of £1,720—in 1623 it was published at £1. When, in 1818, 116 guineas was paid for the Grenville example no one supposed its value was destined to increase, but in 1864 the copy now owned by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts made 682 guineas, while in 1899 an excellent copy brought £1,700. Next comes "The Ryall Book" of Caxton, valued at £1,550 instead of at about £60, as in 1829. For details of the £1,475 "Pilgrim's Progress" readers may be referred to Literature, May 18; for a note on the £620 copy of Shakespeare's "Titus Andronicus" to our issue of March 9; while of the Kelmscott Chaucer on vellum (£510), Byron's "Poems on Various Occasions" (£129), Caxton's "Polychronicon" (£349), Scott's "Waverley," &c. (£118)—wherein, however, defects were afterwards discovered, if we mistake not—more or less detailed mention is made in Literature, November 30, December 7, and December 14. Higher prices than ever before have been paid at auction for certain works, it would be hazardous to say by how many writers—by Keats, Byron, and possibly Shelley; by Charles Lamb and Sir Walter Scott, Wordsworth and Thackeray, Browning, and many more. It is easy to attribute to its source the cause of these increased money values. Undeniably it is the issue of American competition, a subject dealt with three weeks ago in these columns.

In the domain of illustrated works, again, prices for rare and fine things have ruled high. The late Mr. Ellis is said to have paid no more than about £100 for Edward Calvert's copy of Blake's songs "Of Innocence" and "Of Experience," which in November fetched £700, as against £146 for the perhaps finer Beckford example two decades since. At £665 the series of engravings after Watteau have doubled from what was regarded as an excessive price in Paris a few years ago; at £395 the set was sold, it is said, for the first time at auction.

A detailed account of the dispersal of the Barrois-Ashburnham MSS., many with beautiful paintings and illuminations by old-time artists, appeared in Literature, June 15-22. This sale, with its total of £33,217 for 628 lots, excels in interest all others in its kind held during 1901. On May 12, however, £1,200 was paid for an incomplete Sec. XV. MS. of the Wycliffe Bible, written on 269ff. of vellum; compare this with £1,750, the value placed on the Bramhall example, with 404ff., in the Ashburnham "Appendix."

From the literary standpoint, as distinct from that of the collector, one of the most important lots sold was a small 4to., valued at 100 guineas, containing bibliographical and other MS. Orders, Papers, &c., by or relating to Nelson; nine autograph letters from Samuel Johnson to Mr., Sir Robert, Chambers, 1762-83, all said to be unp Dr. Hill's "Life" (£144 15s.)—these belonged Macdonald, a daughter of Sir Robert Chambers havi Colonel Macdonald, the son of Flora; and, not to two long letters from Tennyson to Colqubo (50 guineas). Extraordinarily high sums have be several bindings from Mr. Cobden Sanderson's own h than £387 for three originally charged by him at and early mementoes of writers whose names afterwa familiar are discoverable in half-a-dozen school exer Brontë sisters (£15), in a music book written by th when she was at Miss Franklin's Academy, Cov (£15), and in a school atlas on one of whose Tennyson had inscribed the names of a score o pupils (£8 15s.).

THE "LOWER BRANCHES."

A "Personal View"

By FRANCIS GRIBBLE.

A happy chance brought me, the other da unimpeachable source, some information concerning ments and methods of work of the successful writers o and serial stories of the sort that readers of presumably regard with contempt—stories that pu have nothing to do with, and of the existence o educated public is only aware because it has advertised on the hoardings or exposed for sale on the the stationers' shops. I knew, of course, that somebo paid to write them; but I had always assumed that was a beggarly one, followed only by poor hacks who nothing better to do. What I heard opened my e hasten to communicate it. If my revelations spoil th encouraging competition I shall feel no qualms b malicious joy.

In the old days, of course, the trade was a very l indeed. When I was a boy living in the country I k who supplemented her income by writing novelettes to get £5 for a novelette of 30,000 words, and she ns about four a year. A little later I made the acq another lady who used to write 30,000 word novelett apiece, and who generally managed to sell about hal the twelve-month. Politeness having compelled me t of the latter lady's work, I formed the opinion, remuneration was inadequate, but that she was very any remuneration at all. What I now perceive is b born before her proper time. If she were writing would be flourishing, though she might not be fa stuff that she wrote for her poor pittance was just th of stuff that is written by the authors, not one of the fame, whose prosperity was lately brought under my

The first case is that of the author of a dark story and crime which I saw advertised by gaudy posters a home at night. That author is always writing da mystery and crime. They have no literary qual merely run serially through a popular weekly pape are no more heard of. But the proprietor of the pape spends as much as £10,000 in advertising them, and t reward is £20 a week.

The second case is that of a lady whose "feuill

Tuesday, and Wednesday respectively, he writes in shorthand instalments of 3,000 words each of stories for three different papers. On Thursday and Friday he transcribes what he has written, and then he goes out of town for the week-end. Asked how he managed to do this, he replied that he had two plots on which he rung the changes, getting new incidents from time to time by reading the reports of the inquests in the News of the World. In this way he makes about £800 a year out of fiction, though I believe he has never had a book published in his life.

If these three cases were the only ones discoverable, it would hardly be worth while to comment on them. Inquiry, however, has satisfied me that they are typical of a great number of other cases of which I do not know the details. Consequently they do invite comment as evidence of the low level of literary taste prevailing among the great masses of our countrymen and—more particularly, I expect—our countrywomen. It is no use, of course, working oneself up into a passion of indignation against the people who write the "truck," as it is technically termed. Most of them, no doubt, are quite incapable of writing anything better, and seriously regard their pecuniary gains as proof of high literary gifts. Nor is it worth while to be angry with the editors who print the rubbish. They certainly know that it is rubbish; but they are, in most cases, only the salaried servants of impersonal public companies, and have to earn dividends for hungry shareholders. Moreover, they can argue, plausibly enough, that as there is money in the business it is sure to be carried on by someone, and that the money may as well be divided among their shareholders as among other people's shareholders. The tragedy is that there should be money in such a business for anybody.

It may be urged, of course, that though the stories referred to are rapid, unintelligent, and mechanical, there is nothing in them for the moralist to take exception to, and therefore they do no harm. On this plea I join issue, maintaining that the harm done by books of openly "vicious tendency" is less than the harm done by books which are only "bad" in the sense of being "fatuous." In the first place, the vicious books are few, whereas the fatuous books are many. In the second place, the poison of the latter is the more insidious because their poisonous nature is not proclaimed upon the housetops. It is true that no one after reading one of them feels compelled to rush out and commit a crime. But it is also true that, owing to their wide popularity, the greater portion of the time which the great majority of people in this country spend in reading is spent under the influence of tenth-rate minds. Mean ideals, false views of life, and the stultifying of the intelligence are the inevitable results. Reading, which should be the medicine, whether tonic or sedative, of the mind, becomes as stupefying a habit as drunkenness itself; and a novelette-sodden woman is hardly a less depressing spectacle than a gin-sodden man. Decidedly the matter is one for the moralist no less than for the literary critic.

The literary critic by himself, indeed, can do but little. I am aware that in this article I am preaching to the converted. What I have written is not likely to be read by the public which destroys the books which I denounce. If it does by accident come into the hands of a few members of that public it will make no impression upon them. They will accuse me, and convict me to my closeness, of dryness, dulness, stupidity, and what not. My only possible means of getting at them is to send them a missionary whose opinions they are accustomed to respect. What missionary? A great number of the novelette readers are regular church or chapel goers, and the obvious missionaries in such a case are the clergy of all denominations. They have application of their knowledge. They are afraid o by rebuking the imbecility of the pious. They ac workers and Sunday-school teachers scores and ev young women of poor intellectual capacity who more empty-minded as the years roll on because that they read. Cannot they reverse this policy

One cannot expect them, perhaps, to treat th stunt their intellectual growth by reading rubbis treat notorious evil livers. That would be too change, though I think a case might be made ou I can picture a clergyman speaking like this, not pulpit, but in his ordinary intercourse with his pa

What do you read? Novelettes? The half-penny papers? The novels of——and——? That accounts for your stupidity. You are com of the man in the parable who hid his talent in t are destroying your brains no less surely than You are making yourselves as unfit as the d decent society. Separately these books that y harmless. Taken collectively, they do more harm so-called "wicked" book that ever was writt you fatuous, and I refuse to have fatuous pe teaching in Sunday-schools or doing any other work. If you were born stupid, you cannot help yourselves stupid by reading inept sto immoral behaviour. It is bad for you, children, if you have any, and bad for every on contact with you. Go and think this over qui

So might the clergy speak. The admonit with much more effect from them than from the for they have infinitely more influence over the p it. If they would exert their influence they mig a blow at the pernicious nonsense which is circulated. Can they be induced to do so?

THE DRAMA.

"BLUE BEARD" AT DRURY LANE. HALL."

A beardless Blue Beard, though a contradic nevertheless to be seen this Christmastide at Dr Herbert Campbell declines to hide his a compromises by wearing blue whiskers and a blu does he care to enter into the spirit of the pa Blue Beard who is obviously not uxorious. because six of his wives are ugly, being in fact who sing glees—even when decapitated. Noth Fatima's fatal curiosity; Fatima is merely a lady," who apparently has neglected to study acting. Nobody, indeed, attempts "acting" in not even Mr. Fred Emney, who was so droll la Mr. Dan Leno, whose antics are tamer than jokes are still in the period of gestation. It n Mr. Leno looks very funny indeed; the mere si promise of infinite mirth; no doubt before the p is over the promise will have been amply fulfil gets into difficulties with a harp, plays Ping-pa pan, burlesques Hamlet and Sherlock Holmes; thinks, to be rich entertainment in such mon have patience. A fond father introduced a sto Johnson with the remark that he would be fo taining in time. "Sir," replied the Doctor, "I Boxing Night the one really humorous thing in th neat repartee or two, would do them no harm, and would comfort their elders, now doomed to mental vacuity for four hours and a-half. The pantomime is "written and invented" by Messrs. J. Hickory Wood and Arthur Collins. It is probably safe to assume that Mr. Collins is responsible for the invention, leaving the writing to Mr. Hickory Wood, who does not seem to have spent much brain-work upon his task. Why not try the experiment of entrusting the libretto to a real writer—to Mr. Anstey or Mr. Harry Pain, Mr. Owen Seaman or Mr. Adrian Ross?

For sheer spectacle, however, the pantomime beats every one of its predecessors. They were gorgeous, stupendous, expensive; so is this, but it is also tasteful. Quite the finest scene is "The Triumph of the Magic Fan," which blends colours as harmoniously as a Persian carpet. Dancing ladies represent Spanish fans, grey and black, Louis Quinze fans of rose Dubarry, and Watteau fans tinted like the bloom on an Orleans plum. Round these cluster children in the rich robes, orange, lemon, and pale blue, of the Far East. It is said that we English do not, like the Latin races, revel in the sheer sensual delight of colour; but Drury Lane is convincing disproof of that—though it is true the costumes are designed by Signor Comelli, who is presumably an Italian. For quieter tastes, the pensive mood, there is "The Land of Ferns," a delicious scene, "with verdure clad," cool with shallow rivers, by whose falls melodious birds might, but do not, sing madrigals; the only birds are some real (and obviously disconcerted) swans. The "Slave Market" and the "Hall of Pleasure" are minor delights, chiefly remarkable as exhibiting every species of female beauty comprised in the genus known as "opulent." Drury Lane brings us annual comfort in that respect; it is evident that the physique of the Englishwoman is not deteriorating. What is also most pleasantly in evidence is the pure natural joy of the stage children. They revel in their dances, their pretty costumes, their merry antics. I read (in innumerable "interviews") that the management keeps a school for their especial benefit. And, when one thinks of the numerous homes that are enabled to tide over the winter solely through the existence of Drury Lane Pantomime, one recognizes the duty of accepting the institution cheerfully and gratefully. That, however—I return to my grievance—is no reason why the libretto should not be written by some one who can write. And I do think it is high time for the management to recognize that one can have too much of a good thing. I left the theatre on Boxing night on the stroke of twelve (for newspapers must go to press at fixed hours), and the third great spectacle, "The Fairies' Gift to Fatima" (a spiral staircase of electric light, I am told), was yet to come. Was there any harlequinade? If so, I wonder when the audience got away.

For holiday afternoons at the St. James', Mr. Alexander has revived Liberty Hall, an early piece of Mr. R. C. Carton's, pervaded by a seasonable flavour of Dickens and furnished with one character—a benevolent old simpleton of a second-hand bookseller—by no means unworthy of the great Master of the Sentimentalists himself. This old fellow, who keeps a bust of "the late Mr. Charles Dickens" on his mantelshelf, and uses bookselling metaphors about life which might have been put into his mouth by that novelist, was originally played by the late Mr. Edward Righton, and is now played, with less humour but more pathos, by a notable recruit to the St. James' company, Mr. Lennox Pawle. Mr. Alexander is pleasant as a disguised Baronet acting the part of Fairy Godmother to two pretty orphans (Miss Margaret Halstan and Miss Lilian Braithwaite), and Miss Le Thiere quite superfluously unpleasant as a slatternly maid-of-all-work. The domestic details of the play

ALEXANDER SMITH REDIVIVU

There are some signs of a revival of interest in Smith, and the appearance a little while ago of a sele his poems in Mr. Walter Scott's Canterbury Poets ma have aroused in the breasts of some readers the que was Alexander Smith?

During the fifty years that have passed sin hailed with enthusiasm as "a finer poet than Keats qualities in which Keats was finest," we have arrive conclusions and forgotten the name even of the a "Life Drama." At the most, until quite recen dimly remembered by a few as the literary sensat years ago, with some recollection of a speedy ert charges brought against his honesty as a writer. Smith echoed Tennyson, copied the ardours of Ke violence for passion, licence for imagination, vagu for the moral imagination that comprehends the world. Why, then, revive his memory? Why recall for the pleasing of a bygone taste, now that our a other satisfaction?

To be plain, the chief reason for distinguishing Smith among other incomplete poets, after his day is p the excuse that must be offered for his faults—hi inexperience. His early verse, with all its vagaries, flourish set on youth," and has the inspiration of a t spirit. So far as he looked at life directly, and i imitated fashion, he faced the old perplexities with towards a brave solution, saw events and circum the emotion that arises from fresh vision, and found and hope in everything that had not conformed to Confronted from childhood with the harsh facts of great city, earning his bread in the din and bustle of warehouse, he was held by a passion for the beautiful perplexity. His early work is marred by the disloc thought from the things he knew intimately. He fancy towards a region where facts have suffered ch been spiritualized and made brilliant by art. The C in his few hours of freedom dreamed "to set the age but found his own experience too meagre to be com material for his art, save under the trappings of crud Managing his daily work, living sparely that he migh and money for his books, making friends by his mind he found a refuge for his thoughts in the woes and passions of heroes such as Walter in the "Life Dr intention he utters his thoughts of love and life, of de and virtue, not as he found them serviceable in the o of every day, but as he deemed they would be realize free of actuality. All of actual observation worthy preted in verse he finds in the moon and stars, or sensational aspects of sky and sea. Of human relat seriously considers but one, and his lovers are all p engaged with the variety and tumult of their own s The characters of the "Life Drama" are phanta and remote as the glades and tapestried rooms flicker through the swift phases of their emotions. the frequent beauty of language that redeems the most of its passages, there is a second value in the poem writer passes from artificial gestures to speak the s truths found in the normal life he knew by experienc

Alexander Smith had the instinct of beauty and came near to giving it individual expression. had he lived to achieve greater restraint in ma simplicity, more largeness of comprehension, it is that his later work would have fulfilled the pro youth. The "Life Drama," published when the twenty-two, is ardent and unworldly. In spite theatricality and incoherence, it is sincere. The "Ci of five years later have the same quality, but it is to the beginnings of acquiescence. The poet's attitude accordance with the then existing state of things, a his power of expression gains thereby in clearness, th

Alexander Smith is more cheerful and less enthusiastic, rather wiser and less intuitive, more careful in observation and less rapturous in his perceptions—in short, more sensible and less sensitive.

"Edwin of Deira," published in 1861—last and most carefully laboured of his poems—has still less of the vital fire. The verse is gentle and melodious, the characters credible, the lyrics, as in all Smith's work, sweet and plaintive. But the glamour of the unknown has for him faded from the world, he has accepted a temperate measure of existence, and plies his craft steadily and with a sober regard for the needs of humanity. As a prose writer, his early death at the age of 37 left fair promise unfulfilled. As a poet, he had made his music and told his tale.

A FIFTEENTH CENTURY BOOK OF SPORT.

The Englishman of the Middle Ages loved, as his descendants love now, all pastimes that bring the touch of the wind upon the cheek and call for endurance and the display of bodily strength and skill.

> Maistowe I am, therefore I me delyght
> To hunt and hawke, to nourish up and feede
> The greyhounde to the course, the hawke to th' flight,
> And to bestryde a good and lusty steede,

says the gallant in the verses of Sir Thomas More, verses that are none the less western in spirit, though the language is that of a bygone world. If war was the serious occupation, hawking and the chase formed the pleasure, and Heraldry—for his pride in his house and lineage was great—the one science of the gentleman of the fifteenth century. Though incredibly ignorant in many matters, he was well instructed in the technicalities of the pastimes and pastimes of his class. A "gentleman," he was taught, was to know from a "churl" by his acquaintance with the "kindly terms" that belong to the chase, and it was to help him to this and kindred knowledge of practical utility that an obscure printer compiled in 1486 a volume, which, as the thick-coming later editions plainly show us, was one of the most popular books of the age. The "Boke of S. Albans," so-called from the place where it first saw the light in type, is a collection of treatises on Hunting, Hawking, and Heraldry. In its original form the volume is extremely rare and almost priceless, indeed in 1862 an imperfect copy sold for 600 guineas. The authorship of the book has long been attributed—at first with certainty, but latterly with hesitation—to Juliana Berners, Prioress of Sopwell Nunnery, in the county of Herts.

There is little of the man about Dame Juliana, save, perhaps, some slight traces of the schoolmistress. This forerunner of Mrs. Trimmer and Maria Edgeworth compiled—whether as part author or as mere scribe we cannot tell—a rhymed treatise on "Hunting," evidently intended as a child's lesson book, after which small performance she vanishes into the unknown. Her work, indeed, was saved from oblivion by her printer, who did not preserve his own, being merely known to Wynkyn de Worde as "our moreover schoolmaster of S. Albans." While Caxton was delighting his patrons at the "red pale" at Westminster with the marvels of the new discovery, this obscure schoolmaster was doing his best with a discarded fount from the Westminster press to print off such books as he thought suited to the general public. Eight works by all have been traced to this provincial typographer; six are in Latin, for the schoolmaster must have had a scholarly clientele, and two, including the "Boke," in English.

The question, "Who wrote 'The Boke of St. Albans?'" would be as difficult to answer as the question "Who printed it?" Mr. Blades, its latest editor, would have us believe that Dame Juliana is little more than "the shadow of a great name." She seems within an ace of being relegated to the limbo of the demigods and heroes, the record of whose doings, so real to us in our childish days, we are sometimes told may have originated in the sun-myth. The only circumstance that points to the fact ing to a lady named Juliana Barnes or Bernes. is summed up by Mr. Blades in the following probably lived at the beginning of the fifteenth c possibly compiled from existing MSS. some rhyme Yet this meagre and hypothetical statement is the foundation of the life history of one of th authoresses.

There are, however, two early traditions whi have freely incorporated into subsequent accou posed authoress. The first is that she was of the Berners, of Roding-Berners, in Essex, and the s held the position of Prioress of Sopwell Nunnery of Herts. Undoubtedly the Berners family were in the fourteenth or fifteenth centuries; and a mark the place where Sopwell once stood, a qu from St. Albans Abbey, hard by the pleasant H but concerning "Mistress Barnes"—as her mod likes to call her—the authentic Berners pedigre nor does the list of the Sopwell Prioresses re This latter fact would be quite convincing if w that the list was perfect, but it is a far cry from in which Letitia Wyttenham succeeded to the Pri and 1480 in which the aged Joan Chappell was se there is still a loophole for us, and we may imag successor of Letitia and predecessor of Joan.

Like a good many specimens of early pri "Boke of S. Albans" is shown by internal ev compilation from various MSS. This fact silen claim to sole and original authorship. Even t Hunting, the part which the printer attributes shows nothing of the unity of plan characteristic a single author. The two distinct parts of whic betray a separate origin, and the compiler has n weld them together; for, while the opening and tions are in the form of a "Dame's" monologue, is frequently addressed, the middle part, obvious is a discourse between a "Master of the Hunt" Theboke of Heraldry falls likewise into two parts, th is spoken of as having been "translatyt," a wor that a French manuscript has been drawn upon f To add to the general miscellaneousness of the bo following a common practice of the time, filled which the comparative shortness of the book c blank, with various disconnected matter, such a of the bishoprics and provinces of England, and t this miscellany is a certain list, headed "th beestys and fowlys," which certainly proves tha could never have been responsible for the wh and that if the clergy had hitherto been the p they must have looked sourly on the new prod For under this innocent-looking title there pressions which are by no means connected wi fowls," and which correct stylists would only us to express their contempt of the Church, and of Nobody's feelings would be hurt by learn proper to say "a Herde of Hertis," but "a Pri "Coey (coey) of partrichis," but a "kyndyll c But how could Dame Juliana, in her position as well, endure that any one should talk of "a su fluity) of Nunnys"? Can one have too much c Or, as a dependent on the great Abbey of S. A write of "A bhomynable sight of monkis" (m obedient daughter of the Church, of "an vn neris" (untruth of sumpners)? As a woman, bear to hear her sex traduced by the express Women," or the open sneer conveyed in the paciens of Wyves (impatience of wives)," or th the words "a Multipleng of husbondis"? Th a squib, and is copied bodily from some MSS. devout nun would have turned in horror.

But the public, who always hold the pernicio book exists more for the convenience and deli than the writer's profit and renown, troubled with questions of authorship. They read it w ably as the latest monographs on farriery, fly-fishing, cricket, or the history of the county pack do in the gun-room of his Victorian successor. Nowadays, having served to instruct the many, it merely delights the few; and the bibliophile, whose ancestors possibly never bore arms, and who never owned hawk or hunter, pores over the woodcuts that delighted gentlemen when Harry the Eighth was King.

MARY DORMER HARRIS.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH.

THE LIFE OF THE RIGHT HON. SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH, BART., M.P., P.C. By Mrs. HENRY FAWCETT. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d.)

Mrs. Fawcett's "Life of Sir William Molesworth" is nothing if not timely. Molesworth's reputation as a practical statesman must stand or fall upon what he did and helped to do for the colonies; while at no period of our history have the colonies loomed so largely upon the political horizon as at present. It is true that this predecessor of Mr. Chamberlain at the Colonial Office never in his most hopeful moments anticipated the extraordinary success which has sprung from his policy. Yet to Molesworth and Edward Gibbon Wakefield—two advanced Radicals, which seems to-day paradoxical enough—must be given the credit of having inspired the Imperialistic movement and united the colonies all the more closely to the mother country by the very act of setting them free. Mrs. Fawcett may be said to have fairly proved her case that, so far from being a "Little Englander," as he is occasionally painted, Sir William Molesworth was an Imperialist and an Empire-builder. Once, indeed, he apparently departed from his usual views; and capital has been made out of the fact that he advised the practical evacuation of our South African colonies. But, as will be shown presently, this was due to no sudden doubts of what he had hitherto preached as the mission of the British; but simply to his honest disbelief in the possibility of developing the country north of Cape Town sufficiently to make it profitable.

In describing the various influences which operated upon Molesworth's character in early life, Mrs. Fawcett hardly attaches enough significance to two—viz., his singularly mixed ancestry, and the distressing ailment which tinged his boyhood with unhappiness, and made him peevish and suspicious of insult. As for his ancestry, it was hybrid indeed. On the paternal side he sprang, at once, from an old Cornish stock, the Molesworths of Pencarrow, and from a French family, Ourry by name, originally gentlemen of the robe at Blois, then petty seigneurs, and finally Huguenot refugees in the British service. His mother was partly of Lowland Scots, partly of Highland descent, and said to have been of kin to David Hume. There was little of what is called Anglo-Saxon blood in his veins; and indeed the west-country squires among whom he lived looked upon him as almost a foreigner. The ailment alluded to was scrofula, which disfigured him sadly in childhood. Mrs. Fawcett does not tell us that this disease cost him his father's affection; but we learn from his own statement that such was the unhappy truth. At the private school to which he was sent (he was too sickly for Eton) the boys made mock of his disease with boyish thoughtlessness; and the bullying which he underwent, coming after his father's dislike, filled him with bitter feelings, and "set him against all authority." With his succession to the family omniscience, and appears to have been a great deal of but some of his letters written to his mother and sist wall, and quoted by Mrs. Fawcett from the sister's p considerable humour, as well as shrewd insight into Mrs. Grote has drawn his portrait at this period;—" countenance, expressive blue eyes, florid complexion brown hair; a slim and neatly made figure about fi inches in height, with small, well-shaped hands and f

Molesworth sat in the first Reformed Parliam Cornwall, but his advanced principles and youthfu the gave out that he preferred to be disliked) r odious to the Cornish gentry. In reply to an invitatio constituency, that of Leeds, he made a daringly indep characteristic declaration. The Leeds Whig com asked if he would support Lord Melbourne. "With he wrote,

> To my support of the present Administration,
> to inform you that undoubtedly I should support th
> if I approved of them. If, however, they do n > ballot and other measures open questions, my fir > that their tenure of office will be short. .
> supporting them, you mean that I will suppo > opposition to the Tories—undoubtedly I will. If > that I must abstain from expressing my opinions i > motions, or by amendments, through fear of indirec > ing the present Administration—then I must > will not give that species of support.

Apparently Leeds was pleased with his honesty, returned contrary to his own expectation.

Mrs. Fawcett places Molesworth's adoption colonial reform policy in 1833; but he did not m parliamentary speech on the colonies until June 29, philosophic Radicalism was all but defunct, and W convinced him of the crying need for abolishing tr
and giving our dependencies their freedom within co Cobden was willing to give the colonies absolute in if they asked it; the old Whigs opposed the giving in any form; Molesworth and his adherents took course, and spoke in season and out of season for col ments subject to Imperial rule. Our author, on endorses the view taken by her subject of Lord Durha after the Canadian rising, although she says that, in the banishment of the rebels, "Molesworth was fr of wishing well to the enemies of his country." M is, above all, a fervent believer in the theory of auto she holds with Molesworth can alone make our co and contented. But Sir William was first led to advo autonomy for the more selfish reason that it would British taxpayer. "His argument was that as long the colonies in a state of tutelage, they naturally sem to us; give them self-government, he urged, and understand that they are to be individually responsi own internal wars."

Only once does Mrs. Fawcett differ serious William, and this is upon his proposition that further in South Africa should cease, and that only the Cap and a coaling station should be retained there. Sh however, to offer an explanation of what she calls the mistake of his extraordinarily far-seeing and enlighte policy." "He had made it the work of his life," sh
"to promote the development of the colonial Emp Britain in Australia, New Zealand, and Canada, on showing his capabilities in the position which, after long coveting, he eventually obtained—that of Secretary for the Colonies. He succeeded Lord John Russell at the Colonial Office on July 2, 1855, and died on October 22 in the same year at the early age of forty-four. His marriage, which had occurred in 1844, was said to have greatly softened the asperity of his temper, and drawn him from the seclusion into which he had plunged during the completion of his edition of "Hobbes' Works"—a publication in sixteen volumes, which occupied him six years, and cost, according to Mrs. Fawcett, many thousands of pounds.

The "Life of Molesworth" is satisfactorily indexed, and the portraits mostly from family paintings at Pencarrow and from mezzotints and sketches owned by Sir William's sister, Mrs. Fordi are well chosen. The book contains some errors in the matter of dates, and there is one woful Latin mistake, for which the printer is perhaps to blame.

THOMAS KYD.

The Works of Thomas Kyd. Edited from the Original Texts, with Introduction, Notes, and Facsimiles, by F. S. Boas, M.A., Balliol College, Oxford. (Clarendon Press. 15s. n.)

We take this work as a sign that the country is awaking from its long neglect of the Elizabethan drama. As far as Shakespeare is concerned, indeed, we have no cause to find fault: he has been studied here as thoroughly and as intelligently as could be wished, and we have not needed that foreign scholars should show us the way. But to the average man, Shakespeare is all the English drama. Dodsley's "Old Plays" is only a selection, and not a critical edition even of those selected. Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, Webster, Peele, Massinger and Ford, and a few others have been reprinted, it is true, in the last generation, but not with the scholarly discrimination which is used for Æschylus or Sophocles; nor again are the volumes we refer to convenient or pleasant to look at. A few years ago, Mr. Bullen added to his claims on our gratitude by editing several dramatists in a worthy form; but although his literary taste leaves nothing to be desired, even he has not done for the text what should be done. But if, as we hope, the Clarendon Press has in hand a series planned on the scale of the present volume, we shall soon be in a position to enter into our great dramatic heritage with full enjoyment and understanding.

For Mr. Boas' work is from every point of view excellent. In research, he has added new material and cast new light on the old; in criticism, he follows a scientific method, and fully presents the evidence which he uses; in taste, he is a safe and discriminating guide. We have here in the result the first complete edition of Kyd's works, including all that can be safely identified as his, and for illustration some which have passed current for his; while appendices and notes contain not only illustrations and sources, but the earliest German adaptation of Hieronimo. Mr. Boas has also wiped away a reproach against England, that it has left too much to foreigners the recognition of Kyd's importance as a figure in dramatic history.

And that importance is by no means small. Mr. Boas in his introduction gives good reason for believing that he was "the first playwright to put the story of Hamlet upon the stage," and that his influence may be traced in the first quarto of the Shakespearian play. He does not effect this by winking at difficulties; on the contrary, he raises and discusses one difficulty which has hardly been noticed, Nash's hint that Kyd knew not though glorified, in that delightful pair, Ancien verbose swashbuckler Bardolph.

The text of Hieronimo may now be read for Kyd wrote it, the latest additions which appear i distinguished here by smaller type. Mr. Boas additions highly, as they deserve; but shows t another hand, and inconsistent with the rest of reputation has, of course, suffered whilst the imagined that Kyd wrote it as it stands. A stil is done to Kyd's memory by the proof that Hieronimo is not by him. As regards Soliman can fully agree with Mr. Boas in ascribing it is nothing in it he might not have written, and only point to a greater maturity of style, mostly insight into character. Throughout the bo readings are given in footnotes, and some conj very few of these are admitted into the text. A tion of his own is adopted in Sp. Tr. 3, 12, will exempt (him) the place." We are glad to s admits the principle of attraction in criticis strange how a neglect of this, so fully grante languages, has obscured our knowledge of E carefully examined the notes, and find no omissi explanation. There is a puzzling misprint Sp 463), where the second S. Luigis should be S. L

We have no space to discuss the "Intr deserves; and can but say that it contains muc Mr. Boas has discovered some new information and prints (with facsimile) two interesting doc to Sir T. Puckering written after he had been p and containing an unkind reference to Ma "atheistic" treatise which he asserts th Marlowe. Kyd's works are discussed in ful historically, and his dramatic power and inf Mr. Boas thinks that Kyd was not a thinker, or stylist; but a "born dramatist for devising impressive situations and flambo for exploiting to the full the technical resource porary stage." If he wrote Soliman, neither denied him. A renewed study of his works con sion that no ordinary man could have conc strength of Hieronimo; and his Soliman is a of the effect of unchecked power and unbri nature not ungenerous. In his women he d some of the minor characters are happily c sistent. Kyd, in a word, deserves attention has made it possible for students of the drama enjoy him.

THE FOURTH CENTURY

Life and Letters in the Fourth Century. M.A. (Cambridge University Press.

Three years ago we reviewed Professor Dill the fourth century, which, we are glad to se second edition; and we notice Mr. Crawford's " It is satisfactory to see that another scho attention to the same period. If Mr. Glov rank with Professor Dill's (and an examination Symmachus in each book is enough to sho probably appeal more effectively to the gen Glover is quite scholarly as far as he goes;

Barrack Room Ballads. The last was, no doubt, caught in America, where Kipling seems to be inevitable in every book. Mr. Glover's translations are often forcible and telling; we have noted, however, one serious mistake, when he translated tripudiare "to waltz" (33).

The persons whose careers are here sketched are Ammianus Marcellinus, Julian, Quintus Smyrnæus, Ausonius, Symmachus, Macrobius, Augustine (from the "Confessions" only), Claudian, Prudentius, Sulpicius Severus, Palladas, and Synesius; and there are chapters on women pilgrims and Greek and Early Christian novels. The sketches are quite interesting, particularly where Mr. Glover's sympathy is strong. We think that the best essays are those on Claudian and Synesius, but if St. Augustine took in the complete life, we should give the palm to that. Synesius, of course, cannot be fairly compared with Mr. Crawford's elaborate work, but we get from the shorter essay a quite clear and consistent portrait of the man, and in some respects a better one; the figure is more human. In all cases Mr. Glover is keen to spy out the good points in a man, generous in his appreciations, and glad to find him sincere; if he preaches a little we forgive him, because he is so obviously in earnest. Julian is a much more credible person than he is usually made out. We do not quite understand why only women pilgrims are spoken of; and we think that more might have been made of the novels; indeed, we wish it had been done, for the criticism of "Daphnis and Chloe" is really good. After viewing the picture-gallery we cannot but be struck by the fact that the great men of the age were almost all provincial. "Ammianus and Macrobius were Greek, Augustine a Latin of Africa, Prudentius a Spaniard, Sulpicius a Gaul, Claudian some kind of Egyptian." One recalls the galaxy of great Spaniards in Nero's time. It is really creditable that Mr. Glover has seen all this and yet spared us the "Celtic theory."

Synesius the Hellene.

Synesius, apart from his connexion with Hypatia, is a sufficiently interesting personage to deserve a monograph; and in some respects Mr. W. S. Crawford in SYNESIUS THE HELLENE (Rivingtons, 12s. n.) has done his subject justice. In all that relates to the works of Synesius himself he has gone to the fountain-head, formed his own impressions, and justified his statements by exact references; in this part of his work the only improvement we would suggest would be to print the text of the more important quotations. He has by this means succeeded in producing a very real portrait, and Synesius stands out before us the public-spirited local grandee, always ready at need, whether to undertake a wearisome mission to the capital, to fight the savage marauder, or to help a friend. His literary work is fairly estimated, and his theological position is treated with a sympathetic touch, although we think it would be far from Mr. Crawford's own. The historical framework is not put together so skilfully, because Mr. Crawford has been content to take facts at second-hand from Gibbon, the Dictionaries, or Miss Gardner. The last writer, indeed, has been very useful to him; and it is, perhaps, surprising that with a book so good as hers in existence Mr. Crawford should have made another. As to the literary value of the book there is a freshness and naïveté in Mr. Crawford which pleases, but he is not an accomplished craftsman. There is no affectation, for which in these days we may well be thankful; on the other hand, there is no style to speak of. He is sometimes flippant (there is a cockney allusion on p. 153). In his chapter on Synesius as a man of science he [illegible]

STELLA.*

(By PROFESSOR STANLEY LANE-POOLE.)

Does any one read Swift now? If one were to ju[illegible] personal acquaintance the answer would be unhesita[illegible] not even ten righteous men—that is, leaving out the critics, who, of course, are not righteous men. Yet [illegible] be a Swift-reading public somewhere, or else why [illegible] Bell brought out a new edition—remarkably well [illegible] of his works in seven or eight volumes, and [illegible] Messrs. Methuen gone to the expense of producing t[illegible] to Stella" in a new and very acceptable form? [illegible] creases of the great middle class there are evidently [illegible] are not content with the popular pabulum of Yellow [illegible] Cardinals, Gentlemen of Carinthia, and Janes of the [illegible] and similar food for babes. They ask for strong [illegible] the big minds of the past—there are none now—can [illegible] them, and it is a very good thing for the publishers [illegible] is still some demand for non-copyright matter: th[illegible] heartily sick of the royalty system as applied to [illegible] poorer novels.

Even if the appetite for a classical writer like S[illegible] severer style should pall, and such "wom[illegible] pamphlets"—to use Johnson's phrase—as "The Co[illegible] Allies" cease to delight a generation that knows no[illegible] Peace of Utrecht was about, there is a perennial c[illegible] the "Journal to Stella," which masters even those to w[illegible] and St. John and my Lord Keeper Harcourt are [illegible] political figures, and who care little even about [illegible] Nick Rowe. There is something absolutely unique [illegible] wonderful Journal, in which the most masculine intel[illegible] age set down day by day the incidents of three [illegible] years; which received every hope, fear, or fancy in [illegible] as it rose to him; "which was written for one pers[illegible] pleasure, and has had indestructible attractiveness fo[illegible] since; which has no parallel in literature for t[illegible] importance of the men and the events that move along [illegible] the homely vividness of the language that describes [illegible] of which the loves, the hates, the joys and griefs, th[illegible] tions and disappointments, the great and little in clo[illegible] bourhood, the alternating tenderness and bitterness, [illegible] all, the sense and nonsense in marvellous mixture an[illegible] remain a perfect microcosm of human life." The suprem[illegible] of the Journal is its self-revelation; in it we see Sw[illegible] laid bare, and discover that the open cynic had a [illegible] secret vein of tenderness which he blushed to disclose.

But the Journal is a picture of the times as well as [illegible] of the writer, and as such it needs the commentator. [illegible] hitherto has been fully annotated—perhaps because [illegible] that constant reference to footnotes dispels the charm [illegible] tainly does. Nevertheless one must know who the m[illegible] are who pass across the stage, and though the prog[illegible] tracts the attention, it is indispensable. None more [illegible] than Mr. George Aitken could be desired as a comm[illegible] the Journal. He knows the age of Swift intimately [illegible] names escape his quick identification. Naturally, the [illegible] "Dictionary of National Biography" has proved a [illegible] him; it saves individual research and reduces t[illegible] historical annotation almost to a mechanism of clockw[illegible] Mr. Aitken could almost have done without it, had be[illegible] to it, so thorough is his knowledge of the times of

but it is as comfortable and complete a little volume as one could wish for.

Of course there is an Introduction. Every one must have his say about Stella, and poor Vanessa is sure to be dragged in. It is the penalty of greatness that a man cannot even make love in private, and so discussions which about ordinary unimportant people would be an insufferable impertinence appear to become biographical necessities when it is a question of the indiscretions of great men. Not that there was any indiscretion about Swift; the difficulty was that he was so exasperatingly discreet. He never saw Stella but in the presence of a duenna, and he wrote to her in the dual number! If he had openly married Stella and then run off with Vanessa a vast deal of lootless controversy would have been saved. But here are half-a-dozen excellent critics—such as Mr. John Forster, Sir Henry Craik, Mr. Leslie Stephen, Mr. Churton Collins, and so on—who cannot agree whether the mysterious marriage with Hester Johnson ever took place, or "if not, why not"; whether Swift was really in love with Miss Vanhomrigh—there is, of course, no doubt whatever that she, poor soul, was desperately in love with him—whether the last ride to Marlay and the "awful look" are mere romance or indirect homicide; in short, whether half that has been reported about Swift's relations with these two women is in any degree authentic. The more one looks into the evidence the more amazed one becomes at the credulity that accepts second or third-hand gossip as gospel. Take the question of the marriage with Stella in 1716. No one, of course, could disprove a private marriage without witnesses in the deanery garden of St. Patrick's; it were a negative of the most impossible kind; but considering the consistent manner in which these two otherwise truthful people acted ever afterwards as if they were not married, remembering that Stella signed several legal documents afterwards as "spinster," and that Swift, writing her "character" in the deepest agony of sorrow on the night of her death, and writing only for his own eye, speaks of her as "the truest, most virtuous, and valuable friend that I, or perhaps any other person, was ever blessed with," and not as wife, the onus probandi undoubtedly rests with those who maintain that this formal marriage, by which neither party gained any conceivable benefit or satisfaction, really took place. The only person who could have betrayed the secret was Bishop Ashe, who is said to have performed the ceremony. Bishop Ashe died in the year following the alleged marriage, and is it likely that he would have revealed such a carefully concealed secret so soon and in the lifetime of both the persons interested? Dean Swift was not a pleasant man to fall foul of, and one can well believe that Dr. Ashe would sooner have bitten his tongue off than babbled about the particularly private concerns of so formidable a colleague. Nobody, at all events, seems to have heard the tale during the Dean's life. At last it came out that Dr. Ashe had related it to Bishop Berkeley, whose relict communicated it to Monck Berkeley, who published it in 1789. But the future Bishop Berkeley was abroad in 1716, and remained abroad till after Ashe's death. Is it imaginable that this respectable prelate would have committed such an explosive piece of news to a letter—a letter, too, traversing the continent of Europe? And, if so, why did it not leak out until Berkeley's relict, in a fit of expansion, set the gossip going? Orrery mentions the story in 1752, and probably had it from the same unique and exceedingly suspicious source, though he does not say so; and Tom Sheridan the younger accepts the story in make your choice; because I never saw th conversation I entirely valued but hers; thi

I ever gave way to.

There is nothing to make one think he gave twelve years later. There was no reason w have openly married Stella if he wished, marriage could have been of no possible use to it at all consonant with the Dean's view o ecclesiastical character to do such a thing in a
The tale naturally arose out of the well-k between the two; though no one seems to have or at least diffused it, in their lifetime. So rolls on, little-tattlers will whisper that a man with a woman without wanting to marry her.
crowd of witnesses there are to the contrary!

In his very straightforward introduction sound on the marriage question, and, oddly eno as one of the disbelievers in it. As far as I only book in which I have dealt with the Letters and Journals of Jonathan Swift," publi ago—I merely quoted, with some caution, S statements in favour of the marriage. The Paget, the well-known magistrate, less known
"Puzzles and Paradoxes," set me upon a fres
the subject by referring me to his searching pa and since then I have been a total sceptic as the ride to Marlay, and the other legends sk
Mrs. Wood's "Esther Vanhomrigh." But I
Mr. Aitken discovered my conversion, unles the writer of unsigned reviews. By the way,
"some foundation in fact" for the Marlay inci like to know where? And he also attribut additional ten lines of "Cadenus and Van revision of the poem in 1719. If so, how is it t not appear in the earlier editions of 1726?
believe that Swift would have wished to sup would like much more to know that he never w Vanessa story is much simpler than the Stella less creditable to Swift. Still he owes someth tality to both those attachments. How few "Tale of a Tub" nowadays, or even "Gulliv many are vaguely familiar with the names of S and are convinced, still more vaguely, that S badly to both. The mystery and obscurity of t affairs, different in kind, as I believe, but carri say cooled off—at the same time, in the same n at perilous risk, have given Swift's Journal a other works could not achieve. It is an instan of the human over the literary, the heart ove twofold romance of his life has outweighed all of his brain.

Swift's Tracts.

In producing the fifth volume (Historic Tracts—English) of his admirable edition Works of Jonathan Swift (Bell, 3s.
Standard Library, Mr. Temple Scott has s than his wonted ability. Hitherto no English e more at the hands of his editors than the Patrick's. Only one's affection for Sir Walt one from saying the whole truth about his

Mr. Temple Scott will find the task practically insuperable when he deals with the Irish portion—but a great deal can be done, and the present editor has undoubtedly worked hard at the difficult problem. His judgment is sound, his industry remarkable, and the result is as full a collection of Swift's authentic historical and political writings, from the "Character of Wharton," 1711, to the "Memorial to the Queen" of 1714, as can probably be attained. There are still some papers referred to in the "Journal to Stella" which remain unidentified, and we confess we doubt the wisdom of including the "Learned Comment on Dr. Hare's Excellent Sermon," of which Swift himself says that he only gave "hints" to his understrapper, Mrs. Manley. But any judgment on the question of how far one should include the results of such collaboration among Swift's works must depend chiefly upon internal evidence—for Swift might have disclaimed full authorship for politic reasons—and a critical verdict based upon style is not easily arrived at in the case of a writer so free from mannerism. As a rule we accept Mr. Temple Scott's decisions as sound and critical. It is needless to add that he has collated the text of each pamphlet with the first and later editions, whenever procurable, and that his notes are full and scholarly. The reproduction in facsimile of the original title-pages will interest collectors and is besides quite the right thing to give in all such editions. A good photogravure after Jervas' picture in the National Portrait Gallery is prefixed. Swift's political tracts may seem out of date to modern readers who are not familiar with the foreign policy of the age of Marlborough; but they are not only admirable specimens of virile English, they are also marked by that sound common sense and matter-of-fact sanity which were among Swift's leading characteristics as a political writer. Biassed as they are and must be, as briefs for a fighting cause, such powerful tracts as "The Conduct of the Allies" and "The Public Spirit of the Whigs" live for ever as models of political pamphleteering. In their time they were mighty weapons in the war of party, and even to-day they ring with the clash of steel.

LEOPARDI'S POEMS.

Mr. Morrison's translations of THE POEMS OF LEOPARDI (Gay and Bird, 3s. 6d.) are with a single exception in the original metres; the exception is unfortunately "The Infinite," which is in rhyming lines, as though Leopardi's blank verse were not good enough. There may be gain in the reverse process, there cannot be any in trammelling a version with rhyme when it is absent in the Italian. "I have retained," writes the translator, "Leopardi's form and metre, employing the same regular, and sometimes intricate, sequence of rhyme wherever he does." But Mr. Morrison's renderings will not be judged ultimately by their faithfulness in technique. It is quite possible to run a translation into the mould of the original, without at the same time preserving its illusion and vision. For instance, "Il Primo Amore" is in terza rima, and Mr. Morrison, true to his self-imposed task, repeats the treble rhymes in English—his lines are not endecasyllabic, by the way, as they should be, but decasyllabic and destroys the illusion and banalizes the thought. Leopardi's lines begin:—

> Tornami a mente il dì che la battaglia
> D'amor sentii la prima volta, e dissi:
> Oimè, se quest' è amor, com' ei travaglia;
> Chè gli occhi al suol tuttora intenti e fissi,

How admirable Mr. Morrison is when he is not fettered the following lines from Sappho's Last Song will show

> Through us joy, unaccustomed yet, doth thrill,
> When from the South the dust-laden winds
> Swift roll along the liquid air, and sweep
> Across the swaying fields, and when the ear
> Of Jove deep thundering o'er our head doth cle
> Its heavy path along the lowering sky.
> We love to float amid the rain-charged clouds
> Across the crags and valleys deep, and hear
> The panic-struck stampede of horses, the sound
> Of swollen river fell,
> And trench'rous, or the waves' resistless swell.

Specimens equal to this may be found in almost every they conclusively prove that Leopardi is best tra rhythmic prose. Even into blank verse there slips harsh line, which would certainly have been avoide lated prose. Although "Noi l' insueto allor gaudio r accurately translated by the first line of the above sel the harshness of "unaccustomed yet" is not to mel iambic beat, nor do we think that had the translate his cadences as he went such a nervous check would suggested itself.

When the matter of the poems is carefully examined that no poet of equal repute has less variety in idea within a narrower circle of sympathies; the secret of seems to lie in his satisfying that side of our nature solace in calm nescience. Were men always optimist active, there would be no nest of a Leopardi, but escape at times a sense of failure, a world-wearin poignant irritation at movement (girando senza posa) assured place in our affections. He is neither a phil a moralist; he is purely and perfectly the poet of Bankrupt at twenty of all physical vitality, without of men, treated by his father and mother as an alien, for his pleasure on the intervals from pain, repellent he yet finds room for his genius to work in, and is un perhaps with the single exception of Hardy—in visu loneliness and peace of Nature:—

> No ruffle on the water's breast, no chirp
> Of gay grasshopper, and no flutter mid
> The trees of wings, or buzz of butterfly;
> No voice or motion far or near I hear
> Or see. Profoundest peace reigns o'er these sh
> Where I, ne'er stirring, as oblivious
> Of self and all things, sit; methinks e'en now
> My limbs are froze in death, nor feeling more > Nor breath of life in them; their primal peace
> Confounded with the silence of the scene.

How inerrantly the last line (lor quiète antica Co' loco si confonda) describes the borderland between sl waking! The terror and beauty of silence and the loneliness have never received more intensely Imag pression. The mood with which these lines infect us a the poet; it is reflected in every poem. Take "Genista," which more than pages of analysis helps u his marvellous perfection in his own domain:—

> Oft on these lonely slopes,
> In mourning vesture clad
> By the stark sea, which seems to undulate,
> I sit by night, and o'er the sombre down
> Out on the stars I gaze
> That in the clear, blue firmament bright blaz
> Which far the mirroring sea
> Reflects; and see a whole world scintillate
> Around of sparks, resplendent space's crown,

To the reader unfamiliar with the Canti no poem more completely reveals the poet's temperament or lets out the secret of his strength and limitations than the exquisite "Il Tramonta Della Luna." As the moon sinks, hills and valleys, hedges and houses, assume vague shapes and become weird and splendid in the dusk. Presently thick darkness shuts out the sight of everything, and night is left solitary. Thus youth disappears and the springs of hope dry up. Life is left desolate and miserable.

The wildered traveller,
As in its darkness he doth vainly peer,
Looks for some end or goal along the road
Which stretches far and lone;
And feels this life's abode
To him, as he to it, is stranger grown.

Were man to keep to the end the delusions of his youth the eternal gods would envy him, and so they invented old age, "of all woes the crown," in which should die all desire and joy:—

Soon from out the east ye'll hail Returning light new pierce
The darksome heavens and the dawn fresh break!

And the poem concludes with the commonplace of poets that our life when once it has sunk will never rise again, recalling the oft-quoted lines of Catullus:—

Soles occidere et redire possunt;
Nobis, quum semel occidit brevis lux,
Nox est perpetua una dormienda.

(Suns can rise and set; once our brief light has fled, through the unending night we must sleep.)

FICTION.

"The man of mixed blood," we read in THE WESTERNERS, by Stewart Edward White (Archibald Constable, 6s.), "is not like other men. . . . No man lives who can predict what may or may not suffice to set into motion the machinery of his passions. . . . But once started the results may be tremendous." This much being postulated it would be absurd to cavil at the refinement of iniquity displayed by the half-breed Lafond in his revenge for a casual affront. The picture of Western life is vivid and powerful, sometimes painfully so. The author succeeds by his perfectly natural presentation of people whom he knows and by his freedom from affectation; he reduces everything to the lowest possible terms, and produces a series of pictures which stand out on one's mental retina with unusual clearness.

IN THE BLOOD, by William S. Walker (Long, 6s.), is frankly a novel with a purpose, which is, perhaps, an excuse for its literary defects. Page after page of the book sets a cultured reader's teeth on edge. But if we forgive these literary crimes—we cannot forget them—it is because we sympathize with the purpose. It is an appeal to the new Federal Government of Australasia to grapple seriously with the larrikin. The appeal is couched in the form of a picture of slum life in Sydney in the year of grace 1900, and it is a terrible and damning indictment. There is no hysteria in Mr. Walker's work; he is a close observer, and his account rings true, given in the plainest Anglo-Saxon with nothing extenuated, naught set down in malice. If, therefore, "In the Blood" is not good as a novel this does not detract from the sincerity of our wish that it may have its is about to give birth to a child, and believing her child to be dead, marries a whom she keeps in ignorance of her past. C adopted by the steadfast adorer, the Dobb course, too, the bold bad gallant who love comes back to make pie of everybody's happi the fact that the words "of course" spring lips, the story interests. The meeting betw her son, and between him and his father, plication are all well contrived.

HUMBRT SHERBROOKE, PRIEST (Simpkin, Tarika, is a painstaking but by no means luminou young Ritualist, whose religious zeal must hampered by his curious code of morals. The face makes him forget his vow of celibacy self respect, of honour, and even of the lit with which nature had endowed him. And artists of distinction are proud to count the a fashionable painter, is an R.A. at 31, whos bined the refinement and delicacy of finish of strength and profundity of Rembrandt." T less successful, had at any rate "surpassed Burne-Jones, Rossetti, and a dozen others," assured him that even Raphael had not painte Small wonder that the poor heroine foun between their claims! The book is as a whe disappointing.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The governors of the People's Palace Lib to hand over the whole of their books, amounti volumes, to the new public library for Stepne accumulated since 1887, and form a substant extensions in the direction of up-to-date work otherwise would have been necessary to provi may now be expended upon modern technical

In two metropolitan boroughs the public recently come up for discussion. The results Hackney a largely attended town's meeting, the Mayor, almost unanimously urged the adopt the Acts, but the representatives of before them an offer of the books from the fre maintained by subscriptions), conditionally put in force, rejected the proposal after scan

At the Salford Public Libraries all new b and examined by borrowers for a week before circulation. The volumes are exhibited f daily, but must not, of course, be removed fr that the discussion over open access is agai idea may be commended to the notice both opponents of that system. To hold exhibition be a capital way of familiarizing the public w indicator would not be obviated, and the lon of strayed and stolen works would be greatly

Mr. Basil H. Soulsby, of the British M been appointed honorary secretary of the Lib the room of Mr. Frank Pacy, one of the Westminster, who has felt himself obliged to In future a paid assistant secretary is to r a model library building stocked with books chosen by the librarians of America. An interesting article is contributed by Miss M. S. R. James upon "Libraries in the Bahama Islands."

The library of Nassau was formerly a prison, and the old traditions in the form of salutary punishment still remain. Miscreants who turn down a leaf are fined four shillings, while threepence a day is charged for overdue books.

Correspondence.

ENGLISH FICTION IN GERMANY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have read with sympathetic interest Herr Lutz's letter to you, published in your last issue, and, unless any one more competent than myself should address you on the subject, I should like to be allowed to point out, with submission as the lawyers say, why I think Herr Lutz is perhaps wrong in attributing solely to a deficiency of literary culture among his countrymen the failure, from a commercial point of view, of the German translations of the English works of fiction specified in his letter.

If his view is correct, it would seem to follow that the success of those same works in English is proof of the cultivated literary taste of their very numerous English and American readers. Unfortunately, that is not so.

It would require something more than ordinary boldness to assert that the commercial success, in England or America, of a modern book is the measure of its artistic value; rather may it be taken as a rule, subject to every rule's proneness to exceptions, that the literary merit of a modern work in English is in inverse ratio to its popularity with the general reader. And this must continue to be the case until education, in its best and widest sense, shall have instilled into the populace, somewhen in the distant future, a love of beauty and the faculty of critical appreciation.

It is, of course, perfectly true that a work of pure literature may be fortunate enough to score a popular success, but it is not true that because a book runs into several very large editions it is therefore good literature. As I have already said, the presumption is entirely the other way, and experience confirms it, unless it be more correct to say that experience gave birth to the presumption.

If then, as I have tried to prove, Herr Lutz is as much too complimentary to us as he may be too severe on his countrymen, the cause of the results at which he expresses disappointment must be sought elsewhere, and I venture to think it is to be found just where he says it cannot possibly be, viz.—in his choice of books for translation.

If he chose them because of their enormous sale in England and America, arguing therefrom that all of them must be good literature, the chances were in favour of his arriving at a wrong conclusion. But admitting, for the sake of argument, that they deserve to rank high as literature, it does not follow as a consequence that they will prove attractive in translations.

Works that are full of local colour, descriptions of scenery, dialect, native humour, and other limitations of universal human interest, have an elusive quality which escapes in translation, and what remains fails to appeal to foreigners who, familiar with the masterpieces of Tolstoy and Balzac, Hugo and Dumas, Flaubert and de Maupassant, Zola and Bourget, are not eager to know anything about "Thrums"; do not care very much that his case against his countrymen will not be comp he can quote equally poor results from translation Meredith's "Ordeal of Richard Feverel," Hardy's the D'Urbervilles" (excised of descriptive passages) the Obscure," George Moore's "Esther Waters," Eliot's "Silas Marner," Lucas Malet's "Wages Marion Crawford's "Saracinesca," George Egerton' notes." If he gives his countrymen another and bett but with no better results, then they will deserve inde hard things he says of them, wherein they will, how themselves not one whit behind the public of any othe except France.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

D. N. SA

74, Grosvenor-road, Highbury, N., 30th Dec., 190

GOSPEL RIOTS AT ATHENS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Hogarth and I are at issue on a q fact and a question of forecast. Mr. Hogarth maint the pedantic style has taken so deep root in Gree cannot now be done away. As to the first point, I a newspapers are widely read, and that the people can u the general drift of them. This may be true, and it be true that there are many words and phrases whic not understand. Greeks are extraordinarily quick in the sense of an imperfect expression. The sentence qu the complimentary address is much simpler th newspapers; εὔχεται at once gives the key to the construction, and no doubt the Demarch read out τ δοκιμασθεῖσαν Πατρίδα μαι with such an air that his audie have taken him if he had said τὴν ἀβρακαδάβρα πατρίδ must also be borne in mind that to understand the style is a matter of pride; the more ignorant the h less likely he is to show that he does not underst Cretan villagers applauded, no doubt, but, unlike the a not smile. As regards the second point, no one k power of a tradition until it is assailed. Mr. Hogart right; if so, it is a sad thing for the Greeks. But, anyh are some who mean to try whether it is too late to me

Mr. Hogarth says that none of us write as we spe and it is the divorce of writing and speech which has g ruin English style. In the great age men did writ spoke; Shakespeare, North, Florio, Browne, Milton wrote as they spoke, in a style dignified and mel solemn matters, light and racy for trifles. The e century did us great damage, and even now very fe (such as John Bright) have shaken off that false tradit I venture to assert that in no age of English history never in the history of the world, has any one written as the Greek pedants do; and for proof I translate part of the sentence which I quoted in my first le stituting unnatural English for unnatural Greek, and, I can, reproducing the effect of the dead inflexions.

The question of the from the Lunatic Asylum Dr. K. O., from þem* simply typographicale ques tenderly brotherlichre, ist begonnen to assume sinc day's revelations the moods (conditions) of an scandales, of hwilc, &c.

I hope your readers appreciate the effrontery of cal a jargon "pure." It is simply impossible.

Yours faithfully,

Books to look out for at once.

"The House of Percy." By Gerald Brenan. Freemantle. 42s. net.
"Christ, our Life." By Professor Moberly. Murray.
"The Automobile." Translated from Gerard Lavergne's Manual. Revised and edited by Paul Hasluck. Cassell. 10s. 6d. net. Illustrated.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

ARCHITECTURE.

THE PANTHEON AT ROME: WHO BUILT IT? By J. THOMAS. 7½×5, 24 pp. Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.

[To prove that the rotunda of the Pantheon was built, not by Agrippa in the Augustan age, but more than two centuries later.]

CLASSICAL.

THE CHOEPHORI OF ÆSCHYLUS. By T. G. TUCKER. 9×5¾, 318 pp. Cam. Univ. Press. 12s. 6d.

[Full introduction on the Greek Dramas of Orestes and on the text of the Choephori; text translation, commentary and recension of the Scholia. By the Professor of Classical Philology at Melbourne University.]

EDUCATIONAL.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION MEETING AT GLASGOW, 1901. Discussion on the Teaching of Mathematics. Ed. by J. PERRY. 7¾×5¼, 101 pp. Macmillan. 2s. n.

FIRST GREEK READER. By E. C. MARCHANT. 7½×5, 72 pp. Bell. 1s. 6d.

[Similar to "Scale Primer." Vocabulary, and a few "hints." Illustrations.]

VIRGIL: ÆNEID BOOK V. CICERO: DE AMICITIA. (Bell's Illus. Classics.) Ed. by J. T. PHILLIPSON and H. J. L. J. MASSÉ. 6×4, 168+104 pp. Bell. 2s. each.

[Vocabulary, notes, introduction, and pictures.]

ELEMENTARY INORGANIC CHEMISTRY. By J. WALKER. 7½×5, 263 pp. Bell. 2s. 6d.

[Expounds principles in detail with illustrations, but without instructions for practical work which the teacher can supply. The author is Professor of Chemistry at University College, Dundee.]

FICTION.

THE GARDEN OF A COMMUTER'S WIFE. Recorded by THE GARDENER. 7¾×5¼, 254 pp. The Macmillan Co. 6s.

[A gardening book of the chatty, autobiographical, mildly humorous kind by an American lady whose husband lives in the country and works in town, or "commutes."]

POETRY.

STORY AND SONG. By the authoress of "Two Loves in One Life." 8½×6¾, 51 pp. Cornish.

POLITICAL.

NATIONAL POLICY. A speech delivered at Chesterfield, December 16, 1901, by LORD ROSEBERY. 9×6½, 39 pp. A. L. Humphreys. 1s.

[In a prefatory note, Lord Rosebery, after apologizing for publishing what is "not a speech, but a skeleton," says, as to the policy of the speech, "that policy appears to have received a large meed of general approval. But political opinion, to be effective, must be organised; political energy must work and entrench. I want some of this spade work on behalf of this policy, or else the wave of popular enthusiasm will be lost in space." Red paper bound.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

THE CHISWICK SHAKESPEARE. KING HENRY VI. Part I.: MEASURE FOR MEASURE. 6×4, 123+126 pp. Bell. 1s. 6d. n. each.

[Introduction and notes by John Dennis; illustrations by Byam Shaw.]

SONGS FROM THE PLAYS OF SHAKESPEARE. 4×2¾, 63 pp. Curtis Guildford. Brimley Johnson. 2s. n.

[A new booklet in white and gold printed at the Astolat Press, Guildford.]

SOCIOLOGY.

INDUSTRIAL EVOLUTION. By CARL BUCHER. Trans. from the Third German Ed. by S. M. WICKETT. 8½×5¼, 393 pp. Bell. 12s. n.

[The Leipzig Professor's book has had a wide influence in Germany since its publication in 1893. Mr. Wickett is a Lecturer at Toronto University.]

THEOLOGY.

A MINISTER OF GOD. Selections from the Sermons and Addresses of JOHN HAMILTON THOM. Ed. by V. D. DAVIS. 7½×5, 222 pp. P. Green. 2s. n.

[Mr. Davis supplies a biography of this well-known leader of Christian Unitarianism, the minister of Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool, and friend of James Martineau. The selection is made largely for the use of those preparing for the ministry.]

THE CHRISTIAN VIEW OF HUMAN LIFE. By J. W. HARPER, D.D. 7½×5¼, 231 pp. Dent. 4s. 6d. n.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing Hou

PROBLEM No. 290. by W. A. SHINKMAN, U.S.A.

BLACK. 11 pieces.

WHITE. 10 pieces.

White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBL
REV J. JES
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play a

PROBLEM No. 292, by A. Troitzky.—Whit Q Kt sq; Q at Q sq; B at Q B 2; pawns at Q (5 pieces)—K at Q 4; Q at Q B 2; B at K Kt 3, K B 4. White to play and win.

PROBLEM No. 293, by A. Troitzky.—Whit K B 2; R at Q Kt 2; Kt at Q B sq; pawns Black (4 pieces)—K at Q sq; R at K Kt 5; K at K 3. White to play and win.

PROBLEM No. 294, by A. Troitzky.—Whit K Kt 2; B at K B sq; Kt at Q B 5; pawn Black (4 pieces)—K at K R 4; Q at K R pawn at K Kt 2. White to play and draw.

Note.—We cannot always guarantee that these End-games a above will be new to most of our readers, and they should be, as of point.

NOTES AND NEWS.—M. Janowski and Mr due to give consultation games and exhibition week. The Hastings club has new quarte hall. It has long been a leader.—Lasker Paris, and play lasted 6½ hours, or till 2 30 a. by three players, and two drew. Lasker, knows, has some mathematical appointment Manchester. He will not go to Monte Carl entries at Monte Carlo, or rather the names every known master. W. E. Napier, a young of whom little is known here, is coming to Eu there. If so, we expect him to score well. may take place in February if it can be Americans will only arrange it when Pillsbu will be at Monte Carlo in February we suppo the games—Marshall's and Pillsbury's—may the board.—Mr. Blackburne recently visited return played at Liverpool C.C.—Mr. A. J. Editor, Cape Times) won the champions Town C.C. recently.—A new club has been s burg.—A match by telegraph between the England and Australia, is a project of Mr. M.P., but these matters are not easy to bring

GAME No. CXVIII.—Played in Sweden:—

WHITE. J. Möller.	BLACK. S. Abertsen.	WHITE. J. Möller.
1. P–K 4	P–K 4	23. P–R 3
2. Kt–K B 3	Kt–Q B 3	24. Kt–Q 4
3. B–B 4	Kt–B 3	25. P–R 4
4. P–Q 3	B–B 4	26. P×Q
5. P–B 3	P–Q 3	27. Kt×B
6. Castles	Kt–K 2	28. P–K B 4
7. P–Q 4	B–Kt 3	29. B×R ch
8. P×P	Kt×P	30. P–K Kt 3
9. Q–B 4 ch	K–B sq	31. Kt–Kt sq

Literature

No. 221. SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1902.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

NOTES OF THE DAY 1, 2

LITERATURE PORTRAITS.—No. XXXVI. Mr. Stephen Phillips. An Appreciation by Stephen Gwynn 3

"THE ISLANDERS," by Rudyard Kipling 23

MINT AND ANISE AND CUMMIN.—A "Personal View," by W. P. James 4

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF LITERATURE 5

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S MANUSCRIPTS 6

"AMERICANISMS" FOR THE GERMANS, by Jennett Humphreys 7

THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley 8

CURRENT LITERATURE—

English Coronation Records 9

The Earlier Renaissance 10

French Furniture and Decoration in the Eighteenth Century 11

Some Feudal Coats of Arms—Florentine Heraldry 11, 12

Central and South America, Vol. I.—Canada—New France—A Guide to Italy—The Foundation of British East Africa—Russian Life in Town and Country—Dutch Life in Town and Country 12, 13, 14

Biographies of Persian Poets—Persian Historical Texts, Vol. I. 15

The Amherst Papyri, II.—Homer's "Odyssey," xiii.-xxiv.—Ætna—The Meno of Plato 15, 16, 17

Miscellanies—Walt Whitman—Essays in Paradox—Patriotic Songs—Humorous Verse—A Little Book of Light Verse—The Jewish Encyclopædia—The Ethics of Judaism—Barry Sullivan and His Contemporaries—Dutch Painters of the Nineteenth Century—Lectures on the History of Physiology—The Commonwealth of Cells—A Treatise on Medical Jurisprudence—The Training of the Body—Summits of Success—God the Beautiful, an Artist's Creed—Anselm and His Work—Francis and Dominic and the Mendicant Orders—A Scientific Philosophy the Harbinger of a Scientific Theology—A Commentary on the Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude—Inter Amicos—The Confirmation and Communion of Infants and Young Children—The Atonement and Intercession of Christ—Temple Bible—The Letters of St. Paul to Seven Churches and Three Friends—The Corrections of Mark—Handbook of the Gospel According to St. Mark—Life of Henry Drummond 17, 18, 19, 20, 21

The Usurper—The Man from Glengarry—Love in Its Tenderness—Spindle and Plough—Straws in the Wind—Tales from Tolstoi—The House Divided—A Man of Devon 21, 22

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS—Books to look out for 24

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We reprint on page 23 Mr. Rudyard Kipling's poem, "The Islanders," which appeared in The Times of January 4.

* * * *

It is most satisfactory to learn that the Incorporated Society of Authors has taken steps to form a committee for the purpose of urging the claims of British candidates for the Nobel literary prize. The names of the gentlemen asked to serve on the committee—Mr. Bryce, Mr. Lecky, Dr. Garnett, Mr. Thomas

If the value of literature is to be measured by its [illegible] and obvious influence upon the policy of men of action, [illegible] late M. Jean de Bloch must be reckoned a great lit[illegible] The calling of the Peace Conference at the Hague w[illegible] due to the impression made upon the Tsar by Bloch's g[illegible] upon the horrors of war, and the new factors introduced [illegible] perfection of weapons of destruction, and the complic[illegible] mercial conditions of our times. The actual value of [illegible] clusions is more debatable; and the experts doubt [illegible] they are supported or confounded by our own recent ex[illegible] in South Africa. Perhaps M. de Bloch's views on the [illegible] effect of shell-fire and the impossibility of storming [illegible] ments are less valuable than his estimate of the co[illegible] war in direct outlay, and indirectly through the disl[illegible] industry. This was a matter which his early training a[illegible] particularly qualified him to discuss.

* * * *

Although Prebendary Tucker's connexion with th[illegible] for the Propagation of the Gospel extended from 1865 [illegible] July the only book which he published through the [illegible] though his secretarial work involved an immense a[illegible] literary work—was "The Spiritual Expansion of the [illegible] Two Centuries of Work Done for the Church and N[illegible] shilling book which was written for the bicentenary co[illegible] when it reached its thirteenth thousand. "Under His [illegible] his missionary book published by the Society for [illegible] Christian Knowledge, has also gone through several [illegible] Mr. Tucker's other works include the volume on "Th[illegible] Church in Other Lands," written for Messrs. Longm[illegible] of "Epochs of Church History," edited by the la[illegible] Creighton; and the lives of Bishop Feild and Bish[illegible] Selwyn—both published by Messrs. Wells Gardner.

* * * *

Messrs. Smith, Elder will publish Dr. Conan Doy[illegible] to the misrepresentations circulated on the [illegible] regarding the conduct of our troops at the fro[illegible] "pamphlet" runs to about 60,000 words, and is bei[illegible] lated into five European languages—no new experienc[illegible] Conan Doyle, whose works have made him one of the b[illegible] English authors abroad. It is said that sufficient [illegible] has been collected to meet every charge which has bee[illegible] against our soldiers, and Dr. Doyle's idea is to send a [illegible] work to every deputy and newspaper editor of conse[illegible] the Continent.

* * * *

Mr. Max Judge writes:—"Having read with th[illegible] admiration Mr. Fred. G. Bowles' translation of 'La [illegible] Voiles,' it may be of interest to note that in Joaqui[illegible] 'Songs of the Sierras' there is a line which expres[illegible] idea as,

With jibs close-clasped, like hands in fervent pr[illegible] novels in his forthcoming "Descriptive Guide to the Best English Fiction," to be published by Messrs. Sonnenschein, but Mr. Nield's list is, we believe, the first serious attempt to do the thing exhaustively. He includes notable novels which, while not strictly historical, in some way represent bygone periods. Mr. Elkin Mathews will publish the book.

* * * *

Mr. Grant Richards, now established in his new home in Leicester-square, will lead another little procession of anthologies on Wednesday next with "The University Song Book" a collection of the best-known songs of the various Universities with musical setting. Many other sources have been drawn upon, as well as the Universities, to make the collection complete. Mr. Murray is bringing out a somewhat similar volume, entitled "A Book of British Song," edited by Mr. Cecil J. Sharp, Principal of the Hampstead Conservatoire. Here, again, the favourite songs of the home and school are brought together, and in this case the collection will appear in two forms, one with pianoforte score and words, and the other—a small edition—with words and airs only. Mr. Grant Richards will also publish "The Book of Humorous Verse," which Mr. T. W. H. Crosland has in hand.

* * * *

LOVE'S GREETING.

I.

(From the Land.)

O crimson light, upon the foreland far,
Coming and going
In revolutions steady; lonely star, Allegiance owing
To Man the mighty Maker, Lord of land and sea;
With radiance flashing over wave and scar,
One moment showing
The black buoy tossing at the harbour bar,
Now seaward throwing
The beckoning rays that call my Wanderer home to me;
Flash him a rosy welcome o'er the deep,
Thy glory flinging
Low at my Conqueror's feet; and richly steep
The white sails bringing
My star, before whose beams all stars of night must bend.
Beside him kingly wealth I hold but cheap
As sparks upspringing.
Tell him my love for him will never sleep,
But closer clinging
Will wake, and watch, and serve him, humble, to the end.

II.

(From the Sea.)

O crimson light upon the foreland set,
The dark ways cleaving
With lanes of light and welcome, stay and let Thy beam deceiving
One moment longer light the balcony I know.
A moment since it seem'd my eyes had met,
O'er waters heaving,
Soft eyes, and hands that round me fling a net
Of wondrous weaving,
Where may I captive stay till Death's tides round me flow!
O crimson star, no beams of thine compare
With her eyes blending
The glories of the kingly Day and fair
Queen Night descending
With slow majestic step adown the curving sphere.
Proclaim my swift home-coming, and declare
My love unending,
My worship, and the service that will dare
All things, contending
For her sweet sake with pain and shame and death and fear.

LEONARD ALSTON.

Mr. King's book was the tenth of the dozen Am young American authors which Messrs. Harper beginning of last year. Only a few of these ha here. The most important work which Mess in hand for early publication is Mr. W. D. How of Fiction," in two handsome volumes, illustr well-known American artists. The work is n W. D. Howells' "Literary Friends and Acq will be ready very shortly.

An Object Lesson in Criticism.

Among orthodox Shakespearian scholars th improbably been held that far too much attentl devoted to the "madhouse Baconians. With this opinion least agree. By the extensive s Baconian theory which has been columns of The Times a signal rendered to the study of English literature, has, for once, moved a public, generally qui regard to such matters, to real interest n purely literary topic. It is a common mistak problems of authorship are of minor import play's the thing"; and that so long as we c properly appreciate Shakespeare's poetry and care much whence they proceeded. Questions a matter of fact, often lie at the very basis of of greater moment to the race has ever been questions of authorship involved in the "Hig
the Scriptures, and no one on either side wi deny that the disputants have often displayed to hasty assumption, to false logic, and to me conspicuous in the Shakespeare-Bacon c occasional object lesson in the sifting of evid beliefs is an immensely beneficial tonic for "likes to be deceived." But that is not the o are glad to see our friends the Baconians tr spirit. The "madhouse chatter" attitude is but a dangerous one for true believers to netly parallel to the state of mind revealed shocked and horrified at the suggestions of the Hard words have not only never furthered t but have frequently obstructed it. The Ba unnaturally felt that if their opponents could than call them crazy and imbecile it was be ments were unanswerable. Hence it comes th spread since its birth in the middle of the la rapidity very little realized in literary circles.
two hundred pro-Baconian works have appeare not far short of a hundred in England. The underlying mass of Baconianism among the mi superficially cultured reading public on be Atlantic. Dr. Georg Brandes ascribes t
"feminine criticism, on the one hand, with it nerve, and Americanism, on the other hand, spiritual delicacy." Unquestionably the new d mostly among those who are quite unconscious possess the cautious judgment and the subtle ins to sound literary criticism. But so large a vinest doubters will never be converted by a are not sure that the "Baconian bacillus" i by the modern method of inoculation. The summarily dismissed; there are unquestionabl surmounted. A temporary hesitation, a sligh lymph, may be the surest way of warding off t Gallup's cipher, we venture to think, exis serious factor in the problem for those who recent discussion of it—though we have some sy respondent in the Daily News who, accepting t it the strongest argument for Shakespearian aut lem turns partly on the internal evidence, int enough, supplied by the plays, and the ext contemporaries. The closer one studies eith whelmingly probable does the Shakespearian

Literature Portraits.—XXXVI.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

Three years ago it was something like an article of faith that the poetic drama was dead beyond hope of recovery. Nowadays there is a very different complexion on the matter. M. Rostand is in a fair way to be a millionaire, and Mr. Phillips has two plays down for appearance in the next month at the two leading theatres in London. His Herod, though it had not a pecuniary success at all comparable to that of Cyrano, brought him applications in profusion from notable actors, both English and American, and received only the other day a tribute of which any author might well be proud. M. Baumeister, the well-known Dutch actor, celebrated the fortieth anniversary of his début by a special performance, and for that occasion the piece he chose was a translation of Herod. Add to this the enthusiastic recognition accorded to Mr. Phillips' poetry as poetry by the majority of known critics, together with the significant fact that his three volumes—the poems and the two published plays—have reached a very large sale, and it will be apparent that here is that extremely rare creature, a real poet who is also popular.

One is always more interested in a butterfly when one has been familiar with the chrysalis, and I knew Mr. Phillips in the chrysalis stage a remarkably short time ago. We were in a sense contemporaries, though he had the advantage of me by several years; for when I came to London and took to literature as a business, he was just launching his first little volume, "Christ in Hades," and his friends were my friends also—and very helpful friends they were. My impression is that we met first at the Spectator office; at all events, I remember very distinctly my perplexity when one of the editors gently upbraided me with shortcomings that never were mine, until we discovered that he was taking me for another new contributor who had the same Christian name.

"Christ in Hades," though it drew from Mr. William Watson a generous eulogy, did not greatly impress the world. Probably a good many people were first convinced—it was my own case—that Mr. Phillips had to be very seriously counted with, by "The Woman with the Dead Soul," which was published in the Spectator in about July, 1897. In the December of that year came the "Poems," the sale of which received a great impetus from the award to them of a £100 prize by the Academy.

Mr. Phillips had thus achieved reputation. The poem in the volume which gained him most admirers was certainly "Marpessa," an idyll which showed pretty strongly the influence of Tennyson, though not so strongly as to hide Mr. Phillips' own individuality. The two which were, at least to my thinking, most characteristic, and therefore most interesting, were "The Woman with the Dead Soul" and "The Wife"—the latter of which contained, perhaps, the best but also probably the worst things in the book. It is, however, noticeable as being the only one which gave some hint of a possible dramatist. But if any one thought of that at the time, I certainly did not. Mr. George Alexander was more intelligent. A couple of months

Benson, in which he played many parts, his predil for the Ghost in Hamlet—a rôle in which he [illegible] honour of a special recall. And though, so far as [illegible] his chief distinctions while with the company were prowess in the cricket field and by an unholy taste joking, there is not the least question but that he rience which has proved of inestimable value to him

Paolo and Francesca was written in the course for a variety of reasons Mr. Alexander did not [illegible] produce it at once. During that year Mr. Philli some sporadic pieces, one of which, "Endymion," type to "Marpessa," and was to my mind even a m and interesting piece of work. But it had bad luck.
printed it in the Nineteenth Century—an honou accorded to poetry—and it appeared at the September—in the week in which we learnt th Colonel Henry, the murder of the Empress of battle of Omdurman, and the presence of the Fashoda. Naturally enough, it passed unnoticed.
excitement drew from Mr. Phillips two exceedingl of occasional verse, but since then his shorter have been few. "A Poet's Prayer," which the rather inaccessible Anglo-Saxon Review, ran with his best work in this class; not so th Saeculare," with which Mr. Knowles inaugurated th Century and After. This poem, however, showed in the interesting light of an experimenter innovation, employing an unrhymed couplet that rhythmic effect solely on the distribution of stress,
—but a rhythm helped out by a free use of allite metre, which had somewhat the effect of Horace's lochian ("Diffugere nives"), had been previously ex Phillips, and, in my judgment, with much finer resu contributed to the Spectator. But it is a little besi to dwell upon these shorter compositions. Almost modern English poets, Mr. Phillips has done h justice on the large canvas than the small; and it is evident that in devoting himself to dramatic poetry merely cast in the form of dialogue and grouped i scenes, but carefully designed to make its appropria theatre—he has followed the true bent of his genius increasingly evident to me; but from the night I and Francesca read I had no doubt that its autho dramatist; yet that was the last conviction I had carry away with me. I have not forgotten, and I d any of the four or five rather critically-minded peop
the play for the first time when I did will forget, t delighted surprise that the reading produced—till the poetry obliterated surprise. Mr. Phillips is singula a reader, and, like all poets, he reads his own verse any other, so that the element of personal magne be allowed for; but the opinion which I formed not gone back on—that it was the most important that had been made to English literature since Ten his masterpieces. Other men had done things as goo but in a smaller, less exacting, and, as I must think, l kind. Poetry has been so long divorced from the s country that we have lost all sense of the value poetry. There is always Shakespeare, no doubt; b the voice of his own time, and the voice of Elizabeth not affect us as, for example, Hugo affected France ha ago. Shakespeare's greatness obscures the true issue will always been on saying, "If you have Shakespeare supposed reluctance of actors to touch poetical drama was proved to be non-existent directly a man appeared who showed himself able to write drama that was poetry and was adapted for stage production.

As soon as Paolo and Francesca was published, offers to produce it in America and elsewhere came in; but Mr. Alexander, naturally enough, held to his rights. And since his engagements did not permit him to make the experiment at once, another man led the way. The final act of Herod was written in the early part of 1899, and was submitted with a rough scenario to Mr. Tree, who accepted it, and threw himself with enthusiasm into the task of bringing out the play. Perhaps the decision to make it consist of three acts rather than of four was unfortunate; but in any case the exigencies of the medium must be allowed for. To compress that mass of action with its variety of characters into the compass even of four acts, so that the pith and essence of it should be conveyed to a miscellaneous audience through ear and eye, was a task immeasurably transcending in difficulty the problems which most modern poets have set before themselves. The only one among his contemporaries who has any claim, in my judgment, to rank with Mr. Phillips as poet is Mr. Yeats, and many of us may prefer The Shadowy Waters to Herod as a piece of literature. But Herod will act, The Shadowy Waters will not; and, in order to be actable, a poet must discard deliberately the very qualities which make the charm of Mr. Yeats' work. About Ulysses it is too early to say anything, but a very little thought will show the initial difficulty, the tremendous structural problem, which had to be faced in order to shape out of the story anything that could be presented under the conditions of the stage. Yet I do not think that the reflection will occur to playgoers: so easy does the thing seem once it has been done for us, so simply is the great story told.

But with all his acceptance of the positive Mr. Phillips is as fundamentally a mystic as Mr. Yeats. He never wrote anything more characteristic of his habitual bent of mind than those lines in Herod—

> I tell you we are fooled by the eye, the ear—
> Those organs muffle us from that real world
> That lies about us, we are duped by brightness.
> The ear, the eye, doth make us deaf and blind;
> Else should we be aware of all our dead
> Who pass above us, through us, and beneath us.

Another strong element in his temperament which has not as yet made itself fully felt in his writings—though to some extent it appears in Ulysses—is a curious, rather grim humour, verging on the broad, that accounts for his disposition to rank Dickens above all other writers of the last century. For his personal appearance, those interested in it can supplement the perfectly just impression conveyed in Elliot and Fry's fine photograph by a glance at Mr. Max Beerbohm's wickedest but admirable caricature.

STEPHEN GWYNN.

According to present arrangements both Paolo and Francesca and Mr. Stephen Phillips' new play, Ulysses, will be seen on the stage next month. Mr. Beerbohm Tree will introduce Ulysses on February 1 at Her Majesty's Theatre—the scene of "Herod's" dramatic triumph towards the end of 1900—and Mr. George Alexander will give his long anticipated representation of Paolo and Francesca at the St. James's Theatre later in the month. The new drama, Ulysses, is in blank verse and three now obtainable in that form only in the lon

"Garland." The title-poem and the lyri in the volume of "Poems" published by in 1898. Lane.

1897. "Poems," including "Christ in Hades with the Dead Soul," "The Wife," and " Lane. Eleventh edition. ("Marpessa" wa Lane's "Flowers of Parnassus" Series in by Philip Connard; now in its tenth editio

1899. "Paolo and Francesca." (Written Alexander.) John Lane. Twentieth thous

1900. "Herod." (Written for Mr. Beerb produced at Her Majesty's Theatre on John Lane. Twenty-first thousand.

MINT AND ANISE AND CU

A "Personal View"

By W. P. JAMES.

Careful observers of the columns of corre newspapers have observed that no topic—not ev attractive topics of marriage unions or religi taps a more unfailing source of letters than so grammatical usage and error. Amidst the abun multitude of small inaccuracies that pervade w language, now one, now another particular is suddenly made the butt of all the purists; critic and the minor literary person, who like I not critical, make the attack on it the staple
The fact seems to show that the spirit of the s abroad in the land. A generation back it was able" that was the favourite butt for attack.
on each others' heels in pointing out the larity of its formation. Dislodged from th sidered position by Fitz Edward Hall's defe and his citation of such kindred examples as lang dispensable, conversible, at which no dead se fell back on the objection that the word was a for trustworthy. But quite useless synonyms a usage of language synonyms rarely remain quite mous. Anybody with a nice sense for the us feel that there is room for a word to express th ing whereby "reliable" differs from "trustworth style, I find by the dictionary, no less eminen and Newman in the past and Mr. Leslie Steph have found a use for the word; while smaller use a word tabooed, have been driven to depend o

Not many years ago again a good deal of cri was expended on the popular usage of the word an intensive adverb, as in "He was literally s and so forth. Well, of course, this is just one makeshifts of unoriginal emphasis which can defended. At the same time the criticism usual usage was quite beside the mark. In origin simply an abbreviation for "literally expressed," letter, and not in metaphor or in exaggeration.
the expression is neither admirable nor forcible or illogical as its common critics lightly assume

A rather different class of the same kind of

and never will be peopled by scholars, words, sometimes to a deplorable degree, sometimes only to a degree necessary for the convenience of general communication, become conversational counters, from which in the handling of multitudes and generations the image and superscription once fresh minted by genius have become worn or defaced. Convenience compels us, for example, to apply the terms of "bachelors" and "spinsters" without too nice a sense of their original signification. French made a glossary of such words; words now mere logical counters which once were metaphors, similes, even poems in brief. The word "tribulation," which of course means "threshing," was one of his most striking examples. So in "aversion," the original sense of motion has become lost in the metaphorical sense of a mental disposition. And when a word comes to denote a mental disposition, it falls into line with words of that class and governs (as the old grammarians used to say) the dative. We are now, of course, particular to write "sympathy with," but the authorized translators of the Gospel, who knew something about style, wrote "compassion on," not compassion with.

The pet aversions, most prominent in popular criticism to-day, are, perhaps, from the "split infinitive," and the use of "and which." The last good writer convicted of using "and which" was I notice "Lucas Malet" in "Sir Richard Calmady." So far as the accusation is one of essential impropriety (I am speaking, of course, of "and which" not of "Sir Richard Calmady"), its usage in French is a complete answer. For "et qui" is admitted by good usage precisely in the cases where "and which" is condemned. Now no purist will pretend that, in whatever other respects it may be inferior, French is inferior to English in logical accuracy or grammatical correctness. (I ought, I suppose, to write "inferior than.") I do not recommend young writers to write "and which." They will certainly hear of something to their disadvantage from reviewers if they do. But it is not to be denied, I think, that the usage is not essentially illegitimated, and just occasionally expresses the writer's meaning more correctly, than what by custom is considered the more correct usage.

As for that terrible "split infinitive," real writers must feel about it as real composers, Schumann said, felt about consecutive fifths—that they were just things to catch the attention of superficial critics and to keep them out of serious mischief. That the split infinitive is incorrect is undeniable; but it is equally undeniable that this incorrect usage apparently meets a felt want in the minds of many quite cultivated writers and speakers. Mr. Arthur Balfour, for example, who is nothing if not cultured, once opened an election address with a split infinitive. The instinct to which the split infinitive appeals is the instinct to get the qualifying expression as close as possible to the expression qualified, in order to avoid the possibility of ambiguity. In a letter received this morning I read—"I am asked to seriously consider conscientious objections, urged &c." This (if my correspondent will pardon me) rather clumsy example may at least serve to show that the adverb placed before or after so as not to split the infinitive would involve a possible ambiguity. I do not mean to say that the ambiguity could not in most cases be avoided in another and a better way. But my point is that if the choice ever does arise inevitably between ambiguity on the one hand and a split infinitive on the other, and I think it may and does, the wise writer will choose the split infinitive, rage the critics never so furiously. For language and literature after all exist to convey and to enforce meaning. And so long as language and literature are living processes, the natural grammatical construction is always what we used at

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF LITERA

Some little time ago correspondents of The Ti the Royal Society of Literature because it was n represent English letters in the International A Academies, and denounced it on the ground that it w to do so. Neither the derision nor the denunciati unmerited. The Royal Society of Literature has one failures. Many excellent people, otherwise well in never heard of it. It has become somewhat like one of and corner" institutions at which Matthew Arn and of which his favourite example was a certa College of Health in the New Road." But, after al Charter. It is the Royal Society of Literature. necessary for the right men to do the right thing time in order to enable it to take its place worthil Royal Society, the Royal Geographical Society, Associations. Instead of deciding it, it would be m to look at its history and see what can be made of it.

The origin of the Society cannot be better descr the words of its official historiographer, Mr. Edward V C.B.:—

> In October, 1820, in "accidental conve "person" who can be identified as Thomas B Bishop of St. Davids, afterwards of Salisbury, another the advantages which might be expect institution of a Society of Literature somewhat the French Academy of Belles Lettres. The su communicated to Sir Benjamin Bloomfield, and by George the Fourth, who had but recently ascended
>
> On the 2nd November the Bishop received H command to attend at Carlton House to discuss and was directed to draw up a plan in elaboration outline which he had previously submitted. . .
>
> His Majesty became the Patron of the prop and assigned out of his Privy Purse the annual guineas to be applied in pensions of 100 guinea Royal Associates, and (as at first proposed) in a 100 guineas for a prize dissertation.

This munificence, it appears, was partly due to tion. What the King meant to give was £1,000 annual subscription of £100 only; but the Bisho His Majesty's intention of subscribing the larger su and the Press praised him for it so warmly, that he situation and subscribed it. That, however, is a d interest than importance. The Society was quic The three Royal Dukes of York, Clarence, and Ca came Fellows, each contributing a composition of Among its Vice-Presidents and on its council we known names as those of Bishop Bloomfield, Lord Sir Gore Ouseley, Sir James Mackintosh, Lord G Thomas Acland, and Francis Chantrey. The Pe elected, the most famous of them being Coleridge, Sharon Turner; and the Charter of Incorporation defining the object of the Society to be

> The advancement of literature by the publicatio remains of ancient literature, and of such works great intrinsic value, but not of that popular cha usually claims the attention of publishers; by th of discoveries in literature; by endeavouring standard as far as is practicable and to preserve t the English language; by the critical improvem lexicography; by the reading at public meetings o papers on history, philosophy, poetry, philology, and the publication of such of those papers approved of; by the assignment of honorary rewa of great literary merit, and to important di literature; and by establishing a correspondence men in foreign countries for the purpose of lite and information.

There is little fault to be found with any of the being more economically minded than George IV. and less interested in literature, declined, when he came to the throne, to continue his brother's grants out of the Privy Purse, with the result that the ten pensioners all lost their pensions, and all that the Society could do for them was to admit them to the privileges of membership without payment. The King subsequently intimated that he would give the Society £100 a year; but even this source of revenue was lost in consequence of some economies in the administration of the Privy Purse, effected a few years ago. And this, of course, was morally discouraging as well as materially inconvenient. The community at large could not be expected to have a high opinion of a society which Royalty snubbed.

Another difficulty has been that the Society has never had the sort of constitution which would have made membership, or at least Fellowship, a distinction to be sought by the best men and sighed for in vain by the inferior men. It was launched by men who did not know their business, or understand what should be the difference between a Royal Society of Literature and a club of gentlemen more or less interested in letters. Consequently the Society first struggled and then languished. A certain number of eminent men have been connected with it. In Mr. Brabrook's History one comes upon the names, among others, of Southey, Hogg, Hallam, Hookham Frere, Austen Henry Layard, George Crabbe, Lingard, Sir Henry Rawlinson, and, among foreign honorary members, of Bunsen, Guizot, Thiers, Ranke, Boeckh, W. H. Prescott. Moreover, at an early period of its history, the Society did its best to anticipate the late Mr. Smith's project for a Dictionary of National Biography. It collected £580 15s. for the purpose, and actually got as far as publishing a couple of volumes—one in 1839, and the other in 1840. It is a great pity that a Society which meant so well, and began to do so well, should have declined instead of increasing in repute, and should have come to bear so close a resemblance to an Essay Society at which elderly gentlemen read each other unimportant papers that are never heard of again.

It must not be supposed, however, that the members of the Society are unaware that the Society has missed a great opportunity, or are opposed to the idea of reform. The address delivered to the Society by Mr. Brabrook on April 24th last, which is before us, proves the contrary. The intention of George IV., Mr. Brabrook points out, was that the Royal Society of Literature "should be to the literature of the United Kingdom that which the Académie des Inscriptions et des Belles-Lettres is to the literature of France"; and he deplores the signal failure of the Society to achieve that ideal, brought into such unpleasant relief by the action, or rather the inaction, of the International Association of Academies. He asks "whether the opportunity of a new departure under our new Royal patron should not be taken," and in what this new departure, if taken, should consist.

Mr. Brabrook proceeds to make several suggestions; but one of his suggestions eclipses all the others in importance. It is to the effect that plenty of new members of the right sort should be induced to join. "When I observe," he writes, "at the Authors' Club and other places of resort how many brilliant young men are rising to adorn that great profession, I cannot but regret that many of them are not included in our list of Fellows. I would seek to attract them."

Precisely; Mr. Brabrook hits the nail on the head fairly and straightly. We ourselves will go one step further and say that the defects of the Royal Society of Literature are not the fault of the members, but of those men of letters who might be members but are not; and that the reasonable course for men of letters is not to sneer at the Society because it is unworthy of its name, but to join it and make it worthy of its name. The Society, we have every reason to know, so far from interposing obstacles, would gladly elect all properly qualified candidates; and the membership of the Society is at present so small that, if the leaders of literature in all its branches sought and obtained election, they would be in a majority, and would be in a position to control the machinery.

And the machinery ought to be controlled, not by a clique but by the men who are most eminent in the various branches bearings, could perfectly well make applica and in due course, for a new Charter better a day requirements. A humble petition to t panied by proper evidence that the managemen in the hands of men zealous for the interests o and competent to represent it, might conceiva restoration of its original endowments. If it w able—though on this result there would no do diverse opinions—the Royal Society of Litera reconstructed on lines that would make it the of the French Academy of Letters. It can, at lifted out of the disrepute into which it has and transformed from a hole-and-corner institu which men of letters could be proud of. But be accomplished on condition that men of lett joining it obtain control of it.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S MANU

Portions of the original autograph man "Ivanhoe" came under the hammer at Soth They consisted of fifty-one quarto sheets, and be and fourth volumes of the work as issued in 18 property of Constable, the publisher, to whom them with twelve other volumes of his origi the spring of 1823. Another portion of the the hands of Cadell. He had purchased it fr whose husband, the well-known comedian, Sco the idea of having the story dramatized. Som year 1835 this portion was seen and described to Chambers's Journal, and the other, which has be regarded as, in all essentials, like unto it. struck by "the neatness and uniformity and the absence of blotting and interlinea "as much manuscript as would fill five printe single correction, or even the appearance of a The songs introduced seemed also "to hav with the same easy grace as the connecting has become of this portion of the manuscript i although, as it was bought by Mr. Hope Cadell's effects in 1867, it is probably at Abb

When Constable failed, the question of th thirteen volumes of manuscripts which Scott him came up for consideration. Lord Newton belonged to the bankrupt estate, and they we by Evans in 1831, the total sum realized fo being £317. Here is the list of prices:—

(1) "The Monastery," £18	(8) "Ivanhoe,
(2) "Guy Mannering," £27 10s.	(9) "The Pira
(3) "Old Mortality," £33	(10) "Fortunes
(4) "Antiquary," £42	(11) "Kenilw
(5) "Rob Roy," £50	(12) "Bride o
(6) "Peveril of the Peak," £42	£14 14s.
(7) "The Abbot," £14	(13) "Waverle

As prices go now these sums are absurdly first six of the manuscripts were in a comple were more or less imperfect, and some port the case of "Ivanhoe," had been dictated.

Of course the prices soon rose. Both " and "Guy Mannering," had been bought for ardent bibliomaniac who wrote "From Mountains," and both were resold by him in 1 £45 3s., the second for £63. Other manus value in like proportion, though one or two o out of competition by finding a permanent ho case with "Waverley." The manuscript apparently unique in so far as a considerable p on sheets of folio size, whereas the rest of S are in quarto. In 1831 the manuscript wa Wilks, M.P., as the above list shows, for £18. Mr. Hall, who, in 1850, presented it to the Ad treasures have gone. Curiously enough, it is the first published editions of "Guy Mannering" and of "Waverley" the rarest of all the premier editions of Scott that seem most likely to run each other close as to auction prices. "Waverley," of course, comes first, the record price so far being £150; while £70 was paid for "Guy Mannering" at Sotheby's some little time back. Not so many years ago it used to be a common remark among bibliophiles that first editions of Scott's novels were seldom made the subject of competition, and were consequently of no particular value. The fashion, however, seems to be changing—a fact which should give pause to those who declare that Scott is losing ground.

The highest prices so far realized for the manuscripts sold in 1831 have been those of "Rob Roy" and "The Monastery," both of which realized £660 when they last changed hands. The first was bought in 1847 by Cadell. He subsequently presented it to Lockhart, and it passed into the hands of Mr. William Law some six years ago. "Old Mortality" was sold at Sotheby's in 1897. "The Pirate" was bought in 1831 for Cadell, and it is now in the possession of one of his descendants. The manuscript has a note on the fly-leaf in Cadell's handwriting, which says that he had received from Scott himself, in April, 1831, the part missing from the manuscript as held by Constable. But eight pages are still wanting to render the manuscript complete. "The Abbot" was another of the manuscripts held by Cadell; it was sold to Mr. John Murray in 1868 for £50—£36 more than it brought in 1831. "Kenilworth" was one of the incomplete manuscripts of 1831. It was bought for Mr. Wilks for £17, and, strangely enough, brought only £16 when his collection was sold in 1847. The manuscript was bought for the British Museum in 1855. The late Dr. David Laing, the Scottish antiquary, had a portion of the original, and bequeathed it along with a fragment of "The Legend of Montrose," to Edinburgh University.

A second collection of Scott's manuscripts was privately purchased by Cadell from David Constable, a son of the publisher, in 1833. This collection consisted of manuscripts of the poems only, the list including "Marmion," "Lord of the Isles," "Rokeby," "Don Roderick," and "Field of Waterloo." The manuscript of the "Lay of the Last Minstrel" had not been preserved, "such things," to quote from a note of Constable's, "not having been thought important till the publication of 'Marmion.'" For the five poems Cadell paid the ridiculously low sum of £60; and at the same time he gave £105 for five quarto volumes of Scott's Letters, written between 1796 and 1832. Cadell, it will be remembered, was Constable's successor as Scott's publisher, and he thus acquired several other manuscripts of the novelist for which he apparently paid nothing. The list of these was given by a writer in Chambers's Journal some three years ago. The most notable was, perhaps, "The Lady of the Lake," which, when sold at Sotheby's in June, 1897, produced the extraordinary sum of £1,290. Cadell died in 1849, at which time his Scott manuscripts appear to have been housed in his mansion at Ratho, near Edinburgh. It is said that the entire collection was offered privately for £2,000; but it produced a good deal more than that when it was sold by Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods in 1867 and 1868. The following are the prices and purchasers of the first lot, sold in the former year:—

"Marmion"...	191gs.	Mr. Harvey.
"Lady of the Lake" ...	261gs.	Mr. F. Richardson.
"Vision of Don Roderick"	37gs.	Mr. F. Richardson.
"Rokeby"	130gs.	Mr. Hope Scott.
"Lord of the Isles" ...	101gs.	Mr. Hope Scott.
Introductory Essay on Popular Poetry ...	51gs.	Mr. F. Richardson.
"Auchindrane"	27gs.	Messrs. Nixon and Rhodes.
"Anne of Geierstein" ...	121gs.	Mr. Hope Scott.
"Waverley and Ivanhoe"	130gs.	Mr. Hope Scott.
"Tales of a Grandfather"	145gs.	Mr. F. Richardson.
"Castle Dangerous" ...	32gs.	Mr. F. Richardson.
"Count Robert of Paris"	23gs.	Mr. Massey.

This made a total of 1,255 guineas. In the next lot, sold in

"AMURRICANISMS" FOR THE GER

For an and not immediately apparent, there has hand a little German-English English-German dic for a florin or so, and prepared by a Mr. Frank Will the way of almost all dictionaries, it contains a intended yet distinct diversion. Its source is t abundant recognition of the trouble in store for t speaking races when they cross the Atlantic. They selves amongst English-speaking people; but th English these speak differing so curiously from the E have been diligently learning beforehand that they Whether in New York, Boston, Washington, or West," everywhere they encounter patches of talk all their book-lessons to the winds. They will hear of sherry-vallies, frough, vendue, lass; of a cow-lass a polliwog, a boss, a scalawag. What are they, the were not in the "Englisch per Dampf" which the emigrant studied so hopefully; not in "Englische K zu Dreien"; not in "Der perfekte Engländer."

The friendly Dictionary-maker solves each diffi order. Frough, they are told, is spongy, crumbling; is an auction; sherry-vallies are leathern over-bress is a huge serpent; a boss is a strong man; a cow right of pasture; a polliwog is a tadpole; a school a scalawag is a vulgar fellow. Germans, also, m the States that they themselves must absquatulate, must tuck on, must shut their clam-shells, must bl teeter-tawter, give so-and-so the mitten, give give him a su-marquee, they giving it full-chisel be told that they have seen the elephant, have the wrong tree, are catawamptiously chawed up.
explained by the pitiful lexicographer. Some of pretations may be familiar; but we may remark t a man the mitten is to reject him; to give him scold; a su-marquee is a corruption of the Fr marqué"; and to give either of these full-chisel immediately. To see the elephant (a phrase wh alternative in to shoot one's grandmother) is to be bark up the wrong tree is to miss what one tried fo chawing up of a person catawamptiously is anot expressing the meaning given for the German verb " namely, as the author says in an overflow of expl dish him, swamp him, knock him into a cocked hat.

The German buyers of the Dictionary need doubt as to the kind of information here supplie second page, at the foot of the "Abkürzungen" (Ab
we are told "Amerikanismen sind mit schräg gedruckt"—Americanisms are written in slant That is so. Freely sown in the columns of upright t the "oblique letters," otherwise italics. Guided b traveller need not be in despair if asked to tak apple-butter, Albany-beef, burgoo, hockey; or, i draught of switchel, sling, black-strap, calibogus, h pupelo. Does he not learn that "succotash" is a d and maize, apple-butter is cider-sauce, Albany-beef burgoo is a preparation of oatmeal, hockey is a pu of the drinks he is told that switchel is water and sling has rum added to the switchel; that black-stra sugared; pupelo, apple-brandy; calibogus, rum mobee, a drink consumed by the West Indian negro glass of brandy, pure. This, of course, does not foods and drinks honoured with italics. There is n on to exhaustion, yet a few more may be called. T instance, noodle-soup—that is vermicelli. There is c is pork and fish, with onions. Cork-juice is anoth for brandy. Flap-jack is a pancake—an interest from the English of the Primitive Fathers. Shakesp word, and Taylor, the Water-Poet, wrote of it largel Should unintelligible epithets of abuse be u showered upon a German, he will no doubt take plea fully consulting his Dictionary as to their meanin

Perhaps our Teutonic friend will be filled with wonder at being invited to a cantleoy. It is only a kind of dance, and he may find callithumpians—unskilled noise like marrow-bones and cleavers—to dance to. If in his surprise he uses the exclamation Gaumy! he is directed to pronounce it "gŏm'ui." Should he be turned out from the cantleoy (or from anywhere), then "It's a gone goose with him," i.e., he can never go there any more. Should he, on the other hand, wish to stay a long while, he is to call the long while a greatle; but he may be hurried off, malgré lui, because a fellow-countryman may assure him, in his own tongue "Nun ist der Tanz aus," stated to mean, The jig is up. But the period will inevitably come when he and all the rest of the company must make themselves scarce (in "oblique lettering"), otherwise scarce, and go away—or absquatulate. The kindly aim of the Dictionary-maker is to teach the Germans how to turn their own language into these curious Transatlantic phrases. Thus, their word "Landstreicher," besides the gloss sufficient for ordinary requirements, of a vagabond or vagrant, gets the "Amurricanism," in its proper italics, of a shack. So "Lärm," after the gloss of bustle, noise, gets tomse, hellabaloo.

But this useful little work is no common Dictionary of Slang, it has a legitimate end. There is "coster" talk heard in these British Isles as well as in the United States; and there are other varieties of distorted and repellent English—it is enough to call one variety Kipl-English—to be heard in these British Isles. But it has no recognition by dictionary-users; and to consider it necessary to teach it to foreigners landing on these shores, and about to mix with cultivated people, would be absurd. Why, therefore, is it less absurd to make a lesson of it for foreigners settling in the United States, where, just as certainly, it would not be heard amongst the refined and highly-trained? Perhaps it is because the very way of the birth of a language may here be traced, or rather that the evolution out of an old language of an almost unrecognizable new language is seen in its actual period of gestation. Chaucer once wrote of a blissful marriage—

> O flesh they ben, and o flesh, as I gesse,
> Hath but on herte in wele and in distresse.

Now, to evoke response from most Englishmen, this must be translated—

> One flesh they be, and one flesh, as I guess,
> Has but one heart, in welfare and distress.

The lines are identical, yet each is disguised to the other. Philologists know how recurrent tides of new speech sweep over extinct speech—know how they cannot keep the language-wheel from its perpetual turning. Perhaps these "Amurricanisms" are slowly advancing with an overwhelming gradual flood. Give them two centuries, and one shudders to think of the result. But we have only dealt here with stray words out of stray volumes. Scrumptious, blusteration, dunderhead, slick, mizzle, shanook, hunt, wamble-cropped, loafer, diggings, chore. Are these Americanisms; are they to be the common property of the States and of ourselves? The language-caldron is on the fire; as ingredient after ingredient is added, each, now or later, appears heterogeneous. Pick sweet-smelling herbs, then, for distribution. Fling in berries ruddier than the cherry, and do not give passage to offal.

JENNETT HUMPHREYS.

THE DRAMA.

"THE TWIN SISTER"—"FROCKS AND FRILLS."

A young wife, neglected by her husband, hits upon a plan of regaining his love. She has a twin-sister, the image of herself in form, but of a temperament more sprightly and coquettish. Pretending to depart on a journey, she returns to the household in the disguise of her sister and deliberately lays siege to the turned from the German of Herr Fulda into bl Louis N. Parker for the Duke of York's Thea cannot be a modern story; its incidents are n matter-of-fact twentieth century. And, ev possible, they would not be represented, be moral. But these objections are diminished in action is removed to the fifteenth century a wear Masaccio costumes designed by Mr. By talk is in blank verse, even though it is the r occasionally slangy blank verse of Mr. Louis in an atmosphere of sheer fantasy the a Macaulay, as against Leigh Hunt and Charles admit as an excuse for the Restoration dr moral writ does not run and disguises are eve

a tinge of hair-dye suffices to prevent husband their own wives. In brief, The Twin Sister Boccaccio or a "Facetious Night" of Strapar Tale" of Bandello transported to the stage.

But the worst of this atmosphere is t transferred in its purity from printed page to the actors in the story are left to the reader can let them go without close scrutiny i belief. Seen on the stage as flesh-and-blood p sarily give rise to misgiving in the spectator.
way, brought the same objection against perf
summer Night's Dream:—"The imagination qualify the actual impressions of the senses.
to the eye is not to be got rid of by explanati are not incredible, but fairies six feet hig
The boards of a theatre and the regions of same thing.") The impossibilities of the act pass, though I suspect there are many worthy who wonder how this man whom they see be person of Mr. H. B. Irving, can be such a foo his own wife. But it is more difficult to avoid Lorenzo's rich fifteenth-century robes do fact that he is a very poor creature, nor Giu beauty the fact that her stratagem, her desi love by the very act which proves it not wo say the least of it, unwomanly. Hence a c sympathy in the spectator for Giuditta and a for Lorenzo. Further, there is the disquieting whole trick is a futility; it is laboriously gain chimney when the door is wide open. For Giuditta calls herself Renata that she rekind love; it is because she takes more pains to did she not try this simple expedient in her moral is that cynical one which some modern have openly inculcated and which they call l mariage. These misgivings arise because Herr a fantastic theme too seriously. If the play —as Shakespeare, for instance, assuredly wou
—wholly on the comic plane, as some Comedy Padnan Night's Dream, the spectator would to take it in a purely Pickwickian sense.
has gone for passion, strong and hot; and w in at the O.P. entrance fantasy flies out And so, oddly enough, it happens that Mr.
makes his greatest success in a scene wh to have been there—a scene of fierce pass a headlong force and absolute sincerity pected in him. Miss Lily Brayton is swe Giuditta-Renata.

On March 20, 1858, MM. Eugène Scribe an produced Les Doigts de Fée at the Théâtre plays were just then becoming a French f
impulsion of Dumas fils—it was the year o (Gymnase, January 16)—and in this play Scri that "Todgers's could do it when it liked," a the inventor of Scribism, of theatrical plot for tackle a thesis with the best of them. It was thèse philosophique et sociale, la réhabilita demonstrating a thesis; but the noteworthy fact is that the task was attempted. The joke is that the play has been adapted by Mr. Sydney Grundy for the Haymarket, under the title of Frocks and Frills, in a day when Scribe's thesis has long ceased to need demonstration, inasmuch as a Bond-street bonnetshop is now a recognized career for the most aristocratic of dames. Of course Mr. Grundy has had the sense to get rid of the pompous moralizing, though he cannot get rid of the belated, unreal air in the objections of his noble Athelstan family to acknowledging a cousin who keeps a milliner's shop. Scribe's artificial story is left intact, and gives very little opportunity for the players; such chances as there are, however, are used to full advantage by Miss Grace Lane (from the Kendal company) as the heroine, by Mr. Allan Aynesworth as a sentimental duke, by Mr. Cyril Maude as a family friend with a stutter, and by Misses Ellis Jeffreys and Lottie Venne as two fashionable ladies, rival customers of the couturière. The fact is, Frocks and Frills very loyally bears out its title; the chief attraction is neither the play nor the players but the array of gowns provided by famous West-end tradespeople, to whom strict credit is (on this occasion very properly) given in the programme. The "trying-on" scene at a Mayfair show-room in the third act is sure to send all the ladies into ecstasies; nor will their men-folk miss the opportunity of witnessing on the stage what they are not permitted to see off it. One has the pleasing sense of profaning the mysteries of the Bona Dea without indiscretion.

A. B. WALKLEY.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

CORONATION RECORDS.

English Coronation Records. By Leopold G. Wickham Legg, B.A. (Constable. 31s. 6d. n.)

Special occasions produce special books. Such works are frequently characterized by slovenly haste and careless compilation; but in this book faults of this description are conspicuous by their absence. Higher praise can hardly be given to everything pertaining to this handsome volume than to say that it is worthy of the great historical ceremonies that it chronicles. This is no mere olla podrida of Coronation anecdotes and legends, but a carefully edited and annotated collection of records bearing on English Coronations from pre-Conquest times to those of Queen Victoria.

Moreover, Mr. Legg has prefixed to these records an evenly-balanced and clearly-expressed introduction of some hundred pages. It is difficult to conceive that anything yet remains to be told with respect to the hallowing of our Kings that is worth the telling. From the days of Egbert's Pontifical down to the order for the crowning of Victoria the Coronation Service has, in all essential points, remained the same. The Prince is anointed and then invested as King with the ornaments and insignia of regal rank; whilst he, on his part, binds himself by solemn promises as to the nature of his rule. Round these three integral points of the Coronation certain fixed rites have become crystallized, and it is not a little remarkable to note to what a small degree these rites, or the expression of them in words, have changed during upwards of ten centuries, notwithstanding frequent interruptions in dynastic succession. From 1307 to 1685, in spite of civil wars and religious upheavals, the service remained precisely the same. With James II. came a serious change; in consequence of that Monarch being under the Roman obedience the Holy Communion, which had hitherto office, but personæ mixtæ, as Lindwood has it, part character of clerks as well as laymen. In a celebra Grosseteste to Henry III., the Bishop points out the in the unction of a King a sacramental conveyance fold gifts of the Holy Spirit. The commentary sha English Coronation ceremony explains the striki that exists between the setting apart of a Bishop an which is well brought out in detail by Mr. Legg.

The evolution of the Coronation Oath is a mu interest. From the eighth century to the crowning (inclusive) the King made a solemn promise to precepts—to preserve true peace at all times toward of God and all Christian people, to forbid rapa iniquities to all degrees, and to observe equity and judgments. Our subsequent Kings, from Edwar wards, have taken the oath in a different form, for in Regalis" of the fourteenth century it becomes a tions which the Archbishop puts to the King—a form ever since retained. The first of the four questions bishop was whether the King was willing to keep customs of England, and especially the laws of Henry VIII., with an inborn distaste for the restra of the Coronation Oath, endeavoured to effect a change, and had a new draft prepared with a variety tions. Even this, in its vagueness, did not satisfy Prince, and with his own hand he made various co in the direction of nullifying any binding obli original of this corrected draft is among the Cotton British Museum, and a facsimile of it forms one of t interesting illustrations of this volume. Henry V however, at that time get his way, and the old form his Coronation. It is somewhat ominous to find tha tion in the direction of Henry VIII.'s wishes di into the oath taken by Charles II. The policy of Church matters necessitated a change in the Monar tions, and the opportunity was taken of introdu levelled against absolute government, the Sove required to govern according to the statutes of Par the Coronation of Queen Anne it was ordered that should take the long oath against transubstantiat for office-holders in the previous reign. This declar which there has been so much recent contentio whatever of the Coronation Service proper, and has been read by the Sovereign in the House of Lords.

Valuable and interesting as the great histori Service is, we quite agree with Mr. Legg that it d to any great excellence from a literary point of v the editor of these records writes with much s them:—

> The prayers are long, rambling composition a wealth of Old Testament illustrations that have disgraced one of Scott's Covenanters, inter truculent allusions to heretics. And the dread and injustice on the part of the King is very seems as if the writer of the prayers was not sati oath was efficacious in preventing either of these and that he was determined by means of the prayer to the King the excellency of peace and justice, same time invoking the aid of Heaven to keep these virtues.

from the "Liber Regalis," which lays down that the King shall be served clothed in a long tunic and over it a regal pall, and supposes they must be the very vestments in which he was crowned. But the words he cites convey no such meaning; they simply supply burial in distinctively Royal robes, such as were found round the remains of Edward I. when his tomb was so shamelessly desecrated by the Society of Antiquaries in 1786. The various documents so generously supplied in this volume establish the fact that the actual Coronation robes of the Confessor were used at the time of the crowning by a long line of his successors.

The frontispiece to the book is a coloured facsimile of a fourteenth-century illumination of a Coronation from a Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, manuscript. Cumulative argument places it beyond doubt that this is a picture of the crowning of Edward II., and it would have been better thus to letter it. The comparative dinginess of the regal pall over the King's shoulders, as compared with the scarlet copes and clearly defined embroidery of the vestments of the other figures is thus explained. The reversed pall of the Confessor was even then dulled by age: in the time of the Commonwealth, when the old regalia were destroyed, it had become "liver-coloured."

The introduction deals not only with the actual order of the Coronation, but with all the officers and various quaint services. In short, there is no subject bearing directly or indirectly on English Coronations upon which authoritative statements are lacking. The volume is a model of historic completeness. Mr. St. John Hope contributes a useful and learned note on the Cap of Maintenance, or Cap of Estate, as used not only by Kings and Queens, but by peers and peeresses at the time of a Coronation. His plea that the ladies' coronets should be made to encircle the head, according to old use, and thus grace the wearer, instead of being of diminutive size attached to a red velvet bag, and perched up on a bunch of hair on the summit of the crown, is not only historically correct but its comeliness can be established by reference to old pictures and still older effigies. Nevertheless, the Hanoverian innovation in Coronation headgear will probably prevail next June.

The typography and illustrations of this fine volume are worthy of all praise, but the old English lettering on the back of the cover is a mistake; it is almost illegible, and if clear printing is wanted anywhere, it is on the back of a book as it stands in the shelves, so that it may be readily distinguished from its fellows.

LITERATURE IN THE REFORMATION ERA.

The Earlier Renaissance. (Periods of European Literature.) By George Saintsbury. (Blackwood. 5s. n.)

The literary period with which this volume deals (1500-1560) was not rich in original work, but was mainly one of preparation for great achievement in the future. Professor Saintsbury regards it as the school-time of the vernacular languages and literatures; and he thus sums up the gains of the age in the various departments of belles lettres:—

> It laid the keel of almost every kind of modern literature (including the essay in fact if not in name) except the regular prose novel, and made the advent of that practically certain. It very nearly finished the stage of apprenticeship further illustration of this. Its title, by t admission, is in regard to Italy "a trunk and conf Yet he considers that the period is "undoubtedly Renaissance in general European literature."

thinking that the passage from Matthew Arnol be accepted as the motto of the series, is of i this contention. If Europe can be regarded and spiritual purposes as one great confede joint action and working to a common result,' titles allotted to the several periods should at le to all the principal countries within each perio Impossible, it might be plausibly urged that employed should be such as to describe the mor than the more backward members of the c
consequently that the period under notice w styled "the Later" than "The Earlier Renaiss any rate pre-eminently the era of the Refo cannot see why that title should not be at le the purely chronological titles which have bee of the other periods.

In his preface Professor Saintsbury think some of his former critics that the series intended to supply text-books for educational rather," he says, "an attempt to do, with the e material" now available, "what Hallam did wi smaller resources at his disposal." A comparis with Hallam's chapters upon the same peri Professor Saintsbury has approached his task i different from his predecessor. Hallam never milieu in which the writers of a period had to w period especially, without introducing m biographical detail, he has constantly in view t movement, which was the dominant note conformity with this principle his central who occupies four times as much space as Ar writer. Professor Saintsbury dismisses Eras while he devotes thirty to Ariosto and n Rabelais. This disproportionate treatment m be due to a prejudice against original writi Hallam did not share. In one place Professo calls Latin writing "a kind of Helotry," thou does it fuller justice. But in reality the di partly from his preference for the critical ov method, partly from the fact that he finds mor he calls "the literature of power" than in that Whole fields of research, which Hallam at those of science, theology, mental and mora jurisprudence—are left untouched by Professor If his work gains thereby in intensity and in it suffers a corresponding loss in breadth completeness. We think that a literary histo all, be a history of Letters rather than a critical specimens, and that even in handling a period notice, which was not conspicuous for origin should be found for many names which have re

Of course, the problem of space would hav the sacrifice of much critical disquisition; an critic so accomplished as Professor Saints involve some loss. His criticism is always sti result of first-hand study; but like other c limitations. He is thoroughly at home in disc prose fiction, yet his treatment of the graver k and English literature was the "Italianation," as the Elizabethans termed it, of both countries through the gradual assimilation of Renaissance culture; and the twin-poets Wyatt and Surrey were close followers of Italian models. Professor Saintsbury's generous appreciation of the work done by the compilers of the English Liturgy is one of the best passages in the book, although in his selection of parts for special praise he includes at least one collect which is the work of Laud. In English prose the period is one of steady and continuous improvement; and if the Professor hardly does justice to honest Latimer, he gives an adequate account of Ascham and the educational reformers. He closes with a chapter on the revival of criticism in Italy, which anticipates the next instalment of his larger work. With much that he says about the earliest Renaissance criticism we are unable to agree; but he is doubtless right in insisting on the far-reaching influence of the Italian critics of the sixteenth century upon later times.

We cannot part with Professor Saintsbury without entering a mild protest against some of those sallies of wit with which he is apt to regale his readers. His jocosity is not in this book quite so insistent and ubiquitous as it is in the "History of Criticism," but it has the same disagreeably undignified effect. He speaks with some scorn of the "rather infantine punning" in which John Heywood indulges; but even the most childish effort of the latter could hardly be worse than "Secundus is left without another second," or his remark, in contrasting Ariosto with his erotic brother-poets, that though "his Venus may have too much of Pandemos, she has nothing of Pandemonism." Even if the volume be not an educational textbook, there is no reason why the unlearned should be taught that such a word as "Quadrilogue" is possible, or that the term "Utraquist" means a writer who employs both Latin and the vernacular. In deploring the absence from his period of the highest kind of charm, he explains that the northern countries were "too full of a Jack-Horner-like sense of their own good-boyishness and thorough desert of all possible plums to develop this supreme quality." It would be well if so great a judge of literary expression could keep in mind a warning of his own, that a good plain style, when it descends to this kind of thing, comes perilously near to a bad plain style.

FRENCH FURNITURE AND DECORATION.

French Furniture and Decoration in the Eighteenth Century. By Lady Dilke. (George Bell and Sons. 30s. n.)

As Lady Dilke proceeds with her task, now within sight of its completion, two things happen. She becomes, by reason of each change of subject, a little less popular, and, with each fresh volume, she becomes a little more excellent. The first of her three books—there are to be four altogether—dealt with the French Eighteenth Century Painters. It dealt, therefore, in great measure, with known names; and it expressed commonsense opinion. The second, dealing with Sculptors and with Architects, could count only on a diminished public—at all events, on a diminished public that was really cognisant of the matter in hand. Here Lady Dilke became more original, as well as more instructive. With the fourth volume, which is to be on Draughtsmen and Engravers, she will find again, in those who read her, something more of familiarity with her theme. But, meanwhile, writing of French Furniture and Decoration (notwithstanding the existence of Hertford-house Jones Collection)—comes in Lady Dilke, more than o and sagacious, more than ever an acceptable m theme.

Even a brief review should make it quite plain perhaps the best service it can render—that covers her ample, almost bafflingly extensi astonishingly well. She is so saturated with kno subject that upon any given artificer she can be t being slight. Her volume is an instance not only of e science, but of encyclopædic compression. Full of argument about facts, and of the clear expressi opinion—with which we are by no means always in it is yet now and then a little too difficult to progress with her page, so burdened is it with foot it is difficult to disregard. The only thing is to that at the first reading one will discard them alto only later take them up—to have so many a fresh trai suggested by them. As to the text, differences of o may well be as to conclusions Lady Dilke arrives at; be hard to point out what feature of a style she ha notice, or what important practitioner of an applic tive art she has forgotten to name. She discusses th almost as exhaustively as Paris; with equal patience in the balance the men of the Regency, the men of th days of Louis Quinze, the men of the days of Louis th One great worker in iron whose work is to be see and practically at Nancy alone, she does full justice Jean Lamour, whose wonderful gilt grilles connect th buildings of the Place Stanilas which were the work o pupil, the great architect, Héré. Lady Dilke appre scarcely sufficiently, we think—but the point is now Je We are reminded that though Lamour's iron gates and la railings are still abundantly gilded, the effect at pre —owing to the uniform tint of the gold—is not qui was when the work was first beheld, in the days of " Stanislas." Tasteful, of course, but by no means o in our opinion, are the little balconies Lady Dilke in Jean Lamour's own house, behind that church of S which was once the Cathedral.

To turn to one other matter discussed in a book wh page offers opportunities for comment—since it treat as well as Chantilly, Potsdam as well as the Hotel and deals with clocks as well as with cabinets, with as well as with the Gobelins—we may say that Lady I excellent brief chapter on Vernis-Martin, the taste one member of the Martin family perfected. No lar remains; but there are painted plaques—small, admir —and étuis shining still with the rich green ver most, and that is most justly, prized. The collector with the best small examples of the enamels of Batt selves the work of good French artists—these Ve étuis accord well.

HERALDRY.

Some Feudal Coats of Arms. By Joseph Foster, Oxon. (James Parker and Co. 63s. n.)

Mr. Foster has done most useful work in the p industrious compiler of the many volumes of th Oxonienses. He has also obtained well-merited credit volumes of his "British Peerage and Baronetage convenient or well-judged plan for drawing attention to the projected volumes to bind up twenty-six pages, paged consecutively with the rest of the work, of specimen sheets of the forthcoming books.

The amount of illustrations in this great book is almost bewildering. There are upwards of 2,000 zinco etchings from the Bayeux tapestry, Greek vases, seals, tiles, effigies, brasses, and heraldic rolls, as well as some chart pedigrees. They vary a good deal in quality; the reproductions of shields from the rolls and other sources are of true value, but we doubt either the use or attraction of including a good many copies of debased effigy drawings. The illustrations of heraldic seals, which Mr. Foster has brought together from old seventeenth-century drawings, recall no shadow of the original seals, and are useless either for the antiquary or the artist.

The preface opens with a spirited attack on "Armorial Families," the well-known volume, first issued in 1895, which has given rise to so much heraldic controversy. Though coming rather late in the day, Mr. Foster's share in the affray proves him to be a vigorous assailant. The blows at the weak places in his opponent's armour are planted with rare skill, and he delivers several deadly thrusts at the author of that work, which so unduly exalted the power and status and learning of the College of Arms. Mr. Foster states that it was the issue of the book in question which led him to begin the long-cherished design of producing an Armorial which should give the authority for each coat. That Mr. Foster is able to produce an elaborate work of this character without going near any of the official heralds is in itself a strong proof of the correctness of the charge that he makes against former heralds of "having sold practically all their ancient manuscripts or copies of them." It has long been known to working genealogists and heraldic students that the Harleian MSS. of the British Museum are just as valuable as the visitations stored in Queen Victoria-street, and in some cases more so, but it has been left to Mr. Foster to assert this boldly, and to prove it by what he has already published. His plan, in this volume and its successors, is to give a trustworthy account of the arms of those families who have borne them since feudal times, long anterior to any Heralds' College, by ancient grant or other right heraldic—and, finally, by an established user of three generations, giving them, as in Ireland, a prescriptive ownership so long as it does not conflict with any established rights.

This volume on feudal coats of arms is primarily a collection, from the heraldic rolls, of the names and personal insignia displayed on their banners or vestments of the combatants at Falkirk, 1298, at Carlaverock, 1300, at Boroughbridge, 1322, at Calais, 1345-48, at Rouen, 1418, and at the tournaments of Dunstable in 1308 and 1334. With these have been incorporated names and blazons from some later heraldic rolls, concluding with the Arundel or Military Roll, which was emblazoned time, Henry VI. Excellent as all this is up to a certain point, and valuable as it is to have the true references so laboriously collected to thousands of early insignia, it is nevertheless a great pity that Mr. Foster should not have adopted a more thorough system. That which he has produced is by no means exhaustive, and the whole subject has not been planned in the spirit of a student of the archæology of heraldry. Irrespective of a certain lack of digestion about the material here so lavishly and confusedly produced, it is plain that certain authorities have been ignored. It is a pity that Mr. Foster's justifiable indignation with "Armorial Families," which has been distinctly repudiated by one of the most capable heralds of the College of Arms, has volume. There is no trace in these page consulted, or at all events used, the great possession of the Society of Antiquaries, whic consent of students, regarded as by far th important of its class.

Mr. Foster, both in his preface and introd some rather unworthy sneers at those who blazon to the simplicity and common se language, and spells the English word " as his own contribution to the archæolog Though so vigorous against the modern her tions, he is thoroughly in accord, contra students of early rolls, with the modern a blazon.

There are three great shields given wh achievement of the 15th Duke of Norfolk engraved. The first of these 209 coats of t that of Howard, with the augmentation gra the battle of Flodden to the first Duke et h Foster, by giving this coat with the augmen Mr. J. H. Round's recent assertion (wh unassailable) that this honourable addition t being granted to heirs and not in tail male, by the present Duke, and that Lords Mow alone entitled to it.

An interesting pedigree of Sir Christoph granted by Garter King of Arms in 159 possession of the Earl of Winchilsea, is giv heraldic achievement. Is Mr. Foster aw printed letters that throw some little sus nexion of the Lord Chancellor with the senio of the Hattons? Sir Christopher ought no Holdenby Hall, but of Holdenby House.

It is much to be wished that higher prais this olla podrida of early English heraldry; faults and omissions it has a distinct valu both heraldry and genealogy.

In his FLORENTINE HERALDRY: A SUPPLEM BOOKS (Dean, 10s. 6d.), Mr. Howel Wills gives arms borne by the leading families in Florence together with a glossary of terms and an intr how Italian differs from English heraldry. As heraldry the book is both learned and compl know why Mr. Wills tells us nothing about major and minor guilds. These shields are in the Church of Or San Michele, and possi do not here need supplementing; yet a littl an expert as to the origin of these shields a adoption would, if obtainable, have been of g useful appendix the author gives a descrip "cerchi" or residential circuits within the roughly to grades in the nobility. It seem should not have been illustrated by a map far as the residences are known, to whic important families belonged.

ABOUT THE WOR

In the new issue of that series of books awkwardly entitled "Stanford's Compendium men have made scientific expeditions into Latin America whereby facts have been brought to light which profoundly modify "the views hitherto prevailing on such questions as the tectonic constitution, both of Central and South America, the West Indian orographic systems, the distribution of plants and animals over the whole area, the cradle and primitive migrations of Caribs and Arawaks" not to mention the ethnical relations of Toltecs, Aztecs, and Mayas, and other similarly important matters. Mr. Keane has dealt thoroughly with all these subjects, and has not neglected to summarize recent political or economic changes. Among the thirteen excellent maps we have special praise for the valuable "Ethnological and Philological Map of South America," but some of the illustrations are poor or indistinct.

The wide range of Mr. Keane's scholarship is seen to great advantage in his treatment of the physical and biological relations of South America. He points out the remarkable absence of islands which can be properly regarded as geographical dependencies of South America. On the fauna it is interesting to note that

> From the region that has enriched civilization with so many valuable economic plants, the Old World has obtained not a single useful animal. The aborigines themselves had domesticated the llama (which, like its Asiatic congener, was endowed with a somewhat morbid temperament, rendering it useless for the rough work of cultured peoples in other lands), and the alpaca, guinea-pig, and alco, all, however, confined to the limits of the Peruvian Empire. There are many indigenous forms, some, like the tapir, peccari, jaguar, spectacled bear, puma, cayman, rhea ("ostrich"), and several of the lower anthropoid apes, allied to the corresponding genera or orders in the Eastern Hemisphere, and often presenting much interest to naturalists. But all these and the many other native species —sloth, vampire, ant-eater, agouti, tree-porcupine, viscacha, anaconda, toucan, humming-bird, and others—are of little or no economic use.

The section which deals with Venezuela is perhaps that which will most attract English readers. The account of the frontier question is concise and accurate, and we like the "local colour" of the descriptive passages.

The account of Peru is crammed with practical and picturesque details. Witness the pregnant passage—

> Despite the relatively moderate mean temperature all the low-lying coast-lands are exposed to the ravages of yellow fever. Here also the creoles, or whites of pure Spanish stock, appear to be scarcely yet acclimatized. There is little if any natural increase, owing to the excessive mortality of the children, who are subject to convulsions and to the so-called "seven-days' sickness," which attacks new-born infants and is always fatal. Ague, dysentery, and liver affections also prevail in the seaboard, and typhus and typhoid fever in the montaña, while the uplands suffer especially from the somewhat mysterious soroche. This strange disorder, which is due to the rarefaction of the atmosphere at great elevations, assumes different forms in different places, but is never fatal.

The Bolivian section of Mr. Keane's book draws special attention to the grand and varied aspects of Illimani, the mountain which Sir Martin Conway succeeded in perfectly ascending in 1898. In the account of Chile we are glad to be reminded of the fact that large numbers of the inhabitants of Valparaiso, of Spanish descent, have learned to speak English with fluency and correctness; the rapid spread of what may be called commercial English in South America is probable as well as desirable. The description of Santiago is admirable, and should draw the eyes of English travellers to this city of quaint Spanish houses, set in a magnificent semi-circle of Alpine scenery. Chile should be dear to the heart of English education-supposed to be absent, is now believed to be ... southern sandstone rocks, but apparently at ... the surface.

Although this book is not so much intend... investors as for travellers, the former may rea... lines many useful warnings, by which they will do ...

Of the "Historical Geography of the Brit... written by Mr. Lucas of the Colonial Office, ... France (Clarendon Press, 6s.) is an excellent vol... with an exhaustive index, and four useful maps... latter is a bold map of the waterways of New Engla... and Central Canada, which is sure to be grea... students of early "Americana." Mr. Lucas... "European discoverers in North America to ... Sixteenth Century" is almost wholly admirable, ... the finishing touches of an ethnological kind whi... been given by a Keane or a Wallace. The love... conspicuous throughout all the chapters of Mr. L... We like his view of "the great successes to b... France" in the way of colonization, and congratul... weighty series of paragraphs comparing the metho... of English and French colonization in North Ame... Mr. Lucas is inclined to overrate the amount of wisd... the French. He points out most clearly that Champ... settled at Quebec when he played third to th... Algonquins by joining them in an attack upon the ... also well to show plainly that the one object of the... trade, and that they profited more by paying a low ... things than they would have done by open land-gr... Lucas is not afraid, in days when it is the fashion ... the Jesuits, to assert that the members of the Or... Canada were essentially "the champions of excl... the enemies of freedom." Again, he is right when... the Huguenots were the best of the French trade... to be capable, enterprising, and resolute pioneers ... colonization.

Apart from the large numbers of persons who... literary standing compels them to acquire this bo... volume will among general readers tend to incre... of intelligent Imperialists.

A Guide to Italy (10s. n.) is the first v... series of Guides to be published by Messrs. Mac... aim of the book is certainly ambitious. It is obvio... to describe Italy at all adequately within the co... 350 pages, especially as nearly 100 pages are de... alone. The Eternal City is, however, so well ... will quarrel with this lack of proportion. At ... for a guide which professes to deal with ... Italy it is strange to find that Sicily is altog... Within its limits, it is a good and reliable work... Perhaps none is so well adapted for the ordinary ... and especially for the American determined upon ... whole of Italy in a month, as it gives a sufficiency ... about the great tourist centres—Rome, Florenc... A comparison with the standard guides of Baedeke... is perhaps inevitable. It certainly avoids the mas... meticulous detail and the over-conscientious ... places which ninety-nine out of a hundred travelle... Baedeker, however, though certainly designed too... lines of a gazetteer, yet gives an adequate amou... information on all the great cities frequented ...

Accuracy is, no doubt, the one pre-eminent virtue of a guide-book, and in this respect Macmillan's new enterprise can hold its own with its older rivals. Indeed, we have only come across two serious errors. An odd one occurs in the description of India, when it is stated that at the earthquake at Casamicciola (population 3,200) in 1883 6,000 persons lost their lives! The writer probably means were rendered homeless. Then in the Rome section the fable that the Vatican has 10,000 rooms is perpetuated. The letterpress is, we believe, in the main original—though the editors expressly disarm any criticism under this head by avowing that a certain similarity in phraseology to that of the standard guides is to some extent inevitable, but the general arrangement is distinctly reminiscent of Appleton's.

The liberal supply of excellent maps is one of the best features of the book. Indeed, even travellers who know their Italy might feel inclined to buy the book for the maps alone. There are no less than forty maps and plans, all designed specially for the guide. They are clearly engraved, not crowded with unnecessary names, and embody the most recent cartographical information. Indeed, the closest inspection has only revealed one error of any moment—that in which the course of the railway, which for the last fifteen years or so has been in progress from Cuneo to the coast, is marked as if it were to be continued by tunnels through the mountains to the east of the Roya Valley—the natural highway, but not available owing to a portion being on French soil. This route has been abandoned by the Government. But it is only fair to mention that the same error is to be found in the Twentieth Century Atlas (though this is to be corrected in the next edition). Besides the very insertion of this line (if premature) testifies to the praiseworthy ambition of the editors to be as up to date as possible in the maps.

The Foundation of British East Africa, by Dr. J. W. Gregory (Horace Marshall, 6s. n.), is a convenient compendium of the available information concerning this new British possession. It begins with physical geography, and proceeds to a history of East African exploration, bringing out the interesting fact that the first half of the nineteenth century is the period when European ignorance of the geography of Central Africa reached its climax, and that the earlier travellers whose reports were dismissed as fabulous had acquired a very considerable knowledge of the Dark Continent. The discoveries of such travellers as Krapf, Rebmann, Burton, Speke, Grant, and Sir Samuel Baker are related at sufficient length. There follows a full account of the religious wars which raged at the time when General, then Captain, Lugard administered the dependency; and there is a chapter which guardedly predicts the future. Dr. Gregory implores the missionaries and other adherents of the Anti-Slavery Society not to be in too great a hurry to abolish the "peculiar institution." He recommends the establishment of a special service open to competition as in the Indian Civil Service, and he maintains that the assistance of Arab chiefs should be sought in the commercial development of the country. Subject to these conditions he believes that East Africa will flourish. The book is well written, and has some good photographs and a really excellent map.

Mr. Francis Palmer, the author of Russian Life in Town and Country (Newnes, 3s. 6d. n.), has visited some parts of Russia and has acquired a great deal of information not always accurate. From internal evidence we are led to believe that can make sufficient noise to waken the dead. I Russia the watchman goes at stated intervals to stout piece of iron is suspended, this he hits wit hammer, thereby considerately suggesting to t wisdom of waiting "until these tyrannies have the whistling watchman is rare, it is the robbers v

We are puzzled to account for Mr. Palmer's cur —here is one which is quite incomprehensible. H
the great Russia behind the veil, however, the av Russian is most unreasonably ashamed. For him t interesting or picturesque in the old-world life s there. It is, in his eyes, merely a humiliating Russia, as a whole, is still far behind other Eur in social progress." Mr. Palmer does not appear there is no country in the world where people are their peasantry and their national customs than the ladies of the Court, whose regulation dress is tion of the costume of the peasant, to the red-shirted everybody worships the "people." It is not eve go to Russia to learn this, Russian literature teem of the peasantry and their customs. There is no m topic of conversation among all classes of Russ Russia behind the veil of which Mr. Palmer repr being ashamed. Russians have their faults, but s not one of them, and to be ashamed of one's count most contemptible form of snobbishness.

Mr. Palmer introduces us to a doctor who "hold at Court, and is highly decorated, one of the last has received giving him the Tchin, or rank of a g right to wear a uniform, although he is in no way the army." If this doctor had a position at probably in the Civil Service, and every bran Service has its uniform. The rank of general is h as well as soldiers in Russia, because in the military and civilian titles are tabulated, and the has its equivalent in the Civil Service. A general is his children can be educated in the Corps des various Ladies' Institutes which are under the p Empress. The decoration which carries with it a rank is known only to Mr. Palmer. In spe government and the Zemstvo he tells us that t of these councils is "extremely small," but that theless serve a useful purpose in counterac degree, the routine and red-tapism of the executive." In other words, Mr. Palmer, lackin gingerly walks round the functions of the Zemstvo excusable than his statement that the Russian na Iouldiéy. There is no such word as this in Russia Judea, but a Jew in Russian is either called Jid, first is of course identical with our Jew, the Ger
the French Juif, while Yevrey means Hebrew.
talks about a chateau, forgetting that the Russian is not a chateau, although, of course, the German shores of the Baltic have castles. He tells us th recently been a tendency to discard the curious style of the national Russian furniture in favour o that produced by modern dealers in Austria and reverse is the case. The old style of Russian woo embroidery, &c., has been largely applied to modern some very interesting and quaint designs have be in consequence.

Mr. Palmer, in fact, is far from accurate, and his style is not sufficiently entertaining to compe

ceased to be their mother tongue. The chapter on literature makes no mention of Vondel, generally esteemed the greatest of all the Dutch poets. The chapter on the position of women tells us nothing of the practice of marriage by proxy, whereby girls in Holland are enabled to land in Java or Sumatra or Borneo or Celebes as the duly-wedded wives of officers or merchants living in the Indies. The section on the Dutch Indies is, indeed, the most inadequate in the book. The abuses of the famous "culture system," introduced by Van den Bosch, are not brought into such clear relief as they should be. No one would gather from Mr. Hough's pages (what is nevertheless the fact) that this was a system of shamelessly exploiting the natives—many of whom emigrated and even committed suicide in order to escape the tyranny of their Dutch oppressors. The truth may be found in M. Charles Grad's article on colonization in "La Grande Encyclopédie." Moreover, only a portion of the truth is told concerning the relations of the Dutch emigrants with the native women, and the position of their half-caste children. The fact that well-to-do half-caste girls are continually sent to Europe to be educated at the same schools as the children of pure Dutch race, and are sought in marriage by officers in the Dutch army, is a feature of contemporary Dutch civilization which clashes strangely with English, and particularly with Anglo-Indian, ideas of the fitness of things, and ought, therefore, to have been emphasized. This said, however, we have done with fault-finding and can proceed to praise. The book is lightly and brightly written, and Mr. Hough has obviously a first-hand knowledge of his subject. Tourists who visit Holland should certainly make themselves acquainted with what he has to say about the country and the people.

PERSIAN POETS.

BIOGRAPHIES OF PERSIAN POETS IN THE TARIKH-I-GUZIDA. Translated by E. G. BROWNE. (Luzac. 2s.)

PERSIAN HISTORICAL TEXTS. Vol. I. The Tadhkiratu-sh-Shu'ara of Dawlatshah. Edited in Persian, with Prefaces and Indices, by E. G. BROWNE. (Luzac. 12s. n.)

Professor Browne of Cambridge has rendered a useful service in publishing Dawlatshah's "Memoirs of the Poets" and in translating Hamdu-llah's biographies from the Tarikh-i-Guzida. The latter work originally appeared in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society. To appreciate Persian character and realize something of the life and surroundings of the poets one ought always to have the same scholar's delightful "Year among the Persians" at one's side; it is a priceless commentary. Hamdu-llah, the Mustawfi or Auditor, wrote his history in 1330, and the chief merit of his "Biographies" is that they include extracts from poems, partly in dialectal Persian, which would otherwise be lost. So unfamiliar are some of these dialects, and so perverted and mutilated are the extracts by the pardonable ignorance of a succession of copyists, that even Mr. Browne is compelled to abandon the attempt to translate them. The extracts are the best part of Hamdu-llah's "Biographies," for the biographical data are exceedingly scanty. Ibn-Khatib of Ganja was the hero of a not very creditable love affair, but his triumphant retort to his defiant mistress, unfortunately, does not bear translating—though no Oriental would consider it coarse. Most of the poets, however, are merely described as living in "so and so's" reign and having written some "fine verses," of which the author then cites an example. Sometimes these examples cast a lurid light upon the poet's character. Jamalu-d-din Kashi writes—

I am a drunkard, a libertine, a spendthrift, and this character poems," of which one quatrain is quoted, but [illegible] FitzGerald. Firdawsi has five lines of biography [illegible] extract. The list ends with [illegible] poets, [illegible] (the lady whose Ibn-Khatib [illegible]) had a [illegible] butcher-boy, of all people in the world, and [illegible] feelings as follows:—

Every knife that he withdraws from the victim's [illegible] and takes in his sugar-sweet lips and teeth,
Were he to place it once again on the throat of [illegible] would renew its life for desire of the lips.

Some of the extracts, however, contain fine lines [illegible] Persian there is always a grace that eludes transl[illegible] latshah wrote a hundred and fifty years after the M[illegible] his "Memoirs of the Poets" has already been lith[illegible] Bombay, as well as extensively quoted by Sir [illegible] Ouseley. A really good edition, however, was wan[illegible] Mr. Browne has supplied as the first volume of w[illegible] to be a most valuable series of Persian Texts to [illegible] Messrs. Luzac. As the earliest systematic biogra[illegible] Persian poets Dawlatshah has his importance, though [illegible] early nor very accurate or critical; for he preserves [illegible] that have now vanished, and besides his discursive [illegible] the "anthology of poetical fragments" which [illegible] he throws in a good deal of incidental history a[illegible] anecdotes. Mr. Browne recommends the work [illegible] valuable and pleasant edition to the Persian studen[illegible] and we must agree with him that it forms an agre[illegible] duction to Persian poetic literature. Such portion[illegible] read are written in a good style, and the illustrati[illegible] are generally well chosen. Mr. Browne has, of [illegible] duced a scholarly text, based chiefly upon three [illegible] manuscripts, together with a fine codex belonging [illegible] E. Denison Ross, and collated in certain parts with [illegible] MSS. in the British Museum, India Office, Bodle[illegible] Society, and Bibliothèque Nationale. The manuscri[illegible] latshah's work are very numerous and it would [illegible] waste of labour to collate all that could be consul[illegible] indexes, of persons, places, and books, form an in[illegible] complement to this serviceable publication. W[illegible] projected series of Persian Texts will receive adequa[illegible] Editions of Persian authors are much neglected, and w[illegible] devote their time and learning to the "somewhat so[illegible] and mechanical work" (as Mr. Browne laments) [illegible] and collating such texts, the least that scholars a[illegible] can do is to give the results an encouraging welcome.

CLASSICAL.

THE AMHERST PAPYRI: Being an Account of the G[illegible] in the Collection of the Right Hon. Lord [illegible] Hackney. By B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt. II. FRAGMENTS AND DOCUMENTS OF THE PTOLEM[illegible] AND BYZANTINE PERIODS, with an Appendix [illegible] Additional Theological Fragments. (Frowde, an[illegible] £2 12s. 6d. n.)

The study of papyri is fast becoming a science i[illegible] we may congratulate ourselves that this country ha[illegible] lead in discovery, publication, and interpretation. [illegible] one knows more about the subject than the edi[illegible] present volume, whose earlier publications are too [illegible] to need mention here. Their work has been done [illegible] with all the care, accuracy, and success which we [illegible] them. Whether in transcription, illustration, or tr[illegible] careful examination has revealed no serious fault, al[illegible] of course, does not imply that they have solved ev[illegible] suggested. The relation of the Maccabean [illegible]

of Heraclas or the charming ode of Sappho from Oxyrhynchus. There is a tragic fragment, parts of fifteen lines, which may be by Æschylus, a bit of the Scyros of Euripides, with didascalia; a scrap of comedy, which contains a phrase quoted from Aristophanes and from Plato; and an epic fragment, of which no line is complete. There are the usual fragments of Homeric vulgate, a piece from the second Philippic, two columns of Isocrates' Demonicus, two columns of Babrius. In these there is little of interest, excepting the last, which proves that "some at least of the epimythia of the fables" are ancient. There is more interest in a portion of a commentary on Herodotus, otherwise unknown, by Aristarchus, which records a new reading, ἄμμνα for ἄωνα in Herod. I., 215, and quotes a new fragment of the Palamedes of Sophocles: οὐ χαλκὸν, οὐ σίδηρον ἀνήνυτα χρεών. There are also twenty columns of Scholia Minora on Homer, Od. xv., which are for the most part a glossary on the rarer words; these will be of some use in criticizing the text. Here a new explanation of ἥρωας as ἀγαθὸν is given (xv., 9). The writer apparently had not lines 113-119 in his text. There are, besides, part of a Homeric Lexicon, Scholia on Callimachus, and some grammatical fragments.

Amongst the Ptolemaic papyri is part of a roll of royal decrees, which resembles the well-known Revenue Papyrus; most of the pieces are official reports, receipts, records of loans, orders for payment, bankers' dockets, petitions, and the like. We get a good many side-lights on the times. Egyptians quarrel with Greeks and burn title-deeds; landowners move their boundaries forward by secret, are induced by "forcible persuasion" to confess, and are fined; law-court procedure is illustrated (as particularly in No. xxviii.), and the conditions of loans.

From the Roman period come imperial rescripts, decisions of prefects, records of judicial proceedings, petitions, leases, sales, and other official documents. The longest document is a copy of official correspondence relating to a piece of land (first century after Christ). A Report of Sitologi confirms Wilcken's account of the ἀλογοσταί, as given in his monumental "Ostraka." In the registration of inheritance, returns of flocks and cattle, census returns, and so forth, we see an elaborate political and social organization; it is curious to note another case proving that οἱ ἀπὸ γυμνασίου, those descended from a gymnasiarch, were exempt from poll-tax. The caravan-trade appears in great activity; there were more exports than imports, and the evidence of the tax-receipts is thus confirmed. The ἐξηγητής, otherwise known as a revenue official, appears as public trustee of orphans. New light is thrown on the government oil monopoly, which in the second century seems to have been no monopoly at all. The means of identifying persons are critical. Whole groups are recognized by their scars. Satabous, aged sixty-five, having a scar on his left eyebrow, and his son, having a scar in the middle of his forehead, acknowledge a receipt to eight men, who have scars on the left cheek little finger of the left hand, left shin, left knee, nose, or forehead; the two witnesses are also decorated with scars. The scars reappear in the next receipt, fifty years later. Another odd relic is a ticket for a voyage on a canal. There are also accounts and letters, the last showing some touches of human nature. The Byzantine section has the usual official documents; amongst the rest may be mentioned a case of assault and battery on a poor widow woman and some interesting letters. One letter concerns the property of a hospital. The Theological Fragments include part of the "Shepherd of Hermas," which is important as containing one piece from the missing Greek original. There are also a few lines from Exodus, Deuteronomy, and Proverbs.

As regards the palæographical value of the collection, it does not contain quite so beautiful as the best of the Petrie Papyri, there is a great variety of facsimiles ranging from the third century B.C. to the seventh after Christ. (Why do the editors use the curious phrase "7th century A.D."?) There is an early fragment of vellum; and No. cxlv. is "one of the very few fragments of a Byzantine hand to which an approximate date can be assigned with certainty," this being of the fourth or [illegible]

Homer during the period. There is, indeed, [illegible] ment of Homerica which has been untouched, [illegible] perhaps of the literary side. As those w[illegible] refused to recognize the consummate art of th[illegible] parts of the "Iliad," so the new school of ling[illegible] years ago held the field seemed blind to all [illegible] thematic and athematic forms. Nor have the [illegible] free from the usual prepossession of the s[illegible] amount of new knowledge which must be brou[illegible] is enormous; and we are much impressed wit[illegible] which Mr. Monro has done it. We shall [illegible] criticism; but, on the whole, the appendices t[illegible] the most satisfactory summing-up of the Ho[illegible] have yet seen.

First as to the notes. They are few, [illegible] good; scholar's notes, in fact, not the tiro[illegible] grammar and etymology Mr. Monro is speci[illegible] to be expected. Amongst others we may [illegible] on ἀνασσάτιρα, xvi., 366; but ὀλοκόμωρος (xiv., 2[illegible] nected with Celtic, and Mr. Monro need no[illegible] altogether. The notes on the text are r[illegible] weight given to literary considerations, espec[illegible] a specialist in language. On the principle of [illegible] ness, for instance, he condemns the last book [illegible] then reinforces his view with an array of lin[illegible] which quite settle the matter. In the appendi[illegible] the literary structure prove that the Telemach[illegible] original poem. New and often convincing i[illegible] suggested of many passages. It was liter[illegible] suggested to Mr. Monro that λυκάβας might [illegible] year (xiv., 161); and why should it not? W[illegible] many other cases of happy annotation. We d[illegible] satisfied with xviii., 100, where γέλῳ ἐκθανον [illegible] mean "burst out with laughing"; surely, [illegible] common phrases as "to die of laughing [illegible] ordinary interpretation is enough. On xv[illegible] seems to have been missed, ἄλλοθι πάτρης being [illegible] where from (i.e., than) his country"; away [illegible] phrase, not by ἄλλοθι. When what is called S[illegible] more fully studied such difficulties as this w[illegible] The few analogies which are quoted from mod[illegible] so interesting that it is a pity they were not [illegible]

The appendices are as follows:—Compositio[illegible] Relation of "Odyssey" to "Iliad," Homer an[illegible] History of the Homeric Poems, Time and [illegible] the Homeric House. They are written, [illegible] good judgment, clearness, and fairness; [illegible] test them, no important point has bee[illegible] although some are perhaps not fully trea[illegible] also shows a most open mind; he does [illegible] folklorist, and from the volumes of the Fo[illegible] gathered not a few things of worth; he has g[illegible] the Homeric house from the old Icelandic pa[illegible] appendices are admirable; all essential facts [illegible] those who may disagree with this or that p[illegible] learn much from them. We welcome especial[illegible] Mr. Monro's hand in literary criticism; he s[illegible] things. One point is here brought out for t[illegible] full importance—the number of places wh[illegible] parodies or half misunderstands the "Iliad." [illegible] to the fifth, we cannot feel that Mr. Mon[illegible] justice to his subject. We should have likes[illegible] tion of the question of memory versus writi[illegible] European origin of Homer, and whether "Ilia[illegible] should be ascribed to the same place; of the s[illegible] conditions which preceded the Homeric Age, [illegible] here and there in the poem things which [illegible] Ulysses' use of the bow, the superseding of [illegible] later family and offers suggestions as to [illegible] not attempt to fit them into a larger scheme, [illegible] example, the bow of Heracles and Ulysses w[illegible] longbow. Nor is the author quite fair [illegible]

A new edition of the Ætna, such as that now given us in ÆTNA, a Critical Recension of the Text, with Prolegomena, Translation, Commentary, Excursus, and Index of the Words, by Professor Robinson Ellis (Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d. n.), was certainly wanted. Since Munro published his, there have been two important studies of Ætna made, by Kruczkiewicz and Alzinger, and the edition, with translation and commentary, of Sudhaus; and Mr. Ellis himself has been for years examining and weighing the MS. evidence, part of which he has published. He has come to the conclusion, which he supports by ample evidence, that too much weight has been given to the inferior MSS., and that the editor must to a great extent neglect these. He bases his text on the Cambridge MS. C and the Stabulensian fragment S, reinforced by three collections of extracts, in rare instances calling in one of the fifteenth-century MSS., in which the true reading appears amidst numbers of preposterous corruptions. He also gives all the so-called Gyraldinian variants in one list, and the Excerpta Pithoeana in another, besides the apparatus criticus at the foot of each page. Thus the MS. evidence is for the first time fully and clearly set forth for scholars. By the use of italic, it is made easy to see what part of the text is beyond question; and all doubtful problems are fully discussed in the notes.

And yet there is something to seek. Mr. Ellis has a wonderful knowledge of facts, but his literary taste is not beyond dispute—a point which has its importance in dealing with conjectures, or deciding between doubtful variants. It is hardly conceivable that any one endowed with a keen literary sense should think that Ætna could belong to the Augustan age. Mr. Ellis carefully sets out the imitations or echoes of Virgil, and notes the evidences in language of later authorship; yet he can think it "not improbable" that the piece was written "not long after the death of Virgil." But the rhythm bears unmistakable marks of a style more like Lucan than Virgil, and que carries on the negative quite in Lucan's obscure manner—not to speak of such expressions as mens carminis haec est, cessata per sidera (the editor's own conjecture), the rhetorical nec tu terra satis, and others. The translation is a great help, and is well done. There are places, however, where Mr. Ellis seems to be incorrect—melius sua tempora nosse is rendered "to have a happier knowledge of his time"; sacrare (226) "to deify" instead of "consecrate"; "effects should teem as they do" (456) is hardly intelligible; and surely mille vera (189) is an extraordinary phrase for "a thousand truths." We have noted other points for criticism, but these will suffice to show the limitations of the work. As a whole, it is a useful and able performance, which well sums up the present state of criticism on the poem, and takes it a step further.

It is strange to find an editor apologizing for having spent twelve years over his work, which should rather be a cause for rejoicing. Mr. E. S. Thompson at least is to be congratulated on his long labour over THE MENO OF PLATO (Macmillan, 5s.), for it is far the best edition of the "Meno" yet published. The "Meno" is peculiarly well fitted for the student's first piece of Plato; as J. S. Mill says, in this dialogue "more that is characteristic of Plato is brought together in a smaller space than in any other." But the schoolboy will have to go elsewhere than to Mr. Thompson; he has no milk for babes, but addresses himself to those who have passed the first stage and desire to begin the systematic study of Plato's philosophy. We do not imply that he neglects the linguistic problems which come up. On the contrary, his notes on conditional clauses (72 B.), ἀλλ' ἤ (75 B.), ὅπως μή (77 A.), ποῖος (71 B., 80 D.), μή οὐ (89 D., 90 E.), ἆρ ἄρα (91 B.), εἰκεῖν πράγματος (96 A.), the Middle Voice (93 D.), and many other points are full of sound discrimination, and his views supported by large numbers of new examples. It is but rarely that he fails to appreciate a linguistic point; as on 70 C. he does not realize that the verbal noun can imply either a passive or an active sense according to the context. He misses a chance, however, to show by a wider range of examples that the speaker's feeling is expressed in vocatives like ὦ Δημόκριτε language (as ἄγε and ἴθι, ἀλλὰ γάρ, ἐ with philosophy, as the important discussion of the Pri might have been found for one more if Mr. Th realized how unjust a picture Plato gives of Georgi cus; he may hint his respect for them as Mr. Th but the figures are really caricatures. The introdu so well put together as the rest of the book. Much is put into the text which should have been put into the impression which it makes is indistinct. But th whole is a valuable contribution to the study of Plat here what is more important than opinions—the mean opinions for ourselves.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Essays.

The secret of Mr. Augustine Birrell's charm as would seem to lie in an airy spirit of irrespon heartedness. He has no great merits of style, manner is always easy, and pleasantly conversational great depth of feeling; he seldom surprises the sudden and illuminating flashes of wit, or by delic fancy, or by a revelation of unsuspected tenderness seldom makes the mistake of taking himself too serio the midst of the gravest subjects some of the subj volume are very grave indeed—he will suddenly int quaintly humorous turn of phrase that serves to brig page. Take a sentence from the opening essay, tha Wesley," selected from the first page we open at the eighteenth century our two Universities, fa their faults, were always open to the poor scholar wh to subscribe, not to boat clubs or cricket clubs, Thirty-nine Articles." This little jest at the exp modern tendency to athleticism in our Universities l Mr. Birrell's manner of securing his reader's good wi manner of a practised orator, who fires off his little rhetorical witticisms to put his audience in a g before he comes to serious business. These M (Stock, 5s.) are all readable, but they are not so g Birrell's previous volumes. In fact, the majority of t essays at all, but simply papers, lectures, or addres private or public meetings, and reprinted apparently attempt to bring them into line with the essays prep it would have been worth while to revise the form, address on "Walter Bagehot," delivered at Leight March 5, 1901. The matter was most suitable for an Birrell's discursive and gossiping style; as it reader is perpetually being caught up by the little tropes, proper no doubt to the occasion but sadly o in book-form. We refuse to believe, for example Birrell, had he been writing instead of speaking, wo down the banal sentence on page 138, speaking o description of Lord Jeffery and his friends, "people! I hope there are a great many of them London County Council." The address on "Robert is also out of place here; it was passable as a spoke but it was not worth reprinting in a book of essays. I book is something of a disappointment. It contains readable matter, but it will not advance Mr. Birrell' as a light and graceful essayist.

Mr. Edmond Holmes, himself a poet of a consider gives us in WALT WHITMAN (Lane, 3s. 6d. n.) a ca of the author of "Leaves of Grass," together with of his poems designed to infect the reader who Whitman with a desire of remedying the o Holmes has no new and startling theories to propo (which is more to the point) a faculty of sane and criticism which is as uncommon as praiseworthy. He means an idolatrous admirer of Whitman, and he has and not too obvious points to make about the Gospel prose is as rapidly or so easily made." We can recommend Mr. Holmes as a safe and competent guide to any one who wishes, this late in the day, to begin an acquaintance with the poet of the Democracy and his works.

Another volume proving that the art of essay-writing is not altogether extinct is by the author of "Exploded Ideas," and is called ESSAYS IN PARADOX (Longmans, 5s.). Of its kind it is good work, but it is unlikely that it will be widely read. Some of the qualities that go to make a good essayist are here, but not all. The author has sensibility, he is seldom diffuse, and he handles happy memories of childhood with a very pleasant touch. Unfortunately, however, he is also a careless writer, and essay-writing is just the one form of literature in which carelessness of diction is the unpardonable offence. The opening paragraph of the essay called "Non-Intervention" is an excellent example of clumsy and ungrammatical writing. But the essays have a certain value, and display more than common depth and subtlety of feeling.

Anthologies.

A collection of PATRIOTIC SONGS, such as that which has been made by Mr. Arthur Stanley, and published by Messrs. Pearson (3s.), is no new thing in the history of English letters. To go no further back, there is the "Lyra Heroica" of Mr. Henley, not yet more than two years of age, covering much the same ground and introducing many of the same poems as Mr. Stanley's anthology. Here, too, we have the "Agincourt" of Michael Drayton, the "School Fencibles" of William Cory, and Sir Francis Doyle's "The Private of the Buffs." But since Mr. Henley published his volume there have been several patriotic singers. Perhaps, indeed, they were not a little stimulated by the resurrection of so many spirited poems. We have had Mr. Henry Newbolt's "Admirals All," from which some quotation was unavoidable in a book of this kind; and Dr. Conan Doyle's "Songs of Action," which necessarily furnishes a contribution, and that excellent poem of Thomas Hardy's (included in his volume of poems published the other day), "The Dynasty of the Battery." On the whole, Mr. Stanley may be said to have carried out his scheme satisfactorily. The intention of his book was, apparently, to foster the "Imperial" spirit, and, to that end to make a representative collection of the patriotic poetry of the British Empire. England, Wales, Scotland (with a large infusion of Jacobite songs), Ireland (with a considerable amount of Nationalist verse), Canada, India, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand—each of these is provided with a separate section. If, after reading this sumptuous volume from cover to cover, we are not "patriots" of some sort or another, it is obviously our own fault. Dr. Weldon contributes a short introduction. Two little collections of lighter verse we have already alluded to—an anthology of HUMOROUS VERSE (Virtue), edited by Mr. T. A. Cook, and A LITTLE BOOK OF LIGHT VERSE (Methuen), for which Mr. Anthony C. Deane is responsible. Of the two editors Mr. Cook takes his business the more seriously. His "Foreword" is a thorough exposition of the subject with which he deals, while Mr. Deane's introductory remarks are (as is natural) in considerably lighter vein. Mr. Cook's anthology has the wider range of the two; it includes Geoffrey Chaucer and A. D. Godley, James V. of Scotland and Barry Pain. There is food here for lovers of all kinds of humour. It is rather curious to notice what poems attain to the double honour of pleasing both editors. John Milton's lines on Hobson the Carrier come in both anthologies as does Thackeray's "Ballad of Bouillabaisse." We prefer Mr. Deane's selection from the verses of J. K. Stephen to that in "Humorous Verse"; it contains "The Last Ride Together" and that excellent sonnet in imitation of Wordsworth, while Mr. Cook gives us only the lines in imitation of Myers and the poor verses "To R. K." On the other hand, Mr. Cook has the better of the selection from Mr. Owen Seaman. W. M. Praed figures largely, with justice, in both volumes; three Calverleys only figure in each—the "Ode to Tobacco" among them. Mr. A. D. Godley is justly conspicuous, and Thomas Hood and Matthew Prior. Messrs. Lang, Lehmann, Dobson, and Anstey appear in both, and, as was inevitable, Canning's "Friend of Humanity and the Knife-

book, are not merely behind the times, but co part of the ground taken up in the new ventu although aided by 400 scholars and experts, a notice many names of European reputation, has him a task so vast and complex that it will tax utmost to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion.
motto to deem nothing strange which bears i Jewish life and thought, from the earliest daw
the present hour, he divides his subject into th
—"History, Biography, and Sociology," "
"Theology and Philosophy," which are further specific headings. The editor is an ard enthusiast. "The book," he tells us, "is the Israel; it is the national property of the tribe scholars preside over its literary form and the and clerk are destined to become the financial vast undertaking, which is not only a great glorious past of Israel, but shall be also a mig its future." As for the rest of the world, the to become the "spiritual centre of the world trust that the promoter's expectations will be extent; for it must be confessed that Christen deal to learn from Judaism and that most of us ignorance of its literature and history. The n supplies the required information with a fulness before. An ideal encyclopædia, to our thinkin four features; it should present the facts scientific accuracy; it should be thoroughly presentments; it should aim at scientific objecti individual opinions, and it should give the know be conveyed in as concise and popular a form have examined several of the articles in the Dr. Singer's work and found them excellent. S ones, on comparatively unknown authors an condite subjects, are especially admirable. W plete mastery of the subject in hand, and brim there is no obtrusive display of learning, wh is singularly free from bias, and tone and sty modern and lucid. The book contains some illustrations in elucidation of the text.

The sources of Jewish moral philosophy a the Talmud. The latter, that vast storehouse history, is an enormous potpourri of the s thousand of the leading men of Israel, who, countries at different stages of civilization, and dissimilar social conditions, had nothing in their membership of the same religion. To co out of a medley so strange and heterogeneous
but impossible task. In THE ETHICS OF JU 3s. 6d.), Dr. M. Lazarus claims to have disco by means of which to extricate himself fr mazes and to emerge safely from the labyrinth spirits less fortunate or less bold have been hope
The underlying formula of unity is, according the moral is divine, therefore you shall be moral divine is moral, you shall become like unto Go man was created and whose copy and image it strive to become." That many of the Jewish the connexion between morality and religio admitted. "Who does not know the Thora," ignorant of morality, and where there is no mo does not exist." Other similar utterances quoted, but it would be just as easy to adduce opposite direction inculcating a mild form utilitarian morality. In the concluding sectio the author discusses the attitude of Judaism and foreign communities. He argues that " particularistic in order to formulate and hold ideal." The school of Hillel, and even that of traditional and most conservative of men, en stranger. Unfortunately, theory and practice and the Jewish teachers failed signally to impre with their principles. It may be said th forced upon us as we read Mr. Robert M. Sillard's considerable volumes, BARRY SULLIVAN AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES (Fisher Unwin, 21s. n.). The lines which run :—

> Where are the passions they essayed,
> And where the tears they made to flow?
> Where the wild humours they portrayed
> For laughing worlds to see and know?
> Othello's wrath and Juliet's woe?
> Sir Peter's whims and Timon's gall?
> And Millamant and Romeo?—
> Into the night go one and all—seem particularly applicable to such men as Sullivan, at once so famous in his day, so little known in ours. But to Mr. Sillard, at least, he is very real. The actor's art is so utterly extinguished when his admirers pass away that he must rely on the biography as his sole monument. His history and his art can alone survive in the written tradition of his method. From this point of view Mr. Sillard has done his work well. Within the four corners of his volumes is stored a complete account of Barry Sullivan's art and life. It is not always interesting, nor, from the literary point of view, of high value, but it is full, true, and just. The work is a compilation that must have cost the author an immense amount of labour. It will remain a mine wherein others may dig with a certitude of finding many illustrative stories of the second half of the last century, many "documents" of the old bad days of the life theatrical, which are now rapidly disappearing. But the student will have to dig, for, although Mr. Sillard gives us a very full contents bill of each chapter, he does not supply that invaluable aid to research, the compendious index.

Barry Sullivan came upon the world at a time when the way was rough, but when it was far easier to enthral an audience than at the present time. He took the stage with a highly robustious air; from the early days in Ireland, when a leading actor foretold his success, until his last appearance the key-note of his art was boldness. He was always certain of himself and the gods, and the groundlings will never tire of applauding such a one. He was an earnest, conscientious worker at his own conception of art; great at new (and futile) Shakespearian readings; unwearied in the study of fresh parts; a hard worker at rehearsals. The rôles that Mr. Sillard mentions when added together number no less than 301. For fifty years he laboured—fifty years in which he may be said to have made his tremendous voice heard in every corner of the world, and to have garnered fame and money wherever his professional duties called him. Although Mr. Sillard finds the actor a sympathetic character we cannot say that we do. His humour usually took the form of rather obvious vituperative repartee. For instance, one night in Dublin, when he was playing Richard III. and, in his great part of Gloster, comes rushing on the stage, shouting "A horse! a horse! my kingdom for a horse!" a boy in the gallery called out "Will an ass do you, Barry?" To this Sullivan replied "Yes, come down." But Mr. Sillard informs us that Sir Squire Bancroft, Mr. Wilson Barrett, Mr. Tree, Mr. Lionel Brough, Mr. Warner, Mr. Toole, and others have borne testimony to Sullivan's good nature and uniform courtesy.

Dutch Painters.

The series of volumes on DUTCH PAINTERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY (Sampson Low, 42s.), edited by Max Rooses, is now brought to a conclusion by the publication of the Fourth. It does not deal on the whole with men as famous as those treated of in more than one of its predecessors. Mauve, Jacob Maris, and the great Bosboom—to speak of no others—have helped to give material to the earlier volumes. For the present one, Mathieu Maris seems the only very famous man who is available; but we by no means resent the inclusion in the volume of men like August Allebé, George Poggenbeek, Théophile de Bock, and Willy Martens. Allebé by this time is, in a sense, a leader. He has had an influence. He has made disciples. Poggenbeek and De Bock are painters not without individuality, and, yet more certainly, not without skill. Willy Martens, by no and not very long afterwards that his work was e gible. Since then he has passed on to r and even to obscurities which have left only the p already prepossessed connoisseur quite ready to r Between the lines the critic who writes ab this volume it is M. O. Maris—admirer and much. He is a poetic writer, or rather a poetic he understands Mathieu Maris. We wish we could much confidence that we invariably understand him.

Intricate, difficult, and, we should suppose, has abominably translated. There is something in his e theless; so is there in that on Martens by the yo man. But the defect of the volume as a whole—and its predecessors—is the extraordinary incompete literary, as distinguished from the artistic, ex writers are, speaking generally, tasteful people of ga hardly a remote idea of literary form. Bad thoug lation often is, it is evident that the original ite not infrequently be at fault. We call out, not for the beauty of the amateur, but for the terse appreciation fessional writer. What value these would have give now too full of the amiable incubrations of the well-

Science

Sir Michael Foster is to be congratulated on scholarly essays that go to form LECTURES ON THE PHYSIOLOGY (Cambridge University Press, 9s.) and on a series of lectures delivered at San Francisco in of last year; he writes of the pioneers of physiologi with much sympathy, and places clearly before the peculiar difficulties with which they each had to con limitations of contemporary human knowledge that in. Beginning with Vesalius, the first anatomist of Galen, the researches and influence of such master Malpighi, van Helmont, and Sylvius in the various physiology are described in detail, and illustrated b from their works. In his account of the English—or rather say the Oxford?—School of the seventeenth Michael devotes several interesting pages to the Quinque" of John Mayow, that variable star of e physiological history, whose work has been twice f twice disinterred by antiquarian zeal. Ample ju to his important advances in physiological theo Michael has not brought out very clearly the fact t experimental chemical work does entitle him to be co original discoverer of oxygen gas, named by Priestley sticated air," and by Lavoisier "oxygine." A history of physiology has yet to be written; but the pr will materially lighten the labours of the author of when he comes to deal with the period 1550-1775.

In THE COMMONWEALTH OF CELLS, by H. G.
B.A., Oxon. (Baillière, Tindall, and Cox, 2s. 6d. n.)
has made a bold attempt to explain the latest scient about the workings of the human body in language to the unscientific mind, and he meets with a fair success. The book consists of five essays, which d various chemical, physiological, and nervous processes life depends that are known or supposed to take p animal economy. Mr. Spurrell is an avowed materi medical training forbids him to pursue the study of when it passes out of "the material plane." He easy conversational style, and has illustrated the va he wishes to emphasize with simple pen-and-ink dra facts are thoroughly up-to-date, particularly those d histology and the properties of muscle and nerve perhaps, we may be permitted to recognize the Oxf student—but the book would probably gain in completeness were some of the abstruser "mu diagrams omitted and replaced by more commonplace

Law and Medicine.

To the majority of hospital students, the stud jurisprudence appeals but slightly. This unfortun well-worn paths, but is undoubtedly clear in exposition. The last three chapters are devoted to insanity. The first, treating the subject "as a form of disease," is illustrated by eighteen excellent plates. We venture to think Dr. Poore should have briefly discussed the line of treatment to be adopted in different cases by the practitioner who is often called upon to take charge pending removal to an asylum. The next chapter deals with the legal relations of the insane and the statutes on lunacy—the Act of 1886 in particular. Copies of the numerous documents that the law requires to be filled up are given, accompanied by useful advice as to the part the medical man must take in the proceedings. The plea of insanity in the Law Courts, with special reference to criminal cases, testamentary capacity, and divorce, are discussed in the last chapter. Dr. Poore naturally has a few words to say on affective insanity, a "disease" defined "as the fact that a man is affected abnormally by normal conditions"—a charitable theory that cannot stand against the practical considerations of civilization, in spite of Shakespeare's psychological dictum. The several appendices contain many important facts arranged concisely, thereby facilitating ready reference. The student will find this volume amply sufficient for examination purposes and easy to assimilate, while the specialist will regard it as no mean companion to Taylor's classical work.

How to Train.

Physical culture is a subject that seems to grow in importance year by year; with kindergartens for the young, gymnasiums and Sandow exercises for those that are older, and increasing interest in out-of-door sports for their own sake, we are to improve the physique and morals of the individual and increase the power of the nation. Mr. E. H. Miles is an enthusiast of sport, and has, with Dr. F. A. Schmidt's assistance, compiled THE TRAINING OF THE BODY (Swan Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.) to show how and why one should train, not for games only, but for the common purposes of daily life as well. Using Dr. Schmidt's scientific work on physical culture as a basis, Mr. Miles has taken numerous excerpts and diagrams from it, and amplifies the data of the German doctor by an extensive general commentary of his own. The result cannot be called wholly satisfactory; this is especially the case in the physiological sections of the volume, which might with advantage have been submitted for revision to some one even moderately acquainted with the subject. The special advice on training for each of the different forms of athletic exercises, whether carried on in open air or under cover, are from the pen of Mr. Miles alone, and though somewhat laden with generalities they form the more valuable part of the book; but the remarks and advice given on the subject of rowing, if given on the strength of the author's own observations from the banks of the Cam, would go far to explain the alleged decay of Cambridge rowing. The author is also an ardent vegetarian, and at the end of the book puts in a strong though temperately-written plea for purely vegetarian diet and training.

Self-Made Men.

SUMMITS OF STATUS, by James Burnley (Grant Richards, 6s.), relates in a scrappy, anecdotal manner the careers of an immense number of men who have made their fortunes in various fields of activity. It is due to Mr. Burnley to say that he is no blind worshipper of wealth, and regards a certain number of rich men as having really failed in life. At the same time, he does not properly examine the doubtful methods by which some of his heroes gained the financial triumphs with which he dazzles the eyes of his readers. Such details require the particular attention of the moralist in an age which tends more and more to worship wealth without asking questions as to its origin; and a strong line of demarcation ought always to be drawn between the rich men who, like the inventors and the engineers, have acquired riches by means beneficial to the community, and those who have only juggled with stocks and shares to the damage of people less clever than themselves. His failure to draw this distinction—or at any rate to draw it with proper emphasis—

we are to have a study of philosophy seen thro temperament. There is no more suggestive me ing the problems of life, as may be seen in "A or in Paul Elmer More's "The Great Refu Beautiful" fails, however, to convey any sens while the creed which is introduced with such but a feeble echo of familiar truths and trui floats with exasperating vagueness between reflections and practical precepts, which are obvious. Gently optimistic platitudes cannot philosophy by repeated use of the word "Co than the discords of life can be explained by t
God the Beautiful and Creator of Beauty expre the harmonies of nature. Nor can the esse poetry be adequately rendered by the rapturo
the poet "fans the flame on the altar of devot on high the starry banner of love." This well book will probably find its welcome among th Miss Whiting's "World Beautiful" with some enthusiasm.

Theology.

ANSELM AND HIS WORK, by the Rev. A. C. W
AND DOMINIC AND THE MENDICANT ORDERS, by (T. and T. Clark, 3s. each), are volumes for series of the World's Epoch Makers, edited Sineaton. The "Life of Anselm" will natura mostly to English readers. A keen metaphys theologian, the father of scholasticism, an of realism, a devout son of the Church w intellect to its authority, the distinguishe Canterbury is perhaps the greatest name annals of the English Church. It is true, as M in his interesting little book, which, though s be commended on account of its historical a sobriety of tone, that Anselm in appealing to strengthened greatly the Pope's spiritual England. But it should be remembered that, adherent of the Gregorian absolutism, he con assert his episcopal claims against the Bisho as the Episcopate at home. On the other ha which he wrung from the English King, who w by political considerations, religious fears, a of his wife and sister, was of service both to Church. It may have been formulated as Chartres, but the credit of the execution belo Anselm. It secured for the Church its spiri at the same time guarding the rights of th paving the way for political freedom. Dr.
story of the Franciscan and Dominican orders in which he does full justice to the religious inspired the movement, and describes with co power the poetic atmosphere amidst which it which it lived and moved during its halcyo Indeed, a charm about St. Francis, his life and of character, and unsparing devotion to his fel
even the sternest of Puritans can deny. Th Dominican order was cast in a sterner mould
the maintenance of theological doctrine in it was the paramount consideration. The theolog Dominicans and Franciscans, which lasted f forms one of the saddest chapters in the Ch went hand in hand with their internal fallin high ideals taught and practised by their foun

A SCIENTIFIC PHILOSOPHY THE HARMONIZ THEOLOGY (Swan Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.) work, which is not, we fear, likely to be to students either of metaphysics or theol the writer is obscure, and he evidently has n of his subject. One feature of the work is a in the order of chapters. Thus a note prefix informs us that it "should be read immediatel
It should have stood as Chapter IV., but time as the work was going through the

A COMMENTARY ON THE EPISTLES OF ST. PETER AND ST. JUDE, by the Rev. C. Bigg, D.D. (T. and T. Clark, 10s. 6d.), will be warmly welcomed as the first work published by Dr. Bigg since his promotion to the chair of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford. The book is, however, the fruit of the comparative leisure enjoyed in a country vicarage, and, though Dr. Bigg pleads the disabilities of a resident in the country, the book gains in originality and force more than it loses through want of complete literary apparatus. The section on "St. Peter and St. Paul, in the New Testament" owes much of its striking suggestiveness to the imaginative power of Dr. Bigg's mind. The study of St. Peter's character, and of the distinctive points in which he differs from St. Paul, is one of the best sections in a commentary of unusual merit. As might be expected, Dr. Bigg believes that the real amanuensis of the Epistle was a disciple of St. Peter, possibly Silvanus, and that while the Apostle dictated in Aramaic, "Silvanus expressed the substance in his own Greek." He argues effectively against the comparatively late date (circa 80 A.D.) to which Professor Ramsay assigns the Epistle. The "Babylon" from which it was written Dr. Bigg identifies with Rome, in accordance with the view universally prevalent before the sixteenth century. In the introduction to the Second Epistle the questions of date and authenticity are discussed thoroughly and impartially. Dr. Bigg is inclined to agree with Zahn in ascribing the Epistle to St. Peter himself, and he suggests that it was "directed to Corinth not long after the date of the Pauline epistles." The notes are sober, learned, and scholarly. It would indeed be presumptuous to criticize in detail work of such calibre as Dr. Bigg produces at his best. As a study of the Greek text, his commentary stands in the front rank of the series to which it belongs. But the most characteristic part of the book is the preface and the introductory matter, in which Dr. Bigg's genius as a historian finds ample scope.

In a volume entitled INTER AMICOS: letters between James Martineau and William Knight, 1869-72 (Murray, 5s.) Prof. Knight has published a fragment of his correspondence with the illustrious Unitarian. The main topic of the earlier letters is the divinity of Christ, Prof. Knight, of course, maintaining the more orthodox view. Later in the volume there are letters from Prof. Knight on a doctrinal conflict in which he had become involved within his own communion. The religious views which Dr. Martineau expresses in friendly controversy with his correspondent do not materially differ from the authoritative printed statements of his doctrine. But the volume gives one more proof of his sympathetic readiness to answer those who applied to him for counsel. His letters are written with all the familiar grace of style. Style, indeed, was not an effort with Martineau. Everything he wrote fell naturally into beautiful form. At the close of the volume there is the text of the famous address presented to Martineau on his eighty-third birthday, with the full list of signatures.

THE CONFIRMATION AND COMMUNION OF INFANTS AND YOUNG CHILDREN, by the Rev. H. Holloway (Skeffington, 5s.), is introduced to the reader by some vigorous remarks of Lord Halifax, who insists in the preface that "the best way to teach the Sacramental doctrine of the Church" is to admit little children to communion, and that the fixing of an arbitrary age-limit for confirmation is nothing less than an abuse of episcopal power. The tone of the book as a whole is moderate. Mr. Holloway does not plead for the immediate restoration of a custom which the Western Church has practically abandoned for three centuries; but he argues that there is nothing in Scripture or in the Prayer-book against it, and he has no difficulty in showing that the practice is Catholic and primitive. There is some one-sidedness in the argument, and a tendency to insist on the objective aspect of the Sacraments to the exclusion of certain moral considerations. Mr. Holloway is probably right in contending that the question of the age for presenting candidates for confirmation should be left to the discretion of the parochial clergy.

THE ATONEMENT AND INTERCESSION OF CHRIST, by the late Principal D. C. Davies, M.A., edited by D. E. Jenkins (T. and

In the TEMPLE BIBLE, of which four volumes (I[illegible] each), have appeared, the Bible is presented as a [illegible] literary value. The volumes are little books in fl[illegible] covers, very well printed on the continuous method, [illegible] notes, maps, and appendices giving synchronisms [illegible] History, Biblical references in English literature, &c. [illegible] is edited by Professor Sayce, who expounds his [illegible] views as to the tendency of archæology to confirm [illegible] "Exodus" by Dr. A. H. S. Kennedy, "Leviticus" [illegible] J. A. Paterson; and the fourth volume, containing [illegible] of St. Matthew and St. Mark, by the Dean of Ely. [illegible] Introductions are admirably adapted to the special [illegible] the edition.

THE LETTERS OF ST. PAUL TO SEVEN CHURCHES [illegible] FRIENDS, by Arthur S. Way (Macmillan, 3s.), is an [illegible] put before English readers St. Paul's letters [illegible] language. There is no doubt that our Authorized Ve[illegible] majestic and stately style, leaving out of consideration [illegible] tions and obscure renderings, is frequently misunderst[illegible] common people. The author of the book before us [illegible] to place the thoughts of the great Apostle before [illegible] in a connected form and in plain English. We do not a[illegible] of his interpretations, but he has shed light on seve[illegible] passages and he has made an interesting contr[illegible] Biblical literature.

Mr. E. A. Abbott's object in THE CORRECTIONS [illegible] ADOPTED BY MATTHEW AND LUKE (A. and C. Black) [illegible] that Matthew and Luke borrowed from a tradition co[illegible] Mark and to show the corrections made by the form[illegible] latter. The priority of Mark is now all but universally [illegible] It is still a moot question whence Mark derived his [illegible] Petrine traditions and several versions of the Ara[illegible] furnished, probably, the foundation of the Proto-M[illegible] suppose that the Gospel in its present form belong[illegible] period. It is very likely that Matthew used Mark [illegible] other documents, in the compilation of his Gospel, and [illegible] had recourse to the two presumed Gospels and to [illegible] of Logia. There are numerous instances of [illegible] justifiable or otherwise, made by the later Evangel[illegible] Abbott, however, seems frequently to suggest alterat[illegible] none were intended, and at times to unduly exa[illegible] import of various readings. His assumption that th[illegible] could neither read nor write, because they are de[illegible] "ignorant and illiterate men," is a perfectly gratuit[illegible]

The Rev. F. S. Millard's HAND-BOOK TO TH[illegible] ACCORDING TO ST. MARK (Rivington, 2s. 6d.) is inten[illegible] use of Sunday-school teachers and Biblical students. [illegible] strictly on orthodox lines and looks upon the Gospel [illegible] of an eyewitness. The foot-notes given at the e[illegible] chapter are partly explanatory and partly practical. [illegible] book will, no doubt, prove of use.

Sir James Simpson contributes to the Famous S[illegible] a LIFE OF HENRY DRUMMOND (Oliphant, Anderson, a[illegible] 1s. 6d. n). It might be questioned whether th[illegible] divine was worthy to be placed in the series. His [illegible] for the reconciliation of science and religion in his "N[illegible] in the Spiritual World" rested to some extent on the [illegible] of false analogy, and scientific men riddled them with [illegible] to which his biographers does but scanty justi[illegible] Drummond was nevertheless an amiable and successful [illegible] and his work in this line deserved to be recorded. [illegible] Simpson has recorded it sympathetically, and has been [illegible] some interesting material not included in the biogra[illegible] by Professor G. A. Smith.

FICTION.

"The Usurper."

The central idea of Mr. W. J. Locke's novel The [illegible] (Lane, 6s.) is a good one, and it forms the backbo[illegible]

Mr. Locke has made him sufficiently real, though perhaps Cudby, his secretary, is the more lifelike of the two. In a novel of this kind it is understood that the real claimant (or a specious imitation) should turn up some time to mar the full tide of success, and the man Burke is used by the author with considerable effect in this unpleasing role. Woven in with the main threads of the plot is a pretty love story of a certain youthful poet and the niece of an Italian restaurant-keeper. We confess that Mr. Locke's poet makes some rather strong demands upon our credulity: he is so singularly attractive to the ladies, so remarkable a compound of the healthy athletic young Englishman and the writer of erotic verse. But the book is a good one. As modern novels go it is as good as any but the very best—well contrived, well written, with a good deal of solid thought at the back of it. Mr. Locke is decidedly one of the most promising of our younger novelists.

Western Canada.

The qualities that "Ralph Connor" displayed in "Black Rock" are visible also in THE MAN FROM GLENGARRY (Hodder, 6s.). But this is something more of the customary novel than was that earlier book, and in our opinion it loses in consequence. There are excellent passages in it. Whenever the author has to describe Western Canada, its men, and its customs he is as vivid as ever. We could wish for nothing better of its kind than the earlier chapters, with the two Macdonalds, the minister and his wife, and the life-like pictures of Canadian shanty life. The Glengarry men, one and all, are admirable. It is in the later portions of the book that the author goes astray for awhile, and comes on one or two occasions perilously near melodrama. The love story of young Ranald Macdonald is not well done, and some of the aristocratic characters (young De Lacy, for example) are merely ridiculous. To some extent Colonel Thorp makes amends, but the author, generally speaking, seems to lose his grip of the situation when he comes to depicting town life. With all its defects—and we admit ourselves to be disappointed in the book—there is something genuine and earnest in "Ralph Connor's" work that gives it a certain value.

The Kailyard.

It is clear from LOVE IN ITS TENDERNESS, by J. R. Aitken (Alex. Gardner, 6s.), that we have not done with the kailyard yet. Albline the Southron has by this time conquered some of his repugnance to the dialect that flourishes the saving side of Tweed, and assuming that this initial obstacle is safely surmounted Mr. Aitken's idylls are calculated to afford a great deal of pleasure. They bear witness to imagination, as they certainly betray an apt turn for a graphic and fanciful description. More than all, the characters are drawn with firm lines, and in every case the author has exerted his sympathetic imagination with the happiest results. One becomes deeply interested in the simple lives of the Enochdu folk, in the minister whose conception of the all-embracing love of God is too broad a thing for the rigid Calvinists, in the triumph of his well-lived and well-preached evangel. If we were to make any selection for special praise, our choice would fall upon "A Mathematician's Love Story," and "Through Great Tribulation," both of which in their several ways are excellently conceived and convincingly written. Tenderly sentimental without being maudlin, Mr. Aitken's stories deserve the warmest welcome.

A Determined Spinster.

There are some unusual characters—and several not unusual—in SELISHA AND PLOTON, Mrs. Henry Dudeney's latest novel (Heinemann, 6s.). Shalisha, which is the rather remarkable name given to the chief figure in the book, is certainly not cast in the common mould of heroines. She is tall, and vigorous, and masculine—and she earns her living as a head gardener, going about her work at Bramble Tye in the rational costume that we may see on the lady gardeners at Kew. With her contrasts well enough the silly, fragile Dresden china figure of her mother, with her constant attacks of nerves and her invincible love for the romantic. The book contains much that is interesting—a good deal of smart dialogue and some subtle touches of feminine psychology. Mrs. Dudeney paints realistically the drab, dreary supposed that he can only write one sort of bo

IN THE WIND (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.) Mr. left the lands of the chrysanthemum and the his scene in Mayfair. The experiment is in Dawe has produced some really good work must confess to a little disappointment with rapier is not the weapon with which Mr. Daw but there are many superficially clever say Lord Caplington's courtship is clever comedy type, and there is some good work-a-day phil cularly healthy sort sprinkled over the pages.
Dawe is concernest we think his London w drawn than his brides of Japan. In the nature, which is the only thing worth dealing the West he seems not to see it, or at any rat
it. Although we thus suggest that the book we are none the less glad to bear witness to i well written and amusing.

Tolstoy.

Some of Tolstoy's short stories, translated Hain, and already published serially, are repr entitled TALES FROM TOLSTOI (Jarrold, 6s. prefaced by a biography which the publishers
first published in English," but the descri Eugene Schuyler's life of Tolstoy is in Englis life of Tolstoy has been translated into Engli self merely remarks that his biography "cont uncommunicated details." Some of these are diction with Tolstoy's own statements. M Tolstoy's life in St. Petersburg after the that Tolstoy "never could believe in the reg of mere culture." Tolstoy's own words, in re period, are:—

> Our vocation was to instruct people > instruction there was no need of inquiring;
> in theory that artists and poets instructe > considered myself a remarkable artist and > very naturally accepted this theory. . .
> the importance of poetry and the developmen > and I was one of its Priests. Being a > advantageous and very agreeable, and I > this belief without doubting its truth.

Some of the other details are more pictu instance:

> We are told that, on his return to Y > steward coming to him in the morning > frequently find his master hanging in flanne > on a trapeze, in which position he wou > modes of sowing and threshing, the ste > his young master round and round the > somersaults without interrupting the conve

The case of Old Father William (Lewis is the closest historical parallel that occ appreciation of the detail is enhanced by rea with Mr. Sergyeenko's remark that Count any situation is ridiculous." As regards th detail so appropriately introduces, there is n seeing that they have appeared already, become famous," except that the author's ma glad to have them collected into a volume.

A Virginian.

Presumably it was "The Virginians" inspired Mr. Marriott Watson with the HOUSE DIVIDED (Harpers, 6s.). Unfortunate has had no very happy result. The opening enough, but by the time we reach the mid tirest of Mr. Mallory and all his relations, " lady" Tabard, the perpetual intrigue and ga ing to duels, and, above all, the perpetual af manner which is Mr. Marriott Watson's ba which his characters employ in their dialogue

THE ISLANDERS.

(Reprinted from THE TIMES of January 4, 1902.)

"Early in January, 2,000 . . . are to be enlisted and mobilized. . . . The men are to be sent to Aldershot in batches of 500 for eight weeks' training."

". . . So the Cape Government asked the Colonel to come home and secure suitable men for his regiment."

". . . Any form of compulsory service being impossible among a free people."

". . . 1,728 head of game falling to four guns. Thanks to careful and scientific attention, the—moors were never in better condition."—Daily Press.

". . . My fifteen months out here have made me fairly keen on compulsory service for all England. It is simply awful that after two years you send us out men who have to be taught to shoot and ride. It's like expecting a Board school boy to play in a county eleven."—Private Letter.

Fenced by your careful fathers, ringed by your leaden seas,
Long did ye wake in quiet, and long lie down at ease; Till ye said of Strife:—"What is it?" Of the Sword:—"It is far from our ken";
Till ye made a sport of your shrunken hosts and a toy of your armed men.
Ye stopped your ears to the warning—ye would neither look nor heed—
Ye set your leisure before their toil, and your lusts above their need.
Because of your witless learning and your beasts of warren and chase
Ye grudged your sons for their service and your fields for their camping-place.
Ye forced them glean in the highways the straw for the bricks they brought;
Ye forced them follow in byeways the craft that ye never taught.
Ye hindered and hampered and crippled: ye thrust out of sight and away
Those that would serve you for honour and those that served you for pay.
Then were the Judgments loosened; then was your shame revealed,
At the hands of a little people, few but apt in the field.
Yet ye were saved by a remnant (and your land's long-suffering Star),
When your strong men cheered in their millions while your striplings went to the war.
Sons of the sheltered city—unmade, unhandled, unmeet—Ye pushed them raw to the battle as ye picked them raw from the street.
And what did ye look they should compass? War-craft learned in a breath?
Knowledge unto occasion at the first far view of Death?
So! And ye train your horses and the dogs ye feed and prize.
How are the beasts more worthy than the souls you sacrifice?
But ye said:—"Their valour shall show them"; but ye said:—
"The end is close";
And ye sent them comfits and pictures to help them harry your foes.
And ye vaunted your fathomless power and ye flaunted your iron pride
Ere—ye fawned on the Younger Nations for the men who could

Ancient, effortless, ordered, cycle on cycle set—
Life so long untroubled that ye who inherit forget
It was not made with the mountains; it is not one with Men, not Gods, devised it. Men, not Gods, must keep Men, not children, servants, or kinsfolk called from

But each man born in the island broke to the matter
Soberly and by custom taken and trained for the same Each man born in the island entered at youth to the
As it were almost cricket, not to be mastered in haste
But after trial and labour, by temperance, living cha
As it were almost cricket—as it were even your play
Weighed and pondered and worshipped and practised
So ye shall bide sure-guarded when the restless lights
In the womb of the blotting war-cloud and the pal quake.
So, at the haggard trumpets, instant your soul shal Forthright, full-harnessed, accepting—alert from th sleep.
So at the threat ye shall summon—so at the need ye Men, not children or servants, tempered and taught t
Cleansed of servile panic, slow to dread or despise,
Humble because of knowledge; mighty by sacrifice.

But ye say:—"It will mar our comfort." Ye say minish our trade."
Do ye wait for the spattered shrapnel ere ye learn is laid?
For the low red glare to southward when the rai towns burn?
(Light ye shall have on that lesson, but little time
Will ye pitch some white pavilion; and lustily eve With nets and hoops and mallets, with racquets and rods?
Will the rabbit war with your foemen—the red-deer
for hire?
The kept cock-pheasant keep you? He is master shire.
Arid, aloof, incurious, unthinking, unthanking, gelt—
Will ye loose your schools to flout them till the columns melt?
Will ye pray them or preach them or print them or back from your shore?
Will your workmen issue a mandate to bid them strik Will ye rise and dethrone your rulers? (Because y both,
Pride by insolence chastened? Indolence purged by
No doubt but ye are the people; who shall make you
Also your gods are many; no doubt but your gods
Idols of greasy altars built for the spirit's ease;
Proud little brazen Baals and talking fetishes;
Teraphs of sept and party and wise wood-pavement G
These shall come down to the battle and snatch you the rails?
From the gusty flickering gun-roll with viewless salve
And the pittest hail of the bullets that tell not w were sent.
When ye are ringed as with iron, when ye are scourg
whips,

Books to look out for at once.

"In the Land of the Blue Gown." By Mrs. Archibald Little. Fisher Unwin. 21s. n.
[See under notes.]
"Happy and Lucky Land." A view of England as seen through German eyes. Fisher Unwin. 1s.
"The University Song Book." Grant Richards.
[With musical setting. See under notes.]
"Gravenhilles." By Thomas Cobb. Grant Richards. 6s.
"Houses of Ignorance." By Frederic Carrel. John Long. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

With notes where required to guide the reader as to their contents.

[Notes on a book under this heading do not preclude a subsequent review.]

ARCHÆOLOGY.

A CONCISE DICTIONARY OF EGYPTIAN ARCHÆOLOGY. By MARY BROADRICK and ANNA ANDERSON MORTON. 7×5, 198 pp. Methuen. 3s.6d.
[A small and handy reference book for students and travellers, with eighty illustrations and a bibliography.]

BIOGRAPHY.

SCOTTISH MEN OF LETTERS IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By H. G. GRAHAM. 9½×5½. 441 pp. Black.
[An extensive work, giving accounts, biographical rather than critical, of thirty-three writers, from Adam Ramsay to Dugald Stewart, including Burns, with admirable portraits.]

GABRIELE ROSSETTI. By W. M. ROSSETTI. 8½×5½, 199 pp. Sands. 7s. 6d. n.
[A verse translation of the autobiography in Italian verse, written by the father of Dante Gabriel and Christina, with prose additions and appendices illustrating Gabriele's life from his correspondence, and including six specimens of his verse.]

LAMARCK. The Founder of Evolution. His Life and Work. By A. S. PACKARD. 8½×5½, 451 pp. Longmans. 9s. n.
[A book by an American Professor, called forth by the tendency to rehabilitate Lamarckism. Translations from Lamarck, illustrations, and bibliography.]

STAGE SILHOUETTES. By S. DARK. 7½×5½, 160 pp. Treherne. 1s.
[Short impressions of the personal characteristics of some actors, dramatists, and critics, with photographs.]

THE MAKING OF AN AMERICAN. By J. A. RIIS. 8½×6, 443 pp. The Macmillan Co. 8s. 6d. n.
[Mr. Riis is a Dane who narrates (in a very American spirit) his life as American journalist and social reformer. There is a chapter on President Roosevelt ("For two years we were brothers in Mulberry Street").]

EDUCATIONAL.

A COLLEGE TEXT-BOOK OF CHEMISTRY. By IRA REMSEN, President of the Johns Hopkins University. 8½×5½, 659 pp. Macmillan, 6s. 6d. n.

ALL ABOUT CHRISTMAS. By MARGARET W. RUDD. 7½×4½, 39 pp. Stockwell. 6d. n.
[Brief notes for children on Christmas customs. Paper bound.]

FICTION.

THE YELLOW FIEND. By MRS. ALEXANDER. 7½×5½, 332 pp. Unwin. 6s.
[The "Yellow Fiend" is Gold; the heroine the granddaughter of a miser. The book gives the story of her love; her devotion to art, and her trials—and ends happily.]

"GOD WILLS IT!" By W. S. DAVIS. 7½×5½, 352 pp. The Macmillan Co. 6s.
[A story of the First Crusade. Illustrated.]

WHERE HONOUR LEADS. By MARIAN FRANCIS. 7½×5, 339 pp. Hutchinson. 6s.
[Upper class social life under George II., at York and elsewhere; and "the 45."]

THE BILLAGUICRED FOREST. By ELIA W. PEATTIE. (The Dollar Library.) 7½×5, 340 pp. Heinemann. 4s.
[The autobiography of an American girl before and after her marriage to a drug-drinking husband in the middle of a forest.]

FOLKLORE.

TRACES OF THE ELDER FAITHS OF IRELAND. By W. G. WOOD-MARTIN. Two vols. 9×6, 405+[illegible] pp. Longmans. 20s. n.
[An elaborate work in two volumes on the folklore and pagan customs in Ireland before the introduction of Christianity, with illustrations.]

HISTORY.

ROMAN AFRICA. By ALEXANDER GRAHAM. 9½×6½, 325 pp. Longmans. 16s. n.
[This exhaustive work, tracing the history from 201 B.C. to

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS YEAR-BOOK. 7½×5, 306 pp.
THE ENGLISHWOMAN'S YEAR BOOK, 1902. JARRS. Black. 2s. 6d. n.
THE ADVERTISER'S A B C for 1902. 10½×7, 1,08[illegible]
CATALOGUE OF THE PRINCIPAL ENGLISH [illegible] CULATION AT MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRAR[illegible] Mudie's. 1s. 6d.
[Contains among other useful features th[illegible] classified under authors, titles, and subjects.]

POETRY.

A SCORE OF SONNETS. By F. W. G. CAMPB[illegible] (Brown paper bound.) Dublin: Hodges. 6d.
HAROLD THE SAXON, AND OTHER VERSE[illegible] 6½×5½, 47 pp. Elkin Mathews. 1s. n.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITI[illegible]

SHAKESPEARE'S WORKS. Three vols. Thin[illegible] Newnes. 10s. 6d. n.
[Well printed on fine paper, in dark blue lin[illegible] bindings, with imaginative portraits of Shakespear[illegible] E. J. Sullivan.]

TENNYSON'S IN MEMORIAM. (Caxton Serie[illegible] Newnes. 3s. n.
[Similar to the Shakespeare. Illustrated by [illegible]

THE WORKS OF GEORGE ELIOT. POEMS, ESSA[illegible] 8½×5½, 457+463 pp. Blackwood. 10s. 6d. n. eac[illegible]

CASTLE DANGEROUS, AND THE SURGEO[illegible] COUNT ROBERT OF PARIS. By SIR WA[illegible] Century Library.) 6×4. Nelson. 2s. n. each.

PENDENNIS. By W. M. THACKERAY. Authorized [illegible] Dent. 9s. n.
[Small octavo, very pleasantly bound in g[illegible] graphical note by the Editor, Walter Jerrold, and [illegible] line by C. E. Brock.]

HYMNS AND OTHER STRAY VERSES. By [illegible] 96 pp. Wells Gardner. 2s.

MAUPRAT. By GEORGE SAND. Translated by S. [illegible] of French Romance.) 9×6. 426 pp. Heinemann [illegible]
[The third in this handsome series; with [illegible] "John Oliver Hobbes," a biographical note by [illegible] and an illustrated appendix on the portraits of Ge[illegible] Uzanne.]

A TALE OF TWO CITIES. By CHARLES DICKENS [illegible] 6½×4. 485 pp. Dent. 1s. 6d. n.

A REPORT ON CANADA. By the EARL OF DURH[illegible] 9×5½. 216 pp. Methuen. 7s. 6d. n.
[Exact reprint of the famous Durham Rep[illegible] appendices—with introductory note.]

SPHERICAL TRIGONOMETRY. By the late I. T[illegible] by J. G. LEATHEM. 7½×5, 275 pp. Macmillan.
[Mr. Todhunter's book was published in 185[illegible] thoroughly revised and rewritten much of it.]

THE PRINCIPLES OF POLITICAL ECONOM[illegible] By H. SIDGWICK. 9×5½, 592 pp. Macmillan.
[Mr. J. N. Keynes, the Editor, has incorp[illegible] notes left by Professor Sidgwick, and parts of a[illegible] Professor for the Dictionary of Political Econom[illegible]

THEOLOGY.

FATHERS IN THE FAITH. By MARY C. DAWS[illegible] FORD. 7×4½, 96 pp. Methuen. 1s. 6d.
[Lives told in simple language of eleven Fath[illegible] Columba, the selection being made by the Scotch [illegible] to the requirements of Sunday school teachers in [illegible]

ON THE PROGRESS OF LIBERTY OF TH[illegible] QUEEN VICTORIA'S REIGN. By CONSTA[illegible] 8×5½, 117 pp. Watts. 1s.
[Traces the unrestricted growth of Rations[illegible] the best features of the reign. Paper bound.]

A SHORT HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY. [illegible] 7½×5½, 429 pp. Watts. 6s. n.
[This is issued by the Rationalist Press [illegible] Robertson, who is a well-known writer on politic[illegible] from the proposition that "It is not even cert[illegible] Jesuism took shape round the memory of an actu[illegible]

LIFE EVERLASTING. By J. FISKE. 7½×4½, 87 p[illegible]
[An address delivered by the late Mr. Fiske a[illegible] at Cambridge (Mass.), Dec. 19, 1900. An evolu[illegible] favour of immortality.]

THE EXPOSITOR. Vol. IV. (Sixth Series.) H[illegible] 7s. 6d.

THE DIVINE IDEA OF PREACHING. By G. [illegible]

Literature

CHRISTMAS SUPPLEMENT

SOME ILLUSTRATORS OF "A CHRISTMAS CAROL."

"I SUPPOSE that among artists and people of any artistic appreciation," says Mr. Pennell in his trenchant way, "it is generally admitted by this time that the greatest bulk of the works of 'Phiz,' Cruikshank, Doyle, and even many of Leech's designs are simply rubbish, and that the reputation of these men was made by critics whose names and works are absolutely forgotten, or else by Thackeray, Dickens, and Tom Taylor, whose books they illustrated, and

THE MAGICIAN DICKENS INVOKING THE SPIRIT OF FATHER CHRISTMAS.

[By permission of Messrs. A. Maurice and Co.]

who had absolutely no intelligent knowledge of art, their one any new Illustrator with this remarkable little ghost-have endeavoured in this ghostly little book." Dick 1843, "to raise the Ghost of an Idea, which shall readers out of humour with themselves, with each the season, or with me.' But we doubt whether Le than a ghost of an idea of the inner meaning of this Idea, and his work does not properly share with author the favour with which the little story has received.

The etching for the "Christmas Carol" wh known is "The Fezziwigs' Ball"—an incident material to the progress of the story, and not even affects the action of a remarkably dramatic narrative Ghost, again, who (if we may be permitted to a phrase attention of the reader at the outset and is the close o
the plot, might have commended himself to the most careful attention of the Illustrator, but is, as Leech p by no means convincing. We recognize in the present dread visitor more burlesque than Dickens intended that is either impressive or awe-inspiring. Leech phantom of Scrooge's seven-years-dead partner, M much-reduced major-general, not at all sure of his his return to his old haunts or of the expediency of tion, and as one who relies more upon the effect secured by his unexpected reappearance than upon t his case or the lesson that his partner is likely from his strange reappearance. He stands as ready to relinquish his cause should the effect of his awful appearance fail—as it did fail—to strike horror into the soul of the soulless Scrooge. An attempt to be humorous circumstances is, moreover, made by Leech, for he the flame of the one candle upon the cold of a face, with an expression of concern spectator of the dire visitation might have expected to wear. This is surely elementary kind, and we should be more mistaken if that Dickens intended the elements of comedy enter into the scheme of "A Christmas Carol." It those who wrote to him concerning it—Lord Jeffrey and a host of unrecorded correspondents—were in the author's intention. There is no possibility of attitude of the reading public towards the years ago; for there poured in upon its author daily, J has recorded, all through that Christmas time from complete strangers to him, not literary at all, simplest domestic kind, of which the general him, amid many confidences about their "Carol" had come to be read about there, and upon a little shelf by itself, and was to do them good—just as if it was a new-fashioned Christmas there is Thackeray's whole-hearted testimony to of the story—the moral of it, it was with a Pagan Who can listen to this little publication, fostered more kindly feelings, and prompted more positive acts of beneficence, than can be traced to all the pulpits and confessionals since Christmas, 1842."

Putting aside the impression that a careful re-reading of the "Carol" must make upon us, it is difficult to imagine that there was the slightest intention upon the part of the author to introduce any element of burlesque into it. Leech, however, did not in his illustrations rise above himself, certainly not in the same way as one at least of the more recent illustrators of the "Carol" has done. The frontispiece, for example, is a very dainty etching, but Mr. and Mrs. Fezziwig are marionettes, and the fiddler who went up to the lofty desk and "tuned like fifty stomach-aches" is the fiddler of low comedy. It would seem that, in the very selection of this incident for the first illustration, Leech showed himself hardly the man for the work. There was too much domestic respectability about his wind, too much fourright good humour in his nature, to make him an ideal [illegible] of a story with a very far-reaching moral,

MARLEY'S GHOST. Drawn by F. Barnard.
(By permission of Messrs. Chapman and Hall.)

grasp the inwardness of the "Carol" may be foun
Leech was just then at but the commencement of hi (1840-64), and was endeavouring to qualify for the somewhat recently established (1841) Punch very much better as he became more experience able; but at no time did his intellectuality rise u humorous, almost conventional respectability, a Dickens demands much more than this. He refined upon Cruickshank, who, in his turn, upon Gillray and Rowlandson, but he never app truly into the Dickens manner as Hablot K comparison is somewhat hard, for it is undenia instances the conception of "Phiz" was superi
description which was, frequently, all that "Phiz Dickens. The difficulty which would beset a man is illustrated by the difference betw representation of Sam Weller as a humourist, and the alert, ready-f ostler which the genius of the later upon the brain of the reader.
Leech never possessed, and the conception of character which mad of "Phiz" only second to the g continued with the artist almost when he did his last work in Two Cities."

In justice to Leech it is only his work must not be judged fro that are so plentiful. His tech studied in the original edition, or edition in which the four illustra etched for the "Carol" are p original plates, as in the 1869 ed and Hall), and not from the imper reproductions of these very del which disfigure so many edition illustrations in the first brown foolscap octavo issue of the "C etched by Leech on steel, and the plates coloured by hand; and the drawn on the wood by the ar engraved by W. J. Linton—for w engraver received something unde poor remuneration for an artist was not well equipped for this had, as Dickens himself recognize admirable quality. Leech was among English humorous dra recognized that it was not necess to be funny. Into his most an he endeavoured to introduce agre sketched with considerable grace hitherto had relied for their eccentricity, deformity, contortion Personal ugliness did not ap a necessary adjunct to humour, represented the other day,"
"certain delicate creatures w countenances encased in sever that amazing garment, the ladies paletot.
fair creatures would have been made as ugl as possible, and then the point would have its career by being illustrated by an artist who, apparently, never had so much as a skeleton in his cupboard! It is, of course, difficult to set the designs and illustrations in MARLEY'S GHOST. Drawn by F. S. COBURN.

[By permission of G. P. Putnam's Sons.]

Dickens' works free from early associations, free from the glamour of Dickens' romance, and then exact a frank, unprejudiced opinion; but if it were possible the opinion would, we feel sure, not be altogether in the favour of those whose reputation has been handed down, protected by the shadow of the great writer. Inasmuch as appreciation is governed by experience the second-best remains acceptable until the best is known, and the child of five accepts without protest the scratches on his plate as real pirates, savages, cats, and railway engines, until he knows better.

The projectors of the Household Edition of Charles Dickens' complete works (Chapman and Hall) set themselves the very difficult task of re-embodying characters already stereotyped, and that it did not wholly fail is very much to the credit of those artists who illustrated it.

Not the least remarkable among them was Fred Barnard, an artist whose melancholy death is fresh in our memory. We turn to his illustrations of the "Carol" with anticipation. He sets his mark upon the very first page. Here are Scrooge and Bob Cratchit, the one old, keen, hawklike, and aggressive, the other ill-clad, suppressed, and simple almost to the verge of nonentity, and both in an atmosphere which offers no apology for being as miserable and uninviting as it can well be. It is, without question, the picture which Dickens himself described, and shows the advance that the English school of illustration had made during the memorable epoch of "the sixties." Marley's Ghost, is not, perhaps, much better imagined than usual, but the Scrooge is considerable more [illegible] and far less comfortable

Mr. Bedford contributes to the small 1900 reprint of [illegible] (Chapman and Hall), and the equally [illegible] of the appearance of Marley's Ghost by W. Cubitt [illegible] figures as the frontispiece to Mr. Dent's very dainty [illegible] 1899. Neither of these illustrators has attempted the spirit of the story, and their illustrations would [illegible] Mrs. Molesworth quite as well as Charles Dickens.

There remain two artists of established reputation, Simpson Coburn and Charles Green, R.I., who have subjects for treatment in this short story that [illegible] predecessors. It is interesting to note how the [illegible] seems to run, in some instances, upon curiously [illegible] In fact the drawing of "A lonely boy was reading [illegible] fire," by Charles Green, published in "Pearson's Annual" in 1892, is barely distinguishable from a [illegible] the same underline by Mr. Coburn in 1900. We [illegible] Green's drawings a standard of technique which others have attempted, but the realization of [illegible] meaning is not always so felicitous. Bob Cratchit's "tank" is a fairly bulky, apparently not ill-fed [illegible] rest of the Cratchit family buxom and well favoured. "Tiny Tim" has a chubby face. Scrooge, however, [illegible] four inches of his height between the time when he [illegible] children on the head" and went to dine with his [illegible] this inconsistency must be accounted for grace in [illegible] He fails to convey the pathos of the story less [illegible] has seized upon the pictorial qualities of its setting [illegible] end of it." Then the real Scrooge seems to have [illegible] himself to the mind's eye of the artist, and he drew [illegible] which is neither too good nor too bad for the part [illegible] meant he should play, and which satisfies us.

The pictorial quality is, possibly, best of all [illegible] Coburn (G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1902). More than

SCROOGE AND TOM CRATCHIT.
[illegible]
(By [illegible] of [illegible] Hall.)

We give on another page an
Mr. Gordon Browne, the son of Mr. Tom Gallon's "The Man who
a story founded on Dickens' "Chr and we may note here another Gallon, who seems to be a conse
the master. There is a rich fe in his book RICKERBY'S FOLLY
This is the good old full-blood and no mistake; a murderous villa his name, and is it not an excel villain?—playing at his old game rightful heir and stepping into hi making love to his sweetheart. On he kills the wrong person, and we have the pleasing satisfaction
the real heir and tracking the ruff Things are lively enough in this and the characters play the mos pranks. The heroine is abducted we forget how many times; she is fro like a shuttlecock, and it is poor girl loses her reason. Peop coming across each other at dea gaged in burying corpses or other and catching each other by the th hissed between their teeth. M trust, will dramatize his book.
fancy, his mission to bring Dick Certainly he sets out with that chapter is an excellent copy o manner. Here is the opening par

London, on a wild and gust spring. A night on which shut down, and men and women bu corners, and flung against e hurled boisterously into unexpe
A wild night, with heavy clouds across the moon, and a bitter whipping and cutting into passers-by. A whirling, shriek to make peaceful folk shiver and bless God that they had them.

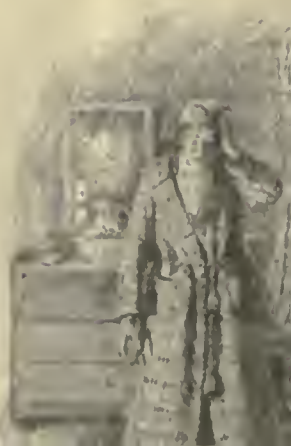
[illegible] Dickens with care, and has more than the usual literary [illegible]. His [illegible] of the light-hearted vagrant who [illegible] at Scrooge's keyhole to regale him with a [illegible] is worthy of the best tradition of [illegible], the picture of Scrooge in "the tank" [illegible] the figure of the skinflint with his dip a very [illegible], the fiddler a very real type, and no one of the illustrations other than will delight the most exacting art [illegible].

[illegible] Mr. [illegible] will lose himself entirely in his subject, [illegible] of modern Dickens illustrators. [illegible] work of "Kyd" (S. Clayton Clark), [illegible] example of which, reproduced from one of a very [illegible] of Dickens drawings by this [illegible] we are enabled to present by the [illegible] Messrs. A. Maurice and Co., we have [illegible] of the illustrations for "A

Mr. Gallon cannot keep it up to this level, but he does his best. To make amends for any falling-off in style he has gone far beyond his model in the melodramatic element—and that was no light task. We confess "Rickerby's Folly" amused us considerably, [illegible]



THE ROMANCE OF CHRISTMAS.

ROMANTICISM is the name given to the first strange utterance of the haunted man. One must say something of this first strange utterance before passing to the shadows and the dull, red fire of that Christmas eve on which a certain haunted man cast away the memory of what he heard in music, in the wind, in the dead stillness of the night.

It may be that all the great sages, the great world-poets, Æschylus, Job, Isaiah, Dante, Shakespeare, have been haunted men; for they, too, tell us what they heard in music, in the wind, in the dead stillness of the night, in the revolving years; and they, too, seem often strangely and bitterly eager to cast away their memories and their delusions. But their real message has been told so often, albeit to deaf ears, that at last we begin to understand, or at least to mimic the movement of our masters' lips, and to pause upon its meaning; for we are all poets nowadays, and there is only one meaning in all poetry. True, we often mistake that meaning and misname it. When it is almost pure poetry we are apt to call it merely fine music. We do not think how different in effect and intention how far less great

[From "Stories from La Morte D'Arthur" in the "Temple Classics for Young People" Series (Dent.) See p. 11.]

To that degree, also, we are haunted men. We [illegible] Alexander of Macedon and the steel [illegible] shouts at Issus and Arbela flitting from [illegible] into another; we that have seen Napoleon with [illegible] retreats and Austerlitz [illegible] making night hideous with tumult; we that see, [illegible] thousand million apparitions, woven from [illegible] are made of, walking the earth openly at noontide, [illegible] all haunted men!

Some, perhaps, are haunted by the sound of [illegible] bell, tolling, a great way off, in the spiritual forests [illegible] all pilgrim souls; others there are that struggle in [illegible] places of despair with the clutching white fingers [illegible] ancestry, the ghosts of sins that are visited upon [illegible] unto the third and fourth generation. Others, again, [illegible] by the homeless cry of the sea, the cry that is [illegible] upon the wintry mountains uttering the old Prometheus [illegible] man. Night and day that cry goes up to heaven so [illegible] universal sea breaks itself against the iron shores [illegible] Eli, lama Sabachthani!

Others there are who are only haunted at certain seasons, or at the performance of certain rites; but [illegible] or another probably every one in Christendom is [illegible] Christmastide. And, since we are all poets, it is [illegible] crude and conventional Christmas ghost that haunts the dream of the Romanticist.

> Between the moonlight and the fire
> In winter twilights long ago,
> What ghosts we raised for your desire
> To make your merry blood run slow!
> How old, how grave, how wise we grow,
> No Christmas ghost can make us chill,
> Save those that troop in mournful row,
> The ghosts we all can raise at will.
>
> The beasts can talk in barn and byre
> On Christmas Eve, old legends know.
> As year by year the years retire
> We men fall silent then I trow,
> Such sights hath memory to show,
> Such voices from the silence thrill,
> Such shapes return with Christmas snow,
> The ghosts we all can raise at will.

So also wrote Charles Dickens in the "Haunted Man," that exquisite little poem in prose. Dickens was the first English novelist who could paint a haunted man, the first to add the dream, the consecration, the light that never was on sea or land; the first who had the romantic conception of childhood; the first who had the romantic conception of Christmas; and being first in so many things he is naturally the butt of most of his pupils. How large a part the romantic conception of Christmas occupies in his writings is not commonly realized. Certainly he is the only writer in the language who has adequately dealt with it.

The romantic conception of Christmas is closely connected with the romantic conception of childhood, and this last is not at all one of particular gravity, wisdom, or age, as Mr. Lang's poem on Christmas ghosts would seem to suggest. In the eighteenth century the child was a thing to be educated; in the nineteenth, much to the disgust of many well-meaning but rather unintelligent men, the child was deemed worthy of almost equal reverence with stars and flowers and birds, concerning which there had been a Renaissance of Wonder. A book of the transition period was Charles Lamb's "Mrs. Leicester's School" with his account of the little girl who was looked upon merely as a thing to be educated, and avoided by her grim old aunt. The child-nature, the nature of the primitive man, is wonderfully portrayed by the true poetic instinct of the author, an instinct, in such a case, far less likely to lead astray than an empirical knowledge of the facts. The child is very lonely, rummages for comfort in the great library, finds a book that mentions one of her favourite heroes. Ishmael reads it and discovers it to be a book on the Mahomedan religion. She is greatly impressed by the solemn wording of it and especially by an account of the punishment after death of all who were not Mahomedans. Then the proselyte begins to endow in her, and she, like many another, is thrown into a fever. Her aunt sleeps with the child, and in the night, the dead unhappy night, the little one turns to the grim old lady and implores—implores her to become a Mahomedan.

The pathos of the story is the care for others, the sympathy displayed by the lonely child as contrasted with the selfishness of the merely rational human being. It is the glory of sympathy, a part of our essential nature, and not the mere reason, which is only a polished tool, almos primitive man; it is, I say, the sacred light of sympathy, even though it entails menta in the works of Charles Dickens hallows the haunted man, making him a Man of Sorrows, b child. The first novelist and poet in France to with Christmas and Childhood displays the sam life. R. L. Stevenson selects the passage wh up her little stocking and Jean Valjean fills it thing in Shakespeare, and well he might. But is the gospel of Dickens and the gospel of V gospel of every great poet since the French gospel that warns us not to fill the chambers so much lumber of what we call knowledge ab have no time or inclination to live. It is a greater gospel—"Except ye become as one of may think and think, and yet be a villain; instrument not a part of our essential nature.

It is in the light of this indubitable fact th upon the romantic conception of Christmas. beard must cry with strange reminiscence evangel—

> Behold the simple sum of things,
> Where, in one splendour spun
> The stars go round the Mulberry
> The Burning Bush, the Sun.
>
> Hoary and bent I dance one hour
> What though I die at morn?
> There is a shout among the stars
> To-night a Child is born.

Even the singer of Empire must cry to th Romance:—

> Thy face is far from this our war,
> Our call and counter cry;
> I shall not find thee quick and kin
> Or know thee till I die.
> Enough for me in dreams to see
> And touch thy garment's hem,
> Thy feet have trod so near to God
> I may not follow them.

Who holds by thee hath heaven in fee
To gild his dross thereby,
And knowledge sure that he endure
A child until he die.
Devil and brute thou dost transmute
To higher, lordlier show,
Who art in sooth that utter truth
The careless angels know.

For, in very truth, it is only our essential nature that can come into communion with the highest; it is not the reasoner, but the human child that has ever attained to the kingdom of Heaven. At Christmastide so many years have rolled away with crumbling creeds and dogmas that it is only the human child that may still see the light that never was on sea or land, only the human child for whom the music of the carols may, in Mr. Davidson's words, roll away the burden of the year:

And with the charm, the homely rune,
Our thoughts like childhood's thoughts are given,
When all our pulses beat in tune
With all the stars of Heaven.

Hush! hark! the waits far up the street!
A distant, ghostly charm unfolds,
Of magic music wild and sweet,
Anomes and clarigolds.

It was this gift of the human child that called forth those beautiful verses by Swinburne:—

Baby, baby wise,
Love's divine surmise
Lights your constant eyes,

Day and night and day
One mute word would they,
As the soul saith, say.

For the modern poet, whatever his view of finite faiths may be, has looked into the fundamental paradox and has understood that everything is true, everything exists, and the earth is only a little dust beneath our feet. The crude spiritualism of the ancient season of Christmas is dead; yet agnostic and scoffer, Pre-Raphaelite and Impressionist, aesthete and mystic, are all alike taking up and fulfilling the prophecy of Matthew Arnold concerning poetry, and the whole of the West is looking towards the light that never was on sea or land.

Christ was born upon this wise,
It fell on such a night,
Neither with sounds of psalteries,
Nor with fire for light.
Mary, that is God's spouse,
Bring us to thy Son's house.

The star came out upon the east,
With a great sound and sweet;
Kings gave gold to make him feast,
And myrrh for him to eat.
Mary, of thy sweet mood,
Bring us to thy Son's good.

Ah! we are all of us haunted men at Christmas; when the fire burns dull and red and the shadows come out to dance upon the walls and ceilings. Some time ago Mr. Kipling wrote a tale about India and the Indian Christmas, the conclusion of which was condemned by several critics as mawkish and unworthy of its author. Perhaps at this season we may be inclined to think it worthy rather of a great poet. Can we not feel that scene—the smoke of the cigars, the hot fragrance of that dusky night, the foolish chatter of the flirting men and women? And then, as human children, can we not hear and appreciate that hush, when suddenly a sound of Christmas carols floated in from the darkness; and then again the burst of chatter:—

"Oh, I hope they are going to give us another! Isn't it pretty, coming out of the dark in that way? Look—look down. There's Mrs. Gregory wiping her eyes!"

"It's like home, rather," said Scott. "I remember—"

CHILDREN'S CHRISTMAS B

[From "Fancy Far Land," Mrs. Myra Ha[illegible] stories for young people noticed in our Supplement of [illegible] (Chatham and Hugh.)

THE WORLD-RE-GOODS, by E. Nesbit (Fisher [illegible] comes very near being the best Christmas boo[illegible] When we read Mrs. Blond's delightful child-[illegible] magazine they appeared in, we hoped she would r[illegible] With their happy title and charming illustrations, [illegible] delightful present for any child; though its [illegible] probably see a fuller beauty in them. Mrs. Bl[illegible] feeling and strong sympathy with children are [illegible] needed for a writer of child-books, and what [illegible]

THE WORLD'S DELIGHT, by Mary Shrine (John [illegible] a beautiful book about children, perhaps, rather [illegible] Betty and Peggy, with their quaint ways and [illegible] things, are living, pathetic, delicious children, [illegible] weep over them. The nursery (full of little Philis[illegible] babily sniff and call them "silly." But they [illegible] they are exquisite.

THE CHILDREN'S CAMPAIGN, by the author [illegible] Peacemaker," &c. (S. P. C. K., Is. 6d.), is an exc[illegible] of how two wild little girls had a strong prejudice [illegible] "grown-ups" who seemed to them objection[illegible] adventures before the prejudice was finally co[illegible] interest any properly-minded person not yet in her [illegible]

There is a distinction of style about PRIVATE [illegible] NEW RECRUIT, by Mable C. Birchenough (Dent, 3s. [illegible] should secure it plenty of readers of all ages. It [illegible] and natural tale of a child's life, and there is more [illegible] the author's Bobs and Lancelot than we often [illegible] grown-up personages of the novelist. The two y[illegible] of whom Bobs, by the way, is a little girl, meet th[illegible] general of that name on more than one occasion. Th[illegible]

the old family retainer wore knee-breeches and "that unlovely fungus, the advanced woman, had never been dreamed of, or appeared to spoil the ideal of gentle maidenhood."

Topsy's Four Homes, by Isabel Wortley (Jarrold, 3s. 6d.), will delight hundreds of children; for Topsy is a dog, her adventures are told by herself, and she is a raconteuse; and the illustrations are from photographs—proof positive that there is "no deception."

Cosey Corner (Chambers, 3s. 6d.) is another by Mrs. Meade, prettily bound and illustrated. It tells of how four children experimented in farm-life. It is a bright and wholesome story.

The Little Colonel's House-Party, by Annie Fellows-Johnston (Jarrold, 3s. 6d.), is delightful, though English children may be a trifle bothered now and then by the spelling of the Little Colonel's conversation. In the latter part of the book she (for it is a girl, and a very charming one) talks like other people. The author made a success with a book called "The Little Colonel," which has encouraged her in writing a sequel. The result justifies her completely.

"SITTING IN THE SHADE OF AN OLD STONE-WALL."
[From "Strange Adventures in Dicky Bird Land" (Cassell).]

Four Little Folk, by E.L.S. (Elliot Stock), begins with some rather pathetic little people, immured in a town-house "where the sun only reached the front windows of the top storey, and where the windows never stayed clean, and the paint always looked shabby." They end in a paradise of cats, kittens, rabbits, hens, and a pony, after some brightly described intermediate doings.

Three Twins, by Eliezer Davenport-Adams (Blackie, 2s. 6d.), and Pats, the Sawdust Elephant, and other ol land of One Fine Day. How entertaining these q can be the readers of "The Patty Pats" will will delight in the funny adventures and i Ernold A. Mason.

For the very young also is Mrs. Moleswor stories with the not very engaging title "My P Little Brother "Too" (Chambers, 3s. 6d.).
the author's well-known manner; they are mu clear and charming pictures of Mr. Lewis Baum Picture Book (Blackie, 1s. 6d.) contains storie a dozen of gay pictures for little boys and girls book.

There is always a demand for little pl people the want is filled in an excellent fashion Book of Plays and Operettas (Warne, 2s. 6d
duces the most popular of this class of work f Something like a score of pieces is collected music, many with charming illustrations. St.
the children one more good turn in present pleasing a volume. (See p. 14.)

His Honour Judge Parry appears to be an judge of that which will delight children. He us the proper treatment and cure of "Katawa who have known his "Book of Krab" and "Butter-Scotia" will understand that, when he Book of Rhymes (Sherratt and Hughes, Mane
a mine of gay conceits and amusing verses.
supplies many drawings for the rhymes. These s admired by Judge Parry, but we do not agree

Faithful Friends (Blackie, 2s.) is a m drawings and good stories for little children :—

Faithful friends and playmates kin
In these pages you will find,
Friends that you have met before,
And are glad to see once more
You will say before it ends,
'Tis a bookful of old friends!

London is always beloved of children; th its mysteries and drain its drama and its Charlotte Thorpe has, in the Children's hall Press, 10s. 6d.), produced a book whi help the rising generation to understand its will show those at a distance what they may they come to London town. Miss Thorpe is cicerone as she is well-informed. If there is an unexplained Mr. William Luker, Jr., comes t hundreds of excellent drawings. "The Chi is, indeed, a pleasant city. (See page 15.)

ANIMALS.

Although not a fairy-book in the ordina
Kearton's Strange Adventures in Dicky-Bir 3s.6d.) is full of fascination and originality. He told by mother birds to amuse their chicks," bu ready audience, too, among those of the y feathered. Many stirring adventures went of these tales, and the birds enact thei without knowing how keenly they were ol delightful book for all who love wild nature Kearton's photographs will alone astonish interested in the habits and life of birds. Ma once well composed studies and satisfactory il stories.

The World of Animal Life (Blackie, 5s Fred Smith, the author of "The Boyhood justly claims to be strictly scientific in all written in simple and effective language. It to the animal kingdom; comprehensive but n

GRAMMAR.

From the alphabet to GRAMMAR LAND (Spottiswoode, Eton, 2s. 6d. n.) is no far cry. Here Miss Ida I. Oxer tries to help mothers to teach children under nine the difficult business of English grammar in an easy and amusing way. The drawings are not good, but they are laughable, and Miss Oxer's book will very likely effect its laudable purpose.

FAIRIES.

Following to some extent the plan of the series which Mr. Lang edits is the admirable collection QUEEN MAB'S FAIRY REALM (Newnes, Ld., 6s.). Here are well-chosen stories from the German and Spanish, with many original ones by skilful writers, all of which might well be inspired by the Fairy Queen herself. Added to these entraneing narratives are dozens of excellent drawings by such clever artists as Mr. Garth-Jones, who is particularly happy when illustrating tales with a touch of German folk-lore in them; Mr. H. Cole; Mr. Rackham; Mr. Savage, and Mr. Millar. "Queen Mab's Realm" should have many visitors.

One never need be tired of welcoming new editions of the prodigiously interesting work of Hans Andersen, and certainly the present issue of FAIRY TALES (Wells Gardner, 6s.) is one of the most engaging we have seen. Mr. Edward Clodd, who knows all about myths and dreams, primitive man and savage philosophy, writes a very instructive introduction, and Mr. Gordon Browne gives us more than one hundred beautiful drawings. Here, indeed, this artist is seen at his best; the wit, the pathos, the wisdom and kindliness of Hans Andersen find in him a truly sympathetic interpreter.

CHRISTMAS ILLUSTRATED BO

"I own that I am disposed to say grace upon twenty other oc the course of the day besides my dinner. . . . Why have we books, those spiritual repasts!"

(From "The Essays of Elia" Methuen)

ELIA.

The new edition of the Essays of ELIA, issued Methuen (10s. 6d.), is one that all lovers of Charle be glad to possess. It is excellently appointed in it has an introductory note on Lamb by Mr. E. V. whom we could not desire a better guide; and th drawings, by Mr. A. Garth Jones, are quite out of in the way of illustration. To the ordinary artis essays would probably not seem a favourable fie exercise of his talent, but Mr. Garth Jones has caught the spirit of the author, the frolicsh h occasionally, the tenderness. Mr. Lucas, by the wa none of that time-honoured epithet, the " Twenty and more years, he says, before the " were begun Lamb wrote a vigorous protest to Coleri already dubbed him the "gentle-hearted Charles." cult to see why the adjective has survived with such At the best (as Lamb himself complained) it is "and almost always means poor-spirited." " Under Mr. Lucas' own suggestion if we must needs have epithet by which to classify him. This is in every admirable edition, and the illustrations (some of whic duce), with their original and never-failing hu delightful. They are in no sense imitative, but her there is a distinct suggestion of Mr. E. J. Sullivan's " Sartor Resartus."

TO THE MOON.

From the earth to the moon is no new idea, but at least original in his method of getting there. M. J when he handled the subject, devoted one volume to arrangements, to the casting of the "Columbiad

OXFORD IN THE VACATION.

"Here I can take my walks unmolested, and fancy myself of what degree or standing I please."

[From "The Escape of Ella" (Messrs. Methuen).]

equally real. This, as we have pointed out before, is Mr. Wells' great merit—that in the wildest flights of his imagination he never loses sight of the humanity of his men and women. It is this, with the many little natural touches that he introduces so deftly, that brings home to us the most astounding adventures he prepares for his dramatis personæ. "The First Men in the Moon" is slighter and more sketchy than "The War of the Worlds" or "When the Sleeper Wakes," but it is no less ingenious in the way it is worked out, and in the air of plausibility with which it is surrounded. It is well worth reading, and the illustrations (see an example opposite) are a real addition to the reader's enjoyment.

FANCY FREE (Methuen, 6s.), by Mr. Eden Phillpotts, is one of those hard-working attempts to be funny in some twenty different pieces of prose and rhyme with which certain authors hail the season. Although many of the sketches, such as "The Nine Musketeers" and "Greensmith's Charade," are of the mildest form of humour, a few—"The Diary of a Gentleman," telling the history of a Persian kitten, "Johnson's Boswell," in which the doctor's manner is fairly well reproduced, and "Quite out of the Classics"—are extremely amusing. In verse such as "The Zoological" and "The Mate of the 'Bunch o' Keys'" Mr. Phillpotts appears as an entirely pedestrian poet; in "The Bills," as a belated parodist of Edgar Allan Poe's least interesting work. Mr. Shepherd, Mr. Stone, and Mr. Cecil Aldin each add an excellent drawing. That from the "Archdeacon and the Dignitaries" we reproduce. (See p. 11.)

To the "Lover's Library" is now added the LOVE POEMS OF BURNS (Lane, 1s. 6d. and 2s.), under the editorship of Mr. Frederic Chapman, whose previous volumes have been greatly appreciated by all lovers of graceful literature.

To all who know the pleasant and reposeful town and grand château, Mrs. Boyd's book, A VERSAILLES CHRISTMAS-TIDE (Chatto, 6s.), will prove very agree historically and personally. The serie Versailles, as it is and as it was, is w picturesque, and observant style. With again the busy people of the market, th the great gardens, and the once gay fig the palace and shone in the Galerie des S. Boyd, whose work is familiar to Pun fifty-three illustrations, many of whi (See p. 11.) "A Versailles Christmas-tide little domestic history of "the Boy," whi be of wide interest, is one of the brighte Christmas books the season has produced

The singular taste and judgment o Tuck's Christmas output show no fal from the very attractive specimens the There are, of course, some of the old-f picture-books—many people prefer the o JACK THE GIANT KILLER, CINDERELL BRITISH ISLES, PA CATS, MA CATS, AN

[From "The First Men in the Moon."]

by Louis Wain, and so on. In book for telling and artistic style of illustration are FATHER TUCK'S ANNUAL, the EMI and HANS ANDERSEN'S FAIRY TALES, SUNNY TALES, too, has one or two b pictures. Of a religious cast are THE JESUS, written by the Rev. H. R. Hav his death, OUR LORD'S MIRACLES, and

A VETERAN OF THE CHATEAU

[From "A Versailles Christmas" (Chatto and Windus). See p. 10.]

The most recent presentation of Thomas Moore's once widely read "Oriental Romance" LALLA ROOKH (F. Warne), recalls successfully the sentimentalism and florid pageantry that pervaded the literary atmosphere in the first quarter of the 19th century. Some score of American artists have here given of their best to embellish again "The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan," "Paradise and the Peri," "The Fire-Worshippers," and "The Light of the Harem." They have given new life to the beaux yeux of Zelica, and add a touch of grace and passion to the loves of Selim and his Nourmahal. So handsome a volume should do something to compensate the shade of Moore for the rather harsh treatment he has received from our generation. He has suffered by comparison with the great men who followed him. But he was a master, if only a little master, of his genre, and in that light is worthy of a good re-issue like this.

Number XII. of the series which is called by its editor, Mr. Money-Coutts, "Flowers of Parnassus" contains William Blake's famous SONGS OF INNOCENCE (Lane, 1s. 6d.). The poet's introductory lines are well known, but will bear repeating:

> Piping down the valleys wild,
> Piping songs of pleasant glee,
> On a cloud I saw a child,
> And he laughing said to me:
> "Pipe a song about a lamb!"
> So I piped with merry cheer.
> "Piper, pipe that song again;"

Whether every child will delight [illegible] in 1789, when the verses were first written and [illegible] plates, coloured by hand, that [illegible] believed they wrote for the entertainment of children [illegible] the nursery may think, this issue of "Songs of Innocence" [illegible] be welcome to the admirers of the master of fairy [illegible]

"There is no more fascinating chapter of History [illegible] Miss Tappan in her preface to OTO BARBARA IN PERSIA [illegible] 1s. 6d. n.t.," than that of old English ballads," and [illegible] will grant so much, he may find Miss Tappan's book [illegible] delight. She tells again, and with [illegible] spirit, [illegible] stories of "a simple people, loving the [illegible] endurance in the woman and valour in the man, [illegible] in the servant, and generosity in the lord."

Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton's spirited poem [illegible] THE MERMAID forms No. XI. of the "Flowers of [illegible] (Lane, 1s. 6d.). Mr. Herbert Cole has contributed [illegible] page illustrations to this dainty little volume. The [illegible] then are rather violent in action; that which [illegible] (p. 14) is of a more quiet, and perhaps a more pleasing [illegible]

Miss Beatrice Clay's selection of STORIES FROM [illegible] D'AURIEN is one of the "Temple Classics for Young [illegible] (Dent, 1s. 6d.), and has a dozen pretty illustrations [illegible] Hughes. The stories are simply and pleasantly [illegible] general get-up of the book, as with all of this series [illegible] lent. We reproduce one of the illustrations, which [illegible] good idea of the artistic method (p. 51.

BOYS' BOOKS.

WAR.

First, of course, the Boer War. Mr. Henty, who [illegible] interesting article recently in our columns on [illegible] Young, handled last year the Natal campaign "With [illegible] Natal"; this year he deals with Methuen's march, [illegible] Kimberley and Mafeking, and the advance of Lord [illegible] WITH ROBERTS TO PRETORIA (Blackie, 6s.). Parents [illegible] their boys to get a clear idea of the operations on [illegible] ley-Mafeking line can hardly do better than buy [illegible] book, which is remarkably full and clear in its [illegible] chief actions en route, and gives an excellent idea of [illegible] traversed. Yorke Harberton serves with Methuen [illegible] Carew, and comes across most of the chief men. [illegible] BULLER (Nelson, 3s. 6d.), by Mr. Herbert Hayens, [illegible] with a fine coloured portrait of the general, [illegible] pleasantly the adventures of the usual young English [illegible] up on the Natal border, who becomes one of a [illegible] called "Barker's Own," gets into and out of Ladysmith with despatches, and bears a hand in most of the fighting from Colenso to Lydenburg. An exciting tale, written throughout in short, staccato sentences. Very much the same ground is covered by Mr. Harcourt Burrage in CARRINEER AND SCOUT (Blackie, 2s. 6d.), which narrates the adventures of Hugh Dunstan, Cyril Johnstone, and other young fellows on the Natal side from Elandslaagte onwards. Needless to say, there is plenty of spirited fighting in all three of these books, and the youthful heroes come out very strong indeed.

Mr. G. Manville Fenn's work needs no recommendation to the schoolboy, with whom he is already a prime favourite. THE KOPJE GARRISON (Chambers, 5s.) is a tale of the Boer war, and opens in spirited fashion with a chapter relating how two young men in khaki started on a fishing expedition in South Africa and caught more than they bargained for. The brisk little fight that ensued is a good sample of the rest. The book is well got up and illustrated.

[From "Two Girls on a Ranch" (Blackie). See p. 15.]

Mr. Henty does not confine himself to the Boer War. Few writers can present historical information in a small compass with more interesting detail than he can. For his other two books this year he has gone to India and Afghanistan. AT THE POINT OF THE BAYONET (Blackie, 6s.) is a tale of the Mahratta avenging campaign. We note, by the way, tha illustration is inadvertently repeated, opposite pa

UNDER THE SIRDAR'S FLAG (Partridge, 2 W. Johnston, carries young Tom Craven enlistment and the Atbara and Omdurman. service and wins the V.C. in orthodox sty his adjutant. It is a stirring tale with plent marred by an unfortunate habit of using fine lan enlisting hero is Phil Western, in Captain Br GALLANT GRENADIER (Blackie, 5s.), but it is a C time, who disappoints his friends by taking lives to be captured by the Russians at the Alm in the Balaclava charge. Ultimately he wins his discovers that he is of "no obscure parentage of this kind are singularly frequent in these w writer has another spirited tale of the Box DRAGON OF PEKIN (Blackie, 5s.), which contain ing at the British Legation and elsewhere an illustrations by Mr. William Rainey. Captain better than most of his competitors.

Mr. Willis Boyd Allen has written a stor American War in CLEARED FOR ACTION (John S contains vivid descriptions of most of the naval struggle. Dewey's Manila battle and Hobson' Merrimac both come in, as well as plenty o land both in Cuba and the Philippines. Much o is taken from official and other accounts; for the chapter entitled "Hobson's Choice" is in t own words. IN SHIPS OF STEEL (Shaw, 5s.) i veteran Dr. Gordon Stables, and is written free-and-easy manner, adorned with numberless and Latin. It is very modern, as its name in young Tom Bowling Gorgon Gordon McGreg hero's somewhat remarkable name) from the marriage as a lieutenant. It is a bright and yarn, containing plenty of information about his

THE KING'S BLUE BOYS (Jarrold, 3s. 6d.) days when it was perilous for a young man to exce height. Young Geoffrey Latimer, grandson John, was a veritable son of Anak, and Miss consequently ships him off, as Wilhelm Brann in his Majesty Frederick William I.'s Grenad modern English, the unfortunate young gentl haied" in the most approved fashion. The bo and the author has got up her local colour wit plenty of excitement, especially during the comes right in the end.

COURAGE AND CONFLICT (Chambers, 5s.) is t another of these collections of stories for boys, w coming popular. It is a sumptuous volume, with above the average, and the list of authors (cont of Messrs. F. T. Bullen, Manville Fenn, Hent sufficient guarantee that the collection is wor Bullen's contribution, "A Partial Blockade," Haytian Rebellion, which we recognize as a "The Log of a Sea-Waif."

DAUNTLESS: a Story of a Lost and Forgotte Martin (Pearson, 6s.), is a fine fat money's wort valour and picturesqueness in general—readab small print and its 365 pages.

REDSKINS.

Mr. Walkey's book WITH REDSKINS ON (Cassell, 3s. 6d.) is the real stuff for boys, and n start to finish it is one breathless round of tomahawk. Blyth Cary is the chief figure, a the New England Rangers, and he goes, at Wolf the period is that of the struggle which culmin to raise the Five Nations for England, car tomahawk as a sign. His adventures begin e struggle in his bed room on the night he acc

THE ROAD TO FRONTENAC (Murray, 6s.) leads directly to the happy hunting-grounds of Mayne Reid and Fenimore Cooper, French Canadians and Red Indians. The atmosphere of the seventeenth century and all the other well-known properties are handled by Mr. Samuel Merwin with the utmost skill. He interests us at once in the desperate adventures of his characters. There is a touch of the heroic spirit in the picture of the leader in many a daring undertaking, Captain Menard.

NORMAN'S NUGGET, by J. MacDonald Oxley, B.A. (Partridge, 2s.), cannot be said to possess any graces of style, but it is full of incident—bears, Indians, gold-mining, claim-jumping by unprincipled villains, and so forth.

VARIOUS ADVENTURES.

Young Gerald Carleton has some rare adventures in THE GREAT KHAN'S TREASURE, by Charles Squire (Blackie, 3s. 6d.), which is a story of exploration in Chinese Tartary. The Mongol Karra is the young traveller's faithful henchman, and he speaks pidgin-English with immense volubility. These two, with O'Reilly the Irishman, have many strange and startling encounters with men and beasts, and one especially brisk five minutes towards the end. It is quite an amusing yarn and should do well. IN QUEST OF THE GIANT SLOTH (Blackie, 3s. 6d.) is by that prolific writer Dr. Gordon Stables, who tells in his own peculiar staccato fashion of the desert lands of Patagonia, of Bolivia, and of the lost treasure of the Incas. The Giant Sloth, to judge by the illustrations, must be a prodigiously fine animal, at least twenty feet in height. There is plenty of miscellaneous information in this volume about South America in general.

For several years now the Illustrations for Boys' Books have shown improvement, the old, bad, wooden "wood blocks" have passed into the limbo of forgotten failures, and "process" reproductions, which have taken their place, show in one or two books this year, as we think, a great advance, especially in the true presentment of values. We note this, for instance, in Mr. Barrow-North's "school yarn of merriment and mystery," JERRY DODDS, MILLIONAIRE (Chambers, 3s. 6d.), in which Mr. Harold Copping's six pictures are excellently given, while the story itself is a good example of what a boys' book should be. BEARS AND DACOITS, by Mr. G. A. Henty, and CUTSONS OF THE FROZEN NORTH, by Dr. Gordon Stables (Blackie, 1s. each), are two small books with interesting illustrations which will delight many small but romantic readers.

"Fortunately, I am a strong swimmer" says young Stephen Thirlwall on p. 66 of O'CALLAGHAN THE SLAVE-TRADER (Digby Long, 3s. 6d.). But Mr. Dudley Lampen gets so bemused by the remarkable adventures of his hero that on p. 168 he makes him say the exact opposite. "Unhappily, I am no swimmer. (It is a thing I have always regretted)." Well, it is a rousing story in spite of this remarkable lapse of memory, and has some pretty villains in it, and much high-flown language.

IN THE DICTATOR'S GRIP (Blackie, 3s. 6d.) is by Mr. John Samson, and the Dictator in question is none other than our old friend Dr. Francia, of Paraguay, famous as the subject of one of Carlyle's essays. Mr. Samson keeps close to history in his tale, but contrives to send young Stephen Herrick through plenty of exciting adventures none the less. The book should be useful to any parents who wish their sons to gain some information on that period of South American history. CAPTAIN ISHMAEL (Hutchinson, 6s.) calls itself "A Saga of the South Seas" and deals with an imaginary corsair of the days of Nelson who knocks the fleets of those times to pieces with modern rifles and modern shells. He rescues a certain Dr. Ravelin, a French inventor, from the Inquisition, and the doctor repays him by teaching workmen to construct these weapons, and by fortifying Hawk's Nest so as to render it impregnable. Mr. George Griffith is a capable writer, and possesses a powerful imagination. His book is something more than a book for boys, but no doubt it will be duly appreciated by them, as well as by their elders.

THREE SAILOR BOYS (Nelson, 1s. 6d.) is a modern version of Robinson Crusoe by Commander Lovett Cameron, in which three young [illegible] out to report upon a [illegible] in Newfoundland, [illegible] on his way out [illegible] the most remarkable [illegible] us to a mysterious [illegible] called the Man Wolf.

Assott R. Hope has for long been a [illegible] amongst boys, and many a schoolboy will linger [illegible] volume, AN ATOLL OF ADVENTURE (A. and C. Black), [illegible] contains a dozen of adventure narratives, [illegible] remarkable, but most of which are readable enough [illegible] them seem to us a little thin and hardly worthy of [illegible] narration as they receive. This is exclusively true [illegible] and Dry," "Up a Tree," and "Stuck in the M[illegible] might regale a dormitory after nine, well enough, [illegible] possess body enough to warrant inclusion in a [illegible] stories. On the other hand, "The Ontario Boys" and [illegible] Crusoe" contain a good deal of what a schoolboy [illegible] "bosh" and are salted with a humour acceptable, if a l[illegible]

In another [illegible] to each member of the party had [illegible] the [illegible]

[From 'Jerry Dodds, Millionaire' (Chambers).]

The writer might have made, we think, better play with one or two others, but it would be ungracious to be hy[illegible] over a book which we confess to have enjoyed and doubtless be fully appreciated by its appropriate patr[illegible]

IN ICE-BOUND (Partridge, 2s. 6d.) Mr. Edw[illegible]

(From "St. Nicholas Plays and Operettes" (Warne). See p. 12.)

If the reader still be young of heart and retains a pretty taste in the adventurers of the Spanish main, we can strongly recommend him to read JOHN TOPP, PIRATE (Methuen 6s.), by Mr. Wetherby Chesney, for that gentleman redresses the figures that engrossed the days of our youth with considerable skill, and retells the desperate quests, the passionate strivings, the horrors of the Inquisition, the lust for gold, and the other happenings of the world of adventure with skill and sincerity, and an almost pathetic disregard for the fact that it has all been done, although in a slightly different way, some ten thousand times before. But it must be merry to follow the history of John Topp when the heart is young.

Miss Bessie Marchant, whose "Three Girls on a Ranch" we notice on p. 15, tries, in the case of TOMMY'S TREK (Blackie, 9d.), to provide a story easily understanded of the unaided young, and her Transvaal story fulfils this intention. It is a pleasant tale with agreeable drawings by Mr. Walker and Mr. Brock.

HISTORY.

Mr. Alfred Armitage's story of the stirring times of Richard III., RED ROSE AND WHITE (Macqueen, 6s.), should not find its sale altogether restricted to the young. It is a stirring tale with plenty of fighting, and young Ralph Mortimer takes a full share in any that comes his way. Mr. Armitage has contrived many spirited scenes, and the illustrator has done some of them full justice. The story is well told in a not too archaic fashion.

A prim little heroine appears in DEB CLAVEL (R.T.S., 3s. 6d.), which has already run through the pages of the Sunday at Home. Her troubles are mostly of a religious nature, for Miss Palgrave's story is of the early days of James II., when the struggle between Puritan and Catholic was made fiercer by the failure of Monmouth's rebellion. An account of the trial and martyrdom of Elizabeth Gaunt has been cleverly worked into the plot, and the book gives a vivid and faithful picture of those troublous times.

The same sturdy Protestantism characterizes THE KEY TO THE RIDDLE (Nisbet, 5s.), by Margaret S. Conrie. Milton's sonnet has kept the persecution of the Vaudois fresh in the memory of Englishmen, and this story of the valleys of Piedmont, cleverly worked out and illustrated with more than average excellence, deserves success. The vein of romance which runs through it makes it specially

Bess and popish and treas
the machinations of trea Maxshelling Manor and it is told throughout in rath but there are some good si
the beacon fires and a touc author has a distinct fond

IN THE DAYS OF PA 1s. 6d.) is a simple boyis girls by H. Elrington with and sport, narrow escape and all the many things exciting and well-writte
The same sort of thing and always with success.

THE FIFTY-TW

Mr. Alfred H. Miles
when he started the "
Series (Hutchinson, 5s.).
imposing-looking books,
and contain a great amo for the money. FIFT COURAGE AND ENDEAVOU
rather a cumbrous tith reference) makes the thirt series, and some thirty or tion contribute each th of pluck and daring. Mr.
the company, which does n known names. FIFTY-TWO BRITAIN has one or two rather good tales.
Mrs. L. T. Meade, and Mr. C. G. D. Rob stirring stories of adventure, and the cov enough to tempt any schoolboy. Girls are TWO STORIES OF COURAGE AND ENDEAVOU contains some of the most remarkable sto our lot to read.

TALES OF SCHOOL L

Mr. S. R. Crockett has written boys' b to some purpose, so that it is natural enoug in arms, "Ian Maclaren," adventuring in t able field. YOUNG BARBARIANS (Hodder, We read it with great interest, and "Speng is a good specimen of the young barbarian a while Muirtown Seminary is a true enc

Scottish school of a quarter of a century ago. It is pleasant reading for adults as well as for boys—only Dr. Watson will always be trying to make his readers weep. He has a wonderful scent for the pathetic; and the case-hardened reviewer cannot but think he plays on that stop something too frequently. When it comes to that touching scene of "Bulldog" (the mathematical master) being brought back from the gates of death by a thoughtful scholar offering himself for a caning we confess that the author seemed to be going rather far. It is an amusing book, though, and far better written than the majority of school stories.

ACTON'S FAG (Newnes, 3s. 6d.) is by Mr. Frederick Swanson, and calls itself a "public school story." We cannot beate St. Amory's, but they do great things in the athletic line, winning the Racquets at Queen's Club and taking the boxing championship at Aldershot, beating the Eton choice in the final. It is smartly told, and a good way above the average school story. The captain of St. Amory's is the narrator. We suppose Raffles, the customary sporting tout who gets young fags into trouble, is a necessary factor in stories of school life, but we have never met him in flesh and blood. Another "public school story" is THE CHRONICLES OF DUNSFORD (S.P.C.K., 1s. 6d.). Mr. John Cartwright is the author, and he follows very much in the ordinary lines. There is an amusing trial by jury, conducted with an immense amount of pomp and ceremony. FOR THE OLD SCHOOL (Blackie, 2s.) is by a lady, Miss Florence Coombe, who displays a most remarkable acquaintance with strange forms of slang. It details the loyal efforts of the pupils at Mr. Henschel's school at Amberley to keep up their end against a rival establishment. Mr. W. E. Cule has written a story called THE CAPTAIN'S FAGS (Sunday School Union, 1s. 6d.). It is about a good little boy who gets into trouble through not owning up to breaking a window, and, needless to say, gets deeper into the mire day by day afterwards. It will make improving reading for small boys.

There is a healthy bracing air about A LOST INTERNATIONAL AND OTHER STORIES of a big boy's school by Mr. S. L. McIntosh (Brimley Johnson). Most of them tell of breathless Rugby football matches leading up to the most exciting finishes. A little long-haired boy who wears gloves turns out in the end to be a splendid half back, and so forth. The author knows the technique of the game well, and he finds an admirable "full back" to support him in his Illustrator, Mr. Jack B. Yeats.

DICK VAUGHAN'S FIRST TERM (Wells Gardner, 2s. 6d.) is by Mr. R. W. K. Edwards, whose name we recollect as author of another and more ambitious work. It is thoroughly good stuff, and the author clearly knows school life pretty thoroughly, which is by no means always the case with writers of school stories. He has humour in plenty, and can draw character, and has a refreshing sense of style. We hope Mr. Edwards may continue his history and give us Dick Vaughan's second and succeeding terms at an early opportunity. A collection of school stories is brought together by Mr. Andrew Home in a neat volume with numerous illustrations which he calls OUT OF BOUNDS (Chambers, 3s. 6d.). They are told in a pleasantly breezy manner, and some of them are very amusing. Mr. Home makes his boys more natural than do most writers in this field.

THE YOUNG ENGLAND LIBRARY.

Mr. George A. B. Dewar has undertaken to edit a series to be called "The Young England Library" (Allen, 6s.), which promises well for the entertainment and, more subtly, the instruction of boys. The library begins with the Rev. G. M. A. Hewett's book THE OPEN-AIR BOY, which deals with fishing, bird-nesting, butterfly-hunting, caterpillar rearing, ferreting, and sport in the fields and woods generally. It is full of out-of-the-way information and quaint knowledge, and well illustrated. The volume will teach something of the ethics of sport—but by insidious rather than the usual means. In the second volume of the library, SEA FIGHTS AND ADVENTURES, Mr. John Knox Laughton gives some wonderful accounts of old adventures. As Stevenson once sang:—

> Sailor tales to sailor times,
> Storm and adventure, heat and cold.
> Schooners, islands and maroons

BOOKS FOR GIRLS.

THE YOUNGEST GIRL IN THE SCHOOL, by Evel (Macmillan, 6s.), gives a vivid picture of a girls' scho quaint little crowd of affectionate (often hysterically aff and excitable small women. The little heroine ha advantage of a purely masculine education, and it has gi distinctive touch which first alienates the others and a wins their hearts. It is well-written and quite wholes gift to a schoolgirl of, say, ten or twelve years old.

GOLDENHEARTED, by M. Bramston (S. P. C. K., 1s a simple, straightforward little tale to tell, with a mor refreshingly direct. It is a young girl's novel rathe book for a child.

LIKE CURES LIKE, by Catherine Mallandaine (S. 3s. 6d.), will appeal to "big" girls. It is about a who was woo over to amiability by a niece who refu intimidated. There is a mild love-story running th This author's books are always pleasantly written and together.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND GARDEN.

[From "The Children's London" (Chatto and Windus, Price 6s.).]

HOW THE DREAMS CAME TRUE, by the author of "Swallows Come Again" (R. T. S., 2s.), is a charming ta spirited young girls. "I don't mean to do anything marry," says one of them. But she does.

TWO BUSYNODDIS, by Mrs. Arnold (Fisher Unwin, delightful book to look at. We do not altogether co the tone of it. Old-fashioned reverence for one's un parents may have gone out. But does one wish to l schoolroom admiration the young by the gifted pencil from Mr. Webster's brush (see p. 12). It is a book that all "[illegible]" girls will appreciate.

ANTHONY CHARLES'S TENANT, by Agnes Giberne (R. T. S., 2s. 6d.), is a good story, with an exciting episode of a falling house in it, and has very sympathetically drawn characters—a kindly, elderly gentleman and a very sweet young girl whom he befriends.

TEDDY'S TEA-MEW, by Evelyn Everett-Green (R. T. S., 2s.), is one of Miss Green's interesting tales. Its subtitle is "A Story of Stormy Days," for it is concerned with Nottingham riots and their troubles.

THE STORIES OF GIRL HEROINES, by Evelyn Everett-Green (Hodder, 3s.), is a fine, handsome, blue-and-gold volume of inspiring contents. No girl will read it without yearning for an opportunity to be heroic. The heroines are of one spirit but many nations. It will make an admirable Christmas present.

[From "Pilgrim Gabriel the Nice Runaway." (Dent). See p. 7.]

BONNIE HARRIETS, by W. Edward Chadwick (S. P. C. K., 3s. 6d.), is a thick, handsome book, meant for girls who have left the schoolroom. The heroine is a striking girl of a rather uncommon type. Mr. Chadwick's style is cultivated and interesting.

HEAVENLY MINSTRELS, by Amy Le Feuvre (R. T. S., 2s. 6d.), tells of two girls who were brought up in rigid seclusion by a maiden grandfather and thrown into the midst of a gay world when they grew. A wholesome and readable story.

marries quite comfortably. A blameless [illegible] the level of the very enthusiastic Press [illegible] Esler's work, which appear at the end of [illegible]

A diffident middle-aged doctor is ha[illegible] in MARGARETA BETHARINGTON (Fisher Un[illegible]) makes the most of him and the one [illegible] Margaret's visit to the Continent as gov[illegible] unusually good descriptions of German [illegible] This is certainly a book that will be read [illegible] girls.

A LITTLE IRISH GIRL, by T. M. Call[illegible] is the prettily-written story of a very enga[illegible] who are suddenly left a little property in [illegible] enough to furnish them with all manne[illegible] seals to smugglers. A fascinating tale.

TWO OF A TRADE, by the Author of "[illegible] concerns two young dressmakers who a[illegible] very different type from the other, and fa[illegible] results are the natural ones, convincingly [illegible]

TIP-CAT, by the Author of "Laddie[illegible] believe to be a new edition. It is quite w[illegible] adventures of Letty and Sybil are charmin[illegible]

DEAR, by the Author of "Tip-Cat" ([illegible] story. It is a graceful, rather sad, little [illegible] sentimental in parts.

INTO STORMY WATERS, by Mrs. Henry [illegible] School Union, 1s. 6d.), tells of a high-spirit[illegible] to live in a very uncongenial household, so a[illegible] prospects of education. Marjorie is di-ti[illegible] story is well told.

A HANDFUL OF REBELS (Jarrold, 3s[illegible] Jacksons, a name that we are inclined to re[illegible] of a lady. It tells how the Pemberton f[illegible] cousins are gradually reduced from the wil[illegible] of something like discipline by the [illegible] governess, Miss Friend. It should make [illegible] for girls.

A VERY NAUGHTY GIRL, by L. T. Mea[illegible] a handsome and readable book, a litt[illegible] setting, but depending for most of its inte[illegible] of the very original little heroine of the [illegible] vulgarity and contumacy and is softened [illegible] indulgent old uncle whom her wildness has [illegible] read it breathlessly. Mrs. Meade seems to [illegible] how schoolgirls really talk. "We have ask[illegible] to come to the castle to-night for the purpo[illegible] should you wish to be in a higher form tha[illegible] warrant?" inquires another. GIRLS OF T[illegible] same author (Chambers, 6s.), will interest [illegible] It is a lively book both inside and out.

A NEST OF GIRLS, by E. Westyn Tind[illegible] for rather older maidens and deals with an [illegible] a young teacher, whom at first the pupils t[illegible] selves. It is good reading, even for a[illegible] very handsome book for a present.

Railing as it does from the Religious T[illegible] ABOUT PEGGY (Illustrated, 3s. 6d.) is the [illegible] the young person. Peggy is of all you[illegible] delightful—vivacious, bold, timid, and te[illegible] could not but take a real interest in [illegible] congratulate her on choosing the right ma[illegible] being delayed with considerable finesse. T[illegible] Rob, Arthur Saville, Rosalind, Esthe[illegible] in whom love triumphed over Latin prose[illegible] Esther's embarrassed lover, are all drawn [illegible] little exception we must make; there seem[illegible] Rosalind should have been burdened wi[illegible] eccentricity of speech; she would have b[illegible] without it. Over all the narrative hovers [illegible] wit, and a neat but not bitter turn of sa[illegible] trations not much praise can be accorded.